Ismailis and Islam:—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, it would seem, had expressed a doubt as to whether Ismailis of whom His Highness the Aga Khan is the spiritual head, are to be regarded as an integral part of Islam. Sir Mahomed Iqbal points out that it is a mistake to regard Qadianis and the Ismailis as in the same category. It is quite clear that His Highness stands for the solidarity of Islam but his words, quoted by Sir Mahomed, sound rather like a new dispensation a reminder of a forgotten one, than that to which they have long adhered.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

840

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 1

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, February 1, 1936.

PRINCES AND FEDERATION.

The Journal of the East India Association for January prints the paper read by Sir Patrick Cadell on the "Accession of the Princes to Federation" read before the Association on the 16th October last year and the discussion which followed. Earl Peel, at one time Secretary of State for India, presided and made the only attempt at meeting the criticisms of Sir Patrick and the other speakers, nearly all of them British officials who had served in India. All those who took part in the proceedings professed great concern for the future of the States and some of them quoted from private conversations with Princes (happily dead) in corroboration of their own views. Reuter had cabled the story of Sir Patrick's conversation with the late Jam Sahib of Jamnagar. "He told me in the spring of 1932," said Sir Patrick, "that he did not believe the States would last more than twenty years after Federation. I was considerably surprised at this view but when I asked other people, some of them rulers, some Dewans, and others who, after being somewhat extreme politicians in British India, had accepted posts in Western Indian States, I found a singular unanimity that some such period as twenty years would about represent the existence of the States." Sir Stuart Fraser, another retired Indian official, put his view of the Princes' position in a hypothetical form. "I am sure" he affirmed "that in the case of a large number of Princes, when they ask themselves why they supported the idea (of Federation) the reply would be: 'Well, we did not at first quite understand what Federation meant. We did not grasp that it meant the sacrifice of certain of our sovereign rights which we have to surrender into a common pool for the sake of what is supposed to be a common interest and ambition; but we did understand that it was the wish of Government that it should take place, and our leaders, many of them the cleverest men amongst us, said it was a good thing for us, and so we find ourselves committed to it'. Sir Stuart pictured another Chief of one of the Kathiawad States with a big seaport and huge revenue from Customs asking: "Is it worth my while to accede if, as I recognise, under the principles of Federation my customs revenue in whole or in part must pass under Federal management?"

Mr. C. A. Kincaid whose gift for telling stories is known to a wide circle of readers, gave the most piquant reports of conversations with his Princely friends. One of them, "one of the most distinguished, most able, and most charming of them," whose guest he was, took him for a drive some way out of his capital town. Mr. Kincaid asked him casually, "What do you think of the future of India? Don't you think that the Congress and the extremists generally are trying to scrap your State?" The Prince replied: "Most certainly they all talk about it and publicly express their intention to do it when they get a chance." And he said, pointing to an open ground, "On that plain my ancestor, with the whole of his troops, met the Moghul Empire, was defeated and died. There, too, I shall try to save my State and die for its independence." Another great Prince whom Mr. Kincaid could claim as a friend, because he was born in his territories, was less pessimistic. Mr. Kincaid writes: "I said 'what will you do when they try to scrap your State?' He said: 'Mr. Kincaid, I have in my forts Rs. 30 crores, not your beastly paper money, but silver rupees. If they try to scrap my State my armies will cross the Jamna. The treaties my ancestors entered into with the English people I shall keep, but not when you cease to exercise rule in India'. I said: 'But you will be defeated at once by the Indian Army.' He said: 'With my 30 crores of silver rupees I shall soon win the Indian Army on my side, and I shall get myself crowned Emperor.' 'You will, in fact, Maharaja Sahib, be the new Yudhishtira'. (Mr. Kincaid had studied the Mahabharata in search of material for his short stories in Anglo Indian journals.) 'Yes,' he said, 'I shall be Samrat of Bharatkhand (Emperor of Hindustan)'. I said: "I hope your wishes may be fulfilled." But unfortunately death claimed him before the opportunity arose." The most sensible suggestion as to the motives of the Princes and also the one consonant with the claim of some of them that they had themselves started the idea of Federation several years before the Round Table Conference took it up, was made by Sir Malcolm Seton who said: "All sorts of influences have been tending to push India towards a greater unity. Some of you will remember a very able and sinister pamphlet published in the days of Lord Minto entitled "Choose, ye Princes." I do not think for a moment the Princes were frightened by that warning, but it set some of them thinking, and Indian Princes, justly proud of their inheritance and their race, began to reflect on their position in India and have become increasingly unwilling to set themselves in opposition to what the majority of educated Indians feel to be the best line of development for their country as a whole."

Sir Patrick Cadell, though he professed not to agree with the late Jam Sahib's gloomy prophesy, framed his arguments on the basis of its fulfilment. He earnestly pleaded for the continuance of the States. He said: "In the first place the British Government is, of course, bound by treaties and guarantees to maintain the States; and that obligation seems to imply that the States should not be placed in a position which will entail their early demise. Secondly, I believe it to be certain that the system in the Indian States serves a useful purpose. It is far more consistent with Indian tradition than the necessarily Europeanized system established, and now unchange-

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

341

able without greater evils, in the British Indian Provinces. It is far more of a personal rule than the administration in a British province can ever be. The average Indian ruler is not an autocrat, however autocratic his power may be in theory. He is easily accessible, and he is subject to many influences which bring him into touch with his people." All this is true, but for the fact that the protection afforded by the British Power has emancipated the Indian Princes from the obligations of tradition and the influence of social institutions. It has been more than once declared on the platforms of States' People's Conferences that, were it not for the British protection, they would be able to persuade their rulers to respond sympathetically to the people's demands. The history of the last few years proves that several Princes have ignored tradition and sentiment. Sir Patrick went on to say: "The people of an Indian State must have, it is true, if they are to live happily, certain elementary safe guards—justice in the Courts, and security of life and property. Given these safeguards, however, they have many local advantages and local interests, which they know that they would not continue to enjoy if their State became an outlying portion of a large British Indian Province." In winding up the discussion on his paper, Sir Patrick definitely stated that these elementary safeguards are already provided in the great majority of the States! The Butler Committee, if we remember, had a different story to tell. Sir Patrick further took upon himself to voice the feeling of States' subjects. In answer to his question whether they wished to join the Federation, the people whom he consulted, asked "Sahib, will it cost more?" He had replied, he hoped with perfect accuracy, that it would cost more. Then the answer, generally, has been: "Then, Sahib, we don't want it here."

As for Treaties, international jurists are becoming concerned at the absence of any machinery for the revision of Treaties which constitute the law governing the relations between States, similar to that which exists for the revision of laws in every country in accordance with changing circumstances. The only way at present in which independent nations can secure revision of a Treaty which has become too onerous or obsolete, by force of circumstances, is to break them. A war may follow and a fresh treaty at the end of it. Or, as in the case of Hitler's Germany, no Power may be inclined to challenge the treaty-breaker in the battle field, and his treaty obligations cease to have force. In the case of Indian States, even if a State finds that its Treaty with the Government of India has become a bar to its progress, it has no means of getting the Treaty revised. The disputes about seaports and customs arise from the absence of provision to adjust treaty rights and obligations to new conditions and to new ideas of good government. This is one of the questions which a Federal system will have urgently to face.

SOLIDARITY OF ISLAM.

BY SIR MAHOMED IQBAL.*

In the year 1799 the political decay of Islam reached its climax. There can, however, be no greater testimony to the inner vitality of Islam than the fact that it practically took no time to realize its position in the world. During the 19th century were born Sir Syed Ahmad Khan in India, Syed Jamal-ud-Din Afghani in Afghanistan and Mufti Alam Jan in Russia. These men were probably inspired by Mohammad Ibn-i-Abdul Wahab who was born in Najad in 1700, the founder of the so-called Wahabi movement which may fitly be described as the first throb of life in modern Islam. The influence of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan remained on the whole confined to India. It is probable, however, that he was the first modern Muslim to catch a glimpse of the positive character of the age which was coming. The remedy for the ills of Islam proposed by him, as by Mufti Alam Jan in Russia, was modern education. But the real greatness of the man consists in the fact that he was the first Indian Muslim who felt the need of a fresh orientation of Islam and worked for it. We may differ from his religious views, but there can be no denying the fact that his sensitive soul was the first to react to the modern age.

The extreme conservatism of Indian Muslims which had lost its hold on the realities of life failed to see the real meaning of the religious attitude of Syed Ahmad Khan. In the North-West of India, a country more primitive and more saint-ridden than the rest of India, the Syed's movement was soon followed by the reaction of Ahmadism—a strange mixture of Semitic and Aryan mysticism with whom spiritual revival consists not in the purification of the individual's inner life according to the principles of the old Islamic Sufism, but in satisfying the expectant attitude of the masses by providing a 'promised' Messiah. The function of this 'Promised Messiah' is, not to extricate the individual from an enervating present but to make him slavishly surrender his ego to its dictates. This reaction carries within itself a very subtle contradiction. It retains the discipline of Islam, but destroys the will which that discipline was intended to fortify.

Maulana Syed Jamal-ud-Din Afghani was a man of a different stamp. Strange are the ways of Providence! One of the most advanced Muslims of our time, both in religious thought and action was born in Afghanistan! A perfect master of nearly all the Muslim languages of the world and endowed with the most winning eloquence, his restless soul migrated from one Muslim country to another influencing some of the most prominent men in Persia, Egypt and Turkey. Some of the greatest theologians of our times such as Mufti Muhammad Abduh, and some of the men of the younger generation who later became political leaders, such as Zaghlul Pasha of Egypt, were his disciples. He wrote little, spoke much and thereby transformed into miniature Jamal-ud-Dins all those who came into contact with him. He never claimed to be a prophet or a renewer; yet no man in our time has stirred the soul of Islam more deeply than he! His spirit is still working in the world of Islam and nobody knows where it will end.

It may, however, be asked what exactly was the objective of these great Muslims. The answer is that they found the world of Islam ruled by three main forces and they concentrated their whole energy on creating a revolt against these forces.

*Islam, January 22.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

842
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb.]

Mullahism.—The Ulema have always been a source of great strength to Islam. But during the course of centuries, especially since the destruction of Baghdad, they became extremely conservative and would not allow any freedom of Ijtihad, i. e., the forming of independent judgment in matters of law. The Wahabi movement which was a source of inspiration to the 19th century Muslim reformers, was really a revolt against this rigidity of the Ulema. Thus the first objective of the 19th century Muslim reformers was a fresh orientation of the faith and a freedom to re-interpret the law in the light of advancing experience.

Mysticism.—The masses of Islam were swayed by the kind of mysticism which blinked actualities, enervated the people and kept them steeped in all kinds of superstition. From its high estate as a force of spiritual education mysticism had fallen down to a mere means of exploiting the ignorance and the credulity of the people. It gradually and invisibly unnerved the will of Islam and softened it to the extent of seeking relief from the rigorous discipline of the law of Islam. The 19th century reformers rose in revolt against this mysticism and called Muslims to the broad daylight of the modern world. Not that they were materialists. Their mission was to open the eyes of the Muslims to the spirit of Islam which aimed at the conquest of matter and not flight from it.

Muslim Kings whose gaze was solely fixed on their own dynastic interests and who, so long as these were protected, did not hesitate to sell their countries to the highest bidder. To prepare the masses of Muslims for a revolt against such a state of things in the world of Islam was the special mission of Syed Jamalud-Din Afghani.

It is not possible here to give a detailed account of the transformation which these reformers brought about in the world of Muslim thought and feeling. One thing, however, is clear. They prepared to a great extent the ground for another set of men, i. e., Zaghul Pasha, Mustafa Kamal and Raza Shah. The reformers interpreted, argued and explained; but the set of men who came after them, although inferior in academic learning are men who, relying on their healthy instincts, had the courage to rush into sun-lit space and do, even by force, what the new conditions of life demanded. Such men are liable to make mistakes; but the history of nations shows that even their mistakes have sometimes borne good fruit. In them it is not logic but life that struggles restless to solve its own problems. It may be pointed out here that Syed Ahmad Khan, Syed Jamalud-Din Afghani and hundreds of the latter's disciples in Muslim countries were not westernized Muslims. They were men who had sat on their knees before the Mullahs of the old school and had breathed the very intellectual and spiritual atmosphere which they later sought to reconstruct. Pressure of modern ideas may be admitted; but the history thus briefly indicated above clearly shows that the upheaval which has come to Turkey and which is likely, sooner or later, to come to other Muslim countries, is almost wholly determined by the forces within. It is only the superficial observer of the modern world of Islam who thinks that the present crisis in the world of Islam is wholly due to the working of alien forces.

Has then the world of Islam outside India or especially Turkey abandoned Islam? Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru thinks that Turkey has ceased to be a Muslim country. He does not seem to realize that the question whether a person or a community has ceased to be a member of Islam is, from the Muslim point of view, a purely legal question and must be decided in view of the structural principles of Islam. As long as a person is loyal to the two basic principles of Islam, i. e., the Unity of God and Finality of the Holy Prophet, not even the strictest Mullah can turn him outside the pale of Islam even though his interpretations of the Law or of the text of the Quran are believed to be erroneous. But perhaps Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru has in his mind the supposed or real innovations which the Ata-Turk has introduced. Let us for a moment examine these. Is it the development of a general materialist outlook in Turkey which seems inimical to Islam? Islam has had too much of renunciation; it is time for the Muslims to look to realities. Materialism is a bad weapon against religion; but it is quite an effective one against Mullah-craft and Sufi-craft which deliberately mystify the people with a view to exploit their ignorance and credulity. The spirit of Islam is not afraid of its contact with matter. Indeed the Quran says: "Forget not thy share in the World." It is difficult for a non-Muslim to understand that, considering the history of the Muslim world during the last few centuries, the progress of a materialist outlook is only a form of self-realization. Is it then the abolition of the old dress or the introduction of the Latin script? Islam as a religion has no country; as a society it has no specific language, no specific dress. Even the recitation of the Quran in Turkish is not without some precedent in Muslim history. Personally I regard it as a serious error of judgment; for the modern student of the Arabic language and literature knows full well that the only non-European language which has a future is Arabic. But the reports are that the Turks have already abandoned the vernacular recitation of the Quran. Is it then the abolition of Polygamy or the licentiate Ulema? According to the Law of Islam the Amir of a Muslim State has the power to revoke the "permissions" of the law if he is convinced that they tend to cause social corruption. As to the licentiate Ulema I would certainly introduce it in Muslim India if I had the power to do so. To the inventions of the myth-making Mullah is largely due the stupidity of the average Muslim. In excluding him from the religious life of the people the Ata-Turk has done what would have delighted the heart of an Ibn-i-Taimiyya or a Shah Wali Ullah. There is a tradition of the Holy Prophet reported in the Mishkal to the effect that only the Amir of the Muslim State and the person or persons appointed by him are entitled to preach to the people. I do not know whether the Ata-Turk ever knew of this tradition; yet it is striking how the light of his Islamic conscience has illumined the zone of his action in this important matter. The adoption of the Swiss Code with its rule of inheritance is certainly a serious error which has arisen out of the youthful zeal for reform excusable in a people furiously desiring to go ahead. The joy of emancipation from the fetters of a long-standing priest-craft sometimes drives a people to untried courses of action. But Turkey as well as the rest of the world of Islam have yet to realize the hitherto unrevealed economic aspects of the Islamic law of inheritance which Von Kremer describes as the "Supremely original branch of Muslim law." Is it the abolition of the Caliphate or the separation of Church and State? In its essence Islam is not Imperialism. In the abolition of the Caliphate which, since the days of Omayyads, had practically become a kind of Empire it is only the spirit of Islam that has worked out through the Ata-Turk. In order to understand the Turkish Ijtihad in the matter of the Caliphate we cannot but seek the guidance of Ibn-i-Khaldun—the great philosophical historian of Islam, and the father

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

1343

of modern history. I can do no better than to quote here a passage from my Reconstruction.

Ibn-i-Khaldun in his famous Prolegomena mentions three distinct views of the idea of Universal Caliphate in Islam; (1) That Universal Imamate is a Divine institution and is consequently indispensable. (2) That it is merely a matter of expediency. (3) That there is no need of such an institution. The last view was taken by the Khawarij, the 'early Republicans of Islam. It seems that modern Turkey has shifted from the first to the second view, i. e., to the view of the Mutazila who regarded Universal Imamate as a matter of expediency only. The Turks argue that in our political thinking we must be guided by our past political experience which points unmistakably to the fact that the idea of universal Imamate has failed in practice. It was a workable idea when the Empire of Islam was intact. Since the break-up of this Empire independent units have arisen. The idea has ceased to be operative and cannot work as a living factor in the organization of modern Islam.

Nor is the idea of separation of Church and State alien to Islam. The doctrine of the Major Occultation of the Imam in a sense effected this separation long ago in Shia Persia. The Islamic idea of the division of the religious and political functions of the State must not be confounded with the European idea of the separation of Church and State. The former is only a division of functions as is clear from the gradual creation in the Muslim State of the offices of Shaikh-ul-Islam and Ministers; the latter is based on the metaphysical dualism of spirit and matter. Christianity began as an order of monks having nothing to do with the affairs of the world; Islam was, from the very beginning, a civil society with laws civil in their nature though believed to be revelational in origin. The metaphysical dualism on which the European idea is based has borne bitter fruit among Western nations.

In the history of Muslim political experience this separation has meant only a separation of functions, not of ideas. It cannot be maintained that in Muslim countries the separation of Church and State means the freedom of Muslim legislative activity from the conscience of the people which has for centuries been trained and developed by the spirituality of Islam. Experience alone will show how the idea will work in modern Turkey. We can only hope that it will not be productive of the evils which it has produced in Europe and America.

The innovation specifically mentioned by the Pandit is the adoption by the Turks and Persians of racial and nationalist ideals. He seems to think that the adoption of such ideals means the abandonment of Islam by Turkey and Persia. The student of history knows very well that Islam was born at a time when the old principles of human unification, such as blood relationship and throne-culture, were failing. It, therefore, finds the principle of human unification not in the blood and bones but in the mind of man. Indeed its social message to mankind is: "Deracialize yourself or perish by internecine war." It is no exaggeration to say that Islam looks askance at Nature's race-building plans and creates, by means of its peculiar institutions, an outlook which would counteract the race-building forces of nature. In the direction of human domestication it has done in one thousand years far more important work than Christianity and Buddhism ever did in two thousand years or more. It is no less than a miracle that an Indian Muslim finds himself at home in Morocco in spite of the disparity of race and language. Yet it cannot be said that Islam is totally opposed to race. Its history shows that in social reform it relies mainly on its scheme for gradual deracialization and proceeds on lines of least resistance. "Verily," says the Quran "We have made you into tribes and sub-tribes so that you may be identified; but the best among you in the eye of God is he who is the purest in life."

It is, therefore, clear that if the Ata-Turk is inspired by Pan-Turanianism he is going not so much against the spirit of Islam as against the spirit of the times. And if he is a believer in the absoluteness of races, he is sure to be defeated by the spirit of modern times which is wholly in keeping with the spirit of Islam. Personally, however, I do not think that the Ata-Turk is inspired by Pan-Turanianism, as I believe his Pan-Turanianism is only a political retort to Pan-Slavonism, or Pan-Germanism or Pan-Anglo-Saxonism.

If the meaning of the above paragraph is well understood it is not difficult to see the attitude of Islam towards nationalist ideals. Nationalism in the sense of love of one's country and even readiness to die for its honour is a part of the Muslims' faith; it comes into conflict with Islam only when it begins to play the role of a political concept and claims to be a principle of human solidarity demanding that Islam should recede to the background of a mere private opinion and cease to be a living factor in the national life. In Turkey, Persia, Egypt and other Muslim countries it will never become a problem. In these countries Muslims constitute an overwhelming majority and their minorities, i. e., Jews, Christians and Zoroastrians, according to the law of Islam, are either "People of the Book" or "like the People of the Book" with whom the law of Islam allows free social relations including matrimonial alliances. It becomes a problem for Muslims only in countries where they happen to be in a minority, and nationalism demands their complete self-effacement. In majority countries Islam accommodates nationalism; for there Islam and nationalism are practically identical; in minority countries it is justified in seeking self-determination as a cultural unit. In either case, it is thoroughly consistent with itself.

The above paragraphs briefly sum up the exact situation in the world of Islam to-day. If this is properly understood it will become clear that the fundamentals of Islamic solidarity are not in any way shaken by any external or internal forces. The solidarity of Islam, as I have explained before, consists in a uniform belief in the two structural principles of Islam supplemented by the five well-known "practices of the faith." These are the first essentials of Islamic solidarity which has, in this sense, existed ever since the days of the Holy Prophet until it was recently disturbed by the Bahais in Persia and the Qadianis in India.

MARRIAGE IN INDIA.

The ancient institution of marriage, which has existed from times immemorial in India, as followed by the Hindus, has now degenerated into a mere fetish, a very cumbersome and tedious affair and needs to be shorn of all its complexities and conventionalities. The history of India depicts clearly how our forefathers, the Aryans and Dravidians, regarded marriage. Since then it has passed through various phases and has at last resolved itself into a not wholly desirable thing.

True, every country, tribe, sect and nation has got its own peculiar ceremonies and rituals. Accounts of the customs and manners relating to marriage of some communities interest us like fairy tales. But most religions and faiths treat marriage with a sacredness and solemnity. Marriage is regarded as a holy state and an indissoluble tie.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. I

Religion, having been the mainstay of the people and the broad tenets not being held open to question, generally the opinion prevailed that to break off the marriage tie was sinning against God and man.

This belief is so particular a characteristic of the Hindu faith and this notion having remained undisturbed for a long time, religion does not sanction divorce. The husband and wife are life partners, thrown into each other's path by a supernatural destiny working as the instrument of an omnipotent God, enjoined to lead a life according to the rules of Grahashta Dharma for the final attainment of the Divine state of (uncertain) Moksha. Accordingly marriage rites were designed with an especial diligence and craftiness so that the two-lives may not attempt to evade set rules. Agni, one of the upper-world gods was to be the chief witness. Others were to be invoked. A too complicated and lengthy performance was ordained, carried through a flowing stream of Mantras or Vedic hymns. The marriage rites were not to end in a day but should continue for days, four, seven and so on according to particular rites of caste. Somehow or other, the belief was to be created in the minds of the married couple that one of the most important acts of life were being solemnised, a life from which they ought not to seek avenues of escape. Who could have thought that this would descend into a money making business? All attempts at justification of these round about ceremonials would be to argue within a circle. The Hindu scriptures ask us to take for granted many assumptions and hypotheses. There is a wide gulf between marriage and religion. Marriage is not a religious function at all. It is a social affair. It is not for religious purposes that you do it. It is a means for the preservation of the race.

The Hindu girl looks with the greatest respect on marriage. It is but meet that she should do so, but the border lines are crossed when she thinks it as the greatest, perhaps the only important, event in her life that matters. Her life is not set for marriage alone. She does not come into this world for being married to a person who could bring forth any number of children. Her life has to receive and assimilate the proper amount of other ingredients that make it pleasant, happy and useful. After all, in modern days, one would regard a wife fit for a bedlam who polishes the shoes of her husband, washes his feet every morn and eve and performs pooja over them. The idea is inconceivable in the year of grace 1936. My observations do not imply in the least that the wife must not be a useful and intelligent partner of her husband.

If then marriage is to be viewed from an angle not at all religious, we should naturally think that many of the wonderful and singular phenomena that attend it none have no place. Marriage has become more or less an exploitation now; exploitation by the male's parents for money; of the priests trading upon credulity for money; for excluding healthy intercaste mingling; to exploit childhood, to exploit poor widowhood! Religion may have given caste, but not marriage. And if marriage is to be free and to have any utility, the many anomalous conditions surrounding it should be removed. Healthy marriage does not depend upon caste, community or creed. It would be national suicide in a country with such peculiar problems and difficulties as India to prohibit intercaste marriages and to persist in plural marriages when to support one wife is a serious problem, to complicate simple natural phenomena and still continue instead of abandoning age-old customs and practices which are today costly and ruinous. Happiness after marriage is to be the aim, not pomp and show, finally insolvency at the time of marriage. A healthy mind in a healthy body is to be the corner-stone and not artificiality of marriage.

Madras.

V. VENKATACHALAM.

PANDIT NEHRU REVIEWS SITUATION.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, speaking to press-representatives last week, said he hoped while in England to meet leaders of different political parties. Arrangements had already been made to meet Major Attlee, Mr. Morrison and also representatives of the Liberal Party, while negotiations with Conservative leaders were proceeding. Pandit Nehru hoped also to address a meeting of the House of Commons. Questioned regarding the political position in India after the adoption of the constitution of the India Act, Pandit Nehru, referring to the suggestion that there is a view widespread in England that the Indian question had been disposed of said that he had hesitated for a long time before agreeing to hold a meeting in the Commons because of the difficulty of saying anything effective about India in a comparatively short time. It would be futile for him and his critics to try to make points against each other. He had a feeling that those who called themselves experts in Parliament were stupendously ignorant of the condition of affairs in India. In talking about India, he started from a different set of facts than that of the average Briton and they argued in different tracks.

The problems facing India, according to his viewpoint, were entirely different from the problems of which the average Briton thought. It was extraordinary how even the Secretary of State for India was ignorant of the history of India—inevitably they went wrong from the very beginning. The Constitution Act was a "trivial affair." It did not touch a single problem of India.

One of India's biggest problems was unemployment, which was mostly prevalent among the peasant class. It started with the suppression of the old forms of Indian industry and the introduction of new methods from outside. A large portion of the unemployed reverted to the land and no outlets were provided for 100 years under British rule.

Pandit Nehru held that under the constitution they could not move their little finger towards a solution of that problem together with the problems of land and land tenure and industrial development. Further, under the Act every single vested interest in India was protected and could not be touched by any legislature or council.

CONGRESS AND REFORMS.

Asked whether the Congress Party would attempt to work the constitution, Pandit Nehru said that the constitution pre-supposed a democratic constitution and for that reason "constitutional activity" was not correctly applied to India at all. When there was no such thing as a democratic constitution the only question was whether one should break the law or not. There was not a section of political feeling in India which had accepted the constitution, although he understood that some quarters had said that they would attempt to work it. Nobody in India was thinking in terms of the constitution doing much good. As far as Congressmen were concerned, there was not the shadow of a doubt that the constitution could not be worked and nothing would be gained by working it. The only question was how to oppose it best, but on that issue he was unable to give a reply. He thought it was highly likely that the Congress would put up candidates for election, but

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

345

with the definite idea in their minds of opposing the constitution. The question of Congressmen taking office was one which they had to decide. He gathered that there was some difference of opinion on that question. Pandit Nehru averred that the India Act had mortgaged India to a number of vested interests, converting India into a magnified Indian State.

Questioned regarding the possibility of direct action, Pandit Nehru pointed out that in India such a phrase meant non-co-operation. The mentality of such an action was there, but whether it would be adopted depended on so many factors. He did not think that it was the immediate issue. Pandit Nehru declared that abnormal measures were being taken even in normal times and the Criminal Law Amendment Act hardly gave a good foundation for the generous measure of self-government to India. Questioned concerning the censorship of the press, Pandit Nehru said he would not censor the press but would certainly proceed against it if necessary under certain conditions, though without involving the Criminal Law Amendment Act and similar legislation.

Pandit Nehru declared that the communal problem was very much overrated and overstated. It was not religious, though occasionally religious passions might have been aroused. It was partly an economic problem and partly a middle class problem and largely a political problem. Indeed, there was far more religious bitterness in North Ireland than in India. Apart from occasional trouble over religious processions, the communal problem was born in the last 25 years. It did not touch the masses and it was purely a middle class struggle as to who should get more jobs. It was a political question in that it led the middle classes to think in terms of "getting the spoils". Because it was not essentially religious, he did not think it was the most difficult problem to solve. Speaking of his personal beliefs, Pandit Nehru said that his personal attitude was "Socialism completely", but how it should be applied to India depend on many factors and on the time at which it could be applied. It depended on the strength of the peasantry. The land problem could only be solved by collectivisation which would involve expropriation, but in order to have a peaceful settlement one should go as far as possible, to win over vested interests though India's resources would not make direct compensation for expropriation possible.

Pandit Nehru said he would like to spread education, and ideas of sanitation and other benefits apart from changing the land system. People would expect immediate relief from the burdens they were suffering from, but he admitted that his proposals would mean a reduction in revenue. Personally, he also wanted industrialisation on a large scale. The first item of the Congress programme was to put an end to the Government of India Act, concluded Pandit Nehru.

CONGRESS SOCIALISM DEFINED.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has sent the following message to the All India Congress Socialist Conference which met at Meerut on January 18:

"I have been told that the Congress Socialist Party is holding a Conference this month at Meerut and I have been asked to send it greeting. I do so gladly.

The members of the Party will not expect me to discuss from a far country the immediate issues that agitate the mind of our people. I am not yet in a position to do so. I can only qualify myself for approval or criticism after closer touch with my colleagues of the Congress and full discussion with them. I cannot of course retain a blank mind on vital issues affecting our country, but to give a concrete opinion requires more intimate knowledge of the exact situations and human material than I claim to possess at present. I may not therefore consider in this message the detailed programme of the Congress Socialist Party, so far as I have come to know it.

Nevertheless I desire to send the Conference and its members my good wishes and greetings. The Congress Socialist Party, as its very name implies, stands for the Congress and for Socialism. For twenty years or more I have been closely associated with the Congress and have worked for it to the best of my ability, till I have come to consider myself almost as having merged into it. I have given the best part of my life to it because I believed that it was working for the ideals that I had in my heart. Inevitably, therefore, the Congress occupies a great part of my being and the ties that bind me to it are hard as steel. I have also progressively accepted the ideology of a scientific socialism and I may claim to be now a Socialist in the full sense of the term. Any organisation that claims to represent these two ideas and ways must, therefore, have my good will, quite apart even from the detailed programme it might advance. I find further that many of my old colleagues whose opinions I have valued are now in the ranks of the Congress Socialist Party.

I have mentioned the two ways that have moved me, and I take it that they move also, in varying degrees many of my countrymen. These are Nationalism and political freedom as represented by the Congress and social freedom as represented by Socialism. Socialism, it is obvious, includes political freedom, for without that there can be no social and economic freedom. But India being unhappily still politically a subject country, nationalism is the dominant urge of most of her politically minded classes. That is a factor of primary importance and any socialist who ignores it does so at his peril. But no Socialist need be reminded that nationalism by itself offers no solution of the vast problems that confront our country and the world; it ignores indeed the world and fails to realize that in doing so it makes an understanding of even the national position impossible. For, the Indian problem is but a part of the world problem of imperialism, the two are indissolubly linked together, and that world problem is essentially an economic problem, though it has many changing phases.

To continue these two outlooks and make them an organic whole is the problem of the Indian Socialist. Scientific Socialism itself teaches us not to follow slavishly any dogma or any other country's example, which may have resulted from entirely different circumstances. Armed with a philosophy which reveals the inner workings of history and human relations and with the scientific outlook to guide him, the Socialist tries to solve the problems of each country in relation to its varied background and stage of economic development, and also in relation to the world. It is a hard task. But then there is no easy way.

Ideas are the essential basis for action. But behind ideas there must be the men to carry them out and the character and discipline to translate them into results. No Socialist can be true to his creed or mission if he seeks satisfaction merely in brave ideas and in criticism of others who do not argue with him. This is the way of facile intellectual opportunism. He has to remember that he is no armchair politician but one working for an object—for achievement, and achievement requires character and discipline and united

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

346 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 1

action and the readiness to sacrifice the individual self for the larger cause. That discipline and character, have been sadly lacking in India in recent months and the brave memory of united and effective action is almost a dream that has faded. It is for us to make that dream real again, and real in an even more fundamental sense than it was in the past, for in the future it must be built up on a clear and well-understood ideology.

'THE MAN AMONG KINGS'

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

If living is a fine art, King George was perhaps its greatest exponent in recent times. The simple human traits in his career which outshone splendour and pomp and pageant of a colourful imperial character revealed an inward discipline which, without effort or austerity appear to have been almost a second nature with him. No greater legacy could a sovereign leave to his Empire in the life he lived, than what stands bequeathed by this man among kings, whose demise the world all over mourns to-day.

Singularly free from pride of Empire, what was most marvellous in his life was that he always and unerringly returned in the privacy of his heart to its simple human basis for refuge each time after performing this or that function, discharging this or that royal duty to which his august position was called, as if with the ruling conviction that that position was after all adventitious.

For proof of this detached attitude of mind we need not go far beyond the tone, temper and earnestness of his very recent Christmas and Jubilee Broadcast messages to listen to which he called his people all over the far flung Empire. What was his singular good fortune, was that it was during his reign time and distance were almost annihilated as if the kindly Providence meant to set a premium on his yearning to get into closer touch with them. There could be no doubt that his heartfelt greetings made every listener to feel that he or she was a member of the great family of the British Commonwealth and the speaker was only a Patriarch intimately talking to every one of them face to face from the hearth of his home, breathing in every word he uttered a burning sense of sympathy and fellowship to all, even children not excepted, and not the King Emperor addressing from his Throne.

There may be many who may differ, and violently differ, from all that he is made rightly or wrongly to stand for in Royal convention in the political sphere, but it would be sacrilegious on an occasion like this to confound it all up with simple human graces which adorned his life. He showed that one needed no kingship to be great at heart and could even be that in spite of such kingship.

It is given to few to be a King or Emperor but it is open to all on the fair face of earth to endeavour to live a simple normal human life and earn the kind of beautiful death which fell to the lot of this man among kings.

The new king is a great lover of little children and according to the small anecdotes we have been hearing of his doings and his unconventional ways, His Majesty has every promise of following in the foot steps of his Royal Sire, and is it wrong for us to expect that it might be given to him even to excel his ancestor to that superb human estate?

The whole picture puts me in mind of a familiar Sanskrit saying of old which I can not resist reproducing in conclusion.

'Yadi raama yadieha Rama
Thanayo vinayagunopetah
Thanayo thanayotpathih
Suravara magare kimadhikyam'

Rendered into English it would read as follows:

'With a woman as good as Lakshmi (consort of God Vishnu) for a wife, with one endowed with true humility for a son, and a son born to that son, what else could there be to excel even in Indra's abode (Heaven).

Penukonda,
(Anantapur Dist.)
24th January 1936.

T. SIVASANKARAM.

MRS. SANGER'S INTERVIEW WITH MAHATMA GANDHI*

Gandhiji poured his whole being into his conversation. He revealed himself inside out, giving Mrs. Sanger an intimate glimpse of his own private life. He also declared to her his own limitations, especially the stupendous limitation of his own philosophy of life—a philosophy that seeks self-realization through self-control, and said that for him there could be one solution and one alone. "I could not recommend the remedy of birth control to a woman who wanted my approval. I should simply say to her: 'My remedy is of no use to you. You must go to others for advice.' Mrs. Sanger cited some hard cases. "I agree," said Gandhiji, "there are hard cases. Else birth control enthusiasts would have no case. But I would say, do devise remedies by all means, but the remedies should be other than the ones you advise. If you and I as moral reformers put our foot down on this remedy and said, 'You must fall back on other remedies,' those would surely be found." Both seemed to be agreed that woman should be emancipated, that woman should be the arbiter of her destiny. But Mrs. Sanger would have Gandhiji work for woman's emancipation through her pet device, just as believers in violence want Gandhiji to win India's freedom through violence, since they seem to be sure that non-violence can never succeed.

Well, this is what he said: "My wife I made the orbit of all women. In her I studied all women. I came in contact with many European women in South Africa, and I knew practically every Indian woman there. I worked with them. I tried to show them they were not slaves either of their husbands or parents, not only in the political field but in the domestic as well. But the trouble was that some could not resist their husbands. The remedy is in the hands of women themselves. The struggle is difficult for them, and I do not blame them. I blame the men. Men have legislated against them. Man has regarded woman as his tool. She has learned to be his tool and in the end found it easy and pleasurable to be such, because when one drags another in his fall the descent is easy.....I have felt that during the years still left to me if I can drive home to women's minds the truth that they are free, we will have no birth control problem in India. If they will only learn to say 'no' to their husbands when they approach them carnally! I do not suppose all husbands are brutes and if women only know how to resist them, all will be well. I have been able to teach women who have come in contact with me how to resist their husbands. The real problem is that many do not want to resist them...No resistance bordering upon bitterness will be necessary in 99 out of 100 cases. If a wife says to her husband, 'No, I do not want it,' he will make no trouble.

* Harbian, January 25.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

347

But she hasn't been taught. Her parents in most cases, won't teach it to her. There are some cases, I know, in which parents have appealed to their daughters' husbands not to force motherhood on their daughters, and I have come across amenable husbands too. I want woman to learn the primary right of resistance. She thinks now that she has not got it."

Gandhiji told her that when she went to Calcutta she would be told by those who knew what havoc contraceptives had worked among unmarried young men and women. But evidently for the purpose of the conversation, at any rate, Mrs. Sanger confined herself to propagation of knowledge of birth control among married couples only.

What was to be done with couples who wanted to resist the impulse of sex and yet could not do so?

Mrs. Sanger was thus led on to her apotheosis of "sex-love", which she said "is a relationship which makes for oneness, for completeness between husband and wife and contributes to a finer understanding and a greater spiritual harmony." The distinction that Gandhiji drew between love and lust will be evident from the following excerpts from the conversation:

G.: When both want to satisfy animal passion without having to suffer the consequences of their act it is not love, it is lust. But if love is pure, it will transcend animal passion and will regulate itself. We have not had enough education of the passions. When a husband says, "Let us not have children, but let us have relations," what is that but animal passion? If they do not want to have more children they should simply refuse to unite. Love becomes lust the moment you make it a means for the satisfaction of animal needs. It is just the same with food. If food is taken only for pleasure it is lust. You do not take chocolates for the sake of satisfying your hunger. You take them for pleasure and then ask the doctor for an antidote. Perhaps you tell the doctor that whisky befores your brain and he gives you an antidote. Would it not be better not to take chocolates or whisky?"

Mrs. S.: No, I do not accept the analogy.

G.: Of course you will not accept the analogy because you think this sex expression without desire for children is a need of the soul, a contention I do not endorse.

Mrs. S.: Yes, sex expression is a spiritual need and I claim that the quality of this expression is more important than the result, for the quality of the relationship is there regardless of results. We all know that the great majority of children are born as an accident, without the parents having any desire for conception. Seldom are two people drawn together in the sex act by their desire to have children.....Do you think it possible for two people who are in love, who are happy together, to regulate their sex act only once in two years, so that relationship would only take place when they wanted a child? Do you think it possible?

G.: I had the honour of doing that very thing and I am not the only one.

Mrs. Sanger thought it was illogical to contend that sex union for the purpose of having children would be love and union for the satisfaction of the sexual appetite was lust, for the same act was involved in both. Gandhiji immediately capitulated and said he was ready to describe all sexual union as partaking of the nature of lust. He made the whole thing abundantly clear by citing facts from his own life. "I know," he said, "from my own experience that as long as I looked upon my wife carnally, we had no real understanding. Our love did not reach a high plane. There was affection between us always, but we came closer and closer the more we or rather I became restrained. There never was want of restraint on the part of my wife. Very often she would show restraint, but she rarely resisted me although she showed disinclination very often. All the time I wanted carnal pleasure I could not serve her. The moment I bade good-bye to a life of carnal pleasure our whole relationship became spiritual. Lust died and love reigned instead."

Mrs. Sanger is so impatient to prove that Gandhiji is a visionary that she forgets the practical ways and means that Gandhiji suggested to her.

"Must the sexual union take place only three or four times in an entire lifetime?" she asked.

"Why should people not be taught," replied Gandhiji, "that it is immoral to have more than three or four children and that after they have had that number they should sleep separately? If they are taught this it would harden into custom. And if social reformers cannot impress this idea upon the people, why not a law? If husband and wife have four children, they would have had sufficient animal enjoyment. Their love may then be lifted to a higher plane. Their bodies have met. After they have had the children they wanted, their love transforms itself into a spiritual relationship. If these children die and they want more, then they may meet again. Why must people be slaves of this passion when they are not of others? When you give them education in birth control, you tell them it is a duty. You say to them that if they do not do this thing they will interrupt their spiritual evolution. You do not even talk of regulation. After giving them education in birth control, you do not say to them, 'thus far and no further'. You ask people to drink temperately, as though it was possible to remain temperate. I know these temperate people."

And yet as Mrs. Sanger was so dreadfully in earnest Gandhiji did mention a remedy which could conceivably appeal to him. That method was the avoidance of sexual union during unsafe periods confining it to the "safe" period of about ten days during the month. That had at least an element of self-control which had to be exercised during the unsafe period.

But I come to a third aspect of Mrs. Sanger. Her address to the World Fellowship of Faiths is most revealing. She frankly speaks there on behalf of her country where "there are more criminal abortions performed than in any other country in the world. The national total of abortions has been estimated to top 2,000,000 per year. This total does not include the number brought about by drugs or by instruments used by the pregnant women herself." Let it be remembered that it is not only the married woman who is thought of here. It is the unmarried woman too, and Mrs. Sanger would not really mind arming them with contraceptives.

But I have come across in her address a startling argument which would take away from the seriousness of all her other arguments. "Japan, is breaking her own record for population increase! The whole crisis in the Far East—so menacing to the peace of the world at large—grows out of this 'full speed ahead' cradle competition between Asiatic races. Is it not time for the League of Nations or the World Court to turn on this red traffic light? Japan's determination to find an outlet for this surplus population precipitates the so-called 'undeclared war' against the Chinese, the creation of the puppet state of Manchukuo, the breaking of solemn treaties, the sowing of the seeds of another World War." Another yellow peril? Is it a humanitarian that speaks here or some-one vastly different therefrom? I wonder.

M. D.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

348
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 1

INDIAN FEDERATION OF INTERNATIONAL FELLOWSHIPS.

The Federation of International Fellowships has for its motto, "Under one heaven, one family". Its Council is composed of two representatives appointed by each Local Fellowship and co-opted members, among the latter being Mahatma Gandhi, Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastry, Mr. O. Kandaswami Chetty, Mr. G. D. Birla, Mr. J. M. Kumarappa and Mr. Verrier Elwin. Professor P. A. Wadia is Chairman of the Council. The Council held its last meeting at Wardha from the 27th to 31st December last, and passed important resolutions on (1) propaganda about India, (2) Conversion and (3) Village service on an inter-religious basis. The resolution on the subject of propaganda by missionary bodies through films and exhibitions, runs thus: "This Council of the Federation of International Fellowships, a body which exists to promote better understanding between people of different races and different faiths, having read with interest the statement issued by the British Missionary Film Committee, that films are being produced depicting sympathetically Indian life to illustrate the work of the Christian Church in India, venture to suggest that this end will be best served, if, in the further plans for the making of these films and before they are publicly exhibited, a Committee of representative Indians be consulted. Reports received lead us to believe that unless something of this kind is done, serious protests will be made on the ground that such films are likely to cause misunderstanding or strained relationship between British people and Indian people, between Indian Christians and other Indians and between Christians and Christian Missionaries in India, resulting in serious harm to the cause of the Christian Church in India." With regard to exhibitions and other such agencies of propaganda, we would suggest that, as far as possible, similar methods be adopted.

We would further suggest that in all missionary propaganda, whether through films or exhibitions, literature or addresses by missionaries, or other means, due reference be made to similar efforts that are being made by non-Christian agencies for the social and spiritual uplift of the people of India." Propaganda by agencies other than missions, was also considered. It was resolved that in view of the false interpretation of Indian life contained in many productions such as films, literature and lectures, this meeting authorises the officers of the Fellowship to get in touch with such bodies as might be helpful to prevent such things being done both in Europe and America.

The Council further resolved that in view of the fact that tourists from foreign countries visiting India often return without a proper understanding of the Indian people and their culture for lack of opportunity of coming into contact with representative Indians, this Council solicits the co-operation of the Local Fellowships and its members in making possible such contacts. The General Secretary be asked to get in touch with various organisations abroad which might keep him informed of such visitors. In view of the fact that the peoples of the West have an opportunity of having Indian life and culture interpreted to them from the Indian point of view, this Council requests the Local Fellowships and its members to inform the General Secretary the names of responsible Indians who are going overseas in order that their services may be utilised for this purpose.

The Council adopted important resolutions bearing on the subject of conversions. They are as follows, "This Council recognises the right of the individual to conversion in the sense of a purely spiritual change of heart, whether within the faith of his birth or to another faith, realising that it is the purpose of God that all His children shall have personal knowledge of and communion with Him. This implies that conversion is to be understood only in the sense of the turning of the soul to God. This Council, while recognising the right of the Harijans to adopt any legitimate means for their social and economic betterment, cannot regard migration of the Harijan community from one faith to another for such purposes as in the category of conversion. As a Fellowship we record our deep sympathy with the Harijans in their struggle for freedom and respectfully suggest to the leaders of the Hindu religion that the present crisis is a call to them for a deeper consideration of the destiny and birthright of these children of God. This Council, while appreciating the good and valuable work that is being done by the various Missionary groups in the country, feels that such work is very often misunderstood because of a lurking suspicion in the minds of the people of this country that there is lack of sympathy towards and lack of understanding of Indian national aspirations on the part of these various groups. This Council commends this opinion for due consideration on the part of Missionary friends, in different Fellowships in the country.

With regard to village service on an inter-religious basis, the Council approved in general the scheme of rural reconstruction in India on an inter-religious basis, presented by the Rev. R. R. Keithahn, and appointed the Rev. R. R. Keithahn, and Dr. (Mrs.) Keithahn to be responsible for this work. The following Committee be appointed to act as an Advisory Body:—

Seth Jannalal Bajaj, Wardha; Rev. H. A. Popley, Erode; Mr. S. S. Bharathi, Chitambaram; Mr. S. V. Ramamurthi, Salem; Mr. M. Jamal Mohammed, Madras; Mr. C. Rajagopalachari, Tiruchengodu; Mr. J. N. Jayakaran, Coimbatore; and Mr. R. R. Keithahn (Convener).

MISSIONARIES AND WAR.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Dear Editor,

In a world where the forces of religion are finding themselves more and more in conflict with those of materialism it is significant to know what are the ideals of the opponents. A recent poll of the Peace-convictions of the congregational church of the U. S. A. has revealed the attitudes of its missionaries. The report comes as follows:

"Up to December 19th, votes had been received from 227 of the 492 missionaries of the American Board (over 50 of them in India) to whom ballots had been sent. Their detailed vote is as follows:

A. I believe as a Christian I should bear arms in or otherwise support:

1. Any war which the United States Government may declare ... 5 2%.
2. Any war declared by the United States Government against an internationally recognized aggressor ... 13 6%.
3. Only a war declared by the United States Government after making utmost use of every agency for peace. 57 25%.
4. Only a war in which United States territory has been invaded. ... 17 7%.
5. No war which the United States

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

349

Government may declare ... 183 60%
 B. In the meantime I will work for peace by advocating for our country: Yes No.

1. Membership in the League of Nations ...	193	90%	22
2. Consultation with other nations in support of the Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact and other peace agreements ...	217	98%	3
3. National isolation through strict neutrality legislation ...	44	28%	148
4. More equal distribution of world resources and markets ...	209	99%	2
5. A larger army, navy and air force ...	1	0%	200
6. Abolition of compulsory or military training ...	216	98%	5
7. Government control of the munitions industry ...	217	100%	1

Missionaries are often said to be the best workers for world peace and friendship as they represent the best of their country. Such questionnaires as the above will do much to help us ascertain the correctness of that point of view.

Devkotte, S. India, } Yours sincerely,
 Jan. 27, 1936. } RALPH RICHARD KEITHAHN.

NEGRO DELEGATION AT SANTINIKETAN.

The Negro delegation arrived of which Dr. Thurman, leader of the delegation in an interview, to the press said, 'Ever since my meeting with Dr. Tagore in America and London, I looked forward to coming to Santiniketan and hence I am very happy today. Our mission is a pilgrimage of friendship from the students of America to the students of India. We have received wonderful response everywhere and we are thankful for the same. We are interested in Indian arts and music too.'

Dr. Thurman is staying here for five days and others will be leaving tomorrow. The delegation is meeting the poet in the afternoon.—A. P. I.

300 CHAMARS EMBRACE CHRISTIANITY.

With reference to the press report that 5,000 Harijan Hindus of Agra villages have embraced Christianity, Mr. A. V. Thakker, General Secretary of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, has shown that only about 300 Chamars of ten villages, near Khandoli, changed their faith on account of the bank realising its dues from the Chamars. Mr. Thakkar adds that the officials of the bank sought help from police who are said to have beaten the defaulters. Christian Missionaries helped some of the latter by stepping between them and the bank authorities, promising settlement of the dues by instalments. On account of this relief, Chamars, with their dependents, changed their faith.

Pickwick Festival in London.—Delegates from the Dickens Fellowship in all parts of the world are coming to London in the last week of March for the centenary of the first monthly number of The Pickwick Papers.

They will see "Pickwickians" drive in a coach from London to Rochester. They will attend a luncheon arranged by the Mayor of Portsmouth—Dickens' birthplace—and a dinner at which a toast to the memory of Dickens will be proposed by the Duke of Kent.

During the visit, the valuable Forster collection of manuscripts of nearly all Dickens' works will be on view at a special exhibition at the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

Another exhibition devoted to The Pickwick Papers is being arranged at 48, Doughty Street, London, where the work was completed in 1837.

The exhibits at the latter exhibition alone are expected to number more than a thousand.—Reuter.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED ... Rs. 60,00,000
 CAPITAL PAID-UP ... " 20,00,000
 RESERVE FUND ... " 22,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
 Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)
 Sheth Todarmal Chimanlal Samal Bhojar, (Mill Agent Baroda).
 Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Giridharlal Desabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
 Raj Ratna Bhaillal Daljibhai Amin, B.A., M. S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
 Seth Pransukhlal Ma.atalal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)
 Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Waichand Hirachand (Bombay).
 Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 3 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
 Burma sailing at Galle Tuticorin
 Colombo and other coast ports
 according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents.

Sudama House, 81, Sprout Road, Ballard Estate,
 2-26 Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

348

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 1

realpatidar.com

INDIAN FEDERATION OF INTERNATIONAL FELLOWSHIPS.

The Federation of International Fellowships has for its motto, "Under one heaven, one family". Its Council is composed of two representatives appointed by each Local Fellowship and co-opted members, among the latter being Mahatma Gandhi, Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastry, Mr. O. Kandaswami Chetty, Mr. G. D. Birla, Mr. J. M. Kumarappa and Mr. Verrier Elwin. Professor P. A. Wadia is Chairman of the Council. The Council held its last meeting at Wardha from the 27th to 31st December last, and passed important resolutions on (1) propaganda about India, (2) Conversion and (3) Village service on an inter-religious basis. The resolution on the subject of propaganda by missionary bodies through films and exhibitions, runs thus: "This Council of the Federation of International Fellowships, a body which exists to promote better understanding between people of different races and different faiths, having read with interest the statement issued by the British Missionary Film Committee, that films are being produced depicting sympathetically Indian life to illustrate the work of the Christian Church in India, venture to suggest that this end will be best served, if, in the further plans for the making of these films and before they are publicly exhibited, a Committee of representative Indians be consulted. Reports received lead us to believe that unless something of this kind is done, serious protests will be made on the ground that such films are likely to cause misunderstanding or strained relationship between British people and Indian people, between Indian Christians and other Indians and between Christians and Christian Missionaries in India, resulting in serious harm to the cause of the Christian Church in India." With regard to exhibitions and other such agencies of propaganda, we would suggest that, as far as possible, similar methods be adopted.

We would further suggest that in all missionary propaganda, whether through films or exhibitions, literature or addresses by missionaries, or other means, due reference be made to similar efforts that are being made by non-Christian agencies for the social and spiritual uplift of the people of India." Propaganda by agencies other than missions, was also considered. It was resolved that in view of the false interpretation of Indian life contained in many productions such as films, literature and lectures, this meeting authorises the officers of the Fellowship to get in touch with such bodies as might be helpful to prevent such things being done both in Europe and America.

The Council further resolved that in view of the fact that tourists from foreign countries visiting India often return without a proper understanding of the Indian people and their culture for lack of opportunity of coming into contact with representative Indians, this Council solicits the co-operation of the Local Fellowships and its members in making possible such contacts. The General Secretary be asked to get in touch with various organisations abroad which might keep him informed of such visitors. In view of the fact that the peoples of the West have an opportunity of having Indian life and culture interpreted to them from the Indian point of view, this Council requests the Local Fellowships and its members to inform the General Secretary the names of responsible Indians who are going overseas in order that their services may be utilised for this purpose.

The Council adopted important resolutions bearing on the subject of conversions. They are as follows, "This Council recognises the right of the individual to conversion in the sense of a purely spiritual change of heart, whether within the faith of his birth or to another faith, realising that it is the purpose of God that all His children shall have personal knowledge of and communion with Him. This implies that conversion is to be understood only in the sense of the turning of the soul to God. This Council, while recognising the right of the Harijans to adopt any legitimate means for their social and economic betterment, cannot regard migration of the Harijan community from one faith to another for such purposes as in the category of conversion. As a Fellowship we record our deep sympathy with the Harijans in their struggle for freedom and respectfully suggest to the leaders of the Hindu religion that the present crisis is a call to them for a deeper consideration of the destiny and birthright of these children of God. This Council, while appreciating the good and valuable work that is being done by the various Missionary groups in the country, feels that such work is very often misunderstood because of a lurking suspicion in the minds of the people of this country that there is lack of sympathy towards and lack of understanding of Indian national aspirations on the part of these various groups. This Council commends this opinion for due consideration on the part of Missionary friends, in different Fellowships in the country.

With regard to village service on an inter-religious basis, the Council approved in general the scheme of rural reconstruction in India on an inter-religious basis, presented by the Rev. R. R. Keithahn, and appointed the Rev. R. R. Keithahn, and Dr. (Mrs.) Keithahn to be responsible for this work. The following Committee be appointed to act as an Advisory Body:—

Seth Jannalal Bajaj, Wardha; Rev. H. A. Popley, Erode; Mr. S. S. Bharathi, Chitambaram; Mr. S. V. Ramamurthi, Salem; Mr. M. Jamal Mohammed, Madras; Mr. C. Rajagopalachari, Tiruchengodu; Mr. J. N. Jayakaran, Coimbatore; and Mr. R. R. Keithahn (Convener).

MISSIONARIES AND WAR.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Dear Editor,

In a world where the forces of religion are finding themselves more and more in conflict with those of materialism it is significant to know what are the ideals of the opponents. A recent poll of the Peace convictions of the congregational church of the U. S. A. has revealed the attitudes of its missionaries. The report comes as follows:

"Up to December 19th, votes had been received from 227 of the 492 missionaries of the American Board (over 50 of them in India) to whom ballots had been sent. Their detailed vote is as follows:

A. I believe as a Christian I should bear arms in or otherwise support

1. Any war which the United States Government may declare ... 5 2%.
2. Any war declared by the United States Government against an internationally recognized aggressor ... 13 6%.
3. Only a war declared by the United States Government after making utmost use of every agency for peace. 37 25%.
4. Only a war in which United States territory has been invaded, ... 17 7%.
5. No war which the United States

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

349

Government may declare	183	60%
B. In the meantime I will work for peace by advocating for our country:	Yes	No.
1. Membership in the League of Nations	193	90% 22
2. Consultation with other nations in support of the Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact and other peace agreements	217	98% 3
3. National isolation through strict neutrality legislation	44	28% 148
4. More equal distribution of world resources and markets	209	99% 2
5. A larger army, navy and air force	1	0% 200
6. Abolition of compulsory or military training	216	98% 5
7. Government control of the munitions industry	217	100% 1

Missionaries are often said to be the best workers for world peace and friendship as they represent the best of their country. Such questionnaires as the above will do much to help us ascertain the correctness of that point of view.

Yours sincerely,
Jan. 27, 1936. } RALPH RICHARD KEITHAHN.

NEGRO DELEGATION AT SANTINIKETAN.

The Negro delegation arrived of which Dr. Thurman, leader of the delegation in an interview, to the press said, 'Ever since my meeting with Dr. Tagore in America and London, I looked forward to coming to Santiniketan and hence I am very happy today. Our mission is a pilgrimage of friendship from the students of America to the students of India. We have received wonderful response everywhere and we are thankful for the same. We are interested in Indian arts and music too.'

Dr. Thurman is staying here for five days and others will be leaving tomorrow. The delegation is meeting the poet in the afternoon.—A. P. I.

300 CHAMARS EMBRACE CHRISTIANITY.

With reference to the press report that 5,000 Harijan Hindus of Agra villages have embraced Christianity, Mr. A. V. Thakker, General Secretary of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, has shown that only about 300 Chamars of ten villages, near Khandoli, changed their faith on account of the bank realising its dues from the Chamars. Mr. Thakkar adds that the officials of the bank sought help from police who are said to have beaten the defaulters. Christian Missionaries helped some of the latter by stepping between them and the bank authorities, promising settlement of the dues by instalments. On account of this relief, Chamars, with their dependents, changed their faith.

Pickwick Festival in London.—Delegates from the Dickens Fellowship in all parts of the world are coming to London in the last week of March for the centenary of the first monthly number of The Pickwick Papers.

They will see "Pickwickians" drive in a coach from London to Rochester. They will attend a luncheon arranged by the Mayor of Portsmouth—Dickens' birthplace—and a dinner at which a toast to the memory of Dickens will be proposed by the Duke of Kent.

During the visit, the valuable Forster collection of manuscripts of nearly all Dickens' works will be on view at a special exhibition at the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

Another exhibition devoted to The Pickwick Papers is being arranged at 48, Doughty Street, London, where the work was completed in 1837.

The exhibits at the latter exhibition alone are expected to number more than a thousand.—Reuter.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED ... Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP ... " 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND ... " 22,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (M.N. Agent, Ahmedabad.)
Sheth Todarmal Chimanlal Samal Beehar, Mill Agent Baroda.
Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharlal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda.
Raj Ratna Bhaillal Daljibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Ma.atalal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Bombay).
Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B.A., LL.B., A.M., Pon Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,
General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta, Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin Colombo and other coast ports according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents.

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate, Bombay.

2-26

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

VI OF 1882,
HEAD OFFICE;

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

AHMEDABAD.
 AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
 CALCUTTA.
 CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
 NAGPUR CITY.
 POONA.
 POONA CITY.
 RAJKOT.
 SURAT.

Capital Subscribed		Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up		„ 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund		„ 1,02,50,000

London Agents: The Westminster Bank Ltd

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

* Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA.

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

The articles which appeared in THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER, have been reprinted in book form. Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra,
BOMBAY 20.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay

BRANCHES

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulia (District West Khandesh)
Tadgaon (" ")	Doodaicha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirkolkarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kepergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nasik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Paigar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Aklul (District Sholapur)

DIRECTOR

Sir Chhannul V. Mehta, K.O.S.I., Sir Lalrubal Samaldas, Kt., Madhwojee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	Prof. V. G. Kale, R. K. Rajadnya, Esq., A. P. Kulkarni, Esq., D. W. Bant, Esq., F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq., C. M. Gandhi, Esqr., Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar V. L. Mehta, Esq., R. G. Sarlaya, Esq., G. P. Murchshwar, Esq., G. K. Devadhar, Esq., S. N. Keshvain, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid)	...	...	...	Rs. 12,96,000
--------------	-----	-----	-----	---------------

1 DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

8. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 4 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VALKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

THE
Central Bank of India, Ltd.
SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a
HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT
 with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA.

Managing Director

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

351

realpatidar.com

QUALITY 1.

So-called cheap silk fabrics do let you do want any time and cost you more in the long run because they are made down to a price and not up to a standard.

Mysore Government Silk Weaving Factory fabrics are recognised throughout India for their superior quality, reliability and attractiveness and are guaranteed free from admixture either with artificial silk or foreign yarn.

The choice is in your hands.

Buy Mysore Georgettes, Mysore Crepes and Mysore Satins and have full satisfaction.

Leading Stockists.

Agents:—

The Mysore Products, Princess Street, BOMBAY.

The Mysore Silk Depot, Swadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY

The Indian Ladies' Magazine.

PUBLISHED ONCE IN TWO MONTHS.

Edited solely in the interests of the Women of India, by MRS. K. SATTHIANADHAN, M. A., Harrington Road, Chetpet, Madras.

Subscription (including Postage).	Ra. a. p.
Inland ...	3 8 0
Foreign ...	4 0 0

(Subscribers and Contributions urgently needed).

THE GUARDIAN

A CHRISTIAN WEEKLY.
Dealing with Social, Economic, Political and Religious Problems.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY PRICE 2 ANNAS.

Annual Subscription: Inland, Rs. 5/-

Foreign, 10s. Post free.

Subscriptions and all other Communications should be addressed to—

THE MANAGER,
The Guardian,
HOGARTH PRESS, Madras.

SAFELY RELY ON

AMRUTANJAN BALI

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swelling, Fever, it was very less the mover was ased his motion on a AMRUTANJAN DI the present instance, the by the publication.

BOMBAY

&

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

352
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 1

UNPRECEDENTED!

PERMANENT!

INSPIRING!

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference have been sent to us for circulation in India and can be had for Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) postage 12 as. extra from—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	20s Annually.
" " " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
Outside "the Union"	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	21s. Annually.
" " " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,

Phoenix, Natal.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland	...	...	...	Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign	...	...	...	Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available, can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage

For further particulars, please apply to:—

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 105 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor :—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY FEBRUARY 8, 1936. No. 23

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice : I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Ramakrishna Centenary.	The Economics of Conversion.
Brahmo Samaj.	Congress and the Liberals.
Congress in the Assembly.	Sri Ramakrishna Centenary
A Bad Blunder.	Memorial Volume.
The Next Congress President.	The Association of the Princes to Cross Currents.	Federation.
The Aga Khan as Governor.	American Attitude Towards
Women and Co-education.	Indian Immigration.
Women's Colleges.	International Women's Confe-
Unemployment in the United	rence.
Provinces.	Indian Women & Journalism.
The Dowsy Demon.	Traffic in Women and Children.
Apocryphal?	The Crown in British Politics.
"Excluded Areas."	The Mechanism of Sanctions.
The Sapru Report on Under Unemployment.

NOTES

Ramakrishna Centenary:—We publish in another column the prospectus of what promises to be a monumental volume on the religious and cultural movements in India, which is under preparation as a part of the world-wide celebrations commencing from the 24th February in commemoration of the one hundredth birthday of Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa. To the world at large the Paramahansa is known as the Master of Swami Vivekananda, the apostle of dynamic Hinduism, to whom is largely due that today in many countries its basic principles are known and appreciated. Sri Ramakrishna's greatest achievement, however was that, at a time when Agnosticism was professed by some of the master-minds of the nineteenth century, when John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer were the prophets of Young India, and when Materialism seemed to have finally established itself as the creed of educated men, he demonstrated in his own life the supremacy of the spiritual and turned some of the best minds of India to the value of their ancient heritage. Raja Ram Mohun Roy had established the Brahmo Samaj as the organ of the highest teachings of Hinduism. He was careful not to depart from the traditional basis.

Relation to the Brahmo Samaj:—Sir Albion Rajkumar Banerjee in his loving memoir of his father, Sasipada Banerji, who was one of the first adherents of the Brahmo Samaj, has mentioned the little known fact that Raja Ram Mohun Roy had made belief in the Vedas a part of the creed of the Brahmo Samaj. Maharshi Devendranath Tagore, father of the Poet, while not accepting this belief, drew his inspiration entirely from the Upanishads and adhered to the social conventions of Brahminism. Under Keshab Chandra Sen's leadership alien elements crept into the Brahmo Samaj and destroyed its power to influence the course of Hindu religious evolution. Sri Ramakrishna stepped into the breach. He had great regard for the Brahmo Samaj and they for him. Every religious revival must have behind it direct religious experience. The Brahmo Samaj springs had run dry. The Paramahansa was able to affirm, as did the Vedic seer of old, that he had realised in his own experience the Divine Presence and he assured others that they could also do so if they observed the necessary discipline. As usual, the West had to appreciate the genius of the Paramahansa before his own countrymen knew that there was born and lived and moved amongst them a Man of God. The Ramakrishna Centenary should recall India to her true mission to the world.

Congress in the Assembly:—Congress members have not acquitted themselves as well as might be expected in the opening days of the Legislative Assembly. They behaved like school-boys in not standing up when the resolution of condolence on the King's death was passed and, again, when a message from His Excellency the Viceroy was read. It is good manners to stand up when a condolence resolution is passed even at a public meeting on the death of a private citizen. To omit to do so when the resolution related to the death of the Sovereign to whom Congress members, like others, of the Assembly have sworn allegiance, is the height of incivility. The Viceroy, again, addressed the House not in his private capacity but as the representative of the Sovereign, and the omission to show the courtesy due to his position, was another sign of mental immaturity. If we wish to take part in public life we must have regard to established conventions which involve no principle and, at the same time, help to promote a sense of being engaged in a common public cause among all parties. The withdrawal of the adjournment motion in connection with certain paragraphs in "India in 1933-34" is a capital blunder. The proper motion was to demand that the offensive passages should be expunged. Adjournment motions have a specific and narrow range which does not cover cases of this kind. Having given notice of adjournment, however, it was very foolish to withdraw it, unless the mover was convinced that he had based his motion on a mistaken view of facts.

A Bad Blunder:—In the present instance, the blunder is aggravated by the publication

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

354

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 8

on the same day as the news of the withdrawal of a Government communique defending and justifying the offending paragraphs. We have no time now to go into details. But the charge that the Bihar Relief Fund raised by Mr. Rajendra Prasad was wrongly used to give relief to sufferers from floods in the same area, is palpably absurd. The floods, we are told, had nothing to do with the earthquake. But the sufferers were the earthquake sufferers on whom the floods came as a further visitation; and only men whose soul is steeped in sealing-wax and bound with red tape, would think that this was a matter for criticism. The Quetta Relief Administration was not such a success as the official propagandist says it was. Press criticisms were punished by demanding heavy securities. But the public is not at all satisfied that the Quetta relief would not have been more much, more, efficient if the proffered non-official co-operation had been availed of. The paragraphs in "India in 1933-34" are of a piece with the attack on Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru in the Bengal Administration Report, which had to be withdrawn. The Congress leaders in the Assembly have made Mr. Rajendra Prasad's position very difficult by their lack of forethought.

The Next Congress President :—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has been elected President of the forthcoming session of the Indian National Congress by a practically unanimous vote. Two years ago, the New Statesman in a leading article compared the Pandit in Indian politics to the Prince of Wales in British politics. It is remarkable even as a coincidence that when the Prince succeeded to the British throne, the Pandit should be elected to the presidentship of the largest political organisation in India. The two offices are totally different but the event marks a supreme moment in the lives of the Prince and the Pandit who are nearly of the same age. The Prince on becoming King pledged himself to follow in the footsteps of his Father as a constitutional sovereign. The Pandit, on the other hand, has been, on the eve of his election as President of the Congress, proclaiming in interviews and speeches in London, views some of which can not but be highly embarrassing to his fellow Congressmen in this country. Thus the Pandit, for instance, avowed that he was in favour of large scale industries whereas the Congress has definitely declared itself in favour of ruralisation of industries.

Cross Currents:—The Pandit is barely tolerant of Khadi—hand-spun and hand woven cloth—which, he holds, has no future. The Congress has made the wearing of Khadi obligatory on all office-bearers. The Leader of Allahabad calls attention to his statement in favour of expropriation of land without direct compensation and asks, pertinently, what indirect compensation the Pandit has in his mind. Above all, while the retiring President, Babu Rajendra Prasad, has been telling Liberals that the Congress can not give up the goal of independence, the Pandit has declared himself in London in favour of a constitution which enables him to carry out his programme of socialisation. In fact, the Pandit's movements in London suggest that he is inclining to an alliance with the British Labour Party for bringing about a socio-economic revolution in India. The Pandit, it is true, has also declared that his socialism is scientific which means that its application to Indian conditions would be tentative and experimental at each step. But he has also said that it is complete. The Pandit does not seem to have been aware that he was likely to be elected to the Presidentship. His nomination was rather sudden and was apparently made without ascertaining his views on some of the crucial problems which the Congress at Lucknow will have to face.

The Aga Khan as Governor:—His Highness the Aga Khan is reported to have told a deputation of his followers in Karachi that he would not accept any office under the new constitution less than a Governorship. We can hardly believe the report. That the Aga Khan will make an excellent administrator, we have no doubt. We had ourselves suggested (Reformer, June 3, 1933) that His Highness would have made an admirable Governor if he could have been appointed to the Bombay vacancy. In the Punjab, Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan would have never allowed the Shahidgunge dispute to develop to its present impasse. He would have managed to bring the parties together somehow and his great social and personal influence would have been exerted to the utmost to pour oil on the troubled waters. He is now a glorified cashier as Vice President of the Reserve Bank where his administrative capacity is utterly wasted. In the Aga Khan's case, a provincial Governorship would mean a distinct descent from his present position. His influence would be restricted and it will have to work through a barrage of Ministers each intent on advancing the interests of his own particular caste or sect. Besides, His Highness as spiritual head of an enterprising community, would be combining in himself Church and State if he undertook the secular duties of a salaried Governor. The position would be exceedingly anomalous, unless the Aga Khan ceases to be the spiritual head of his community, at least so long as he holds office under the Crown, for which there is, so far as we know, no precedent. Since the above was in type, we have received the Sind Observer which gives a full report of the Aga Khan's interview with journalists at Karachi. Many questions were put to him and he answered them all. About Governorship, the report runs :—"If he were made Governor of a Province, and if Congressmen were in a majority, what would be his attitude? His reply was that he would ask them to form the Government. 'How would he deal with the civil disobedience movement if it was revived?' His reply was : 'Let me become the Governor; then we will see what I do.'"

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

355

Women and Co-education :—A recent debate on the subject of separate colleges for women, held by the Bombay Secondary Teachers' Association, had resulted in a tie but for the casting vote of the Chairman who was no other than our genial Mayor and whose stirring speech in support of co-education, carried the day and helped to maintain the traditional policy with regard to women's education in the Presidency. The too familiar arguments of moral dangers and psychological differences, were brought in and emphasised only to be demolished by the supporters of co-education. But the surprising feature of the debate was the support accorded to separate colleges for women by the only lady speaker, herself, perhaps, a product of co-education. Perceiving the anomaly of her position, she almost apologised for advocating separate institutions and professed to speak on behalf of those girls of "a shy and retiring nature" who were overwhelmed by the majority of men students in mixed colleges. When one comes to think of it one feels that there cannot be a better antidote for shyness than rubbing shoulders with men students in the college days. This will serve not only to wear off the shyness of those afflicted by it but enable them to come out of their shells. Many of our women who figure prominently in the civic and social life of the city owe much to the training they have had in co-educational institutions.

Women's Colleges :—The difficulty which our women's colleges, in which the subjects taught are identical as in men's, experience to maintain the standard and temper of education, is great. But where these Colleges are limited to the special curricula deemed suitable for women, they invariably deteriorate into glorified schools. The only excuse for women's colleges to exist is that here are no other institutions in certain localities which impart any education at all for women. It is an irony that some women who have received their training in co-educational institutions should lower the flag of women's education by declaring in favour of inferior education. It is not unusual for these women to support ardently a Vernacular University or a Lady Irwin College but at the same time taking care to send their own girls to mixed Colleges. The attitude of these estimable women would seem to be that the education which they advocate is good enough for the generality of women but not for their own daughters. In the same spirit we often find women leaders holding up the ideals of Sita and Savitri to their sisters while in their own lives there is very little evidence of their living up to them.

Unemployment in the United Provinces :—One of our leading articles today deals with some of the main points of the report of the Committee on unemployment among educated men in the United Provinces over which Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru presided. It is a very elaborate document and we shall have to refer to it now and again. Meanwhile, we are glad to learn from an Associated Press message from Lucknow that the report is not to be shelved. It is, we are told, receiving full and careful consideration from the Education Department. Mr. S. P. Shah, I. C. S., has been placed on special duty to deal with the report. The public has been invited to offer suggestions and criticisms and the report will be discussed in the forthcoming Council Session when it is believed that the Rt. Hon. Sir T. B. Sapru will be nominated to the Provincial Legislature to guide its deliberations on the report. Apparently, there is to be a report on the report by the Special Officer after receiving suggestions from the public. Sir Tej himself is to be appointed to the Provincial Legislative Council to "guide the deliberations". If we may venture a forecast based on prolonged experience of official methods, the probabilities are that the recommendations which are likely to lead to reduction in the already small expenditure on Education will be accepted and those which require increased or additional expenditure will be postponed pending improvement in the finances of the Provinces.

The Dowry Demon :—Some years ago the country was thrilled by the self-immolation of a Hindu girl, Snehalata, by setting fire to her clothes, after drenching herself in kerosine oil in order, as she wrote in a pathetic letter to her father, to save him from the worry of being unable to find the dowry which would secure a bridegroom for her in the matrimonial market. The news comes this week of four sisters having sought to end their lives by taking opium in order to relieve their old father a pensioned officer, aged 70, from the trouble of finding suitable husbands for them. Three of the sisters died, and the fourth is lying in hospital in a precarious condition. Mr. Kishori Mujumdar had seven daughters three of whom are married. His son, Sushil, with the girl whom he loved drowned himself in a tank some months ago. It behoves leading men and women among Hindus to investigate the root causes of such tragic happenings and find a remedy.

Apocryphal ?—A friend writes to point out that the great Indian Prince who was Mr. C. A. Kincaid's friend and who told him of his thirty-crores of silver rupees with which he would buy up the Indian Army after crossing the Jumna, and crown himself as Samrat of Bharatkhand, (mentioned in the leading article in the Reformer last week) could have been only one ruler whose identity would readily occur to persons even superficially acquainted with Indian States. His Highness died some years before the Round Table Conference met and adopted Federation as the future form of government for India. The question, what he would do if the Congress party in the Federation tried to "scrap" his State, would, therefore, have been premature, to put it mildly. Was Mr. Kincaid suffering from a lapse of memory not unnatural in old pensioners or has he taken the incident from one of his story books yet in the making?

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

856

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 8

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, February 2, 1936.

"EXCLUDED AREAS."

The steam roller has begun rolling. Three Orders in Council have been issued so far in connection with the Government of India Act. Two of them constitute Sind and Orissa into separate Provinces from the 1st April next each under a Governor who will be the Local Government pending the application of the Government of India Act to other provinces. He will receive a salary of Rs. 66,000 a year with such allowances as the Secretary of State may determine, will have no Executive Council, and may seek and accept the help of an advisory Council to be nominated by himself. The two new Provinces are thus to enjoy one man rule before entering into the blissful state of full provincial autonomy. New Orissa will remain under the judicial control of the High Court at Patna. The Sind members of the Bombay Legislative Council will cease to sit in it and the number of elected and total members of the Council will be reduced correspondingly. The third Order in Council referring to areas to be excluded from the operation of the provisions of the Act wholly or partially, is of sociological interest. The areas to be excluded are inhabited largely by aboriginal tribes who are supposed to be too primitive to be able to appreciate the privilege of voting. The Secretary of State for India was evidently anxious to extend the "excluded areas" as much as possible. He told the Government of India that the House of Commons will not be satisfied if only the areas now under Executive control were excluded. He instructed them to furnish him with a full statement of the grounds "not only for proposals for including specified areas within the category of excluded or partially excluded, as the case may be, but also for proposals for not including any area the population of which consists to an appreciable extent of aborigines or very backward people." The Madras Government after a detailed examination of the figures in each district, made some strong observations against unduly extending the excluded areas under pressure from the House of Commons. They wrote: "The people in these areas have always been subject to the ordinary laws and the ordinary system of administration, and the Scheduled Districts Act has never been applied to them. The innovation of declaring any or all the areas in question to be excluded or partially excluded areas, can not but be construed as an implication of distrust of the honesty or capacity of Ministers under the new constitution and will be resented. Such an affront to Indian public opinion should not, in the opinion of this Government, be risked unless it can be shown that there was a definite danger that the position of primitive tribes, or backward communities will be worsened under the new constitution. The two directions in which primitive tribes stand to suffer, are exploitation or neglect. It is difficult to imagine how any Ministry could evolve a policy of exploitation even if they have a wish to do so. As for neglect, it is, of course, possible that a Ministry short of funds might be tempted to cut short the allotment for education, water supply, medical relief and other amenities of backward areas. But the sums so saved, considering the very limited possibilities of useful expenditure in such areas, would be negligible. The danger of deliberate exploitation or deliberate neglect is, therefore, in the opinion of the Madras Government so improbable as not to require further examination."

This strongly worded protest of the Madras Government had its effect and the Government of India and the Secretary of State did not venture to go behind it; and the Order in Council excludes wholly and partially only the two areas recommended by the Madras Government. The memorandum submitted by the Government of Bombay was equally cogent though less aggressive in its language. It pointed out that such progress as the aboriginals and backward classes had made was due to their contact with the more advanced classes and that a policy of segregation can only lead stagnation. The advance made by some aboriginals was so marked that several thousands of them would be qualified to vote under the new franchise rules. "It would be an absurd exaggeration to say," observed the Bombay Government, "that any of these classes are totally isolated from civilization. If this were so they would be savages whereas actually they live peacefully a life which at every step is regulated by the laws of society. Through poverty or for excitement they may commit more offences than the ordinary men but they know what acts are offences and what the consequences of detection, are. They understand the working of the revenue, forest, educational, excise and other Government Departments so far as it effects them. Large numbers are engaged by contractors of forest, and such classes as Dodhias and Dublas are largely employed on field labour by landholders. They are in continual contact with the outside world. No doubt they are socially backward with little or no interest in education, and their economic condition is also bad. But this state of things cannot be attributed to the introduction of the democratic principle of government. There is no reason to think that the Legislative Council and Ministers have been less sympathetic towards these classes than the Government under the pre-reform period." We quote these passages at length because they should dispel the general impression that Provincial Governments are illiberal and that the slow pace of reform is due to their obstruction. The Bombay Government definitely stated in their despatch that except the Mewasi estates and the Akrani Mahal in the West Khandesh district, there was no area in the Presidency proper or in Sind

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

357 which was so backward as to justify its declaration as an excluded or partially excluded area. "But for some reason or other, the Bombay Government nowadays do not seem to carry as much weight with the Government of India as some other Provincial Governments. The Government of India in their despatch to the Secretary of State coolly ignore the arguments of the Bombay Government. They accept without change or with very little change the recommendations of all other Provincial Governments. In the case of Bombay alone do they make an exception. "In Bombay," they observe, "we have departed somewhat extensively from the limited recommendations of the local Government. Taking the Western portions of the West Khandesh district as the chief home of the Bhil tribes we have proposed special protection for them over a wide area in that district, and we have added areas in the East Khandesh, Nasik, Thana and Panch Mahals districts which on the facts before us have seemed to merit special protection." What facts could they have had before them contradicting those furnished by the Bombay Government? The Order in Council follows the Government of India's recommendation. The Bombay public and the Legislative Council should not allow this high-handed action to go without protest.

THE SAPRU REPORT ON UNEMPLOYMENT.

The Report of the Sapru Committee on the problem of unemployment among the educated is in many respects better than Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's recent interviews had led the public to believe it would be. But it is not free from certain prejudices which have coloured Sir Tej's other pronouncements on education. The reference to the work of earlier committees in other parts of India conveys the impression of deep study of parallel conditions elsewhere but it is obviously superficial. The Committee, except in two cases, have not troubled to find out how far schemes for relief have worked successfully. The sections devoted to foreign countries adds to the bulk of the volume but we really do not see how they bear on the report.

The key points of the recommendations are, (1) limiting general education; (2) selection of vocations at the secondary school stage; (3) increasing facilities of training for and opportunities of employment in new professions; (4) 'so far as research work is concerned, Universities should study the needs of industry'; and (5) raising the primary school age-limit to 12 or 13. These are the chief decisions affecting education and all of them, except the last, are utilitarian proposals which will sorely disappoint the Committee if worked. Raising the school-age and introducing compulsory primary education will be a real benefit, not because it will make primary education more efficient and find employment for a number of teachers' but because it will keep little children from roaming on the streets or engaging in blind alley occupations. It will relieve unemployment by removing from industry a source of cheap unskilled labour which clogs the wheels of social, or even economic, progress. The other proposals are of little value. It would have been worth the labours of this Committee if the primary education proposal had been accepted by the Government but it is obviously the last one which a retrenching administration will adopt.

Is it really necessary to restrict admissions to the university in order to attract students to vocational schools? Sir Tej seems to think so. He has demanded the reduction of the age-limit for subordinate Government posts to enable young men to enter life without a university degree, he has asked for deciding careers for boys at the secondary stage, and lastly he wants the universities to make themselves the hand-maids of commerce and industry. Still he has a lurking fear that young men will not after all forsake the advantages of a good general education for the doubtful blessings of a vocational training. Apprehensive that even if adopted by the Government, his elegant structure might prove a failure, he seeks to force young men into his scheme. It is as if, in the expectation of the Indus changing its course, the Sukkur Barrage had been built over a hypothetical future course and then engineers had directed their efforts to divert the river's path to the sea. There is overwhelming evidence to show the futility of vocational training in the conditions prevailing today. There is the instance of the cadets trained in the Dufferin training ship, which has evoked strong protest only a few days back from Indian business. The special training has resulted merely in the production of social misfits who are not absorbed in the occupation they are trained to; in spite of the Government having conceded the desirability of compelling coastal shipping to take them on. There is Mr. Vishnu Sahay's evidence, 'of a brilliant University graduate trained in the manufacture of paper at Manchester at Government expense and, after four years of unemployment, turning to law.' What would he have done without his general education? There is the Chairman's own instance of another graduate trained in England in Agriculture accepting the Assistant Registrarship at a U. P. University. And, lastly, there are the engineers who seem to suffer more than the others.

But it is really distressing to observe the dilemma thrust on our graduates by these educational experts who are convinced that there must be vocational training. If they are prepared to accept any job, they are sneered at—university graduates selling milk is a frequent charge brought against them. If they refuse to accept jobs out of expediency, they are accused of being white-collar wage-slaves who will not take their coats off and get to work. A distinguished politician once boasted that he paid more to his cook than most graduates earned, unconsciously censuring an

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

353

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 8

realpatidar.com

outlook which pandered grossly to one's palate. Yet even a cursory glance should prove that the graduate generally has little trouble in getting employment, the trained-to-a-trade man more. Few people can make up their minds what profession to take up even when they have grown up. Sir Tej expects boys in the secondary school to show aptitudes. He feels that headmasters should advise parents on the jobs for which their children are suited and, as the headmaster might find it difficult, the Committee recommend the import of a few 'psycho-technical' experts to help him or the training in foreign countries of a few Indian teachers in this new science. This is the most absurd of the Committee's proposals and it surprises us how these men of the world have seriously advanced it. In the old days parents of girls used to write to heads of boys' schools for bridegrooms. We have little hope that the teachers' new task of employment adviser will be more successful than the old one of match-maker.

Sir Tej Bahadur—for he is the domineering figure in the Committee—has curiously enough produced two sets of conflicting proposals for Government servants and lawyers. For the first, he advises reduction of the age-limit for subordinate posts; for the second he desires the restoration of an old rule that before permission to practice in the High Court is allowed law graduates should put in some years of practice in a district court and that the course of study at the University should be increased to three years—the most sensible reform here would be to reduce it to one year and make it a full-time course instead of the present hour or two each day. For Government servants, Sir Tej enforces a rigid rule of retirement; he is silent on the need for such measures in the legal profession. His desire to restrict legal education to a few while initiating at the same time a thorough and well-considered overhauling of the system, which promises to widen its scope, is incomprehensible. Sir Tej Bahadur's special emphasis on legal education reform is understandable. But his desire to restrict it to a few can be explained only on the basis that he too believes there are too many lawyers in the country.

The decision of the U. P. Government which is strangely silent on the scheme of reform suggested by Sir Tej's Committee, will be most probably to shelve the Report. This is unfortunate—but only because these earnest Committee members have wasted their labours. Few people seem to realise the implications of the recommendations. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru is known for the rather extreme social reform views which he has frequently expressed. One would have expected a distinguished lawyer to realise the dangers of his proposals. It seems to us that this restriction of general education and vocational careers, decided at an early age, can be compatible, only with caste. It certainly is calculated to perpetuate the system.

THE ECONOMICS OF CONVERSION.

It was rather ingenious of Dr. B. R. Ambedkar to make a dashing political move and he meant to time it well. But the threat has fallen very flat; it had no force in it; it failed to create the fear its author wanted to create; it did not serve the purpose of its birth. For surely he knew, though he would not admit it, that he could do nothing by mere empty volleys. Threats are of no more use. Perhaps he wished to follow one of his creators but there is no comparison between threats of fasting and threats of conversion. One would ask, why did he not fast himself to death if all the Harijans were not raised in their status and their disabilities removed? If he had no mind to do this why did he not become a Christian or join the Muslim faith, or if he does not believe in these two also, create a new religion as Guru Govind did? A new religion would have been wiser as he could have enjoyed the enviable privilege of a founder. There was ample time since his dramatic announcement to take definite steps in any direction. Perhaps he is awaiting some divine inspiration as was revealed to Buddha!

All this is mere eye-wash. The problem is fundamental. If Dr. Ambedkar is at all practical and wants to face facts, he should calculate what his chances are in other religions. But let him not reckon without his host. In any religion, the economic condition of the Depressed classes is not likely to advance of itself. Nobody can deny that economic progress is the immediate necessity which outweighs all other considerations. Under the Christian banner they are not going to be offered higher salaries in Government services or in private firms, companies or factories, so long as they remain backward in education. A certain minimum of qualifications is necessary for any post and if a person does not possess that he is simply unfit for the job. Already there is a hue and cry that because of dilution the general intelligence of the services, is deteriorating and the best positions are not filled by the most suitable men. Government will not waive their present rules of recruitment if the Harijans join another religion en bloc. The converts need not aspire to higher wages if the employers are not prepared to grant them. What the latter class want is labour at the cheapest rate, irrespective of any religious considerations; for if an employer is to be moved by other considerations he would have to quit his business. On the other hand, the new converts have everything to expect by way of new difficulties which they may not have the foresight to see now.

Another point of economics that I want to stress is, that not only will their material position remain unchanged in their new mask, but they will still have to depend upon their former Hindu masters for keeping soul and body together. As things are at present, with the exception of some Zamindars, much of the land is held by caste Hindus. The patadars of every village are mainly non-Harijans. The major portion of the wealth is in the hands of caste-Hindus with a small proportion in the hands of the Muslims, the two crores of Indian Christians, having very little compared to the Hindus. The Harijans, as I said before, have very little land, and they work in the fields of their caste Hindu masters; they do all menial work for them from the barber to the plougher of the soil and reaper of the harvest. The Christians have very little to offer in this respect. The Muslims cannot afford to do it as the major portion among them depend upon wealthier Muslims, whose possessions cannot be much as a whole. The net result is that even after conversion the sixty millions have yet to bow down before the feet of Hindu masters! This being the truth, suppose

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

359

realpatidar.com

the caste Hindus, in a retaliatory spirit, as a whole object to the new converts working in their fields. What would the position of the Harijans be? The consequences are only too dreadful to think of. Disillusionment followed by misery, riot, anything, and the end may be anywhere.

The bare and unpleasant truth is this; that by conversion nothing is to be gained but everything—daily food etc—is to be lost if it comes to that. The converts cannot revolutionise the economic structure of the country as they are powerless to do it, all the money being in the hands of their masters. The religion may lose something in numerical strength but the caste Hindus don't mind it if their economic strength is not undermined. Mere numbers can't do anything. If antyajnas persist in such futile things as temple entry let them do so. There is no gain for them in that. As soon as the first mist of mysteriousness in the temples clears off, they will repent that they have sacrificed the substance in the pursuit of a shadow. There is nothing but stone idols and repugnant figures with blood-thirsty tongues and protruding organs in temples and other places of worship. Temple entry will not in the least raise the economic status of Harijans. Ancient religion is an anachronism in Modern India and is losing force day by day; its living days are numbered. Therefore, it is futile to strive for anything religious. Religion is not going to help the depressed people in the least. In the history of the world we have heard of no nation becoming suddenly prosperous by a change of religion. Prosperity is attained by industry, diligence, perseverance and risk. This is the economics of conversion.

Evidently Dr. Ambedkar did not consider all these points before he expressed his wishes. After all his assumptions, one is tempted to ask, is he the real leader of the people whom he professes to represent? Indeed, it is well known that the majority of the Harijans do not want proselytisation and are not in need of it. Mr. M. C. Raja is opposed to it. More and more facilities are being offered to Harijans as days pass on. Thirty years ago Dr. Ambedkar could not have dreamt of sitting in the same table with a high caste Hindu. Today it is an accomplished fact. Untouchability is receding into the background. We often hear of inter-marriages. All these speak for the good augury of social emancipation.

Instead of sidetracking problems and creating wheels within wheels, with his influence and position, the Doctor could well turn his attentions to the industrialisation of the country. I offer him a practical suggestion. If he cares to take it up, it would bring forth good results. He should approach those wealthy men whose money sleeps now and try to start first class industrial concerns—manufacture of chemicals, of glassware, of photographic materials, ironware, electric goods, rubber goods, any profitable thing—and turn wasting labour into useful channels, employ Harijan labourers in the factories offering all modern amenities of work such as the 40-hour week, education, recreation etc., as are done in countries where labour is most advanced. In the course of a few years he would have much bettered his own community, he would have brought happiness and contentment to suffering homes much more than by conversion. Then he would certainly be revered as a great national leader, who laboured for the well-being of his community, for his nation and for his country, as the late Jambhedji Tata is being revered by his countrymen as a pioneer in the national and social industrialisation.

Madras,
31st January 1936. }

V. VENKATACHALAM

CONGRESS AND THE LIBERALS.

Babu Rajendra Prasad in a statement about the suggestion for coalition of different political parties and the Congress says:—

I have read with care and due respect to the Rt. Hon'ble Srinivasa Sastri and Mr. Venkataram Sastri their speeches at Madras during the last few weeks. I have also received communications from friends suggesting that the Congress should take steps to bring about a coalition, if not fusion, of the parties. I have been considering the matter, and while it has not been possible for me to consult the Congress Working Committee and my other colleagues and co-workers, I may state the position as it strikes me.

I very much appreciate Mr. Sastri's reference to the Congress and would wish that others, who do not agree like him with the present programme and policy of the Congress, would recognize that that institution is of great help and service in the national struggle for freedom and deserves support even from those who do not see eye to eye with it. But when I come to consider the difficulties he points out in the way of the Liberals joining the Congress and the suggestion that the Congress should remove them, I am faced with a problem which baffles me. An analysis of those difficulties shows that in order to induce the Liberals to join, the Congress should do four things: (1) It should change its object or creed of independence, (2) it should declare that it gives up civil disobedience as a method—its suspension or withdrawal at present does not satisfy him, (3) it should give up its discipline of manual labour, and (4) it should give up its uniform of Khaddar.

INDEPENDENCE.

Now as regards the object of independence, even the Government has not insisted upon the Congress giving it up. It was after that creed was adopted at Lahore that the Round Table Conferences were held and the Congress invited to send representatives to them, and the Congress representative was permitted to put it forward on behalf of the Congress at the second Conference.

As regards civil disobedience it is not altogether a new thing in the Congress although it has been actively carried out only recently. In 1917 when Dr. Annie Besant was in internment and the Congress was run by those who subsequently seceded from it. Nearly two years later civil disobedience was not only talked of but actually recommended by several provinces and Congress Committees and had not to be resorted to because of the early release of Dr. Besant. Earlier than that it had commenced as passive resistance in South Africa and secured active support of the Congress which sent funds, and it also received the blessings of Mr. Gokhale. Since then we have gone through it in this country. I can understand the objection that it is inopportune at a particular moment or in particular circumstances, but I do not understand how the Congress can abjure it once for all and for ever and declare that it shall not resort to it under any circumstances. These two suggestions present insuperable difficulties in the way of the Congress and if they are equally insuperable for the Liberals, clearly the fusion of the Liberal Federation and the Congress is impossible.

KHADDAR

As regards Khaddar I am afraid the question has not received the consideration it deserves and a lot of prejudice has been created round it. The manual labour franchise was born in an atmosphere of suspicion and unwillingness to give effect to it on the part of even many Congressmen and has not been able to overcome these in spite of what many amongst us consider to be their merits. If the

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

360
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 8

objection was confined to them alone it should have been possible to find a middle course. I have suggested before this that fusion of parties and organizations may not be possible but it should not be impossible to find points of agreement and work jointly in respect of those matters. In Mr. Venkataram Sastri's speech I am glad to note that he also suggests that areas of agreement should be explored if joint action is desirable—there can be no doubt that it is this line of approach which promises to be more fruitful. Constructive work in the country and combined front against encroachment on fundamental civil rights of citizens, such as liberty of person and freedom of Press, furnish such areas of agreement and considerable consensus of opinion regarding the merits of the new constitution may also provide occasion for joint attack, and all these may be explored.

Regarding the first two the Congress programme and attitude are well known and whatever differences may be with others, it will probably be about emphasis on particular items and about particular methods. These can be composed. With regard to the last the Congress must obviously decide its own line of action at Lucknow before it can take any effective steps.

SRI RAMAKRISHNA CENTENARY MEMORIAL VOLUME.

In pursuance of the general scheme of the Sri Ramakrishna Centenary Celebration, a Memorial Volume, entitled "The Cultural Heritage of India," is shortly going to be brought out through the hearty co-operation of a galaxy of distinguished scholars of the country. That such a work embodying a comprehensive survey of the gradual unfoldment of the creative genius of the Indian people from the Vedic age to the modern times is an imperious need of the hour, can hardly be gainsaid; and it is indeed gratifying to note that through the grace of the Lord this long-felt want of the country is soon going to be fulfilled. The book includes not only the golden fruits of Indian civilization but incorporates as well the manifold achievements in the field of modern scientific researches and investigations carried on by the master minds of the land. We sincerely believe that such an encyclopedic volume while throwing a flood of light on the spiritual, intellectual and material treasures of India as well as on the possibilities and the creative urge of her dynamic spirit, would contribute largely to the reconstruction of our national life and the evolution of a synthetic international culture, and thereby promote mutual understanding, goodwill and amity amongst mankind. The importance and exhaustive nature of this consummate piece of literary workmanship will be evident from a bare outline of the variety of subjects accommodated in the volume. It is interesting to note in this connection that about ninety eminent scholars of India representing fifteen Indian universities, have contributed articles on the subjects in which they have specialized. The book with its excellent get-up and nice printing covers about 2,000 pages of double crown octavo and has been embellished with more than 100 suggestive plates illustrating India's cultural evolution and thus making its successive stages crystal clear to the readers. It will be brought out in two parts, part 1st dealing with the fundamental unity and part A the spirit of Indian Culture.

Price Inland (India, Burma and Ceylon)

Rs. 16 Foreign $10 or 40 sh.

For Members Inland (India, Burma and Ceylon) Rs. 14 " $9 or 36 sh.

Pre-publication price (Inland Burma and Ceylon) Rs. 13 " $8 or 32 sh.

For members Inland (India, Burma and Ceylon) Rs. 12 " $7.35 or 30 sh.

Those who want to avail themselves of the pre-publication price should register their names by sending money by the 1st of April 1936. Mofussil subscribers are advised to send the postage (Inland) Rs. 3/8, (Foreign) $2.50 or 10 sh. along with the price while ordering.

THE ACCESSION OF THE PRINCES TO FEDERATION.*

A meeting of the Association was held at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, S. W. I. on Wednesday, October 16, 1935, when a paper entitled "The Accession of the Princes to Federation" was read by Sir Patrick Cadell, C. S. I., C. I. E. The Right Hon. Earl Peel, P. C., G. C. S. I., G. B. E., was in the chair. He spoke as follows winding up the discussions.

The Chairman: I think we shall all agree that we have heard a very comprehensive paper by Sir Patrick Cadell. I find myself very nearly in agreement—I say very nearly—with many points which he has brought forward. He has raised the fascinating question of what were the precise motives that induced the Princes to make their famous offer of entry into Federation. I like the question because it is a highly speculative one, and speculative questions are always much more interesting than practical ones. I take it that one of the answers to the proposition is to look at the map of India. It is extremely difficult to see how for very long that particular distribution of units and governments could go on in India without a very much closer tie than exists at present. I invoke the old and familiar question of the Customs against which the Princes have constantly protested—that of being in a position of having to pay these Customs through their subjects, and at the same time having no voice in the distribution of the money itself. I quite agree with many who contend that the advantages they get from the security of the army is really a payment in kind for these Customs contributions made by their own subjects. But I suppose that dominant in their motives at least was the feeling that in discussions and negotiations with the Government of India they had not really the authority which they would have liked to have, and that if they became part of the Government themselves, their position would be very much strengthened, and also the very legitimate ambition which they naturally had to take part in the general affairs of the Government of India.

Our lecturer has commented on the danger pointed out to the Princes by their legal advisers—a danger of which they are conscious themselves—that the tendency of federations elsewhere has been of a centralizing character, that more and more the constituent units have got to yield more of their authority up to the Central Government. No doubt this is true, but the Indian Federation, as both its opponents and supporters agree, is unique in the world. I am inclined to think that the very fact which has been urged against Federation of the different character of the units—that some are governed on democratic principles and some governed by the Princes—that very fact would tend at least to delay for a long time any sort of increase of that tendency which has been observed in other federations. Indeed, I have always regarded it as one of the advantages of Federation in India that these units were of a different character, because they would bring out of their different experience much of value to the Central Government by the mere fact that they were governed in different ways. It is a matter of mere guess-work what the future is going to bring forth, and it is rash even to express an opinion on such a subject, but it is quite probable that the

* Journal of East India Association.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

361

States will for a long time maintain their position and authority as contrasted with the Provinces. No doubt democratic government is an admirable thing, but it does develop certain unfortunate evils and vices which has caused it to be superseded in many of the countries of Europe.

Another point I would like to say a word upon is that of individual representation of what the lecturer calls the middle States. That is rather an interesting point, and I agree with the lecturer that it would have been an advantage if this could have been effected, without the construction of too large a central body. I think that it was suggested at the first Round-Table Conference that as the powers that were to be granted to the Central Government were limited—certainly limited in comparison with the great powers to be exercised by the provinces and States—it would be much better to have a correspondingly small body, and that there should be a single Chamber which would be quite competent to keep the executive in order, and would have a range of activity sufficient to occupy its time. That, of course, as you will remember, was strongly advocated by Sir Akbar Hydari.

That idea passed away partly because British India had an attachment to an Assembly and partly because the Princes themselves felt very strongly what the lecturer has said that they would get very small representation; in fact, they feared that the representation of the great States would be too dominant in this diet. Therefore the diet was superseded by the subsequent scheme of two Chambers—the Assembly and the Council of State. The Princes were accorded representation of 40 per cent. of the total in the Upper and 33 per cent. in the Lower Chamber. While thus the two Chambers were more or less equal in authority, the balance of numbers was given to the Lower Chamber. If disputes were to be settled by joint session, it was felt that where the decisions were very closely contested, the view of the elected Assembly should prevail. Again if the middle Princes were separately elected and the Assembly grew in size, you ran the risk of getting very large and unwieldy Chambers. Everybody is agreed from the point of view of carrying on administration and criticism that a smaller House is the better. There was pressure, as you see, on both sides, and if you had given full representation to the middle Princes in the Upper Chamber, you would then have expanded the representation in the Lower Chamber. The Federal authority has only a limited range of duty and authority; and it became essential in one way or another to limit the size of the Chambers. When Parliaments are large in numbers and with limited functions, they generally tend to become mischievous. So it was on some general consideration of that kind that unfortunately we came to the conclusion that it was not possible to give that full representation to the middle Princes which certainly on general grounds one would have desired.

I must admire the skill with which the lecturer, having told us that paramountcy must be paramount, intimated he was dissatisfied with the definition and proceeded gracefully to pass on to another subject. He suggests that before Federation there should be a certain standard of administration. I am not at all sure what is a good or bad standard of administration, because our views differ so widely. Some people like efficiency and some do not. I think if you were to suggest to possibly reluctant States that before they acceded and decided what the terms were on which they would accede, there should be an inquiry launched into their internal administration to see whether it was good or bad, there would be a steady refusal on the part of those States to move forward in the direction of Federation. I am inclined to think that the very suggestion of it would indicate to them that Federation was a very dangerous system which implied interference with their own internal administration.

We know that the question of paramountcy, by which I mean the control exercised by the Viceroy as the representative of the King-Emperor over the Princes, may to some extent change its character when a Federal Government is established. It seems to me that it is even more important than it was before—anyhow, quite as important—that there should be this free and intimate consultation among the Princes, and that the greater States should be fully represented in these Councils.

AMERICAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS INDIAN IMMIGRATION.

(By DR. CHARLES S. BRADEN, Ph. D.)

There is little that an American can contribute to the very interesting project of the 100th anniversary celebration of the Emigration of Indians to other lands beyond the expression of general regret at the exclusion of Indian immigrants from the United States and the hope that eventually the ban will be removed to permit the entrance of men from every part of the world without discrimination. In so writing the author must be thought of as expressing simply his own personal opinion, for it is necessary to state that not all Americans hold identical views on the subject. Perhaps it might not be without profit to state how various American groups feel about the matter.

There is first the out and out "supremacy of the white race" group, the so-called Nordics who would deny entrance on the grounds of racial inferiority to men of any colour other than the Nordics. They recognise the presence of many representatives of other races already in America—this they regard as a great evil, but one about which nothing can be done now—however they are determined that no others shall be allowed to enter—and they have an especial feeling against Orientals. They have their counterpart in the German nationalists to-day who are by every means seeking to destroy the Jews of Germany. They are highly vocal and control not a few of the great newspapers of the country. They are thoroughly irreconcilable to any modification of our immigration laws.

At the other extreme, there is a group rather small to be sure, who hold no such ideas of racial superiority over other peoples and who would throw wide the doors to all who might wish to come.

Probably the vast majority of Americans today are convinced that the day of unrestricted immigration is past, that America can no longer, for economic reasons, afford to admit more than a small number of new comers each year. There are some who, especially in these days of severe economic depression, would cut off all immigration from whatever source. Many of these are people who entertain no ideas of racial superiority or inferiority at all. They would exclude Nordics as well as others, simply because there is no place for them here either as labourers or producers. If they be permitted to come, either they displace men now employed or add themselves to the very long list of surplus workers, or as producers serve to augment the already marked over-production from which the country appears to be suffering.

There is a widespread belief that each peoples should have the right to determine its own general

In the Indian Colonial Review, realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 8

racial character. America is predominantly a white man's country. Furthermore it has evolved economic standards which differentiate it from those of other lands. The "American standard," if indeed in these recent years little more than a figment of the imagination, is nevertheless regarded as inviolable and anything which threatens it is at once subject to bitter opposition. Immigration from lands where lower living standards obtain constitutes a threat to this standard. It must therefore be controlled rigidly or entirely prohibited in the interest of maintaining that standard. The legal basis of exclusion is however couched in other terms. Only those are admitted who are "eligible for citizenship," and those are eligible who are considered assimilable to the general American racial type (with the exception of the Negro—the large population already in the U. S. leads to the exception of the African peoples). The real root of it, however, I am convinced is economic and not racial.

There is a large and I think a growing group, mostly people who are attempting to follow the Christian way of life, who deprecate discrimination against any race. They would have all races and peoples subject to a quota basis it is true and they would probably agree that the quota be fixed in some such way as at present in the sincere belief that relative homogeneity of population is desirable, but it would reflect in no wise an attitude of superiority of any social group over any other.

The age in which we live has made us neighbours all. Quick, easy communication is developing a world culture to which each race may contribute and is contributing regardless of restriction as to residence. Men and women can be kept at home, ideas cannot, and it may be said the peoples with ideas and ideals are not excluded from travel and even prolonged residence in the U. S. nor are they subject to any quota. Students may come and indeed they have come in considerable numbers and have both learned and taught, both received values from and imparted to us values out of their own rich culture. Professors, artists, missionaries, merchants, writers—these have been coming to us for years both in person and through their works. And they are colouring the thought of the west. A recent book "Hinduism Invades America" studies the influence of this impact on our culture. Men like Swami Vivekananda, like Rabindranath Tagore—like Professors S. N. Dasgupta and S. Radakrishnan—great women of India like Sarojini Naidu and Dr. Reddy, journalists like K. Natarajan—what have they not brought to America. And America welcomes them with open arms. Valiant attempts have been made to secure a visit from Mahatma Gandhi who is known to every schoolboy of America.

It is likely especially in these days of economic stress, of ingrowing nationalism and of inter-racial irritation that modification of restrictions on immigration will not be easy. But to their brothers in the East many, many Americans would like to bring assurance that they are hoping and working for the day when any discrimination which would seem to be based on a feeling of racial superiority, will be a thing of the past.

Weather in U. S. A.:—America's spell of Arctic weather has claimed 235 victims. The country is ice-locked from the Rockies to the Atlantic Coast. All twentieth century records for continued cold in the mid-West have been broken and the Niagara Falls have been frozen over for three days, which has never happened before in living memory. The cold spell is now entering its second week, only Florida and the Pacific Coast have escaped.—Reuters.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S CONFERENCE

Before the commencement of the proceedings of the International Women's Conference, which opened at the Town Hall on January 30, afternoon, under the presidentship of H. H. the Maharani of Baroda, all delegates stood in silence as a mark of reverence to the memory of His late Majesty.

Welcoming the delegates from the International Council Overseas, Lady Ezra said that their programme would show the wide range of their interests and labours, and that she felt sure the debates on which they were about to enter would enlarge their vision, rekindle their enthusiasm and give them valuable practical problems of everyday service of women.

The Countess of Willingdon, in the course of a message to the Conference, said that it seemed to her that suspicion and distrust were creating a barrier between countries. It lay at the root of most of their troubles, and for this sympathy and mutual understanding were the only solvents. The Marchioness of Aberdeen also sent a message of goodwill, while Dame Elizabeth Cadbury, in a brief address, referred to the immense amount of social work which the National Council of India was doing all over the country.

Among those present were Lady Pentland, the Hon. Margaret Sinclair, Begum Shah Nawaz, Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya, Miss Louis Thompson, Princess Cantacuzene, Dr. Renee Firod, Mademoiselle de Busschere, Miss Van Ween, Miss E. Zelewages, Madame Kimesco, Mrs. Grieves, Miss Halthe, H. H. the Maharani of Cooch Behar, Princess Ila of Cooch Behar, the Rani of Nandgaon, Lady Maharaj Singh, Lady Woodhead, Lady Reid, Lady Mitter, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, Miss Murie, Lester, Mrs. J. M. Sen Gupta, Mrs. F. G. Currimbhoy, Miss Sailabala Das, Mrs. Saraladevi Chowdhurani, Daw Din Shwe and Mrs. S. R. Dass.

In the course of her presidential address the Maharani of Baroda said:—

I am very pleased to be with you today and to have the privilege of opening this Conference, but my pleasure is tinged with regret that this moment you are listening to me instead of to Lady Aberdeen, whom we had hoped to welcome today, and to whose presidency we had all looked forward with great expectation. I am sure I am expressing your disappointment as well as my own when I say how sorry we are that Lady Aberdeen has been prevented from being with us on this signal occasion, for I am sure we had all looked forward eagerly to honouring one who has rendered such devoted service to the cause of the amelioration of the condition of women throughout the world.

We have various objectives which we have set ourselves to reach; and others specially qualified by their experience will, during the course of this Conference, attempt to estimate the degree of success which we have already achieved and will, I hope, indicate the various ways in which they think we may add to that already valuable accomplishment. I do not pretend to be a specialist. If my occupation of this chair means anything to you, I hope it will be in the nature of an example to the many women in India who, while they have not that specialised knowledge which might bring them to discuss their own and their country's welfare at the Council table, yet have that welfare at heart, and are prepared to do all that may lie in their power to do for their sisters—to fit us to play that part in the destinies of India which we feel we must play if our country is ever to be as happy as we wish with all our hearts that it may. Each and every one of us can do something to further the cause of womanhood in this country, and

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

363

there is not one of us whose contribution however small to that cause can be spared. And we must work together. The more we understand the necessity for concerted action, the more effective will our work be, and the sooner shall we reach our goal. This spirit of ready co-operation must be realised beyond the bounds of our own country.

This is not an educational conference, but since education is the foundation on which we must build, I must refer to it. There must, of course, be compulsory primary education, but for the rest, the education given in our schools, and particularly our Universities, is often so unsuited to the particular needs of women generally that it is, practically, useless and often harmful, since it saps energies which could be put to so much better use. One of the most glaring defects in our education system is its lack of care for cultural development, and nowhere is that lack felt more keenly than in the home where cultural influence is most telling and fertile. There is much scope for reform in the education of our daughters and it is our duty to see that they are given that training which will fit them to play their part in national affairs and, at the same time, make them more efficient mothers.

One of the best things we could do for our country is to establish schools in which the accent is laid on social qualities; schools in which the knowledge which the pupils acquire is a really formative influence in their lives; a knowledge of themselves and of their duty to their fellows which will help them to realise themselves fully as women, and not lead them to think themselves superior simply because they are labelled Bachelors of Arts, for those to whom the benefits of education cannot immediately penetrate there is much that we can do. We must teach them to understand what it is that we require of them, and what we are trying to do for them if we are to get that help from them without which we cannot hope to succeed.

The very fact that today we welcome representatives of various National Councils should remind us that the form of education we should aim to give our women should be such as to make them, not only good citizens of India, but of the world, and citizenship, remember, means the ability to sink individual differences in a united effort for the common good.

You will, I suppose, expect some reference from me to the position of women in the new Constitution which is shortly to come into operation in this country. Under the terms of the new Act we can at least claim that the rights of women to seats in the Legislature and to the vote have been recognised to the extent which, while it is still totally inadequate to the number of women in India, puts us in a stronger position than we were in before the Act was passed. It might well have been a still stronger position had we been wise enough to present a united front at the time when our demands came before the Round Table Conference.

Many more franchise qualifications have been added to those granted under the Reforms Act of 1919. The property qualification has been lowered, with the result that many women in rural areas now have the right to vote and many among the poorer classes in the towns. The wives or widows of men with existing property qualifications will also be entitled to vote. And there is, further, the educational qualification. This is all very far from that universal franchise which is what I feel we should aim at, but still it is a beginning and the terms of the franchise do at least clearly show us in what directions we should work for reaching our ultimate goal. We must make every woman in the country at least literate, so that our voting strength will not merely increase in numbers—it has already increased from 350,000 to 6,000,000—but in effectiveness. And we must work for the removal of those laws, which at present do not give us equal rights of inheritance with men.

How important it is that women should be allowed to inherit property equally with men is seen when it is considered with another problem which is in the forefront of our programme of social reforms. I mean the question of divorce. The right of divorce must remain a dangerous one as long as woman is denied the right to inherit the substance which alone can enable her to be economically independent of her husband.

The work which this Council can do in inculcating a serious and careful attitude in the minds of the voters to the power which has been put in their hands is obvious and by far one of the most important functions it has to discharge. The eyes of women throughout the world will be turned to us here in India to see how we conduct ourselves at this critical time in the history of our country.

I have already said that I think we, in India, should think internationally as well as of our own problem, and that the more we do to promote an understanding of our difficulties beyond our shores, the more shall we reap the advantage of this organisation of ours. One thing more. This Conference gives us the opportunity to see how much we have accomplished. We can review our past work. But that surely is the least valuable use to which this Conference can be put. It should be a pointer to the future and the record of its past achievement used as publicity, as a means to extend its scope and the membership of the Council. We need all the support we can get. Every woman who is proud to be of our race should join with us, for our strength lies in unity. I hope that one of the results of this Conference will be the inauguration of many new branches throughout the country, that the Council may become a strong and representative organisation for the whole of India.

INDIAN WOMEN & JOURNALISM.

"Women in the Press" was the principal subject of discussion in one of the sittings of the International Women's Conference. Miss Zellweger, a journalist and feminist leader of Switzerland, said as vice-convenor of the Press Committee of the International Council of Women, she had had an opportunity often to speak with women journalists belonging to various countries, and the situation seemed to be much the same throughout Europe, America and South Africa. She was not aware how it was in India. The fact that the journalists who were present at the present Conference to report the proceedings were all men seemed to show that women engaged in Press work in this country were few. There were many women belonging to the Press throughout the world, but few of them were really journalists. There were exceptions proving the rule; and some women occupied good positions as sub-editors in important newspapers, but these were few, and women who occupied these positions were generally particularly gifted.

Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya said journalism was a field in which women were just making their entry. The Press in India was a "strangled thing", and those who wanted to understand the situation must first of all know how it was being "strangled in every turn." Miss E. Lewis, of the Sunday Times, London, said women journalists in London were only 163 in number out of a total of 6,533. There were reporters, who were more or less confined to special

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

364
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 1

subjects of women, and sub-editors scarcely existed. From her own experience she could say that women were quite able to compete with men "except perhaps in political journalism." What they still had to break down was the old idea of the segregation of sexes—one subject for men and another for women. Giving her impressions of the activities of the League of Nations, Begum Shah Nawaz said it had succeeded in doing immense good in every other sphere of activity outside politics. The League, after all, was a child, and was labouring under many handicaps. It was, therefore, their duty to strive to make it a success, so that it might be the greatest possible help to humanity.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

The joint conference of the International Council of Women and the National Council of Women in India concluded its deliberations on the 4th instant.

By a resolution the conference recorded with satisfaction the action recently taken by the Government of India to bring cinema posters under censorship, and recommended the National Council of Women in India to urge that more effective measures should be taken to raise the standard of films and develop the production of films suitable for children.

On the motion of Miss Shepherd, Delhi, the conference adopted a resolution urging national councils of women to support the work undertaken by voluntary and official agencies in each country against traffic in women and children, and urging upon the Government of India the necessity of India's representation at the conference which would be held in the Far East in 1937 in connection with the question.

Miss M. Malthe stressed that the two most essential things to be done in order to combat the evil were education of the masses and legislation. It was time that the women of all countries rose to the occasion and acted in a concerted way, demanding common legislation all over the world in order to fight the menace.

Supporting the motion, Begum Shah Nawaz pointed out that as far as India was concerned, in almost every province Government were trying their best to strengthen the law against the evil. She felt proud to declare in that connection that, according to the statistics compiled by the League of Nations, India happened to be one of the most moral countries compared with other countries in the world.

Mrs. Tyau (China) said the Government of China were doing their utmost to fight the evil.

INDIAN WOMEN'S EFFICIENCY.

"I salute Indian women as my sisters. There are few people who are so intelligent as they are. After witnessing in what an efficient manner the Maharani of Baroda, conducted the opening meeting of the International Women's Conference, I have no doubt that if Indian women are given a chance, they can manage their business as efficiently as the women of the most advanced states in Europe," said Princess Alexandrine Gr. Cantacuzane in an interview.

The Princess is a delegate to the Conference and this is the first time she has visited India. She occupies in the political, social and intellectual movements of the present-day Rumania a prominent place.

She is the President of a number of Rumanian societies of which special mention should be made of the National Orthodox Society of Rumanian Women. She is also a Delegate from her country to the League of Nations, where she works on the committees on Traffic in Women and Protection of Children.

The Times of India.

THE CROWN IN BRITISH POLITICS.

This able and scholarly work, writes Prof. Harold J. Laski in the New Republic, deserves a wide audience among all students of the British Constitution. The place of the Crown in British politics is one of the most delicate and least known of its problems. Most writers have been content to repeat the brilliant but facile generalizations of Bagehot, now nearly seventy years old. But the publication (on an ample scale) of Queen Victoria's letters, the biographies and correspondence of Gladstone, Disraeli, Harcourt and other Victorian statesmen, have in the last generation thrown a flood of new light upon the subject. The great value of Hardie's book is that it summarizes the burden of this evidence with clarity and distinction. It makes it clear that the Crown was, throughout the Victorian age, an active and omnipresent participant in the shaping of policy. It exposes decisively the fiction that it was no more than a dignified emollient, destined always to yield before the pressure of its advisers. Queen Victoria was a lady of strong, even of passionate, opinions. Mr. Hardie has made an invaluable study of the methods by which she sought to have her way.

What is the upshot of it all? The crown in the Victorian period exercised the right to be consulted on every matter of serious importance. It exercised considerable influence in the choice of Ministers and (often wisely) in the direction of foreign affairs. In a broad sense, it was throughout anti-democratic; and it exercised an almost daily pressure in this sense. It did not hesitate to intrigue directly against Mr. Gladstone and in favour of his rivals. It took advice from outside the sphere of its constitutional advisers. It regarded the existence of the House of Lords as a bulwark of its own position. It was consistently imperialist and militarist in temper. It showed neither interest in, nor sympathy for, the issues agitated by Cobden and Bright, the trade-union leaders, or Parnell. Its whole attitude was one that went to the support of the conservative interests in the sense that it sought to inhibit all movement in the direction of social or political equality. It is not, I think, an exaggeration of Mr. Hardie's results to say that Queen Victoria emerges from his survey as one of the most useful instruments the Conservative Party possessed in her time.

How far have these things changed? The effective answer is that we do not know. Until we have at our disposal a similar correspondence from her successors no complete judgment upon their habits is possible. We know from things like the diaries of the late Lord Esher that it would be fatally easy to underestimate the influence of the Crown. We know, also, that in the constitutional crisis of 1909-11, the Ulster crisis of 1913-14, the financial crisis of 1931, the Crown on each occasion played a considerable, if mysterious, part. We have reason to suppose that the "Palace" is an important factor in the shaping of opinion, that its ramifications and connections reach far wider than it is usual to suppose. It is significant that a revival of active influence on the part of the Crown has been seriously advocated by leading Conservative politicians. They claim (with the support of the late Lord Oxford's authority) that the king has the power of dissolution in his hands. They suggest that, in an emergency, he is entitled to veto legislation that might endanger national unity. They argue that he may refuse to create peers and enable a government to override opposition in the House of Lords. It is suggested that he may ignore party divisions choosing a Prime Minister so long as his nominee is able to obtain a majority in the House of Commons.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

365

Who are his secret advisers? We do not know. Are there people in his entourage who play the part played by the late Lord Esher? Again, we do not know. What are his relations with the heads of the civil service, the army and navy and air force? Again, our ignorance is complete. Does he seek to influence foreign policy? We have only hazy rumors upon which only half a dozen people alive can comment with any authority. Yet the answers to these questions are vital, since upon them may depend the whole fate of the next Labour government. It is the great merit of Hardie that he supplies a background from which the issue involved receive a new and clear emphasis. His book is written with impartiality and vigor. It will be an indispensable work for many years.

THE MECHANISM OF SANCTIONS.

In 1921, the Assembly adopted a report and resolution on the application of Article 16, which have since been generally accepted as a guide to the way in which this article should be applied. The Members of the League took account of the procedure proposed in this resolution when applying Article 16 in the present conflict.

Accordingly, the Council appointed a committee of six of its Members, which reported that in their view the Italian Government had resorted to war against Ethiopia in disregard of its obligations under the Covenant, and that Article 16 was consequently applicable. This opinion was accepted by all the Members of the Council, except Italy. The report of the Committee of Six and the Minutes of the Council meeting were circulated to all the Members of the League. Advantage was taken of the fact that the Assembly was in session in order to ascertain the view of all the Governments Members of the League. They all concurred in the judgment of the Committee of Six, except Albania, Austria and Hungary, who declared that their special relationship to Italy precluded them from agreeing with their fellow-Members of the League. The Italian Government also, of course, opposed this view.

The Assembly then recommended that the Members of the League other than the parties to the dispute should constitute themselves into a Co-ordination Committee for the purpose of organising the application of sanctions. The Co-ordination Committee, which is a Committee of Members of the League, in its turn appointed the Committee of Eighteen to prepare and watch over the execution of the various sanctions. The thirteen Members of the Council other than the parties to the conflict, plus the five States elected by the Co-ordination Committee, constitute the Committee of Eighteen.

The latter nominated various groups of experts and sub-committees to work out, in co-operation with the Economic, Financial and Transit Sections of the Secretariat, the measures to be applied in pursuance of the decisions of the Co-ordination Committee. The nature of these measures has been described from time to time.

In conclusion, it should be emphasised that the Covenant leaves it to each Government Member of the League to decide for itself whether a breach of the Covenant has been committed. It is the duty of every Member State to take this decision and to act upon it. "The fulfilment of their duties under Article 16 is required from Members of the League by the express terms of the Covenant and they cannot neglect them without breach of their treaty obligations" (Assembly resolution of 1921.)

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarika, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 20,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 22,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
 Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)
 Sheth Todarmal Chimanlal Samal Beehar, Mill Agent Baroda.
 Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Girdharlal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda.
 Raj Ratna Bhalal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
 Seth Pransukhlal Manatlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)
 Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Bombay).
 Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nauvati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
 Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
 Burma sailing at Galle Tuticorin
 Colombo and other coast ports
 according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-36

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

366

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 8

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.BULLION EXCHANGE,

Sheik Memon St., Bombay.

BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)MALABAR HILL,

3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

AHMEDABAD.AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)*CALCUTTA.*CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)*NAGPUR CITY.*POONA.*POONA CITY.*RAJKOT.*SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed	Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up	„ 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund	„ 1,02,50,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1½ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

“Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application.” The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA.

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

The articles which appeared in THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER have been reprinted in book form. Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra,
BOMBAY 20.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad).
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulla (District West Khandesh).
Karad (" ").	Dondalcha (" ").
Tasgaon (" ").	Nandurbar (" ").
Satara (" ").	Shirpur (" ").
Kirloskarwadi (" ").	Shahada (" ").
Shirala (" ").	Sakri (" ").
Koregaon (" ").	Sindkheda (" ").
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nashik).
Shevgaon (" ").	Satana (" ").
Ahmednagar (" ").	Katwa (" ").
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panch Mahals).
Palghar (" ").	Kalol (" ").
Kalyan (" ").
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Sarlaya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
G. K. Devadhar, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandekar,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,00,000

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2½ per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother," is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR:AND*TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

367

Invigorating and Health Giving.

Giving the daily bath to the baby is no worry to the mother, if she uses MYSORE SANDAL SOAP. The baby likes it and he will be happy only if he gets a tablet of MYSORE SANDAL SOAP to play with.

USE MYSORE SANDAL SOAP.

GOVERNMENT SOAP FACTORY, BANGALORE.

Sole Agents: for Bombay Presidency (excluding Sind and Districts of Belgaum, Dharwar and North Kanara) and Rajputana.

Messrs. RAMJANALLY EBRAHIM & Co.,
81, Princess Street, Bombay 2.

The Indian Ladies' Magazine.

PUBLISHED ONCE IN TWO MONTHS.

Edited solely in the interests of the Women of India, by MRS. K. SATTIANADHAM, M. A., Harrington Road, Chetpet, Madras.

	Rs. a. p.
Subscription (including Postage),
Inland ...	8 8 0
Foreign ...	4 0 0

(Subscribers and Contributions urgently needed).

THE GUARDIAN

A CHRISTIAN WEEKLY.
Dealing with Social, Economic, Political and Religious Problems.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY PRICE 2 ANNAS.

Annual Subscription: Inland, Rs. 5/-
Foreign, 10s. Post free.

Subscriptions and all other Communications should be addressed to—

THE MANAGER,
The Guardian,
HOGARTH PRESS, Mount Road,
MADRAS.

SAFELY RELY ON AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF
Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT. realpatidar.com
BOMBAY & MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

368
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 8

UNPRECEDENTED! PERMANENT! INSPIRING!

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference was sent to us for circulation in India and they have been sold out. A further supply is expected in about a month and orders can be booked for at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The Volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	- - - - -	20s Annually.
	- - - - -	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
Outside the Union	- - - - -	21s. Annually.
" " "	- - - - -	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,Phoenix, Natal.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 105 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office: KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY FEBRUARY 13, 1936. No. 24.

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Sir S. Radhakrishnan for Oxford.
Excluded Areas.
Harijan Sevak Sangh.
Arab Riots in Zanzibar.
The Press and Legislature.
Indians and Englishmen.
Broadcasting by Dancing Girls.
Congress and Nautch Parties.
Literary Garbage.
The Population Problem.
Reconstruction in the Irish State.

Europe Sins, Ethiopia to Pay.
The Bihar Squabble.
Ramakrishna Memorial Volume
"Socrates at School."
Congress and Bharata Natyam.
America Faces the East.
Social Legislation in Hindu
Law.
Iranians and Hindus.
Five Phases of the Indian National Congress.
Outdoing Katherine May.
Macaulay Vindicated.

NOTES

Sir S. Radhakrishnan for Oxford:—Great Britain has been behind other nations in promoting the study of Indian culture. The founding of the Spalding Professorship of Eastern Relations and Ethics is a belated recognition of her special interest in the subject. The selection of Sir S. Radhakrishnan as first Professor in the Foundation, however, goes far to atone for Britain's dilatoriness in this important sphere. It has given great satisfaction in India. Sir Sarvapalli is the foremost outstanding exponent of Hindu philosophy in terms of Western culture. But he is more than that. His writings have given coherence and system to Hindu religious thought as influenced by modern trends, and it is not too much to say that they have given direction and form to present-day tendencies in Hinduism. His selection to the new Professorship is a welcome sign that the intellect of England has advanced ahead of political England in its appreciation of Indian capacity. While politically we are considered fit only for the mongrel scheme of Sir Samuel Hoare, intellectually the great Oxford University finds that an Indian scholar and thinker is the most suitable teacher to guide British youth to an understanding of the ethics and philosophy of Asia. Incidentally, Sir Sarvapalli's nomination to this key position in Indo-British scholarship, should convince nervous Indians that writings vilifying Hinduism and Hindus have very little influence on thinking men and that what really matters is the presentation of Indian ideals in the spirit which animates Sir Sarvapalli's writings.

"Excluded Areas":—We were wrong in stating last week that the Orders in Council on "Excluded Areas" had been issued. What has been issued are drafts to be laid before Parliament before they are approved by His Majesty in Council. So there is yet some chance of their being amended so as to fit in with actual conditions and the recommendations of Provincial Governments. As we pointed out in our leading article last week, Bombay has been treated by the Government of India and the Secretary of State with especial antipathy. The considered views of the Bombay Government have been completely ignored. The Government of India "on the facts before them" have recommended the exclusion of large areas where the people are as well qualified to understand the value of the vote as—shall we say?—in Ross and Cromarty. The draft proposals are calculated to thrust some lakhs of people, who have long ago emerged from their aboriginalism, back into their forgotten primitiveness. The comment of Times (London), that the recommendations of the Government of India have vindicated the value of Parliamentary discussion, is a good example of unintended irony. The Government of India's despatch on the subject, does not bear the signatures of the Viceroy and of the Law Member and the acting Member of Education. In a despatch of such importance, these omissions are a serious defect. According to the New Delhi correspondent of the Hindu of Madras, Sir N. N. Sircar and Sir Girijashankar Bajpai were within easy reach of the Secretariat at the Imperial capital. The five signatories to the despatch were none of them interested in Bombay. The Commander-in-Chief's signature was, of course, a formality. The two Punjabees, Sir Henry Craik and Sir M. Zaffrullah Khan took care that no liberties were taken with the recommendations of the Local Government. Sir Frank Noice not long ago described himself as a staunch Madrassee, and he saw to it that his province was safe from the ravages of the Cadogan amendment. The fifth signatory, Sir James Grigg, is indifferent to what happens so long as he can borrow money at 3 per cent in the London market. Bombay had no godfather in the Government of India. The Viceroy who knows Bombay well, would seem to have grown indifferent to her future, as was noticeable in his attitude to the separation of Aden. The Government of Bombay should brief the Congress leaders from Bombay to fight its case in the Assembly, if a gross injustice to the Presidency is to be prevented.

Harijan Sevak Sangh:—The annual meeting of the Executive Board of the Harijan Sevak Sangh

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

370
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15]

was held at Delhi on the 7th February. Gandhiji was absent for the first time owing to ill-health. (The latest news that he is well on the road to recovery has been received with great relief.) Mr. G. D. Birla presided. He felt it necessary to point out in his opening speech that there are people among Sanatanists who were fair minded and it was such people that it should be the aim of workers of the Sangh to convert to their cause. He thought that the appointment of a Publicity man would effect this object. Unless the person selected holds the view which Mr. Birla so aptly expressed, he may be more a hindrance than a help to the cause. There has been a little too much of the tendency to try to browbeat orthodoxy into submission. Mr. Birla's suggestion that vernacular and English newspapers should be regularly supplied with information regarding the work of the Sangh, is a good one. But here, again, a dictatorial tone should be avoided. The cause has the sympathy of nearly all Indian journals but they have also their own views which should receive attention from the Board and its officials. We are rather sorry that the Board has decided to revive at once the temple entry agitation. Hindus who worship regularly in temples are, as a class, the most conservative of their sects, and these will be the last to be persuaded out of their old prejudices. If the educated classes are agreed that caste and out-caste distinctions should be ignored in their social and home life, and if they put the principle into practice, the problem in relation to temple goers will become greatly simplified. In passing, many delegates to the recent All-India Women's Conference at Trivandram, regardless of caste or creed, visited some of the most exclusive Hindu temples, the temple warden at one place having eased his own scruples by exclaiming; "Of course, you are all Brahmins." The Board resolved to grant a loan to a Co-operative Society in Assam. This is a wise advance. About a year ago when a loan for a Co-operating Housing Society on this side was requested, the correspondent was curtly told that it could be given only on his personal security!

Arab Riots in Zanzibar:—The recent Arab riots in Zanzibar in which two police officers were killed and several persons injured, should open the eyes of the British Government to the consequences of the high-handed measures of the Government of Zanzibar of which the British Resident is the virtual head. The recent anti-Indian Decrees were sought to be defended as being necessary to save the Arab, who was represented as a simpleton, from the designing Indian exploiter. The Arabs founded empires long before the British and have shown themselves to be possessed of high intellectual and business abilities. The plea of protecting them was a pure myth. They know their own interests well enough, and they know that they are not menaced by Indians. The British Government is addicted to the doctrine of supporting "the man on the spot" so long as he manages to keep things quiet. This limit has now been passed in Zanzibar and we may hope that the situation will now be viewed in London from the proper angle. It would be folly to allow things to drift as they are doing. The riots show that the Indian element in the population of Zanzibar is an important factor in maintaining a stable economy and that the Resident's attempt to undermine its position has brought about a serious disturbance of the political and economic equilibrium of the Protectorate.

The Press and the Legislature:—A point of great importance to newspapers was raised in the Legislative Assembly this week on a motion of adjournment introduced by Mr. Sant Singh. Mr. Krishna Kant Malaviya, who sits for a United Provinces constituency in the Legislative Assembly, is the editor of a Hindi journal, the Abhyuthaya, published in Allahabad. He made a speech at the last session of the Assembly in the course of the debate in the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, which was duly published in the official report. Mr. Malaviya reproduced his speech from the official report in his journal. The Government of the United Provinces called upon him to deposit a security for having done so. The point raised was, whether it was not an infringement of the privilege of the Assembly to take action against a journal for republishing a speech made in the Assembly, and published in the official report. The Pandit might have bought a thousand copies of the Report and distributed them without incurring any liability. The opinion of the Home Member, that the speech glorified murderers, is entirely irrelevant. We have read the speech in the official report—it was not reported in the papers at the time—and, in our opinion, Sir Henry Craik's impression was entirely unjustifiable. But that is not the issue. A speech which was in order in the Legislative Assembly when it was spoken, can not be treated as an offence when republished in a journal. That the Times of India should justify the attitude of Government on a question so seriously detrimental to the exercise of its legitimate functions by the Press, is surprising and, yet, not altogether.

Indians and Englishmen:—Our observations in an editorial note last week regarding the probability of the Shahidgunge dispute in Lahore not having been allowed to develop to its present impasse, if Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan had been Governor, implied no reflection on the personal competence of the present Governor. All that was meant was that an Indian has certain advantages in dealing with communal situations which the Englishman in the present state of things does not enjoy. An incident may illustrate the meaning. When Lovat Fraser was editor of the Times of India, he had often attacked Congress leaders, including Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and Gokhale, in trenchant terms. Those who knew Fraser, knew that this was merely a part of the game and that he had really great regard for them, greater regard than for those whom he sometimes praised with equal trench-

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

371

ancy. When he was about to leave the country, Fraser told this writer that he would like to make up with Gokhale. "You know," he added, "that one sometimes writes overnight what one does not care to look at in the morning." When this was communicated to Gokhale, he said: "I am not a man who stands on dignity. To an Indian—any Indian—I am ready to go down on my knees if any public interest is advanced thereby. But as regards Englishmen, in the present relation between our two nations, I must maintain an attitude of reserve. I will not see Fraser." The two men met afterwards in London at the instance of Lord Morley. But that is another story.

Broadcasting by Dancing Girls :—The Bombay Chronicle published on Monday from its Delhi correspondent a message stating that Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant, Deputy Leader of the Congress Party in the Legislative Assembly, had a passage at arms with Sir James Grigg, Finance Member of the Government of India, at a meeting of the Standing Finance Committee on Saturday. While the reorganisation of the Broadcasting Service was being discussed, the Pandit pointed out the undesirability of engaging dancing girls for giving music programmes. Sir James, who was Chairman, is reported to have observed that he could not allow discussion on the matter as it implied that dancing girls have been engaged. The Pandit said that he was not the man to make allegations without being sure of his facts and vowed that he would vote a penny for the item which was not allowed to be discussed in the Committee. The correspondent added that the Chairman apologised to the Pandit and the incident closed.

Congress and Nautch Parties:—In this context, attention is called to the communication which we publish elsewhere from the distinguished leader of the Indian women's movement, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddy. Dr. Reddy writes in a personal letter: "You know that the Congress commands great influence and respect from the public of all sections in the country simply because its aims and objects are high and noble. You might have read that the Madras Congress (Committee) which organised musical entertainments during its Golden Jubilee celebrations in this city, had invited all characters irrespective of their morals to sing and play and to dance so as to attract the public." As one of the most eminent workers in the cause of social purity and as the mover of the Act to penalise prostitution, Dr. Reddy feels indignant that the National Congress should, by deriving entertainment from doubtful characters, set itself against the redemption of dancing girls. Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant should spare some attention to the doings of his fellow Congressmen in Madras. Relatively, the voice of a professional dancing girl heard on the radio is less likely to corrupt public morals than her performances in flesh and blood at the Congress Golden Jubilee celebrations.

Literary Garbage :—Miss Katherine Mayo has found an imitator. Indeed, Mrs. Elizabeth Dilling has outdone her in the business of literary muck-raking. Miss Mayo concentrated her attention on the Hindus whom she regards as the scum of the earth. Mrs. Dilling is more cosmopolitan in her antipathy. Her denunciation of the World Fellowship of Faiths is typical of her outbursts. Here it is: "Speakers of the debasing and degrading Hindu, Mahommedan, Pagan and Agnostic cults are placed in fellowship and on equal footing with speakers for Jesus Christ...The savage Mahommedan call of the muezzin as heard in darkest Asia is mingled with the propaganda of the Hindu, Jew and Agnostic." The New Republic deals faithfully with this new phenomenon. We reproduce its comments on the author and her book, "The Red Network," on another page. They may be applied word for word to Miss Katherine Mayo's productions.

The Population Problem :—A Conference was held in Lucknow a few days ago to discuss the problem of population in this country. It is difficult in a country situated as India is, to decide how far the effects that are noticeable in the condition of the people are due to pressure of population in the country itself or pressure of population in another country. Colonialism has on the people subject to it the same effect as overpopulation, because the colony is called upon to support the dominant country before it cares for its own people. It lowers the standard of life, prevents the population from rising much above the level of hewers of wood and drawers of water and imposes on it all the burdens of economic servitude. Western countries have invented economic nationalism as a shield against exploitation. Economic nationalism devised as a protective measure easily develops into an aggressive weapon. The shield becomes the sword.

Reconstruction in the Irish Free State:—In an informing article in the New Statesman of the 18th January, Mr. W. Horsfall Carter writes: "The idea of the Free State setting up heavy industries or even indulging in large scale mechanised farming (such as Pandit Jawaharlal wants to see established in India) has never entered Mr. de Valera's head. He has repeatedly described the limited objective as being to make the country self-supporting in food, clothing and shelter." Mr. Carter shows that the Irish leader has succeeded remarkably in doing this during the last four years. There is considerable resemblance between the internal policy of Mr. de Valera and Signor Mussolini before he took the disastrous plunge into the Ethiopian bog. "Mr. de Valera and his associates" writes Mr. Carter, "are deliberately challenging the Victorian delusion that the mere sum total of trade is the index of a nation's prosperity." That exactly is what Indian leaders should do when they have the power. And they should have power because this is the thing to do in the true interests of the people of this country.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

372

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, February 15, 1936.

EUROPE SINS, ETHIOPIA TO PAY.

After an interval of several weeks, we get some propagandist literature from Italian sources. The earlier productions emanated from a body with a Calcutta address called the Italian Community in India. The documents received this week give no address in India. One of them is a typed translation of an article published by the Popolo d'Italia and headed "an appeal to the students of Europe". It is typical of Fascist mentality that the anonymous propagandist has not even changed the heading so as to make the article of interest to Indian readers. The sum and substance of the article in the Italian journal, is that Signor Mussolini is a devoted lover of peace and goodwill among nations, and that he and his countrymen are the innocent victims of the greed, envy and malice of other European nations. The writer does not pause to tone down his accusations by polite euphemisms. "The prosecution at Geneva," he writes, "has been a fraud. The judges have been subjected to pressure and threats. The Assembly and the Council, constitutional organs of the League, have not been requested to give their advice lest the unanimity might not have been obtained. The various Committees appointed are organs not foreseen by the Covenant and, therefore, they are unconstitutional. The State, constitutionally aggressor, addicted to aggressions, is Abyssinia, only Abyssinia, and nobody else." A long list follows of Abyssinia's aggressions during the last half a century. The writer forgets that the specific offence of Italy is, that she has invaded the territory of a fellow member of the League of Nations and that what happened before the League was even dreamt of, is wholly irrelevant to the consideration of the present war. This delightful irrelevance, however, is the charm of Italian propaganda. As a proof that Italy did not want war, it is naively observed: "That is clearly established. Mussolini, since the memorable declaration of Bolzano, has specified that Italy did not want to have any reason of European conflict. The Ethiopian question was only a colonial question, distant and limited. This ought to be so. Rome pledged herself to respect the imperial British interests and was ready to enter into treaties with London in the atmosphere of loyalty and harmony. At the historical Assembly of 2nd October last, the Head of the Italian Government took the sacred engagement of avoiding any act which could give the colonial conflict the character and the extension of a European conflict." In other words, according to Signor Mussolini, whose mouthpiece the writer evidently is, so long as his aggressions are confined to countries outside Europe, no European nation has a right to interfere. Unfortunately, however, Italy is not the only European country which has to feed on colonial peoples in order to maintain its economic existence. During the last one hundred and fifty years, European nations have fought each other for colonial possessions and for them alone. Even the last war, although violation of Belgian neutrality was the most loudly professed cause, was waged for colonial empire.

This is made clear in the second document a copy of which has been sent along with the translation of the article in the Italian journal. This is a printed paper issued by the Fascist Confederation of Industrialists and is headed "Business and Financial Report, a monthly survey of Italian Trade and Industry." Although it professes to be a business and financial report, it is devoted in large part to historical events, perhaps as furnishing the necessary background to an understanding of the Italian economic situation. Italy went to the Peace Conference, we are told, with 600,000 dead to her account, and with two treaties bearing the signatures of Great Britain and France—the Treaty of London and the Treaty of St. Jean de Maurienne—under which she was promised, in case of an allied victory, colonial outlets for her expanding population and possibilities for satisfying the growing needs of raw materials for her rapidly developing industries. At Paris her claims under both these Treaties were set aside. "As a result of the distribution of mandates over ex-enemy possessions in Africa only, Great Britain was assigned 1,849,203 square kilometers of land with 7,079,000 inhabitants, France 1,879,706 square kilometers with 2,297,000 inhabitants, Belgium 59000 square kilometers with 3,000,000 inhabitants. Italy, with the stretch of desert between the oases of Gat and Gadames ceded by France and trans-Jubaland ceded by England, acquired only 80,000 square kilometers, mostly desert or fever ridden as is shown by the fact that the total population did not exceed 70,000." True, the allies did not honour their treaty obligations, but how is Abyssinia to blame for their dereliction? Why did the Italian Government of the day accept the deserts and why did it not insist on a more equitable division of the spoils of war? Italy may have very good cause to attack the allies who, she thinks, proved false to their promise but, instead of fighting them, she declares she does not want to fight Europeans! What is the logic of this declaration? Then, again, if the United States and the British Dominions passed laws restricting Italian immigration, how can Ethiopia be required to pay the penalty? We have nothing but admiration for the self-respecting way in which Signor Mussolini met this action of Anglo-Saxon countries. Realising that the labour force of the Italian workers was the country's most precious economic asset, and that the moral status and economic well-being of the workers should be the first care of the State, large measures were undertaken and carried out to improve the lot of workers. The passage

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

373

in which these measures are recounted makes very pleasant reading. By super-human efforts, Italy rapidly developed her trade and industries only to find foreign markets closed against her. The United States led the way. Great Britain by the Ottawa agreements closed her markets to foreign countries. France also introduced quotas and prohibitions. "The doctrines of exasperated (exaggerated?) nationalism, economic self-sufficiency and manipulated currencies, prevailed," the writer mournfully observes "and Italy, however reluctantly, had no choice but to resort to similar measures in self-defence" In other words Europe sins and Ethiopia has to pay.

THE BIHAR SQUABBLE.

In view of the controversy that has arisen over the observations in "India in 1933-34" relating to the Bihar Central Relief Committee, we quote them. They are as follows :—

The most important of the charitable funds, after the Viceroy's Fund, is that raised in response to the appeal launched by Babu Rajendra Prasad, the leader of the Congress party in Bihar. The subscriptions up to the middle of November 1934 amounted to Rs. 28,89,565, in cash and Rs. 8,80,587 in kind. The fund was administered by an organization styled the Bihar Central Relief Committee. The Committee took a full share in the distribution of food, clothing and blankets immediately after the earthquake, and sent out a number of workers who engaged in rescue work, the provision of medical aid, the clearing of debris, and building of temporary grass huts. In response to a letter from Babu Rajendra Prasad, Government gave him a full description of the problems arising out of the earthquake, they indicated the measures which they proposed to take, and the manner in which the funds of the Committee could best be expended so as to supplement these measures. The published accounts up to the 30th September 1934 showed that there were balances amounting to Rs. 14,03,000, and advances totalling Rs. 1,87,000. Offices and equipment, stock, cycles and cars had absorbed Rs. 1,28,000, and administrative expenses Rs. 84,000. The balance representing expenditure in actual relief to the public, was Rs. 12,80,000. At the end of the year a large portion of the subscription apparently remained unexpended.

On the face of it, there is nothing in the passage quoted above, which would strike the reader as an aspersion on the work of the Bihar Central Relief Committee. A statistically-minded reader might have made mental note of the small sum of Rs. 3,507 which, in the sentence immediately preceding this passage, is given as the cost of administration of the Viceroy's Fund of Rs. 60,16,041,—nearly double that of Babu Rajendra Prasad's—which was administered by a Central Committee at New Delhi; while the corresponding item in the Bihar Committee's account was given as Rs. 1,82,000, including equipment. Babu Rajendra Prasad had pointed out to the Relief Commissioner of Bihar that this was wrong and that the correct figure is about Rs. 62,000. The correction had evidently not been communicated to the writer of India in 1933-34 in time for being carried out in his book. It may seem that Babu Rajendra Prasad had read into his words what is not there and has taken offence where none is noticeable.

Such an impression would be unfair to Mr. Prasad. The passage is lifted word for word from a Report of Relief Commissioner Brett over which there has been correspondence between that official and Babu Rajendra Prasad. We give the paragraphs in Mr. Brett's Report, as given by the Publicity Officer of the Government of Bihar and Orissa, who has rushed to the defence of the author of "India". Relief Commissioner Brett wrote :—

The accounts up to September 30, 1934, which were published in an audited form in December, showed that there were balances amounting to Rs. 14,03,000, and advances totalling Rs. 1,87,000. Offices and equipment, stock, cycles and cars absorbed Rs. 1,28,000 and administrative expenses Rs. 84,000. The balance, representing expenditure on actual relief to the public, was Rs. 12,80,000. The principal items were Rs. 4,77,000 spent on water supply, Rs. 2,15,000 on temporary huts, Rs. 1,82,000 on flood relief and Rs. 1,03,000 on middle class relief. In August and September, wide-spread distress was caused by floods in the Ganges and the Son. Though the area affected coincided to some extent with the areas which had suffered in the earthquake, these floods had no connection with the earthquake. The Bihar Central Relief Committee expended considerable sums on operations connected with them. At the end of the year, a large portion of the subscriptions apparently remained unexpended. Though at a later stage it was decided to spend money on middle class building grants, it is possible that the initial abstention of the Bihar Central Relief Committee from expenditure on housing grants may make it difficult to spend the balance of the fund. The experience gained from the administration of the Viceroy's Fund suggests that sums which could usefully be expended for objects other than grants for house building are limited. At the same time, the practical difficulties of making a just distribution of such grants among a host of competing claimants are so great that it is doubtful whether any private organisation could overcome them. A Relief Society which is largely identified with a particular political party encounters these difficulties in an accentuated form.

Comparing the above with the quotation from "India in 1933-34" at the beginning of this article, it will be seen that the writer of the latter has merely copied the words of the Relief Commissioner leaving out some sentences which we print in italics. Babu Rajendra Prasad who had corrected the Relief Commissioner's figures and his criticism of the Bihar Central Relief Committee, was naturally offended when he found the same erroneous figures quoted in the Government of India publication. The author of "India in 1933-34" did not, we may be sure, omit the italicised and accusatory passages in Relief Commissioner Brett's Report out of consideration for the feelings of the Bihar Central Relief Committee. He has omitted the passages evidently because he felt they were a bit too thick to pass muster in a volume issued under the authority of the Secretary of State, though it may be quite the usual thing in the polemics of the Provincial Government. The Bihar Publicity Official who is apparently desperately anxious to distinguish himself, under the guise of defending his New Delhi counterpart, has republished Commissioner Brett's criticism with further aggravations of his own. Babu Rajendra Prasad pointed out that the administrative charges of the Viceroy's Fund, which were stated to amount to Rs. 3,507, should, to be correct, include part of the salaries of the officials who administered it. If the Viceroy had to engage a special staff, instead of drawing on the services of the officials

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15

His Excellency would surely have had to spend much more than Rs. 3500 on administering his Rs. 60 lakhs Fund. This is perfectly true, says the Bihar Publicity Officer, but that is precisely the reason why all non-official Funds should have been merged into the Viceroy's Fund. He suggests that this was not done because the Bihar Central Relief Committee consisted of Congressmen who were more anxious to advance the prestige of the Congress than to afford relief to the earthquake sufferers. One might as well say that the Government of India did not allow any non-official organisation to take part in Quetta relief because it was more anxious to maintain its prestige as the ma bap and anna dala of Quetta sufferers. If Publicity Departments are allowed to impute motives to non-officials, Government can not complain if motives are imputed to them. That State relief is always mechanical and does not reach all classes of persons deserving relief as private agencies can, has been demonstrated repeatedly, so often, in fact, as to become axiomatic.

Relief Commissioner Brett's criticism that the Bihar Central Relief Committee helped sufferers from floods in the same areas, is itself a proof of this. We pointed out last week that the floods were an aggravation of the hardships suffered by the people some months previously from the earthquake and that there was nothing wrong in helping them from Funds collected for earthquake relief. Commissioner Brett affirms that the floods had no connection with the earthquake, though it covered a part of the same area. Even if this was so, it would have made no difference. As a matter of fact, the floods were a direct consequence of the earthquake. They occurred in August and September while the earthquake occurred in January. In the preliminary account of the earthquake in Bihar and Nepal by Auden and Ghosh, published in the Record of the Geological Survey of India Vol. LXVIII, part 2, there is a short section headed "Monsoon Flooding". "In view of the area of apparent subsidence, which corresponds approximately with the slump belt," forecasted these geological experts, "it is probable that floods will result along the low-lying river tracts which obliquely cross this area.... The problem of flood waters from the Bagmati river, north of Muzaffarpur, has concerned the Irrigation Department for some years, and it may be expected to become more serious during the coming monsoon, since the country between the Bagmati and Lakhndai rivers comes within the area of subsidence." (p. 206) The floods were thus a direct result of the earthquake, Commissioner Brett's dogmatism notwithstanding.

Ramakrishna Memorial Volume:—The Ramakrishna Centenary Memorial volume, "the Cultural Heritage of India," referred to in last week's Reformer, can be had from the Headquarters of the Ramakrishna Celebration Committee, Belur Math, Howrah District, Bengal, India.

"SOCRATES AT SCHOOL"

For some years the attention of both social workers and the Government has been focussed on rural reconstruction and general uplift of the village population. Prominent among the names of officials who achieved some success in this line is that of Mr. F. W. Brayne I.C.S., of Gurgaon Experiment fame, whose books on village uplift have come to be recognised as authorities on the subject. Realising the need of an interesting and effective way of instruction in bringing home to the social workers and villagers themselves the salient features of village uplift work, Mr. Brayne has had recourse in his later treatises on the subject to the method of questions and answers, himself taking the role of Socrates. "Socrates at School," the latest of Mr. Brayne's booklets, is a rehash of his ideas on village uplift and is mainly adapted and intended for rural students. Those who have had any experience in village welfare work and have come in intimate contact with the older generation of villagers, have found that, if any lasting benefit is to be derived in this direction, it should be done in schools, by moulding the more responsive and plastic minds of the younger generation rather than by coercing the older people, who are what they are owing to force of circumstances, tradition and custom. To the teachers in village schools, some of whom, in spite of their training, are no better than the generality of villagers, the book will serve as a useful guide.

In his village uplift work, Mr. Brayne had been peculiarly fortunate both as regards his position as a high district official, for he could command resources which an ordinary social worker could not, and in the villagers themselves, who were petty but prosperous zemindars, among whom he set himself to work. The zemindars, though they may own only small strips of land, are no wage-slaves and are, therefore, better off than the common run of villagers in other parts of the country. For in a village, also in the North, when a welfare worker recommended to the villagers, during her talk on Mosquitoes and Malaria, the use of mosquito curtains, one of them retorted that to provide a family of six adults with them, would cost him a fortune! And, indeed, it was true considering his limited resources. Therefore, it is not a little surprising that Mr. Brayne should hold that economics does not enter into the problem of rural reconstruction but only a side issue.

According to Mr. Brayne, the villagers have to construct their own roads, build their houses, plaster the walls of the school buildings, raise a woman's hospital, all by village subscription, maintain sanitation and cleanliness and preserve the health of the village in addition to their own occupation. Well may the villager ask: "Has the District Board abdicated its function?" Is it to be wondered at that the villager is apathetic to any scheme of improvement if it involves so much labour and expense on himself? When in other countries the State takes the responsibility for the education, health and welfare of its subjects and even goes so far as to help with doles the unemployed, is it not expecting too much by way of self-help from our poor villagers whose hard work on the soil hardly gives them an adequate return?

It is hard to understand the mentality of those village welfare workers who insist on finding occupation for the villager for every moment of his waking hours. To take the analogy of agriculture. A field which has been cultivated successfully for some time has to lie fallow for a period before it

*Oxford University Press, Price Rs. 1.—

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com 1936

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

375

could again be brought under cultivation. Does this not apply with equal truth to over-worked humanity? Is leisure not a necessity for the cultivation of the mind?

Mr. Brayne would deny the villager even his hookah and his gossip. For what higher purpose do people, better placed in life, frequent clubs?

CONGRESS AND BHARATA NATYAM

The whole creation is full of beauty, colour, music, harmony, and order. All creatures from the thinking man to the crawling worm can enjoy, appreciate music and have music in them. The civilised man as well as the barbarian can sing, dance and play when in a mood to do so. The noblest and the loftiest ideas can be expressed only through divine music so as to inspire humanity for good.

Our Nayanars, Acharyas, Alwars have sung beautiful hymns and verses out of their intense devotion and love to God and those poems ring for ever with the eternal truths of life. These when sung in the right tune and in the right spirit never fail to inspire in us feelings of piety, purity and devotion. Music can either elevate the mind to the highest spiritual and moral plane or drag it down to the lowest depth of human degradation and depravity. Therefore one has to be careful, especially our children and the youth of both sexes in selecting their company and their association. There is good music and bad music. There is music, the outpourings of a good and pure soul as well as that from the voluptuous, from the impure, and from the impious. Therefore there should be discrimination in our choice. In inviting men and women musicians and dancers to exhibit their skill and to entertain the public, the leaders of our society who want the society and the nation to rise to a higher level of thought and action ought to choose for public show the right person, the one who combines a good moral character as well as a talent for music, that is why the God Nataraja himself has danced to the world thereby setting an example for all time to come.

Unfortunately some of our leaders in their anxiety to revive Indian music and dance, lose sight of the above essential factor, and the Madras Congress, the Musical Academies and schools, invite all characters, good or bad, irrespective of their daily habits and mode of life and give them and their music publicity and a good advertisement, which cannot but have an injurious effect both upon the musical world as well as upon the uninformed public mind.

It is recognised by all religions and by all cultured societies that chastity is a necessary virtue for the proper cultivation and development of the fine arts, nay, even for our proper physical and intellectual growth. It is very much to be deplored that certain individuals who live in open concubinage and who pass for prostitutes have been very recently given undue advertisement and publicity even by the Congress. I will be glad to be corrected if my information is not accurate. There was an article in the Hindu dated 17th January 1936, giving a comparative description of their personalities and eulogising their dance and their actions and gestures, so as to draw still further public notice. I believe, that there is an impression among some of our people that married women cannot cultivate dance and music to perfection and hence women who take to music and dance should necessarily lead an unmarried and free life, which, if allowed to spread, would prove disastrous to our social welfare as well as to the development of that art itself. I wish to know from such votaries of those arts whether they are aiming at a life of holy virginhood or at a life of promiscuity and license or even concubinage, a relic of the barbarous past derogatory to women's dignity and status. There may be dancers and actresses in the West, but we all know that their tradition is different from that of the Devadasis of South India who are innocent victims of a pseudo-religious custom, for whose abolition, strenuous efforts are being made.

The public may be aware that a law has been passed in this Presidency as well as in Mysore, Travancore and Cochin, to dispense with the Devadasi service in the Hindu temples, there is a Penal Code to punish dedication of girls under 18 to temples, and further the Prevention of Dedication Bill which I introduced in the local Council has been widely supported by all the leading people and by the enlightened public, that the Bombay Legislative Council very recently passed legislation prohibiting dedication, for the simple reason that the majority of the Devadasis, whether dancers or not, lead a life of promiscuity and prostitution and a few remain as mistresses of men who are already wedded, because none would come forward to marry them.

It is well-known that a good percentage of the handsome Devadasis gifted with fine voices and adepts in Natyam become wrecked physically and mentally very early in life owing to their unhealthy mode of life and are finally lost to the musical world.

When the Congress itself, which is striving for the political and for the social regeneration of the country, has adopted this very objectionable method of encouraging Bharata-Natyam and Abinayanam, how can we hope in the near future to improve public health and morality and to eradicate some of the pernicious customs prevalent in our society through wise propaganda and legislation?

Madras,
6th February 1936. } S. MUTHULAKSHMI REDDI.

AMERICA FACES THE EAST *

(BY WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.)

THE PEACE BRIDGE.

It is good to be reminded in these days of war and preparation for war that there are people interested in peace. Judging by government expenditures around the world one would think the nations were convinced that all the future must be mortgaged so that men might kill each other off. So, in the spirit of peace, we approached the Peace Bridge which extends from Buffalo to Fort Erie, Ontario.

With relatives in Buffalo and friends of longstanding in Fort Erie we felt that we were crossing by a most significant bridge. The bridge stands as a monument to the friendly relations between two great Commonwealths. There are no reasons save selfishness and greed why the whole human family cannot live together as do Canada and the United States.

To go from one country to another with as little difficulty as we had in crossing the Peace Bridge is inspirational and helps us to look forward to the time when passports and customs inspection and official red-tape will be eliminated.

We drove back across the Peace Bridge to Buffalo late at night to visit a brother-in-law and had a unique experience. He did not know we were coming. Just as we drove up to an isolated square in one section of the city he stepped off a bus and we invited him to ride on to his home with us. It was for us another illustration of how events work out most satisfactorily, sometimes when least expected.

There are forces operating in our world that are moving us toward a peaceful solution of international difficulties. We need to center our thought on ways of friendly cooperation, even if such a way may be only the use of a Peace Bridge.

* The first batch of these notes of Mr. Foley's literary appeared in the Reformer of the 18th January.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

376
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15]

SCENES IN ONTARIO.

More model-T Fords than any other place we have traveled since before going to India in 1926...

Along the southern route across the Province a splendid highway...

Farms looking neglected ... Farmhouses badly in need of repair...

English-appearing filling stations. Gas measured in Imperial gallons...

Signs innumerable insisting on a very low speed for automobiles ... Little traffic on the highway...

(With the amount and speed of traffic on American highways we need some kind of powerful governors on our cars. Killing between thirty-five and forty thousand people in the United States in 1935 is too high a price to pay for whatever values we get from automobiles.)

Life may not be more leisurely in Ontario, but it seemed that way. Possibly more enjoyment may be secured from slowing down the tempo than from any speeding-up process...

There ought to be an invisible yet known boundary line that we could cross into a world of more thought than action...

It is interesting how much laughter there has been over a "Brain Trust". How are we supposed to run our governments... without any brains? Some seem to be run that way.

Economic reverses may keep Ontario houses unpainted, but we had the feeling that deep sources of life were still providing inspiration and encouragement.

EMERGING DETROIT.

We entered Detroit through a vehicular tunnel which caused us to emerge in the rush of the business district.

The whirr of machinery seemed in the air. This was the centre where at least a section of the American population seemed to be coming from under the cloud of depression.

One day we were there a special celebration was on in honor of the widening of Woodward Boulevard.

The laws that operate in human life are always interesting. We speak sometimes of the law of the jungle. Is it such law that demands steadily increasing horsepower in our modern cars while the death rate from motor accidents mounts constantly? What of an advertisement that says "capable of 100 miles an hour, but 60 is enough"? As a matter of fact realistic engineers estimate that any speed over 45 miles per hour is intrinsically dangerous—can the motor industry lift us out of a depression only by increasing the dead and injured on our highways?

Even Detroit streets are narrow with the vast traffic they carry. But is it the responsibility of the city to widen its streets?

We stayed in a beautiful residential section along the Lake. One of the great preachers of America has a home there. He and his wife have long been friends of ours in the Orient and in the United States. He said he was studying Detroit just as he would survey a great opportunity for service in China or India.

There is much that is pagan in American cities. Only a trained student of sociology and psychology can cope with the problems involved. And such a student hasn't much chance unless he has a good deal of what our forefathers used to call "the grace of God" in his make-up.

A city is often a discouraging proposition. Witness the partial defeat of the type of good government Cincinnati has had for years or the difficulty in passing adequate zoning ordinances in Manila.

We need in every city and town a greater body of citizens who will be loyal to the best interests of the community and willing to sacrifice to lift the levels of living.

CHICAGO—THE OVERGROWN TOWN.

Every time I enter Chicago I think of the little log cabin that was erected there by its first settler only a hundred years ago. For Chicago has grown rapidly as the heart of the great central west—perhaps we should say it has grown as the great mechanical administrator of industrial, cultural, political and news-circulating groups in a vast area of the United States. How much heart there is in the process is questionable.

Sometimes Chicago appeals to me as a boy of twelve attempting to assert his claims to early maturity. Even the skyscrapers along Lake Michigan strike me that way.

Yet I like Chicago and have lived there with enjoyment. There is a breeziness about life in the city which may come somewhat from the cold winds that sweep down Michigan Avenue in the winter. It is a great art centre.

There is also a sultriness of evils manifest like the humid heat of mid-summer. No funds for many months for teachers. No money to buy new books in the library. But millions for gambling and gangsterism and municipal corruption. Yet great institutions of a religious and social service character still battle for a better civic consciousness.

Chicago fights on for water from Lake Michigan for its sewer system regardless of how much that will affect dozens of other communities. There is a selfishness about the city in spite of its surface friendliness that may be due to its youth and its rapid hurling together of widely divergent groups.

The destructive gossip of a small-town is evident in the policies of many of its newspapers which call themselves the world's greatest—as though saying so would make them so.

Even a Century of Progress cannot cover up the evils not yet out-grown—cannot make many forgive a city for keeping quiet about evils that some businesses may flourish. An opera season built on an evil business structure had to fail—as it is now, the best orchestra music is produced as the result of the hard work of a group composed entirely of women musicians.

EVANSTON—THE BEAUTIFUL SUBURB.

Long shaded streets, wide boulevards, a breath of wind from the Lake shore, fine homes, an air of well-regulated order, a pleasant place to live—all these mean Evanston to me.

Though the elevated runs to the southward into the maelstrom that is the life of Chicago, and the Highways run to the north to homes of the exclusively wealthy, Evanston has a charm all its own.

Perhaps part of the attraction comes from the fact that the first six months of my daughter's life were spent in Evanston. Certainly we like Evanston because a family of our best friends lives there.

Who wouldn't like a place with good friends living there? What makes a city anyway,—buildings, or roads or train service, or the kind of people in it?

Evanston has a suave polish that is lacking in the big city nearby. It has friendliness and an interest in more important things than business and the often-stupid methods of getting money. It is a good place to live.

I suppose that most people who have their homes within its limits feel that they really live before they

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

377

realpatidar.com

leave for and after they return from work in the neighbouring metropolis.

Life, after all, isn't worth so much if we haven't some pleasant surroundings part of the time. Kagawa, the Japanese, who went to live among the people of the slums of Kobe found he could not do the utmost with his life if he continued to stay there. So now he visits such widely separated and interesting countries as China, the Philippines, and the United States.

Beauty is something we need in our experience.

SOCIAL LEGISLATION IN HINDU LAW.*

Under the auspices of the Law College Representative Council, the Hon. Justice S. Varadachariar delivered a lecture last evening at the College Hall on the "Next Social Legislation in Hindu Law." Mr. K. Krishna Menon, Principal of the College, presided.

At the outset, the lecturer said that he welcomed all earnest endeavour on the part of the student to study the live problems of the day in the hope that in due course they would do their best to find a proper solution for them. They must earnestly seek light on problems and solve the same with an unbiased and open mind. So far as social problems were concerned, while it might be useful to study each question detached from the complicated setting in which it really was found in practical life, so far as the finding of a solution was concerned, they had to deal with the society in which that question arose with all its complexities and needs as if they had a clean slate to write on.

Coming to the subject of the evening, Mr. Justice Varadachariar said that what was regarded in the West as social legislation related mainly to the subject of material welfare of the population. But when they spoke of social legislation in this country, they meant social reform within the limits of the Hindu Law. In this connection, the lecturer would remind them of the anomalous position of the Hindu Law in the country. It was bad enough that in the 20th century they should still have a system of personal law. Nearly all Western countries had long passed out of the system of personal law into a system of what was known as 'territorial' law. The territorial law rested upon what was regarded as convenient in a particular locality. It had very little occasion to reach the susceptibilities or sentiments of the people. Even while personal laws were in force in the West, they were personal laws arising out of custom of particular communities or tribes or nations and had very little admixture of religion. For certain purposes the word 'Hindu' had become a territorial name. The result was that, for the purpose of Hindu Law, Courts had, by something like a residuary presumption, classed everybody as a Hindu unless he fell under any particular definite category. But the Hindu Law had been defined as a law founded upon Hindu Scriptures. The result was that in one sense the Hindu Law was a personal law and in another sense, it was a religious law. The moment any proposal for reform of any part of Hindu Law was put forward, there was naturally the objection that its interference was something associated with Hindu religion. The more logical way of dealing with the thing was to differentiate the different parts of the Hindu Law. Portions dealing with general rights of property should not be confounded with other portions of the law relating to matters like marriage. The former fell within what was called vyavahara adhyaya and the latter in achara adhyaya.

In the Mitakshara there was an attempt to differentiate portions of the smritis which could be regarded as closely intertwined with religion and portions which could be regarded as standing more upon popular practice than strictly mixed up with the religion of the country. But unfortunately to-day there were only two sets of people, one who would wish to interfere with any portion of the Hindu Law; and the other who did not want to interfere with any portion of it. This could be avoided if both the parties would look at the subject from a detached and unbiased point of view. Hindu lawyers, even in the most archaic periods, were not unaware of the necessity for adjustment of the law from time to time. They had 'parishads' which consisted of men who bore no animosity, who had no axe to grind, who were learned and well-behaved, and any pronouncement by them was law. It was a mistake to suppose that the authors of the Hindu Law thought that it would be eternal or unalterable. But they should not interpret the Hindu Law on the English convention that 'custom overrides the written text,' because the Hindu theory of custom was different from the English theory. The present Hindu Law administered in courts was based upon a stereotyped system which was prevalent in India 600 or 700 years ago. The present Hindu Law was compiled from a few old texts which were preferred to later commentaries. In doing so, the compilers were anxious not to offend the susceptibilities of certain pundits who held prejudiced views. The result was that they found themselves now centuries behind other systems of law.

*Hindu, February 1.

Proceeding, the lecturer said that there was a tendency to mix up what was considered just and reasonable with existing structure of Hindu Law without caring for the natural evolution of the Hindu Law. It would be a happy day, observed the speaker, if the Legislature would sweep away the Hindu Law altogether and not dovetail two systems which could not dovetail into each other. They might start afresh with something like the Japanese Code or the Chinese Code; but if they went on tinkering with the Hindu Law, they would get into trouble. In this country, where there were more than one system of personal law and where they had a legislature which was partly the creation of modern political theories, the legislature might very well deal with a system of territorial law, but was obviously unfitted to deal with personal laws founded upon religion.

Referring to certain topics of Hindu Law in which either reforms had been attempted or might conceivably be suggested, the lecturer said that the position of a convert from Hinduism was anomalous. It was one thing to say that a man ought not to be penalised for change of religion or freedom of opinion; but it was a different thing to say that, notwithstanding the conversion, the man should be entitled to rights of guardianship and other rights in the family to which he would be entitled if there was no conversion at all. Referring next to the question of marriage, he said that it was very much in the air now that the principal of divorce should be recognised in the Hindu Law; and the theory of freedom of marriage should be honestly recognised. There was a certain amount of irony in the suggestion that in an age where in commercial matters the doctrine of freedom of contract has come to be repudiated, freedom of contract was regarded as a proper rule in marriages. Whatever might be said in justification of this proposal, let it not be introduced as part of the Hindu Law. Again as regards the laws of inheritance, there was a great deal of difference of opinion as to the basis on which the rules should rest. There was the Mitakshara school and the Dayabhaga school and if they found that neither worked properly, they might formulate another principle. But present day reformers were not in a position to formulate logical

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15

principles which could be applied to each case as it arose.

Finally, Mr. Justice Varadachariar referred to the question of temple-entry and the proper duty of the legislature. It was well recognised in the West that all civil disabilities based upon religion were inconsistent with civilized society. But if they passed from the domain of civil rights to rights which could not, in any sense, be regarded as rights of property, the question became much more controversial and not even an attempted differentiation between permissive legislation and coercive legislation and things of that kind would lead to solution of such problems. Ordinarily, legislation followed public opinion and did not attempt to create public opinion. This consideration must be borne in mind by those who wished well for society and who did not wish to create splits.

IRANIANS AND HINDUS.*

DR. M. N. DHALLA

Shams-ul-Ulama Dastur Dr. M. N. Dhalla, High Priest of the Parsis in Sind, Baluchistan and the Punjab, delivered an address on "Our (Parsi) Indo-Iranian Heritage", at the Cowasji Jehangir Hall, Bombay, on Saturday 8th evening. Dr. Dhalla said that the ancestors of the present day Parsis came to India 1,300 years ago, as fugitives from their homeland Iran (Persia). They landed at Kathiawar and requested Jadhav Rana for an asylum. The head priest of the Parsis then told the Rana that their religion enjoined them to do service to humanity and to love God. They would be loyal and dutiful citizens and be truthful.

The Parsis were of the Aryan stock and belonged to the Indo-Iranian group, continued the learned Dasturji. Their cradle-land was supposed to be Arya-nem-Vaejo, somewhere in the north, which according to legend had been destroyed.

The Aryan Hindus also belonged to the same group. The two branches, the ancestors of the Hindus and the Parsis, lived together for a very long time. They had a common religion and common practices. After separation, the Indo group migrated further south to the Punjab, known to the Iranians as Hapta-Hindu, and to the Aryan Hindus as Sapta-Sindhu, and the Gangetic valley.

Though the environments of the two branches had changed beyond recognition, there was a great similarity in all points of life between the two peoples. They had a common vocabulary, common syntax and common metre. A student of the languages of the two peoples, namely Sanskrit and Avesta, could convert a paragraph from one language to the other, sentence by sentence, in equivalent words. There was also similarity between the ideas of the Iranians and the Aryan Hindus and their gods. In the same way they found the closest resemblance in their important ceremonies.

The separation between the two branches was violent. More especially was this noticeable in religious questions. Thus the word "Deva" used by the Hindus for god was used by the Iranians for the evil spirit. In the same way "Asura" was used by Hindus to denote the evil spirit, while the Parsis used the word to denote god.

Continuing, Dr. Dhalla said Zoroaster brought reform in the religion of the Iranians just as Gautama Buddha brought about reform in Brahmanism. Zoroaster's religion somehow or other absorbed the Indo-Iranian divinity.

Thus the Zoroastrian religion had two layers, one as preached by Zoroaster, and the other the pre-Zoroastrian religion. Zoroaster had taught them that the doctrine of life was hopeful, cheerful and optimistic, and consequently both the layers had combined to preserve the optimistic, cheerful view of the religion in Iran.

Religious thoughts in Iran suffered with the political vicissitudes of the people; they did not have the continued progress as they had in India, where, owing to its vastness, thought persisted despite foreign invasions and internal wars.

Priests performed their ceremonies and sacrificial rites, and ritual got a prominent position in the religious life of the country.

The literature or sacred books produced by the Brahmins in this period were called "Brahmanas". Though the religious hunger of the masses was satisfied, there were growing and thinking people who wanted to make religion their life.

They were dissatisfied with the ritual and therefore retired to forests to lead a saintly meditative life. Their thinking on the abstruse problems of life and philosophy resulted in the production of the Upanishads.

Life to the Vedic Hindus was hopeful, cheerful and optimistic. Not so to the composers of the Upanishads; for them the ideal of humanity was to seek deliverance from frequent lives. According to Buddhism, the world was full of woe. Then came the Bhakti cult, and the "Bhagavat Gita", the most sublime literature ever vouchsafed to mankind. Buddhism was the flower of religious thought, and it rose as a protest against the spiritualistic Brahmanism. It lived side by side with Brahmanism until in the fifth century the latter gained ascendancy.

Proceeding, Dr. Dhalla said that after 3,000 years of separation, the ancestors of the Parsis met the ancestors of the Aryan Hindus when they were driven by the Arabs from Persia. It was a curious phenomenon that for the last 1,300 years these two communities were living side by side though the "Deva" of the one was cursed by the members of the other community.

The Parsis had lived in India peacefully and amicably, and they had contributed to the welfare of the country. They had acted as peacemakers and had tried to ameliorate the condition of the people.

They had roused India from its stupor, but their work had not yet finished. India was a vast country of heterogeneous people, slowly evolving towards homogeneity. The greatest hindrance towards that homogeneity was communalism, and Dr. Dhalla thought that the Parsis could remove the misunderstanding between the Hindus and the Muslims and bring about peace so that India, civilised and cultured, might become the beacon-light to the world.

FIVE PHASES OF THE INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.

(BENOYENDRA NATH BANERJEE).

The history of the Congress may be divided into at least five periods. From 1885 to 1896 it met as a 'Christmas gathering' in different parts of the country, proclaiming (as Dadabhai once said) 'like men, that we are loyal to the backbone', and urging that greater opportunity should be given to Indians to be associated with the actual conduct and control of the administration. The impact of Western ideas and the apparent disparities between Indian and Western standards could not but have their logical effect. Every session revealed that the Congress was increasing in popularity, prestige and influence. In reply to a question about the 1890 session of the Congress, Lord Lansdowne acknowledged that the Government of India recognized the *Evening News of India.

New Review for February.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

379

Congress movement as representing what would in Europe be called the advanced Liberal party.

The Congress gradually gave up its apologetic tone, and in 1892 we find it criticizing the reform proposals. It was also demanding not merely more appointments but also some share in the direction of Government policy. The year 1897 witnessed the inauguration of a policy of repression which led to the incarceration of B. G. Tilak on a charge of sedition. The Congress of that year for the first time recorded its protest against the use of the Bengal, Madras and Bombay Regulations 'at a time of peace and quiet', and against some proposed changes in the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure. Lord Curzon's regime led to the emergence of the 'extremists' in the Congress arena, under the leadership of Tilak, Lajpat Rai and Bepin Pal.

This change in the Congress's outlook owed not a little to the Partition of Bengal, which was announced on December 8, 1903 and effected in 1905. From that time till the modification of that policy at the Durbar of 1911, the anti-partition agitation backed by the 'awadeshi' and boycott movements, continued to embarrass the Government. In 1901, Mr. M. K. Gandhi appeared before the Congress in Calcutta as 'a petitioner on behalf of 100,000 British Indians in South Africa'. There was also the new-grown pride of the Asiatic due to Japan's success in its struggle with Russia.

The sessions of 1906-1908 may be regarded as marking the transition to the third stage of the evolution of the Congress. The session of 1906 will ever remain memorable for Dadabhai Naoroji's delineation of 'swaraj' in his presidential address.

The 1907 session at Surat unfortunately ended in the temporary withdrawal of the extremists from the Congress. But this incident led to the framing of the first Congress constitution and creed, which was passed at the Madras Session.

Meanwhile the Morley-Minto scheme of reforms was being prepared. When the details of it became known, the Congress in its 1909 session condemned the Government for neutralizing its reforms by means of adverse regulations, and disapproved of its scheme for separate electorates.

The War however, introduced a new factor in the situation. The increasingly intense demand for self-government was suddenly marked by optimism. In 1915, Mrs. Besant started the Home Rule agitation and familiarized the slogan: Strike the iron while it is hot. An important section of Indian politicians, including Mr. Gandhi, took up the work of recruiting men and securing money to help Britain in the war, hoping thereby to win the support of the British people for the national demand. In the Lucknow session of 1916 the Congress and the Muslim League jointly supported a scheme of reforms and agreed to a Pact for the distribution of seats in the provincial and central legislatures. With the sanction of the British Cabinet, Edwin Montagu made the Declaration of August, 1917. This was followed by Mr. Montagu's visit to India, a record of which may be found in his Indian Diary. He was alive to the strength of the nationalist demand, but the scheme of reforms outlined in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report met with a cold reception from the Congress. At a special Bombay session in August 1918, the proposed reforms were declared to be 'inadequate, disappointing, and unsatisfactory'. Tilak declared them 'entirely unacceptable', and Mrs. Besant characterized them 'unworthy to be offered by Britain and accepted by India. The Moderates, who had kept away from this special Congress, met in Bombay in November 1918, and formed themselves into 'The National Liberal Federation'.

The years 1918-20 were a time of great ferment in Indian politics. It is significant that in spite of the Rowlatt Bill and the Jallianwalla Bagh tragedy Mr. Gandhi welcomed the Royal assent to the Government of India Bill and Proclamation (1919). The Amritsar Congress in 1919 also passed a resolution thanking Mr. Montagu and declaring itself in favour of working the reforms. But the Hunter Report and the evidence of General Dyer, as well as the Muslim grievance over the Khilafat suddenly changed the course of events. The special session of the Congress at Calcutta in September 1920, under the presidency of Lala Lajpat Rai, adopted the non-co-operation resolution proposed by Mr. Gandhi. The Nagpur Congress in 1920 reiterated this resolution on the motion of Mr. C. R. Das, who declared himself a convert to the new programme. A new creed was also adopted by this Congress: "The object of the Indian National Congress is the attainment of Swaraj by the people of India by all legitimate and peaceful means."

The next phase of the Congress relates to the Swarajist capture of the Councils to prove the hollowness of the reforms.

At its Madras session in 1927 the Congress, on the motion of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, adopted a resolution setting forth the goal of the Congress to be independence, which was interpreted to mean 'within the British Empire if possible, outside if necessary'. Its creed was annotated later by the Fundamental Rights Resolution adopted by the Karachi Congress in 1931, committing the Congress to a policy of espousing the cause of the masses in political, economic and social matters.

The announcement of the 'all-white' Simon Commission in November 1929 again led to the emergence of a united front and to the appointment by the All-Parties Conference of the Nehru Committee to draft a constitution providing for full responsibility for India and for a settlement of the Hindu-Muslim question. The Nehru Report, however, though adopted by the Congress, was not ratified by all the communities. The need for the restoration of British prestige was never greater. The announcement was made on the eve of the Lahore Congress, and Mr. Gandhi in an interview with the Viceroy, wanted an assurance that the proposed Conference would draw up a full scheme for giving 'Dominion Status' to India which would become operative immediately. On the Viceroy's inability to give any such assurance on his own responsibility, the Congress passed a resolution in favour of complete independence. Since then it has chosen its own independent method of work. In March 1931, Mr. Gandhi launched a campaign of civil resistance beginning with the historic march to Dandi. The Congress was not represented at the first session of the Round Table Conference because in the course of the Sapru-Jayakar negotiations Mr. Gandhi had demanded that the terms of reference of the Conference should include the framing of a constitution to give India 'the substance of independence', and that there should be a repeal of the salt tax, a prohibition of liquor, a ban on foreign cloth, and an amnesty for political prisoners.

Constitution-making was not easy in the atmosphere of 'struggle' caused by the Civil Disobedience movement; and the Labour Government felt that in the absence of the Congress no final decision was worth taking. There was a partial amnesty in January 1931, and the Viceroy received Mr. Gandhi in prolonged conversations which ended in the Delhi Pact. This document was mainly concerned with the release of political prisoners. But it also set

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

380
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15

forth the terms on which the National Congress was willing to co-operate in the framing of a new constitution.

In virtue of the decision of the National Congress, Mr. Gandhi after much parleying, set out for London as the only delegate. But 'when he arrived in London', observes Mr. Benn, 'the whole scene had changed. A National Government was in power under unfettered Conservative influences. Though no change had been made in the phraseology of the legislative intent, the temper of the Indian Administration was completely altered. Rigid repression took the place of conciliation.'

The revival of Civil Disobedience on Mr. Gandhi's return, the 'dual policy' of the Willingdon administration, and the passing of the Government of India Bill, are matters of recent history. On the fifth phase of the Congress (1920-1933) there may be room for disagreement as to the wisdom of certain of its measures and decisions. But who can deny that even in these years it has been able to rouse the masses to a sense of their rights and duties as never before, that the spirit of Swadeshi and social reform owes its success to its educative propaganda, and that without its agitation a large number of major and minor administrative reforms would probably not even have been considered? Ever since its inception the Congress has tried to represent the nation. It was ushered into existence as the nation's tribune; the recent Jubilee celebrations reveal that its prestige and popularity are unrivalled.

OUTDOING KATHERINE MAYO.*

Mrs. Elizabeth Dilling was born in Chicago about forty years ago, the daughter of a Mr. and Mrs. Kirkpatrick, and christened Elizabeth Eloise. Her father died during her childhood, leaving his family reasonably well off. Mrs. Kirkpatrick (who claims to share ancestry with John Wilkes Booth, the assassin of Lincoln) became a real-estate operator and, in the general mild prosperity of that time, was fairly successful. Elizabeth was sent to a private school in Chicago.

Those who knew her during her girlhood remember her as an unusually emotional child. Her mother sent her to the Southwest, thinking to improve her health, and there Elizabeth spent three or four years. She became deeply interested in religion, sending her girl friends thirty and forty-page letters about her Bible readings, and much of that interest yet remains. (Why she did not become an evangelist will always be a mystery.) She came back from the West a lonely, gangling girl; entering finally the same University of Chicago that she now shrills against as a hotbed of Communism. She remained in the University three months—a highly emotional, eager girl with a dramatically sculptured face, enormous brown eyes and a quick, giddy laugh. What happened to her at college is one of the secrets that only she can reveal. It is said in some quarters that she was anxious—perhaps too anxious—for a social career on the campus and was rebuffed; a humiliation she could not face. The reason for her leaving college is, of course, in itself of no importance. The important thing is that Mrs. Dilling, who speaks with contempt of 'the man educated beyond his own intelligence' (as she referred to Dr. John Dewey during a recent address), has at best hardly more than a high-school education—and, because of its various interruptions, a rather sketchy one at that.

Some time after she left college she met, and married, Albert Wallwick Dilling. He was then singing in an Episcopal Church choir, and studying both law and engineering at night. Both subjects were to serve him in his subsequent entry into Chicago politics. From 1920 to 1922 he served as chief engineer of the Chicago Sanitary District.

It wasn't until 1931 that Mrs. Dilling, who had been casting about for years in search of a career, found what she has since called her God-given task: "exposing" conditions in Soviet Russia. Just when Mrs. Dilling went to Russia, it at all, and for how long, is a matter on which the record seems somewhat confusing. It is worth noting, however, that her description of the horrors of Red Russia occupies a full half-hour of her two-hour lecture, during which she ohides George Bernard Shaw for lauding the Soviet regime "after a short, carefully supervised visit" there in 1931.

Today her description of Russia runs as follows: "I simply went to Russia with my husband to see and find out what it's all about...They've got a great deal of freedom there...for vermin... There's dirt and there's smell...If you have ever smelled Russia you'll never forget it...But they've got a Satanic enthusiasm there...You get cucumbers and black bread to eat. There's no meat, no eggs, no vegetables—but they'll have them if you'll just stick around for another Five Year Plan...Little children beg for cigarettes.

We went to the model nurseries where the flies were fighting over dirty linen that hadn't been washed for, I don't know how long. ... The food makes you sick at your stomach. It did me. It really did ... I don't care what anybody says. I have not had one fact disproved ... We saw Lenin. ... He's god in Russia. Pickled in alcohol under glass. A little sandy-whiskered thing ... a poor substitute for Jesus Christ. I thought to myself—pooh, you don't amount to much. He died of an unspeakable disease and killed three million people before he died."

All this, and two full hours of it, without one discernible inhalation. She speaks at breakneck speed, one word tumbling after another. Before her there is always a great pile of material—red banners, red flags, the V. W. C. A. songbook, the Epworth Herald, the "Internationale" (which she sings for her audiences), magazines, newspapers, pamphlets—she goes through them like a torrent through a broken dam. Testifying at a recent state legislative hearing, she raced on for five minutes before the chairman was able to break in and ask her to speak more slowly so the shorthand reporter could follow her.

"If I give you a chance, you'll stop me," she cried returning to her tirade.

"The Red Network" appeared for the first time about two years ago. It is described as a compilation of 460 "Communist, Anarchist, Socialist, I.W.W. or Radical-Pacifist controlled organizations and 1,300 individuals who have contributed in some measure to one or more phases of the Red movement in the United States." That there is a Red movement in America, an octopus whose Moscow-radiating arms are about to crush the country, Mrs. Dilling does not doubt. "You're going out into the worst age of history," she tells the Monday evening meeting of the Moody Bible Institute. "You don't know the Red harlot, the Red beast, and the signs of the times that are coming."

"The Red Network" is her own personal offensive against the Terror—the product of her imagination and industry and purse. She has been assisted in its production, however, by a group of "super-expert patriots." (The description is her own.) Mrs. Dilling gives them credit for assisting in the preparation of

* The New Republic January 8

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

381

"The Red Network"—whether this includes printing costs she does not say.

The outstanding characteristic of "The Red Network" is its inaccuracy. It ropes together all kinds of organizations and individuals and marks them with a single brand. Its general absurdities—listing Eleanor Roosevelt, Newton D. Baker and the Y. M. C. A. as "Red," for example—are too well known to need any repeating here. It is significant of Mrs. Dilling's great mental confusion, however, that such organizations as the American Federation of Teachers, the Catholic Association for International Peace, the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, are considered as much of a national "menace" as the Communist Party and the League for the Promotion of Atheism. For Mrs. Dilling there are no grades. Everything is Red.

Items picked at random from "The Red Network" and put together on a single page read like an imitation of Walter Winchell's keyhole column. Mrs. Dilling informs us, for instance:

"... While I am unable to understand the scientific value of the Relativity theory, I can understand the 'relativity' of Einstein to his daughter, who married a Russian." ... Another of Einstein's qualifications as a dangerous enemy to our institutions is the fact that he has been "President Roosevelt's overnight White House guest." ... William C. Bullitt is to be regarded with some suspicion because "the Jewish press exults over his mother being Jewish."

"The Red Network" is not without its moral, ethnological and religious observations. "God created separate races," writes Mrs. Dilling, "but Communists insist on racial intermixture and intermarriage. Neither the races nor the sexes can ever be equal." Her denunciation of the Fellowship of Faiths has this passage: "Speakers for the debasing and degrading Hindu, Mohammedan, Pagan and Agnostic Cults are placed in 'fellowship' and on equal footing with speakers for Jesus Christ....The savage Mohammedan call of the muezzin as heard in darkest Asia is mingled with the propaganda of the Hindu, Jew and Agnostic."

MACAULAY VINDICATED.

Principal W. S. Rowland of Robertson College, Jubbulpore, in the course of a paper published by the Daily News of Nagpur, February 9, writes: About a hundred years ago, Lord Macaulay wrote his Minute on Education. To him have been imputed the woes of the intelligentsia by East and West with common voice. In fairness his detractors should read this document from which I quote without apology. "I feel that it is impossible for us (the East India Company) with our limited means to attempt to educate the body of the people. We must at present do our best to form a class of people who may be interpreters between us and the millions whom we govern: a class of persons, Indian in blood and colour, but English in taste, in opinions, in morals and in intellect. To that class we may leave it to refine the vernacular dialects of the country, to enrich those dialects with terms borrowed from the Western nomenclature and to render them by degrees fit vehicles for conveying knowledge to the great mass of the population."

Educated Unemployed in U. S. A.—According to an estimate of Dr. John W. Studebaker, United States Commissioner of Education, 5,000,000 young persons throughout the country who, unable to find useful lace in society, are confronted with general demoralization through idleness and loss of hope and ambition.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1927).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohasam Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okhas.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 22,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
 Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)
 Sheth Todarmal Chimanlal Samal Bochar, Mill Agent Baroda.
 Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda.
 Raj Ratna Bhaillal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
 Seth Pransukhlal Ma.atalal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd; Ahmedabad.)
 Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Bombay).
 Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pesh Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,
General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
 Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
 Burma sailing at Galle Tutuborin
 Colombo and other coast ports
 according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Drott Road, Ballard Estate,
 2-26 Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

382
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
SHEIK MEMON ST., BOMBAY.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 HUGHES ROAD, BOMBAY.
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,02,50,000
London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.
CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA.

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

The articles which appeared in THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER have been reprinted in book form. Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra,
BOMBAY 20.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, BOMBAY.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad).
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulla (District West Khandesh).
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nasik).
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kalwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panhala).
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhrajee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
B. G. Saraiya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
G. K. Devadhar, Esq.,	Reo Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2½ per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

... Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | 1 |
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

383

QUALITY 1.

So-called cheap silk fabrics do let you do want any time and cost you more in the long run because they are made down to a price and not up to a standard.

Mysore Government Silk Weaving Factory fabrics are recognised throughout India for their superior quality, reliability and attractiveness and are guaranteed free from admixture either with artificial silk or foreign yarn.

The choice is in your hands.

Buy Mysore Georgettes, Mysore Crepes and Mysore Satins and have full satisfaction.

Leading Stockists.

Agents:—

The Mysore Products, Princess Street, BOMBAY.

The Mysore Silk Depot, Swadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY

The Indian Ladies' Magazine.

PUBLISHED ONCE IN TWO MONTHS.

Edited solely in the interests of the Women of India, by MRS. K. SATTIANADHAN, M. A., Harrington Road, Chetpet, Madras.

Subscription (including Postage).

Rs. a. p.

Inland ... 8 8 0

Foreign ... 4 0 0

(Subscribers and Contributions urgently needed).

THE GUARDIAN

A CHRISTIAN WEEKLY.

Dealing with Social, Economic, Political and Religious Problems.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY PRICE 2ANNAS.

Annual Subscription: Inland, Rs. 5/-

Foreign, 10s. Post free.

Subscriptions and all other Communications should be addressed to—

THE MANAGER,
The Guardian,

HOGARTH PRESS, Mount Road,
MADRAS.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

384

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 15

realpatidar.com

UNPRECEDENTED!

PERMANENT!

INSPIRING!

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference was sent to us for circulation in India and they have been sold out. A further supply is expected in about a month and orders can be booked for at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The Volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	20s Annually.
Outside the Union	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
" " "	21s. Annually.
" " "	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,

Phoenix, Natal.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 345.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMARSHI HOUSE, BANDEA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY FEBRUARY 22, 1936. No. 23.

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Sir D. E. Wacha.
Vitality of Religion.
Crimes against Women.
The Social Service League Bil-
ver Jubilee.
Earthquake Alarms.
Excluded Areas.
Ancient Indo-Iranian Home.
Music in Maharashtra.
Indigenous Medicines.
Indian Airman's Success.
Newness or Freedom?

"Congress and Bharatnatyam."
The Evolution of Congress
Policy.
America Faces the East.
Bengali Women's Appeal.
Hindu Women's Rescue Home
Society.
Maharashtra Sangeet Samilee.
Hindu and Parsi Origins.
Imperial Baby Wee.
Dame Cadbury's Impressions.
Another View of Russia.

NOTES

Sir D. E. Wacha :—Sir Dinshah Edulji Wacha died at the great age of 92 on Tuesday. For the last few years he had practically ceased to take active interest in public affairs. The public respected his retirement and, except on special occasions like the golden jubilee of the National Congress, did not seek to disturb his life of ease with dignity. His death, therefore, does not leave a gap in the ranks of Indian public men. During the greater part of his life, Sir Dinshah was the most indefatigable worker in Indian politics. His correspondence alone was voluminous and, as he wrote with his own hand all his letters, the strain upon him was immense. Even when his eyesight became weak he kept up his enormous daily reading and writing with the aid of a magnifying glass. With all this, in addition to his office work in the Morarji firm, he found time to discuss at length current questions with all callers, whether friends or strangers. Sir Dinshah wrote copiously to newspapers and was for many years a regular contributor to a local Anglo-Gujarati weekly. As a writer he belonged to the school which believes in the profuse use of adjectives of judgment and enjoys using the superlative where others would be content with the positive degree in affirmation as well as in denial. Malabari with whom Wacha worked in the early years was the direct antithesis as a commentator on men and events. Sir Dinshah's collaboration in public life with Sir Pherozeshah Mehta was a most fruitful one. He was rather overshadowed by the towering personality of his powerful colleague and, we believe, he sometimes felt that he was not getting his due recognition. In the changed circumstances after the death of Sir Pherozeshah and Gokhale in the same year, Sir Dinshah Wacha found some difficulty in accommodating himself to the view points of the new generation of public workers. For instance, he was and remained a staunch Free Trader of the Cobden school and did not feel quite happy at the adoption of the policy of discriminating Protection by the Indian Government. He was also frightened by some new developments and in his reaction against them, he went completely to the other extreme. A man of pure life, simple in his tastes and strong in his hatred of all sham and duplicity, a hard, untiring worker in the public cause, a student all his life, Sir Dinshah will long be remembered with affection by a very large circle of friends.

Vitality of Religion :—There are many earnest people who are eagerly awaiting the death of religion, of the Hindu religion particularly, and are preparing to cast lots for its garments. They would be pained to know that at the Kumbh Mela last month two and a half million people plunged at the precise moment of sunrise into the Ganges at Prayag in the shivering cold of January in Allahabad, and that the mighty confluence of the Jumna and the Ganges with the hidden Sarasvati, changed its course several times in the day, carrying away some sadhus, in its effort to escape the human barrage. Enquiries made invariably bring the reply that temples are flourishing everywhere and that there is no slackening in the number of worshippers or in the incomes, as is reported of Churches in Western lands. More than that the idea of Fellowship of All Faiths has caught on. The few copies sent to us of the great volume issued by the World Fellowship in America were taken rapidly. In connection with the Sri Ramakrishna Centenary, a Parliament of Religions is being convened in Bombay. An Inter-Religious Conference is to be held under the auspices of the Andhra Brahma Sadanasram at Cocanada today and tomorrow (Saturday and Sunday) and the programme contains a large number of papers to be read by representatives of all faiths. Surely, religion is not dying in India!

Crimes against Women :—There have been for some years past complaints of offences against women. These have been increasing in number and are not confined to any area though, proportionately, Bengal and the Punjab enjoy a bad pre-eminence in this respect. We print in another column a statement issued by leading women of Bengal describing the cruel sufferings to which Bengali women are exposed, and appealing to the women of India to take up the question and help their sisters. The enormity of the evil in that Province has led the Bengal Legislative Council to pass a law this week making gross offences against women punishable with whipping. Except as a stern gesture of condemnation, not much is to be expected of this measure as a deterrent to evil doers. Apart from the fact that such crimes are nearly always inspired by blind passion which takes no thought of consequences, judges and juries will naturally shrink from finding persons, accused of offences punishable with humiliating and irrevocable physical chastisement, guilty. They will incline to look for any little loophole of doubt to let them off. This is notoriously the case in murder cases not only in this country where sanctity of life is a religious creed, but also in other countries which retain capital punishment in their penal law. We should look for more effective remedies against the evil in the establishment of Societies like the Hindu Women's Rescue Home Society of Bombay, a brief record of whose work during the last eight years we publish today. The Society has erected a building to house its Shraddanand Rescue Home, which Lady Brabourne is to open this (Saturday) evening. The Society has incurred expenditure to the extent of Rs. 80,000 and requires half as much more to provide accommodation for workers. It has collected so far Rs. 45,000 and appeals to the public for the remainder. The record of its work speaks for itself, and we are sure, that its appeal will meet with prompt and generous response.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

The Social Service League Silver Jubilee :—Of the many Social Service institutions in Bombay, the Social Service League is amongst the foremost, not only because of the wide range of its activities, but because of the place which the work of the League has won in the estimation of the public generally. The Social work of the League on behalf of women, and on behalf of depressed and labouring classes, is well known. In times of distress, caused by floods, famine, or fire, the League has ever been ready to give its wholehearted assistance in the work of relief and reconstruction. The high standard of work at its industrial schools for poor middle class women, has enabled many of those women to become more self-sufficient in their own houses, or to supplement their husband's income by their own handicrafts. The League's dispensary has been used by thousands in the crowded mill area of Parel. Its work for mill-labourers in the form of technical training, recreation, dramatic performances and Co-operative Credit Societies, has been much valued, as also its educational work through night schools, libraries, lectures and publications. The year 1936 completes twenty five years of the League's useful work. During the celebration of the Silver Jubilee from 19th to 25th March a number of functions have been arranged in which members and supporters of the League, and also those for whose benefit the League exists, can take part. One of the most important of these functions is a Variety Entertainment, the proceeds of which will go towards the League's expenses. This entertainment is to take place in the Opera House on March 21st at 9-30 P. M. (S. T.). His Excellency the Governor and Lady Brabourne have kindly consented to be present.

Earthquake Alarms :—Last week there were several shocks of earthquake felt in many places in Northern India, some so acute as to drive people into the streets. But no damage to life and property was reported. Those who share the belief that earthquakes are sent as punishment for the sin of untouchability, will, perhaps, conclude that the sin has been partially wiped out and that the shocks last week were warnings that the hand of heaven is raised to smite any backsliding. The more prosaic view that quakes are the growing pains of Mother Earth and are absolutely unconcerned with human merit or delinquency, derives support from an interesting table, in the Record of the Geological Survey of India, of earthquakes registered by a Pendulum Seismograph at Shillong from 1903 to 1931. The apparatus is an old and rather crude one and its records for several years are missing. But the list shows that earthquakes are a normal occurrence though their shocks are not felt in most cases on the surface of the earth. No morning wears to evening, but some earth does quake. Dr. Charles Davison concludes from an analysis of the list that, after a period of about twelve years since the great earthquake of 1897, during which the shocks did not reach the crust, the crust movements of Assam resumed their original character and may in course of time end in another great destructive earthquake. He does not say when this may be expected. Writing of earthquakes, we notice that the author of "India in 1933-34", with a fine sense of proportion, begins by saying that the Bihar earthquake was the most important event of 1934 and that the passing of the Hoare Scheme by Parliament was the next important!

Excluded Areas :—Those who have read the Government of Bombay's memorandum on "Excluded Areas," will be surprised to see that the nominated official member from Bombay, Syed Aminuddin, spoke against the non-official resolution in the Legislative Assembly in favour of a uniform system of administration for the provinces including the proposed "excluded" and "partially excluded" areas. The Syed said that the aboriginal tribes in Thana and Nasik were in the grip of money-lenders, and that where they had been given a vote for elections, the candidates had poured out gallons of liquor, thus causing deterioration in the moral and physical condition of these people. Are money lenders and liquor going to be excluded from excluded areas? The Government Agent in East Godavery in Madras stressed particularly the protection of the Abkari and Forest privileges of the hillmen in the new constitution. "My experience is", he wrote, "that hillmen are just the same as they always have been and that any curtailment of these privileges will lead to discontent and trouble." This is a very good reason for withdrawing altogether from the administration of these tribes, since that would be the best way of ensuring that they will continue to be what they have always been. The reasons given in favour of excluding areas wholly or partially are self-contradictory but they have served to carry out Mr. Cadogan's object. The new constitution will make the position of the aboriginals worse and not better than what it is.

Ancient Indo-Iranian Home :—We publish a letter in another column from a learned correspondent in Karwar protesting against Sir Hari Singh Gour's opinion that the ancestors of the Hindus and Parsis descended on the fertile plains of India. Dr. Dhalla in his lecture, which we published last week, also seemed to accept the theory of Aryan immigration in to India. As our correspondent points out, however, serious doubts have been cast on this theory of late by both Indian and Western scholars. The first blow to it was the discovery in 1907 by Professor Hugo Winckler at Boghaz-Koi in Asia Minor of an inscription of about 1400 B. C. in which the names of the Vedic gods, Mitra, Varuna, Indra, and Nasatya occur. The total absence of any reference to an ancient homeland other than India in the oldest Sanskrit sacred literature, the order in which the Indian rivers are invariably given, from the Ganges westwards and not from the Indus East-wards as should have been the case if the Aryans entered from the Northwest, and the presence of the Sakadvipi Brahmins in East Bengal, where they have long been regarded as a remnant of an ancient Magian settlement, are other evidences against the theory. Pargiter in his "Indian Historical Traditions" has set out clearly the case against it. The Italian archaeologist, Boni, to whom our correspondent refers, had a brain wave that the clue to the foundation site of Rome would be found in ancient Hindu sacred literature. So it was. William Steed gave, when Boni died, an interesting account of the discovery in the Review of Reviews which he was then editing. The discoveries at Mahenjo Daro and Harrapa have further knocked the bottom out of the theory of Aryan supremacy.

Music in Maharashtra :—The prospectus of the Maharashtra Sangeet Samitee (Musical Academy) which we publish in another column explains that the word 'Maharashtra' has been used to indicate the field in which the main centres of its activities will for the present be located. But why confine itself to Hindustani music? Why leave out of the orbit of the Samitee, the other great—and original—school of Indian music, the Karnatak? Perhaps, the reason is that mentioned by His Highness the Maharana of Dharmpur who presided at the Conference last week. He said that Hindu Muslim unity would be promoted by the cultivation of music. The Karnatak, too, has many Muslim practitioners. But are we never to get away from the tyranny of politics? Is Hindu Muslim unity an artistic or musical objective? Should we found a school of painting which would remove untouchability and prevent Dr. Ambedkar from quitting the Hindu fold five years hence? The Maharashtra Academy is most favourably situated both in respect of geography and cultural affinities to evolve an Indian School comprising the schools of Karnatak and Hindusthan.

Indigenous Medicines :—Sir Wazir Hussain presiding at the third convocation of the Ayurvedic and Unani Colleges in Lucknow gave several reasons for preferring indigenous to imported drugs. Firstly, he said, they are cheaper than allopathic drugs and are thus within the means of the masses; secondly, Indian herbs are probably more suited to the temperament of the Indian people; thirdly, Indian medicines are easy to prepare and do not demand as great care and attention as the graduation of the doses of the highly concentrated drugs of allopathy; and lastly, the ordinary medicines, generally needed, can be had almost anywhere. The last proposition is finely illustrated in the account in the Vinaya Texts, which form part of the Buddhist canon, of the training given in the ancient university of Nalanda, famous for its medical Faculty. The physician who, later, had the privilege of becoming the Buddha's personal physician, spent seven years at the university and then approached the Chancellor with the request that he may be granted a diploma. The Chancellor set him a question and gave him three months to answer it in. The candidate was required to find out what plant or herb there was within a radius of five miles from the Senate House which was not medicinal. The candidate at the end of the period gave the result of his investigation. There was no plant or herb within the area that had no medicinal properties. He got his diploma and became the most eminent surgeon and physician of his age.

Indian Airmen's Success :—What more striking testimony is needed that Indians are becoming increasingly air-minded and are taking to aviation like duck to water or, shall we say, birds to air, than the recent triumph of Lieut. Misri Chand who won the Viceroy's Challenge Trophy, and two other Indians, Messrs. Gadgil and Gazdar who finished second and third respectively, in the Air Race from Madras to Delhi, covering a distance of 1,520 miles? Throughout the Race, the winner easily maintained the first place and he was also awarded the Speedolene Trophy. The success of the Indian Air-man synchronises with the opening of the New Air Station in Delhi by the Viceroy who himself is a keen enthusiast of flying. The progress and development of civil aviation in this country has been slow when compared with what has been achieved in other parts of the world. There is every sign that it has a great future.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

388

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 22

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, February 22, 1936.

NEWNESS OR FREEDOM?

Baron von Oppell writes an article on "the Pleasure of Newness" in the Hibbert Journal for January. "If and as long as we possess any vitality and it finds an outlet in some degree of mental energy, whatever direction this may take," the Baron begins "we seem to have in us a desire, perhaps not consciously felt, for something new. This desire lies at the root of all movement, all effort; the constant urge to get out of the present state, whatever it may be, into a new one, making men strive towards an aim." He goes on to observe that pleasure derived from new "things", in which term he includes all that is not self, including events, passes as soon as a "thing" is had. "Even if our aim were high and difficult and completely achieved at last," he writes, "we rarely find that success brings us what we hoped of it. And certainly it will never give us the joy of newness." This can come only, he adds, by seeing the world with one's own eyes and not secondhand as others see it. Rather a tame conclusion to a start that was meant to thrill! The Baron condemns as false the "originality" which some seek, by trampling on sentiments, principles or prejudices, religious, moral or conventional—a method which rarely fails for the moment at least to produce some effect of novelty. "But," as he says, "people get used to being shocked. Such works in time lose their novelty and become out of fashion." He concludes that we shall not find the pleasure of newness in mere variety of things but only in looking with our own individual eyes and thinking our own individual thoughts on the things that are before us every day. It is freshness of spirit and not newness of things which gives the pleasure which newness seems to give.

What Baron von Oppell strives to convey to his readers with much effort, is pithily expressed in two or three verses of the Bhagavad Gita. "Since enjoyments that are born of contact (of senses with objects) are parents of misery alone and with beginning and end, a wise man does not seek pleasure in them," V. 22. "Whose happiness is within, whose relaxation is within whose light is within, that Yogi alone, become Brahman, gains absolute freedom", V. 24. It is not the "pleasure of newness," as Baron Oppell thinks, but the joy of freedom that men strive for. The freedom sought by the ordinary man is from monotony and deprivations of his daily life; of the man of genius from the limitations of his environment; of the man of God from the things which distract him from his aspiration to be at one with God. But it is freedom of some kind which every one strives for. Don Juan in Browning's "Fifine at the Fair" exclaims:

Frenetic to be free! And, do you know, there beats
Something within my breast, as sensitive?
repeats

The fever of the flag? My heart makes—just the same

Passionate stretch for lawlessness, lays-claim

To share the life they lead; losels, who-have and use

The hour what way they will, applaud:
them or abuse

Society, whereof my self is at the beck,

Whose call obey, and stoop to burdenstiffest neck.

The members of the circus troupe, the flag on whose pavilion moves Don Juan to this outburst, are not in the least so independent of circumstance as he supposes. The life of strolling players is a veritable dog's life. The comic man of the company is often a most melancholy Jaques. Every one of them would rejoice to exchange his or her seemingly care-free life for the humdrum of the householder who is sure of a roof above his head and his meals at the proper time. Don Juan explains to his dutiful wife, Elvire, the philosophy of his passing preference for the circus girl, Fifine. It is not Baron Oppell's philosophy of Newness but the much older one of Trueness. Fifine's attraction is her utter trueness. No makebelieve about her. She shows herself to be what she is, the Pariah of the North, the European Nautch. Strange that the two darkest spots on our civilization, should, in 1872 when the poem was published, have enriched the English language with two stinging words. And why should Truth attract? Because

So absolutely good is truth, truth never hurts

The teller, whose worst crime gets somehow grace, avowed.

It is a long step from the Bhagavad Gita to Fifine at the Fair. But both show that what man really desiderates is freedom, not mere newness. Freedom, of course, has to Don Juan quite a different meaning from what it has to the Yogi. Nonetheless, it is a removal of limitations to self-realisation and self-expression and not the lure of novelty which is the wish in each case. Lord Acton rightly held that the history of man is the history of Freedom. Baron Oppell's hypothesis that we are all hankering after something new because it is new, is not borne out by everyday experience. What is new is strange. Men like what is familiar and distrust what is strange. Babies cling to their mothers and do not take to strangers. Children like to hear old stories repeated. Crowds are roused to enthusiasm or lashed to fury by old shibboleths being shouted with new emphasis. One does not like to part with old coats and shoes which have grown to be part of himself. "Old is gold" and evokes affection. "New", on the other hand, has a suggestion of contempt as in "new rich". We like new things only when they resemble or recall old things. The feeling aroused by a new thing

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

389 is just curiosity. The attitude of the average man is that of Hamlet: "Better bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of." There is, really, as the ancient wise man said, nothing new under the sun. Those who hanker after newness hanker for some thing which exists only within themselves.

"CONGRESS AND BHARATNATYAM."

The contribution, in the last issue of the Reformer, of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi against engaging devadasis to give public performances in dancing and music, it strikes me, is as unreasonable as it is un-called for. Thanks to Dr. Reddi's indefatigable efforts for the redemption of these unfortunate women from a life of degradation and shame, their services and the dedication of girls to temples, have become a thing of the past. Much credit goes to Dr. Reddi also for the Home to reclaim them from their undesirable life. Now that the sting is taken out of the devadasi profession, what harm can there be if these women are encouraged in the legitimate practice and cultivation of the Arts of music and dancing, which have elicited the admiration of even the Western world and of which the devadasis are recognised exponents? Therefore, I can see no objection if they are engaged to give public performances in music and dancing and, much less, if an art critic chooses to describe the merits and demerits of the individual performers. In fact, it would be eminently desirable that these women, for their own good and for the benefit of the society in which they exist, should be absorbed in the new field of activities opened up by the Radio, the Cinema and the theatre. This is the best method of weaning them from their former life. It is almost an axiom in social work that counter-attractions and counter-occupations must be furnished to wean people from their evil ways.

Legislation, though an important factor in putting an end to social evils, is not enough for their total eradication. The unfortunates have to be reformed and to be merged in society as moral, self-respecting citizens. This, indeed, is a great responsibility. Dr. Reddi herself recognises that the devadasis are "innocent victims of pseudo-religious custom" and are, therefore, more sinned against than sinning. That there is awakening among them for a better life is shown by the Doctor's own statement that some of them do not resort to promiscuity but continue in the profession simply because there are not men forthcoming to marry them. Then, again, according to Dr. Reddi, a good percentage of the handsome devadasis skilled in the art of music and dance become physical wrecks early in life, owing to their unhealthy mode of life and are thus lost to the musical world. What clearer proofs are needed than the Doctor's own statements for the leading institutions, such as, Musical schools and Academies to take them on hand and encourage them in the preservation and cultivation of the fine Arts in which they are adepts. There seems to be nothing wrong if Congress helps in this good work. Our society which is morally responsible for their degradation, cannot shake off lightly its duty towards them by declaring them beyond the pale.

Dr. Reddi's estimation of the character of our young men and women hardly does credit to them. Their moral fibre is not so flimsy as to be blown to pieces by every passing wind. Surely, Dr. Reddi does not want our young men and women to be preserved in cotton wool!

Dr. Reddi is disposed to take a more lenient view of the musicians and actresses of the West. If their position in that society is better, it is because they are not discriminated against as is the case of their counterparts here. Or is it a case with Dr. Reddy of distance lending enchantment to the eyes?

In the same number of the Reformer, the attention is also drawn in an editorial Note to Pandit Vallabh Pant's protest in the Assembly against dancing girls broadcasting music programmes. The retrograde views of the self-righteous Pandit should not be taken seriously by the public.

N. K. AKSHI.

THE EVOLUTION OF CONGRESS POLICY.

[S. G. WARTY.]

THE ERA OF PHEROZESHAH AND SURENDRANATH (1885-1905)

When the Congress was first started, its goal was not defined. It was only to be a National Parliament where workers and leaders from different provinces sought to make themselves personally known to one another and decide upon common action. It only emphasized specific piecemeal reforms in administration.

Even when on the eve of the fourth session, Lord Dufferin the Viceroy criticised the Congress as seeking self-government, Congress leaders were at pains to repudiate these sentiments. In 1898 when, for the first time, the aims and objects of the Congress were formally adopted, the aim was laid down as the promotion of the welfare of the masses by all constitutional means. It was not until 1906 that a definite goal was adopted, that of self-government on colonial lines.

It was not that the early fathers were ignorant of the logical development of their activities. In fact Lord Macaulay had visualised the goal of India in the early fifties and the Congress leaders of that time were all well versed in the lore of Macaulay and Burke. But they wanted to proceed on lines of least resistance at start, and did not like perhaps to make the Government nervous by proclaiming their goal. They were also governed by a belief, rightly or wrongly, in the good intentions of the British Government and the British connection was even regarded as a providential dispensation.

The Congress confined itself to political problems and excluded the discussion of social reform, as it was thought that all kinds of people could meet on the political platform without differences of opinion which in the beginning would perhaps have proved fatal. Social conferences were organised latterly but not as part of the Congress. The Congress activities were not as comprehensive as they are today.

As regards the methods followed, the Congress organisation was very poor as was to be expected for an infant institution. The movement was confined to the intelligentsia whom their opponents ridiculed as a "microscopic minority". The early fathers were rather averse to rousing the masses, as they had faith in the full justice of their cause and sincerely thought that, if they properly explained India's case to members of Parliament and the British democracy, redress would come. This was the reason why more importance was given to work in England than to work in India.

The early fathers were all governed by unswerving loyalty to the British Crown, not as a matter of policy but because they were sincerely loyal. They even thought of making Lord Reay or Lord Dufferin the President of the first session. This was mainly due to the influence of Mr. Hume who, when given three cheers at the close of the first session, called for three times three cheers for Queen Victoria. But for Mr. Hume's invaluable

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

890
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 22

able and wise guidance in the beginning, the Congress would not have emerged stonger day by day.

The Congress started with real sympathy from Lord Dufferin the Viceroy who welcomed it as a means of ascertaining the wishes of the Indian people regarding administrative reforms. Soon, however, the Civil Service and the Anglo-Indian press headed by the 'Pioneer' were awake and from the fourth session held at Allahabad, difficulties were encountered, which came to a head at the sixth session held at Calcutta where Mr. Pherozeshah, a superlative combatant, presided, and the issue was joined.

Since then, the Congress and Government were not on good terms. The Civil Service entrenched in power tried to cripple the influence of the Congress but with each attempt it grew stronger from public sympathy. The law of sedition was also strengthened, discontent grew, and under Lord Curzon's violently impolitic regime, his bad manners and his insults, the original policy of the Congress began to lose hold of the public mind and extremists came to the front with a new fighting programme, and even terrorism made its appearance.

In spite of the reverses, the Congress in its first period, gained some successes. The Congress successfully by its agitation compelled the Government to withdraw the notification taking away the Jury rights, as also the Legal Practitioners' Bill which had been devised as a weapon to cripple the lawyers' independence. The Council Act of 1892, though of a very meagre character, was the result of the Congress agitation. If the Government were wise enough to meet Congress demands bit by bit instead of trying to crush it, the Congress would have remained a loyal body. But every reform had to be wrested from Government as it were by compulsion, and the old confidence in the good intentions of Government disappeared before even the first period closed.

THE ERA OF TILAK & BESANT.

The extremist party grew in strength because of the disappointments of the Congress and especially of Lord Curzon's challenging regime, and its influence on Congress policy was clearly marked in the adoption by the Congress in 1906, of self-government as the goal of India, and boycott of British goods as the weapon to bring the United Kingdom to terms. Under the extremist influence, more reliance came to be placed on rousing the masses in India and creating a sanction behind the Congress. The first beginnings of an industrial policy can be seen in the adoption of "Swadeshi" officially by the Congress.

The impetus really came from Bengal, but the youngsters found a competent and accommodating leader in Mr. Tilak who was waiting for opportunities. Even Sir Surendranath was more of an extremist than a moderate. Terrorism also made its appearance now, but the Congress extremists though not directly connected with it, did not denounce the movement as Mr. Gandhi does now, but exploited its presence for their own ends.

After the Surat split, the Congress under the leadership of Sir Pherozeshah, adopted the creed to which the extremists would not subscribe. Meanwhile the announcement of the Morley reforms and the unusual, harsh steps taken by Government against the extremists, gave moderates a chance. Mr. Morley's move to rally the moderates was the first gesture from Government to seek co-operation from the people in fashioning the reforms. The Congress machine was entirely in the hands of the moderates until 1915, but the heart of the country was behind extremism.

It was during this time of comparative lull that the Congress was able to win over the Moslems to its cause. Before now, though-enlightened Moslems had joined the Congress, the community as such under the advice of Sir Syed Ahmed held aloof. Early in 1907, Mr. Gokhale on behalf of the Congress endorsed special representation and since then good relations prevailed, strengthened later by Sir W. Wedderburn's presidential appeal in 1910. As a result, in 1912 the Moslem League, then under the statesmanlike leadership of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah adopted the Congress goal of self-government. If the extremists were in the Congress during this period, the Moslems would probably have held back, scared away by their violent speeches and methods. By the time they returned to the Congress in 1916 the extremists had been greatly sobered and a rapprochement was finally effected by the Congress-League pact.

AMERICA FACES THE EAST.

(WALTER BROOKES FOLEY.)

CROSSING THE MISSISSIPPI.

There is always a thrill for me in crossing the "Father of Waters". The first time I did it by train, late at night. I had the Pullman porter wake me and I enjoyed a lovely moonlight view that has always been in the background of my thought each time I have seen the river since then.

This last time we crossed the river from Rock Island to Davenport, Illinois to Iowa. The rural section of Illinois through which we had driven was quite different from the great city center on Lake Michigan. But when we crossed the river we felt we were getting more nearly "out where the West begins", though that is much less than half the distance across the continent.

Each time I have crossed the Mississippi it has seemed a peaceful stream. But there is always an appearance of latent power that is impressive. The wide banks on either side indicate that at some seasons the river is much greater in volume.

One of the great, moving facts of a trip across the United States is a gripping realization of available power, we are citizens of a great nation—great in the past and with great possibilities for the future.

The River that runs down through the heart of the country with its extensive tributaries is a symbol of the might in American life. When and if it is controlled it is a power for good. When it runs loose without control for a reasonable purpose it becomes a liability.

There are situations crying for American assistance in a world that seems on the verge of madness. How America can use its influence to preserve any worthwhile civilization, ought to be a matter for deep study on the part of each one of us.

"OUT WHERE THE TALL CORN GROWS."

In Iowa it begins to be perfectly obvious why it was necessary for the Federal Government to furnish relief for the farmers. In the central and southern part of the State through which we drove, corn which had really been "tall corn" four years before now was but a shadow or ghost of the previous crop.

The ground was dry and burnt. The winds blew over a drought-stricken area. The land was not the fertile country we had seen often in other years. While we had read of the difficulties of central western agriculture no study of books had given us the sense of desolation that we came upon first in Iowa.

*Previous Notes in this series were published in the Reformer, of 18th January & 15th February.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

391

Though we had tasted western dust on the Atlantic Coast as a result of the terrible wind storms in the west where thousands of tons of fertile surface soil had been lifted and carried more than a thousand miles, still we gained a new realization of the loss of the best agricultural land of the country as we had not before.

We knew something of the excessive ploughing under of prairie and grazing land that should never have been planted to crops. We knew something of the pressure exerted through the Federal Department of Agriculture on farmers to grow larger and larger crops. We knew something of the war and post-war speculation in land. But knowledge of past mistakes will not alleviate present distress.

So the national government was compelled to come to the rescue of the farmers as it has often rescued various industries. Whether we believe in the method or not, the necessity was present. And the only way for the national government to help one needy group in the United States is to get the help from some other group.

After all there is no way to keep the United States going ahead save by having all groups cooperate when need arises. Agriculture needs industry and industry needs agriculture. One must help the other. We need a greater integration of rural and city life.

OMAHA, LINCOLN AND POINTS SOUTH.

To one who has never gone much beyond New York City, Nebraska seems in the Far West. It really is not. Yet it is beyond the great but muddy Missouri River.

A friend of mine a few years ago accepted a position in Chicago. She lived in western New York. Some one in her home town asked her, with awe, whether she was intending to go west as far as Cleveland.

We can be thankful that the great highways and the increased use of motor cars are eliminating some of the provincialism of America. We do need to know our own country. The number of missionaries I have found working in countries outside of their own, who knew nothing, practically speaking, of the United States, is simply amazing.

There is one thing about people from Nebraska and neighboring States when they set out on a world trip; they must travel across half of their own country to reach either coast to take a steamer. We live in a great country and the only real way to know that is to travel through it in leisurely fashion. We need friends scattered everywhere with whom we keep in touch. Nebraska is enough different from Long Island to belong to another country altogether. Just now, it too is suffering from the drought of the past few years. Great fertile areas are gone, perhaps never to be replanted again.

But one thing to keep in mind is that not as much land is needed to grow crops. For chemistry is affecting the land as well as the factories of America.

But some day it is to be hoped we will begin to think of helping to feed millions of the Orient who starve and die, never having had a full meal in all their lives. I believe that our world civilization cannot progress with part of the population economically under-privileged. We must, somehow, lift the levels everywhere.

We need the best efforts of everyone. And a man cannot give his best to great advances when he is forever hungry. We must support the west in its time of need for we need the help of the west. That is also true for people everywhere.

The challenge of economic need in the vicinity of Omaha and Lincoln is very great. In assisting that section we will become a greater country.

DUST STORM IN KANSAS

Moving southward from Nebraska into Western Kansas we stuck the real dust country. In a little town just to the north of the border of Kansas we get our first taste and then all the rest of the day we ate and drank and breathed dust.

The experience came the closest to one we had had in North India with the temperature at 120° and a hot loo blowing, that we had ever lived through.

Snow fences were scattered everywhere partially to break the force of the dust. Great heaps of dust were on the sides of the highway, banks of it over the fields. The constant wind had blown the tops off the sun-dried cornstalks.

Tiny ears of corn seemed a poor excuse for what once grew in this section. The courage of anyone trying to farm in the locality was almost beyond comprehension; yet, of course, there are no fertile fields to which to migrate any more. The land that is available and usable is occupied.

However, I did think of great sections on Long Island held out of circulation and used only by a few for pleasure. Possibly we need to re-distribute land in the eastern part of the United States. Slums in the city and great landed estates in the suburbs somehow, do not synchronize in the modern scheme of things as perfectly as they might.

The stories of the Kansas dust storms are startling to those who have not experienced even such a minor one as we drove through. They were and still are as severe a test of human endurance as Kansas have ever had.

Yet life goes on. It is the significant fact of modern America. Better thinking, changing attitudes, Federal funds for State relief, a Presidential candidate (Governor Landon), a study of economic resources and necessities, a drawing together of those who are interested in seeing the United States go forward by the use of new methods as well as old—all these are direct products of the trials and tribulations of Kansas and her neighboring States.

Incidentally it was a relief to get away from the beer and liquor signs that clutter up most of the American landscape in towns and villages and cities. It is a forcible fact that we still have a depression even though the 18th Amendment was repealed. The nonsense of drinking our way into prosperity has been exposed rather thoroughly. Possibly that idea is like a Kansas dust-storm, it obscures the vision of the road ahead.

BENGALI WOMEN'S APPEAL.

Under the signature of a large number of prominent ladies, the following appeal is issued:—The entire country is aware of the terrible atrocities most inhumanly perpetrated daily on Indian women, specially on the unfortunate and ill-fated Hindu women, in the shape of shameful rape and heartless abduction mostly in the rural area in almost all the provinces of India. Innumerable cases, of late reported in the press, should have sufficiently brought home to the authorities and leaders of public opinion in India alike, the serious nature of the Terrorism of lascivious ruffians and goondas but, in spite of that, these brutalities have become an every-day occurrence in this land. Requests have been made from the platform and the press, but no adequate measures have been devised for the eradication of this evil. It is high time that the womanhood of India should realise the seriousness of the situation and rise equal to the occasion and make an emphatic protest against the systematic and organised cowardly attack upon their honour. We feel that concerted action should be forthwith adopted against the powerful agencies that

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

392
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| Feb. 22

are striking terror and creating and spreading havoc in Hindu homes. At present a few agencies are fighting out the danger with meagre and insufficient resources. It should be, hence, the bounden duty of every Hindu woman to help to organise a strong All-India body with a net-work of branches throughout the length and breadth of our mother-land. With this aim in view, we are calling an All-India Hindu Women Protection Conference within a very short time at Calcutta and hope that men and women from the four corners of India will muster strong in this noble fight and make the Conference a success. The Hindu womanhood of India should thrice think that nowhere else in the civilised world this crime in its utter barbarism exists at the present moment.

HINDU WOMEN'S RESCUE HOME SOCIETY.

The Hindu Women's Rescue Home Society was formed with the object of tackling the problem of unprotected Hindu women—a problem both pressing and complex in the highest degree. The fallen woman, the deserted wife, the betrayed virgin, the unclaimed infant—these are sore spots in the history of all communities. They are, however, particularly grave and acute in the case of Hindus. The Rescue Home Society endeavours to heal up these sores to the extent it can help.

The Society owes its existence to the inspiration of the late Lala Lajpatrai. The idea took a definite form in 1927. The Bombay Hindus had assembled to mourn the loss of Swami Shradhdhanandji. They resolved to raise a memorial to him and they thought that it could best take the form of a Women's Rescue Home in Bombay. The necessity of such a Home had been keenly felt for a long time. The resolution passed at the public meeting was speedily given effect to and this Society was brought into existence and registered in December 1927 with the following principal objects:

- (a) To provide shelter for and render assistance to needy Hindu women and children without distinction of class or caste;
- (b) To promote the welfare of poor and destitute Hindu women and children and provide them with prompt relief from distress;
- (c) To impart education to such women and children including moral and religious instruction on the basis of the Hindu faith.

Messrs. M. R. Jayakar, Bar-at-Law, Govindlal Shivilal Motilal, Rameshwardasji Birla and Velji Lakhamji Nappoo are the Trustees of the Society, and a Committee of Management periodically elected by the members of the Society looks after its affairs. The Society began its activities by starting a Rescue Home at Matunga naming it "Shradhdhanand Anath Mahilashram" in memory of that great leader. The supervision of the Ashram has been placed in the hands of a Lady Superintendent, who is a qualified nurse and midwife.

The activities of the Society, as indicated by its name, have been directed towards rendering prompt and sympathetic assistance to fallen and unprotected Hindu women. A careful inquiry into their condition has shown that they are drawn into degradation for hardly any fault of theirs. Cases of deliberate or conscious wrong-doing are extremely rare. It is a fortunate sign that the utility of this "Home" is being slowly realised by the public as well as by local bodies and Government institutions. The number of women sent by the Magistrates and the Police of Bombay to remain under the protection of the Ashram is rapidly increasing. The enthusiastic encomiums which have of late been showered on the work of the "Home" in the public press and from public platforms, prove that the work of the Ashram is being gradually appreciated in Bombay and outside.

The following figures of admissions will show how the Home has been proving increasingly useful to the Hindu Society from its beginning:—1928, 29 women and 21 children; in 1929, 70 women and 39 children; in 1930, 53 women and 19 children; in 1931, 78 women and 57 children; in 1932, 105 women and 63 children; in 1933, 95 women and 45 children; in 1934, 93 women 52 children; and in 1935, 103 women and 68 children.

Out of 626 women admitted in 8 years, 249 were widows, 264 were married and 113 were unmarried.

We are sure that but for the timely assistance rendered by the Ashram most of these women and children would have been lost to Hindu society. It is the common experience of social workers that unprotected Hindu women become daily victims of fraud and deception in this vast cosmopolitan city. Some of the Hindu women rescued by the Society would have been forced to live an immoral life till death, had not the Society come to their rescue at the critical moment and helped them to tread the path of virtue. Some women are led astray owing to ignorance, but when they realise their mistake, they repent and wish earnestly to be purged of their sin. Such women, although repentant, are outcast by their caste, despised by their relatives, and humiliated by their acquaintances. This will explain the urgent need of an institution like this Home. Several pitiable cases of women who had lapsed into degradation, but were subsequently raised to respectable life, are contained in the records of the Society.

The problem of the deserted wife is in the Hindu community as grave as ever. The present system of Hindu marriage is mainly responsible for it and it requires a radical modification. It is proving more and more unsuited to the needs of the present age. The number of unhappy and ill-assorted marriages is increasing. The law provides no escape for the unhappy woman. Such women seek the help of the Ashram. The Ashram tries its best, wherever possible, to reconcile them to their husbands. It is indeed gratifying that even in this difficult task the Ashram has met with considerable success.

In admitting women and children, no caste or class distinctions are observed. Women belonging to various castes and subcastes, including the Depressed Classes, have sought and found shelter in this Home. Similarly, the Home has been useful not only to the Bombay City and the Suburbs, but to many districts in Gujerat and Maharastra including the Indian States. Sometimes women from distant places like the Punjab, U. P., C. P., Berar, Karnatak, Mysore, Malabar, Madras and Kashmir have found shelter in this Home.

The work of the Society does not end with mere provision of protection. The women who seek the help of the Ashram are generally reluctant to receive education and make themselves self-supporting. The Ashram, however, does its best to provide education in the three R's and instruction in sewing, knitting and embroidery. The children go to outside schools.

The unprotected infant is an equally pressing problem. Experience shows that in most cases, the mother execrates her illegitimate off-spring. It is a perpetual reminder of her shame. The mother, therefore, in most cases desires to see it separately taken care of. Wet nurses have, therefore, to be provided. The "Home" has unfortunately not enough funds to provide this convenience and the problem of the unclaimed infant is in consequence becoming

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

393

increasingly acute. We desire to give the poor infant an even chance of continuing its ill-fated existence amidst surrounding which will secure for it the minimum of human needs. How many of these poor creatures are absorbed by non-Hindu Institutions, Hinduism does not know and does not care to know in its supercilious contempt for illegitimacy. The result is that the various hospitals in this city and outside make a constant demand on the Ashram for the tender care of such infants. But we are sorry to have to record that the Ashram has not been able to give adequate help, its inability being due entirely to paucity of funds. We have been long trying to solve this problem. Sheth Laxmidas Gordhandas Tejpal has made us a generous present of a plot of land at Vile Parle, but the Society has not yet been able to utilise it owing to want of funds.

The activities of the Society had during previous years to be curtailed for want of a commodious building. The Ashram had to be accommodated in a rented building. In spite of the heavy monthly rent we had been paying, the space available was not found sufficient even for the day-to-day activities which are the inevitable concomitants of the work of the Ashram. A judicious grouping of the inmates became impossible. A scheme of industrial training could not materialise. The Society, therefore, took a plot of land measuring about 6000 sq. yards on long lease from the Bombay Municipality and the building which is being opened today has been erected upon it. It has cost about Rs. 80,000. Staff quarters and other appurtenances and conveniences will require at least Rs. 40,000 more. So far only Rs. 45,000 have been paid to the contractors. The balance has yet to be paid. As the Society depends entirely on the help obtained from day to day from charitable persons, and as the number of women and children receiving shelter is on the increase, the monthly expenses of the Society (amounting nearly to Rs. 900 including the ground rent) hardly leave any room for effecting saving from current income.

The Society is, therefore, making an earnest public appeal for help and we are hoping that it will meet with due support. As the revered Swami Vivekanandaji has truly said, No religion is worth its name if it cannot wipe the widow's tears or bring a piece of bread to the orphan's mouth. The public of Bombay and outside has been known for its charity and kindness. What fitter object could it find for the exercise of these virtues than the welfare of the helpless and the fallen, the widow and the orphan! No help is too great and none too small.

Matunga, Bombay, } M. B. UDGAONKAR,
22nd February, 1936 } S. S. NAVARE,
Joint Hon. Secretaries.

Procedure in Coroner's Courts:—Sweeping reforms in inquest procedure are recommended in a report by the departmental committee on coroners in London. It is proposed that a coroner should no longer be empowered to commit a person to trial on a charge of murder, manslaughter or infanticide and that the verdicts of suicide, of unsound mind and felix de se should be abolished and a verdict of "died at his own hand" be substituted. The press should be prohibited from publishing an account of an inquest on a suicide apart from the formal findings.

Repeal Costs more than Prohibition.—Preliminary figures for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, show that the Federal enforcement personnel in U. S. A. has been increased instead of decreased since repeal, a campaign against illicit manufacture resulting last year in the seizure of 15,713 stills.

MAHARASHTRA SANGEET SAMITEE.

The idea of organising Music Conferences for educating the public to appreciate and patronize the art and science of Indian Music, was started in the Maharashtra many years ago by the late Pandit Vishnu Digambar Paluskar, the founder of the Gandharva Mahavidyalaya. He convened an All-India Conference under the auspices of the Gandharva Mahavidyalaya in Bombay in the year 1918. Succeeding sessions of the Conference were from time to time held in Bombay. These sessions, however, tended to become more and more restricted to Maharashtra and led eventually to the convening of Maharashtra Provincial Musical Conference, the first session of which was held in Bombay in 1926, under the auspices of the Gandharva Mahavidyalaya. The subsequent sessions of this Conference were held at Poona, Kolhapur and Sholapur. The Fifth session of this Conference was held in Bombay from the 24th to the 27th of August 1934.

The Fifth Session of this Conference took a distinct step ahead of the work of previous sessions. The previous sessions, being mostly pioneer attempts, naturally tended to be individual efforts on the part of some of the pupils of the late Pandit Vishnu Digambar acting under the general guidance of the Gandharva Mahavidyalaya Mandal. The work of these Sessions was more directed to the awakening of public interest. A number of resolutions were formally passed, but the promoters were unable to give a permanent form to their work or establish a machinery calculated to perpetuate their efforts apart from individual leanings and predilections. These Conferences, however, rendered an undoubted service, so necessary in the earlier stages, in popularising the knowledge of the science and art of Hindustani music. This for a long time, was associated in the lay mind with exaggerations of technique, the idiosyncracies of individual singers, and such other aspects of Hindustani music as gave it the appearance of a fitful and frolicsome effort without any claims to be regarded as a noble art based on immutable principles having their foundation in the phonetic rules of Nature and the cultural tendencies of the human mind. This phase has now fortunately disappeared owing to these pioneer efforts, and it is now widely recognized that the time has come when a permanent organization should be formed for holding annual conferences, popularising still further the higher aspects of Indian music and generally assisting in the uplifting of the art.

In response to this general desire, a resolution was unanimously adopted at the last session of this Conference, constituting a permanent Society called the Maharashtra Sangeet Samitee. The word "Maharashtra" has been used to indicate the field in which the main centres of its activities shall for the present be located, and the sphere within which the Samitee will initially operate. This does not, however, limit its activities or its field of operations within the linguistic or provincial area primarily indicated by that word. On the contrary, the Society has been formed with the object of propagating the science and the art of Hindustani music all round and raising its status by securing for it a due place in the curricula of the University and of primary and secondary educational institutions.

The objects of the Samitee are:—

(1) The creation of a central body which shall be recognised and whose opinions will be acceptable to the Musicians and Dancers in India;

(2) The encouragement of research in various matters connected with and arising in the field so Hindustani Music and Dancing;

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 22

(3) The translation of all old and extant books on the subject of Hindustani Music and Dancing:

(4) The publication of the results of research and the publication of a periodical of Hindustani Music and dancing: and

(5) The arrangement of conferences, etc., in Bombay and other places thereby popularizing the higher aspects of Hindustani Music and Dancing and providing a common platform for the discussion of problems connected with Hindustani Music and Dancing.

The Samitee will by all means at its command, encourage research in the various matters arising in the field of music and likewise attempt to secure the co-operation of scholars for translating Sanskrit books in which the principles of Hindustani music have been laid down. It is considered desirable that, for accomplishing these objects, which require funds, the Society should seek its members from the generous public. The Society will endeavour, subject to the funds at its disposal, to publish periodically a Music Year Book, which it hopes will be an annual production available to all the members. The members will have the right to attend all the future sessions of the Conference, wherever they may be held in addition to the usual rights and privileges of the membership of a society. Subscription of the Samitee has been fixed as follows:—

(a) Persons paying Rs. 1,000/- or more shall be styled 'Founders', (b) Persons paying Rs. 750/- or more shall be styled 'Donors', (c) Persons paying Rs. 500/- or more shall be styled 'Patrons', (d) Persons paying Rs. 300/- or more shall be styled 'Life Members', (e) Persons paying Rs. 5/- annually shall be styled 'Ordinary Members'.

It is hoped that all the lovers of Indian music will give their best help for furthering the long neglected cause of Hindustani music.

20, Shri Rama Nivas, Parekh Street, Bombay No. 4,	{	M. R. Jayakar, President .
		B. S. Sukthankar, Chairman .
		P. V. Gharpure, Dy. Chairman .
		M. D. Pai, B. R. Deodhar.
		Jt. Hon. Secretaries & Treasurers .

HINDU AND PARSI ORIGINS.

To

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Speaking under the auspices of Nagpur University on the origin of the Parsis, Dr. Sir Hari-Singh Gour is reported to have said (vide the "People" of Lahore, 28th January) that "the Parsis and the ancestors of... the twice-born Hindus were both Aryans and descended hand in hand upon the fertile plains of India," and that after a time "the Aryan priests who accompanied the mass migration of their clan made some converts—we call them Jajmans—but soon fell out among themselves, each accusing the other of stealing his Jajmans," whereon "a free fight ensued", and so on and so forth.

One may well wonder on what historical facts this learned Knight of Nagpur bases his fantastic theory of a "free fight" among "Aryan priests" for a partition of their flocks among the non-Aryan peoples.

In the first place, the theory of a pure or pristine Aryan race invading India from outside this sub-continent is a pure myth, about as pure as the so-called pure Aryans. This is my independent opinion, and I am glad that it happens to be the latest as well as the strictest historical view I have come across in my reading. The researches of anthropologists like Pargiter and Giacomo Boni have completely exploded what had already been a thread-bare theory in the light of the researches of philologists like Max Muller in Europe and Whitney in America. (By the way, 'Gaudian' and 'Dravidian' would, I think, be far better terms to employ in place of 'Aryan' and 'non-Aryan' whenever you have to deal with Indian racial and linguistic origins.)

But, be that as it may, I would, in the hope that it may do Dr. Gour's Rajput soul some good, venture to offer for his earnest consideration another theory,—which is 'mine own but not quite as baseless as his,—namely, that big and influential Kshatriya jajmans lusting after 'the flesh-pots of Egypt' first began the quarrel, each accusing the other of seducing his Brahman or hereditary minister.

That is my idea of how that and other like quarrels must have begun in the past, and may begin in the future if the temporal power in a land exercises an undue pressure upon its constituted spiritual advisers, or, in other words, if the State takes too many liberties with the conscience keepers of the nation.

Karwar,
February, 8. }

Yours etc.,
A SON OF IND.

IMPERIAL BABY WEEK.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

We are enclosing herewith two copies of the regulations governing our Imperial Baby Week Challenge Shield Competition for 1935/36. The Shield is awarded annually for the best Baby Week campaign held throughout the Empire, exclusive of the United Kingdom.

We should greatly value your help in giving publicity to this competition and should appreciate your courtesy in sending us a copy of any press announcement which you may feel disposed to make in your paper.

If further supplies of the regulations are needed they can be obtained on application to those persons and organisations whose names and addresses appear on the back page of the folder under the heading of the Indian Empire.

117, Piccadilly,
London, W. I.

NORAH MARCH,
Secretary.

The object of a Baby Week campaign is to promote in every way possible right ideas and ideals regarding fatherhood, motherhood and the well-being of Infants and little Children. The foundation of health is laid in infancy, even before birth itself. A Local Baby Week campaign is a form of propaganda which by reason of its very intensity is calculated to have great effect. The British Isles, under the auspices of the National Baby Week Council, has led the way in Baby Week celebrations. The movement is steadily spreading throughout the Empire.

The National Baby Week Council, England, awards annually a handsome Silver Challenge Shield (donated by the "News of the World") for the most effective Local Baby Week Campaign held throughout the Empire, including the Irish Free State, but excluding the United Kingdom. Conditions vary enormously throughout the Empire, and therefore each campaign is judged on its merits, particularly

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

395

In relation to the way in which it is devised to meet the peculiar circumstances of the district it is to cover.

PREVIOUS WINNERS OF THE SHIELD.

1926-27.—Bellary Municipality, Madras Presidency, India.

1927-28.—Benoni, Transvaal. South Africa.

1928-29.—Kalutara, Ceylon.

1929-30.—Panadura, Ceylon.

1930-31.—Mombasa, Kenya Colony.

1931-32.—State of Western Australia.

1932-33.—State of Mysore, India.

1933-34.—Calgary Council on Child and Family Welfare, Canada.

1934-35.—Lagos, Nigeria, West Africa.

REGULATIONS.

1. A Baby Week Committee may be formed by any municipal or voluntary body for the purpose of organising a Baby Week in any geographical administrative area within the British Empire, including the Irish Free State, but excluding the United Kingdom.

2. Any Baby Week Committee so formed is eligible to compete for the Imperial Baby Week Challenge Shield.

3. A Baby Week Campaign, which must be announced as such and which may or may not, according to the discretion of the competing Committee, be combined with a Health Week, must be held between June the 1st, 1935, and such time as will enable the records to be transmitted to and received by, the National Baby Week Council Office, in London, on or before June the 1st, 1936.*

An extension of closing date to June 14th, 1936, will be allowed in the case of entries from those places (Australia, New Zealand, etc.), involving a five weeks'—or more—mail transmission to England.

4. Competing Committees must supply the following information:—

(a) Entry Form on which is to be given certain information specified thereon. This Form is attached to this sheet. Copies may be obtained direct from the National Baby Week Council, or from the Imperial Headquarters of the area concerned.

(b) A full description of the programme carried out must be given. In addition an outline of the maternity and child welfare work undertaken during the year, together with an account of the special difficulties and problems presented by the local conditions as they affect the welfare of mothers and little children, should be supplied. Such accounts may be illustrated by photographs, and should be accompanied by copies of any leaflets, posters, and similar propaganda material used in connection with the Campaign, also by cuttings from articles in the Press which have preceded, accompanied or followed the Campaign as being part of the Local Baby Week activity. Special attention should be given in this account to any novel features (such as the use of special films) and of any ingenious devices to secure local interest.

5. The winners will be entitled to hold the Shield from the time of its reception from the previous winners until the awards for the year are announced, with a minimum period for holding of 9 months. (This arrangement is instituted through the difficulties which may arise in the conveyance of the Shield from one part of the Empire to another.)

6. Entries must reach the National Baby Week Council, 117, Piccadilly, London, W. 1, England, on or before June 1st, 1936

*An extension of closing date to June 14th, 1936, will be allowed in the case of entries from those places (Australia, New Zealand, etc.), involving a five weeks'—or more—mail transmission to England.

N. B.—In awarding the Shield full consideration will be given to the measure of initiative and energy spent in carrying out the appropriate scheme; the methods adopted to deal with illiterate populations; and the arrangements made to meet with multilingual difficulties.

Note—It should be borne in mind that a Local Baby Week Campaign is intended to be purely of a propaganda and educational nature, and must not in any way be made the medium for furthering the interests of any commercial undertaking.

The National Baby Week Council publishes suggestions for the organisation of Local Baby Week Campaigns. Copies of this publication may be obtained from the National Baby Week Council, England, or from Imperial Headquarters in each part of the Empire.

The award will be announced by the National Baby Week Council during National Baby Week in England, July 1st to 7th, 1936, through the Press and other agencies.

All communications regarding this Competition should be addressed to

The National Baby Week Council,

117, Piccadilly,

London, W. 1, ENGLAND, or to the Imperial correspondents for the Competition in the part of the Empire concerned.

DAME CADBURY'S IMPRESSIONS.

In an interview Dame Cadbury who came to Calcutta as a delegate to the International Women's Conference, gave her impression both of the Conference and of the country.

She said: The Conference has been extremely interesting to me; firstly I have had no idea before that so much social work is being done in India and secondly, I have been struck by the knowledge which writers of papers have shown in dealing with different problem of the country. In a way the problems here are the same as we have in England. The difference is that you are to deal with 340 millions of people, while we with only 40 millions. You have in India, as I am told, many millions of depressed classes who, it is said, live on the edge of starvation. In England though we have nearly two million unemployed, they all receive State aid and public assistance. None need starve in England. Many of the reforms discussed at the Conference have been achieved in England comparatively recently, for instance, medical inspection and treatment of school children. It is not until 1910 that work in England began. Now there is a chain of school clinics for treatment of school children in every town and village of England.

EDUCATION.

As regards education which was also discussed at the Conference, from my experience of the next large city to London I can say that education of children there is comprehensive and intelligent and of a nature that fits children in their future domestic life. Science, arts, crafts and domestic training for girls are to be found in all these schools. The secondary schools carry the children a stage further and from there they gain scholarship to universities.

Another subject discussed at the Conference was the housing for wage-earners. Since the war we have built in England one million new houses for them all over the country. In the neighbourhood of these houses there are open spaces for playground. I am personally the Chairman of the First Housing

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

396.
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 22

Trust in the neighbourhood of Birmingham and my husband was pioneer in this direction over forty years ago.

We have had a session to discuss food and health questions. There again we are told that a very large number of people living in villages are underfed and have no means nor opportunity to provide their children either with sufficient milk or food containing vitamins which are so necessary for health. This is deplorable and I think Ladies Councils cannot do better than see what can be done through the national and civic authorities to remedy them. There is also a large percentage of children and adults who are suffering from tuberculosis. Only public health activities and medical inspection of children in every direction could help to remedy it. It is in this direction that the Indian woman should take a lead.

TRAINING FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

I was struck when I was told at the Conference that there were so many women willing to undertake social work. But from my experience in England I can say that in order to do this it is necessary to have knowledge, wisdom and experience. In Birmingham University they have instituted a diploma for social service; students willing to take up that course must be over 20 years of age and receive school-leaving certificates and then can study, for two or three years, subjects like public health and such other cognate subjects. They are required to visit factories, hospitals, labour exchanges, schools, slums and institutions for the blind, the deaf and the mentally deficient. Such students may become factory inspectors, sanitary inspectors, public health officers and hospital almoners and After-Care workers for children, on leaving schools. "I have met in India many women," said Dame Cadbury "who are beautiful, intelligent and deeply religious. I have realised how deeply concerned the ladies are for the reforms which they had been discussing. My message to them is that the most important reform at the moment in India is to spread education. Cannot they initiate a campaign for the provision of education to the dwellers of thousands of villages which stretch out from one end of India to the other and thereby improve the mental, physical and sanitary conditions of the villagers? It is necessary that the village population should share in the raising of the standard of living which is taking place all over the world."

During her stay in Calcutta, Dame Cadbury visited Lady Bose's institution for widows where she found 60 girls receiving instruction for four years in various branches of domestic work. On their return to the villages their knowledge enables them to earn their living. Among the inmates were girls of even 16 years. About 40 inmates of the institution had been back to their villages.

She also visited the tannery of Mr. Satish Chandra Das Gupta and was interested in seeing students, Brahmins and Depressed Classes, working side by side.

Co-Education in the Punjab:—Despite the conservatism and prejudices of the people against sending girls to boys' schools the efforts of the Education Department to encourage co-education in the province have met with some success as is revealed by the fact that on the 31st March 1934 there were as many as 20,800 girls reading in boys' schools—almost all of them in primary schools. The lack of qualified female teachers and of funds for running separate institutions has necessitated the encouragement of co-education, says the Director of Information in a note on the subject.

ANOTHER VIEW OF RUSSIA.

If for no other reason, as the most abused country in the world next to India, Russia has a deep interest for us. Last week we reproduced a review containing specimen quotations from her book, the "Red Network", by Mrs. Elizabeth Dilling. Another American woman writer, Anna Louise Strong, who has lived in Soviet Russia for several years, has written a very different kind of book which Alice Stone Blackwell calls a great book in her review of it in the Unity. "This book," she writes, "builds a bridge over which open-minded Americans may pass to a better understanding of Soviet Russia. Almost everything about it which has perplexed and repelled them also perplexed and repelled Miss Strong. It was fourteen years before she was ready to join the communist party. She dedicates her book "to all those Americans who stand where I stood fifteen years ago, and to all those Russians Communists who want to understand America." Below are some passages from the review:

Anna Louise Strong was born with the energy and vitality of twenty ordinary mortals, and with a rare outfit of brains and courage. She distinguished herself at school and college, carried on successfully various progressive and humanitarian enterprises, made a reputation as a writer, edited labor journals, and took part in Seattle's general strike. Her heart was broken by America's entrance into the World War. She knew the people wanted to keep out of it, and was sure that we were forced into it by the great moneyed interests. Eagerly desirous to visit Russia, she went to Poland to do publicity work for the Quakers' relief service there and afterwards got leave to take a trainload of Quaker food into Russia for famine relief. Later, when the American relief under Hoover arrived, she also distributed some of that food; and she gives an illuminating account of Hoover's methods.

Her next fifteen years were spent chiefly in Russia. She did not find what she had expected:

"I had thought to find a brave new world beyond the border; I found the collapse of an old world under whose ruins men were dying. But living among these ruins were men who were building a new world from the broken pieces; there were creators in chaos. We had not allowed for the backwardness of a non-industrial country like Russia, for the Asiatic standards of vast populations, for the lack of surplus goods. Most of all, we never allowed for ravages of intervention and blockade, of which we had no adequate conception."

She toiled to be helpful with her pen, and her work as a journalist took her all over the country. She visited Karelia—a long, thin strip of country lying between Finland and Russia, running north from Leningrad nearly 1,000 miles to the polar ocean. She decided to visit the mica mines. The President of Karelia was travelling in the same direction, and they started out together on the slow Murmansk railroad:

"We were a group of six that left the Karelian capital. I shall never forget my first night out. Six wooden bunks on which one could stretch at full length without mattress or bedding were reserved for the presidential party. Only two of these were lowers; as a woman guest I had one of them, while President Guhling took the other, not only as president but because tuberculosis in his leg-bones made movement painful. He left an eighteen-hour day of work behind him and was going to similar work; he was drooping with fatigue. Yet during

"I Change Worlds: The Remaking of an American," by Anna Louise Strong; with a Foreword by Lincoln Steffens. Henry Holt and Company, New York. $3.00.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

397

the long delays at tiny stations he always got out to talk with peasants on the platforms, inquiring into local conditions and needs.

In the middle of the night, peasants, finding the other cars on the train full, began to crowd into the "reserved" car. For only a few years had they known a railroad; they ignored the railroad rules. A peasant woman with a baby seated herself on the edge of Guhling's bunk and began to push against his feet. He turned in uneasy slumber and drew up his legs a little; she promptly put the baby into the vacant place. Slowly but persistently she shoved for more space, using the baby's head as a battering ram against Guhling's feet. Had she picked him as a kindly man who wouldn't hurt a baby's head even in slumber? Soon Guhling was sitting up. I told the woman that the place was reserved; she stared stolidly, unanswering. I offered to exchange with Guhling, or to rouse one of the men in the upper berths. He smiled: "Let them sleep while they can; they also have heavy work." He hunched himself painfully into half a bunk and dropped into uneasy, exhausted slumber, while I lay sleepless thinking of the difference between Guhling and other presidents I have known."

President Guhling, much beloved, was a man of wide culture, a former aristocrat. He had done and suffered much during the revolution, and had helped Karelia to repel five invasions. Since then the country has made astonishing progress.

Everywhere Miss Strong found new life beginning:

"I visited Kiev, and spoke on International Women's Day to a great throng of women—worn, intent faces under faded shawls. The women applauded, thinking me a remarkable person to have come all the way from America. But I knew that every one of those women was more remarkable than I. Every one of them had kept house through sixteen bombardments. Sixteen times in the civil war the city of Kiev changed hands. The Germans had held it, Petlura, Denikin, various guerilla bands, the Poles...Kiev, reviving now, was holding a 'big fair to get acquainted with our new industries.'"

Miss Strong visited the much-discussed Donetz coal mines and other mines. A group of miners from America, hearing her speak English, stopped to talk:

"They told in the twang of Illinois what they thought of Russia: 'Pretty awful last year. Conditions upset by the famine. But now—well, we figure we live about as well as we did in the States. The mines aren't well organized, and it takes a week to earn what we made there in two days. But over there we couldn't count on more than two days' work a week. So it evens up. And we'd rather have it regular. It's more peaceful here.'"

"Peaceful!" I exclaimed, remembering the civil war and famine barely over. But they gave me the workers' idea of peace.

"Yep. No strikes nor lockouts. You can go to bed at night feeling sure of work in the morning, which we never could in the States. No rows with your boss at all. You've your union and your mine committee and you're insured against sickness and accident...But we wish this government could afford to buy good machinery. They've good intentions but no machines. But we don't want to go back. We figure in five or ten years this will be a first class country for a worker."

It was an attitude I was to meet hundreds of times in ensuing years—the typical attitude of American workers in their first experience of Soviet industry.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1927.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Pettad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadvanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
 Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)
 Sheth Todarmal Chimanlal Samal Beehar, Mill Agent Baroda.
 Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda.
 Raj Ratna Bhallal Dalibhai Amin, B.A., M.S., G.I., (Managing Agent, Alomib Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
 Seth Pransukhlal Manatlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)
 Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Bombay).
 Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION
COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
 Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
 Burma calling at Galle, Tuticorin,
 Colombo and other coast ports
 according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

398
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb 22

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,02,50,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.
CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA.

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

The articles which appeared in THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER have been reprinted in book form. Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra,
BOMBAY 20.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, BOMBAY.

BRANCHES:

Baramatti (District Poona),	Virangam (District Ahmedabad),
Karad (District Satara),	Dhulla (District West Khandesh),
Tasgaon (" "),	Dondalcha (" "),
Satara (" "),	Nandurbar (" "),
Kirtoskarwadi (" "),	Shirpur (" "),
Shirala (" "),	Shahada (" "),
Koregaon (" "),	Sakri (" "),
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar),	Sindkheda (" "),
Shevgaon (" "),	Malegaon (District Nasik),
Ahmednagar (" "),	Satana (" "),
Bhiwandi (District Thana),	Kalwan (" "),
Palghar (" "),	Dohad (District Panch Mahals),
Kalyan (" "),	Kalo (" "),
Akluj (District Sholapur),

DIRECTORS:

Sir Ghundal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Esq.,	B. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. F. Kulkarni, Esq.,
R. G. Saria, Esq.,	D. W. Bhat, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR:

AND

TRUSTEE CO., LTD. patidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 |
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

399

Invigorating and Health Giving.

Giving the daily bath to the baby is no worry to the mother if she uses MYSORE SANDAL SOAP. The baby likes it and he will be happy only if he gets a tablet of MYSORE SANDAL SOAP to play with

USE MYSORE SANDAL SOAP.

GOVERNMENT SOAP FACTORY, BANGALORE.

Sole Agents: for Bombay Presidency (excluding Sind and Districts of Belgaum, Dharwar and North Kanara) and Rajputana.

Messrs. RAMJANALLY EBRAHIM & Co.,
81, Princess Street, Bombay 2.

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	20s. Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
Outside the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	21s. Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,
Phoenix, Natal.

SAFELY RELY ON AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

400
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 22

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference was sent to us for circulation in India and they have been sold out. A further supply is expected in about a month and orders can be booked for at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamaksbi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 105 Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 345.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office: KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDA, BOMBAY, 26.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY FEBRUARY 29, 1936. No. 26

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Military Rising in Japan.
A Constitutional Deadlock.
Must Ado About Nothing.
Risky Propaganda.
Bombay Finances.
Baroda Hall of Fame.
Railways and the Public.
Faith and Eirewalking.
The Dewey Evil.
Educated Unemployment.

"Congress and Bharatha Natyam."
Ramakrishna Centenary Message.
Evolution of Congress Policy.
Religion and Religions.
Untouchability and Conversion.
Italy and Colonial Possessions.
The Aga Khan on Muslim Policy.
Bengal Whipping Act.

NOTES

Military Rising in Japan:—Wednesday's evening papers published the news that a military rising has occurred in Japan, that the Prime Minister and two other Ministers, have been killed and that the whole country is under martial law. Fuller information in Thursday morning papers confirmed the news, mentioned 80 as the number killed in the rising but conveyed the reassuring information that the situation is completely under control though martial law was expected to be declared. Admiral Okada, the murdered Prime Minister, is a veteran who served with distinction in the Russo-Japanese war. He was a man of the old school who cherished the ancient simplicity of Japanese life. He and his colleagues reversed the aggressive policy of their predecessors and they would have succeeded in pursuing a policy of non-aggression, had the European Powers co-operated with them in defining Japan's position in relation to themselves in a way that was less irritating to the proud and sensitive spirit of the race. It was the unyielding intransigence of the Powers that drove Germany into the arms of Hitler. It is the same blind egoism which is responsible for the present rising in Japan, as for the assassinations of previous Ministers. Japanese statesmen have made it clear that the national spirit would brook no inequality and have begged the Powers to recognise in theory at least the equal status of Japan. The White Powers would pay no heed to this earnest appeal. There can be doubt that the refusal of Britain and America to concede Japan parity in permissible naval strength, has deeply wounded Japanese self-esteem and strengthened the military party. At the Peace Conference, Japan's attempt to eliminate racial discrimination was side-tracked by President Wilson. Japan's emergence as a great industrial nation, has been viewed with intense jealousy, and she has been refused even theoretical naval parity. She is not allowed to send her surplus population to countries on the Pacific, her natural outlets. For doing in Manchuria what other Powers have done elsewhere without a tenth of the excuse, she has been denounced as a breaker of world peace. In these circumstances, it should not surprise any one that moderate elements have become discredited and the aggressive forces have been encouraged to take matters in their hands. Fortunately for Japan, the Emperor is revered by the Army party even more than by the constitutionalists. This is a stabilising influence which will prevent the present crisis from developing into a revolution. According to a War Office communique the organisers of the revolt took the step for the purpose of defending and emancipating the nation by removing the sources of evil such as the elder statesmen, important officials, financial and military cliques, bureaucrats and political parties which are leading the nation to decay. This is almost word for word the Nazi gospel. It has been suggested that the recent Franco-Russian Pact will be countered by a German-Japanese one. The rising may be a prelude to it.

A Constitutional Deadlock:—The situation created by the majority decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that the Agricultural Adjustment Act is unconstitutional, has a more than passing interest for us, as a similar situation may arise under the Federal Constitution that has been forged for India. The Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed by Congress to counteract the collapse of commodity prices. It authorised the levying of taxes on the "processing" of agricultural produce, that is the preparation of it for the market, and the application of the proceeds to the grant of bonuses to cultivators who agreed to curtail production. The Supreme Court has decided that, while the regulation of inter State transport was a Federal function according to the American Constitution, production was a function belonging to the States exclusively, and that the Act as it affected production was an infringement on the rights of States and was, therefore, unconstitutional. The Court refused to consider the consequences which would follow the invalidation of the Act. A very considerable sum collected under it will have to be refunded and the refunding would not benefit the cultivator as the processor had already passed on the tax levied on processing, either to the producer or to the consumer. "When an Act of Congress is challenged in the courts as not conforming to the constitutional mandate," observed Mr. Justice Roberts, "the judicial branch of the government has only one duty—to ascertain and declare whether the legislation is in accordance with or in contravention of the constitution." The general opinion in America seems to be that there should be an amendment of the Constitution in order to prevent similar deadlocks from arising again. The distinction between production and transport, which was possible when the Constitution was framed, is impossible now owing to the fact that cotton or wheat produced in one State has to find a market in another State or even in other countries. It is suggested as the only way out that the Constitution should be amended so as to grant general power to Congress to promote the economic welfare of the United States. A deadlock is not likely to arise in India in exactly the same form, first, because we have not here the separation of Judicial from Executive functions which is provided by the American Constitution and, secondly, because the Governor General is the deus ex machina to solve all doubts and difficulties under the Federal Constitution. The interest of the case to us lies in the futility of drawing a hard and fast line between the Central Government and the Federal units. The Federal system has failed wherever it has been tried under more favourable conditions, and is bound to fail ignominiously in India where it is beset with inconceivable checks and safeguards.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Much Ado About Nothing:—It is difficult to understand the mentality of the leaders of the South African Indian Congress who have resigned their offices in that body as a protest against Sir Raza Ali's marriage with a Hindu lady of Kimberley. The Congress existed before Sir Raza Ali went as Agent to the Government of India in South Africa. It was started with the object of promoting the interests, chiefly political, of South African Indians. It had nothing to do with Sir Raza Ali's personal affairs. Why any leading member of that body should think of severing his connection with it because Sir Raza lost his heart to a lady at Kimberley, we are utterly unable to understand. The first message sent to India said that the lady was to be converted to Islam. It was a serious point whether an official of the Government of India can engage in proselyting activities. But Sir Raza Ali contradicted this part of the message and declared that the marriage would be under the statutory law of the Union which takes no note of religious beliefs and that Lady Raza Ali would retain her religious and property rights. With this announcement, the public in India was satisfied. Reuter's message sent to South Africa that the marriage had roused very little attention in India correctly represented the position here. Our friends in South Africa and elsewhere should understand that at the present day Indian opinion, while keenly resentful of religious proselyting, looks, if not with favour, with toleration on intercommunal marriages. Indian Opinion, we are glad to note, has taken a sensible view of the marriage though it has been hitherto rather critical of Sir Raza Ali's official acts. It writes: "Marriages between Indians professing different faiths are frequent in this country and they excite no curiosity or comment whatsoever. It is not an unusual thing here for Malay Muslim girls to marry Hindu sweet-hearts and Tamilian and other Hindu girls to wed Muslim husbands. And neither is it an unheard of outrage for an Indian to change his faith in this country. All our Christian countrymen here formerly professed the Hindu faith and their conversion to Christianity provoked no fanaticism on any one's part. Lastly, neither meetings of protest were called nor heavens rent asunder by Congress leaders when the most prominent Congress leader of that time, Mr. Albert Christopher, married his Muslim wife. Where then, under the circumstances, is the logic of the storm raised by them on the present occasion?" It is apparently the view of the South African Indian leaders that the Government of India should recall Sir Raza Ali. Even if the Government incline to consider such a suggestion, public opinion will not support them. If Sir Raza Ali himself feels that his continuation as India's Agent has become untenable, that is another question. We do not think that this is the case. According to Indian Opinion the news of the intended marriage created no stir until the Arya Pratinidhi Sabha started an agitation. We would advise our South African Indian friends to take a sober view and to reconsider their resignations which mean practically the dissolution of the South African Indian Congress.

Risky Propaganda:—The Examiner writes: "Our attention has been called to a large coloured poster or picture, published in connection with the Aga Khan's Golden Jubilee, a publication which to Christian eyes is obviously blasphemous. It represents the Aga Khan in great glory between less glorified figures of 'Lord Krishna' and 'Lord Jesus,' both of whom are represented as pointing the world to the Aga Khan. 'Lord Jesus' with the words: 'I will pray the Father and He shall give you another Comforter that He may abide with you for ever.' Such a publication is offensive to Christians, and no doubt also to Hindus who are informed that 'the Aga Khan is the Manifestation of Lord Vishnoo.' The whole is surmounted by the legend: 'Invite people to the path of God with tact.—Holy Koran.' We have omitted a sentence in the above which seemed rather personal. So far as Hindus are concerned, we think that the great majority will see nothing 'blasphemous' in the picture. The Hindu religion does not postulate the finality of Divine manifestation. It, in fact, declares that whenever righteousness decays,

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

403

there will recur a Manifestation to call the world back to its senses. That the world has got into a slough of unrighteousness at the present time, needs no demonstration. Whether the Aga Khan is the Manifestation come to redeem humanity, is a matter of faith, and if his followers believe that he is, sensible Hindus will see nothing in it to resent. It is, at any rate, no so bad as representing, as Christian missionaries have done, the sacred symbol of Shiva as a phallic emblem. In any case, it is not worth the while of anybody to notice an obviously crude attempt of some zealous artist to make out that the Aga Khan is a reconciler of Hinduism and Christianity. Only, there is nothing to reconcile, as Hinduism has no quarrel with Christianity or any other religion; holding that all religions are sacred and true to their devotees. At the same time, this mode of propagandism is provocative of counter-propaganda and the average Catholic or Hindu is likely to regard what is done in the supposed interests of a single sect as done in the interests of Islam as a whole. Unlike Hinduism, the Catholic Church has the most extensive and effective propagandist agency in the world, which may be used to the prejudice of Islam, even if the risk of communal irritation in India is left out of account.

Bombay Finance:—The statement before the Provincial Legislative Council of the Finance Member of the Bombay Government on the financial position of this Presidency is sorry reading. He had estimated last year for a deficit of Rs. 2 lakhs. Actually it has become one of Rs. 53 lakhs. He pointed to this as proof of his prescience in telling the Legislative Council last year that the Finance Member had always to reckon with the factor of inexorable circumstances which often upset all calculations of revenue and expenditure. Fancy a Chancellor of the Exchequer telling that to the House of Commons! Khan Bahadur D. B. Cooper in the same spirit seemed to hail the separation of Sind as a happy event in the history of Bombay. The "betterment" resulting from this bereavement amounted to Rs. 98 lakhs in hard cash. "If we subtract from this the current deficit of 53 lakhs," explained the Finance Member "it will be seen that the net betterment amounts to 45 lakhs." The Council members could presumably do this simple sum in subtraction but the Khan Bahadur would not trust their intelligence. Except the abolition of tolls on bullock carts, the other items among which this "betterment" is to be distributed are more or less of an obligatory nature for which no credit is due to the Finance Member. He laid the whole blame of the disorganised administration of Bombay Finance during the last fifteen years on the Meston settlement, and made only a casual reference towards the end of his statement to "the responsibilities of the Bombay Development schemes which were passed to us an inheritance from the pre-reform period". This is not quite correct. The worst follies of the Development Department were committed after the inauguration of the reforms, and would not have been possible under the old regime with all its faults. The Khan Bahadur took credit, among other things, for granting relief and remissions from time to time to agriculturists. We do not see what else he could have done when the people have nothing to pay the land revenue with. He also claimed credit for 'inaugurating' a systematic programme and policy of rural uplift and village improvement. Any body can 'inaugurate' a plan but the time for taking credit for it is when it has led to some tangible result which the Sykes' scheme has yet to show. Ministers under Provincial autonomy will inherit from the Cooper regime nothing more useful than the doctrine that the Finance Ministers' calculations must be upset by inexorable circumstances.

Baroda Hall of Fame:—His Highness the Gaekwar opened on Monday the Kirti Mandir which has been under construction for some years past. It is obvious that the Maharaja intends this to be the crowning monument of his long and successful reign as well as of his notable contributions to Indian culture and character. The Maharaja, in his opening address which was full of suggestive and thoughtful reflections, declared that the Kirti Mandir was intended as a Hall of Remembrance to commemorate the benefactors of the State irrespective of their race, caste or creed. His Highness added: "It will be a reminder to all of the story of its rulers and of the men who have planned and toiled in shaping its destinies, and a tribute thus to the most cherished qualities of humanity." The Maharaja proceeded to describe what these qualities are. He referred to the fourfold duties of man as an individual, as member of society, as citizen of a State, as beneficiary of his cultural heritage and environment. This, in fact, is the old Hindu doctrine of man being born as a debtor to the gods, his ancestors, his family and his posterity, restated in modern terminology. The idea of the Mandir is a grand one. Much will depend, however, on the careful selection of persons to be commemorated in it. One necessary rule should be that no one should be chosen for the honour of a place in the Mandir until five or ten years after his death. The Roman Catholic rule of not canonising any one in his life time, is an excellent one. Without such a restriction, no ways when every street, lane and alley is named after some popular hero of the moment, there is a very real danger of the Mandir becoming overcrowded within a short time. Even Westminster Abbey, so long jealously restricted to men of exceptional achievements in politics, art and literature, is succumbing to this influence. Another danger to be guarded against in this commercial age is that of wealthy men purchasing a place in the Baroda Valhalla. The Maharaja's speech affords sufficient guidance in both these respects and his reflections should be embodied in the rules made to govern entrance into the Hall of Fame.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

404
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 29]

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, February 29, 1936.

RAILWAYS AND THE PUBLIC.

Sir Mahomed Zaffarullah Khan is the first non-official Indian to be entrusted with the portfolio of Commerce including Railways in the Government of India. His predecessor, Sir Joseph Bhore, was also an Indian but he was a member of the Indian Civil Service and, therefore, steeped in the official tradition. Sir Mahomed's first Railway budget was looked forward to as likely to reflect the popular point of view which, in railway as in many other subjects, is sharply distinguished from the official one. Considering that this was his first attempt to survey the field as a whole, the speech which Sir Mahomed made in presenting his budget for the next revenue year is not altogether disappointing. The Indian Railway Minister starts with two initial difficulties which is not of his creation and which he can only gradually overcome, if at all. The first is, that Indian railways were laid, firstly, with an eye to strategic purposes and, next, with a view to promote foreign trade. The two purposes are served by many of the railways but there are still some in the Frontier districts which are purely strategic and on which there is an annual loss of two crores of rupees. There is great force in the suggestion of Sir Ghulam Hussain Hidayatulla that the loss should be charged to the Army account. The Commerce Member's answer that it would only reduce the deficit on paper and would not bring any relief to the taxpayer, has only to be pushed a little farther to bring the whole Army expenditure under Education or Agriculture or Village Reconstruction. We should know exactly what the Railways cost in respect of the several purposes which they serve. We can see no reason for crediting the loss under strategic railways to Commerce and not to Defence, except that it is desired to minimise the cost of the Army which in India is much too unconscionable.

The alignment of our railways mostly with a view to promote foreign trade, leads to the paradoxical result that measures taken to develop production and trade within the country, affect detrimentally the prosperity of our railways. Sir Mahomed clearly understands this. Referring to the tendency in all countries to strive after self-sufficiency and the development of internal trade and production, he said that the general effect of this policy on railway earnings, so far as India is concerned, was to replace long lead traffic to and from the ports by short lead internal traffic. "With increasing prosperity and the further development of industries in the country," he added "part of this loss may be made up, but it is apprehended that, in the present state of world industry and international commerce, it will take a very considerable period of time for this happy consummation to be reached."

It is more likely that it may never be reached as the self-sufficiency policy, which has now come to be accepted by nearly the whole world including the British Empire, is the natural and sound policy which no nation is likely to give up. De Valera's opinion that free trade was the greatest curse of the world and that all international trade is wicked unless it is limited to "surplus production," will find a ready echo in India. Along with the self-sufficiency policy, Sir Mahomed placed world depression and the collapse of commodity prices as the leading factor in causing the railway deficit. In connection with this he presented some figures which, if correct, would show that the Indian cultivator is more quickly responsive to movements in world prices than, for instance, his American counterpart who, in every respect, education, outlook, means of transport and communications, is much better placed than he is. In the United States, the State has to give bonuses in order to persuade cultivators to reduce their production of cotton and other commodities. Sir Mahomed Zaffarullah Khan would have us believe that this process in India is automatic, that the moment prices decline, the area under cultivation declines. This, however, is a large question and not strictly relevant to railway finance.

The third cause to which the Commerce Member assigned the decreased earnings of railways, is the competition of motors. It is intended apparently to adopt measures to bring motor traffic under control in order to minimise the competition with railways. We trust that Government will first try to ascertain why people prefer motor buses to railway trains before they interfere in the interests of railways. Sir Mahomed's observations about the loss incurred owing to persons travelling without tickets and dishonesty of railway official in undercharging freight on goods, and his declaration that the law would be made more stringent, show that the Government propose to make railway travelling more irksome to the common people than it is now. If there are a considerable number of people who use the railways but do not purchase tickets, it is clear evidence that the fares are prohibitive. If there is a fall in the drink revenue, Government reduce the duties or increase the facilities in order to prevent illicit production. Why is not the same reasoning applied to ticketless travellers? The official view that there is a sort of conspiracy among millions of people to cheat the railways, is too fantastic to be accepted. Again, if railway officials undercharge goods they, no doubt, have some inducement to do so. In this case, it is not the poor third class passenger but the well-to-do merchant that is concerned. The way to remedy these evils is to improve the position of the employees materially and otherwise so as to make the service attractive to self-respecting persons of good social standing. We say 'persons' because there is room for a larger employment of women in the railway services.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

405

Generally speaking, women may be expected to be more considerate particularly to female passengers. Another way in which matters may be improved is to invite leading non-officials to form visiting committees to help passengers and to see that malpractices are reduced to a minimum. The punitive measures which Government contemplate may in the long run cost more than the half crore which is lost through passengers travelling without tickets, and the amount involved in improving the conditions of railway service. They will certainly not make railway travelling more attractive to poor people or railway service more reputable in the eyes of the public. After all, railways exist for the people and not the people for the railways.

FAITH AND FIRE WALKING.

The Council of Psychical Research of the University of London has been experimenting with Fire-walking. A young Indian, Khuda Bux, who had performed the feat of walking on fire in India, went to London and he was asked to give a demonstration in the presence of several doctors and scientists. Every precaution was taken against trickery and fraud. The feet of the man were examined before and after the performance. Khuda Bux took four strides, twice over the burning embers, and on examination his feet were found to be uninjured. He asked for five minutes grace before making a third attempt but felt he could not do it again. He stated that the instruments and tests had unnerved him. 'Something inside had broken' he said 'I have lost my faith, and if I do it again, I shall burn myself'. Dr. E. H. Hunt, who was present at the experiment, had seen fire walking in Southern India, and he told the Times that the test was made under unusually severe conditions which would have deterred most fire walkers. Readers of the Bible will be reminded of the incident at Gennesareth. After his disciples had crossed over in a boat, Jesus followed them walking on the water. Peter noticing this asked to meet his Master and was bidden to come. After a short distance he found himself drowning and cried out to Jesus to help him. The Master went forward and held Peter up, with the reproachful query, 'Wherefore didst thou doubt?' Peter had started full of faith but it had wavered when he saw himself in the unusual position; something inside had broken and specific gravity began to tell. Western critics of the Bible might dismiss the whole story as a myth. But the Hindu scriptures do not regard the power to suspend the action of natural laws as miraculous. They regard it as incidental to the practice of the discipline of yoga but they warn neophytes that its allurements are to be sternly repelled as bypaths leading away from the straight road to Reality. The Poet-Saint, Tayumanavar, has catalogued the powers thus gained in one of his hymns which Isaac Tambiah in his "Psalms of a Saiva Saint" translates as follows:—

The wild-willed tusker breaking every bond
Is (may be) meekly led wherever I will;
I (may) bid; behold the mouths of bears are bound
The cruel tiger's jaws are still;
Lo! on the lordly lion's back I (may) ride;
The serpent dances at my call;
The metals five in mercury and fire
I (may) turn to gold that buys me all;
Unseen of men I (may) move about on earth;
The gods in heaven my behests heed;
For ever young I may remain; nay pass
Into other bodies at need;

Upon the waters I may walk; may sit Unscathed amidst the flames of fire.
(The word 'may' is inserted in brackets wherever it has been left cut owing to metrical exigency in Tambiah's translation.)

The "siddha" may do all these. But he will not because they are obstacles to the attainment of the Godhead which is the goal of yoga. Gautama Buddha strictly forbade his disciples to perform miracles. When the bereaved mother brought him her dead child, fully believing he could revive it, Buddha consoled her, not by raising it to life but by putting her in the way to realise that death is the universal lot of living beings and that enlightenment and the eightfold path were the only way of real redemption of sorrow. Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa was asked if one could walk on water. "Yes," was his reply, "but sensible people prefer to pay a pice to the ferryman". In reading the Christian Scripture, the miracles present no difficulties to the Hindu. His difficulty is that Jesus should have condescended to perform them.

Dabblers in Yoga attain some of these powers for purposes of exhibition. But even in their case the power is derived from psychic and not from physical or chemical sources. The moment a doubt crosses their minds that their power may depend on physical conditions, that moment the virtue goes out of them. That is why Khuda Bux declined to make the attempt a third time. 'Something inside was broken,' as he aptly said. That something was his faith in himself. Incredulity or scepticism on the part of onlookers also, paralyses psychic powers, by inducing self-distrust. Jesus, sharing the common lot of prophets in their own country, could not perform miracles in his native village of Nazareth. The doctors and scientists who examined Khuda Bux could not discover the secret of his fire-proof feet because they looked for it in the wrong place. Insensibility to cold and heat, is one of the signs of advancement in the Yogic path. It is no unusual thing for ascetics to hang head downwards over a roaring fire not for a few seconds but for hours on end. The author of "India and its Faiths," Professor James Bissett Pratt, saw such an ascetic at Allahabad. The (missionary) friend who was with him and who, of course, would never think of emulating the sadhu, remarked that it was a stunt to gain notoriety. Professor Pratt could not accept this facile explanation. He suggested that even in India there must be less arduous ways of achieving notoriety! The average European tries his hardest to prove to himself that what he does not understand and cannot do, is fraud and humbug. But men with the real scientific spirit are beginning to see that their attitude should no longer be that of disbelieving every thing that is strange to them. Every day shows that there are more things between heaven and earth than are dreamt of by physical scientists. To do them justice, the great scientists have already recognised this. It is the camp-followers who persist in the old attitude of denying every thing which they cannot touch, smell and—eat!

Marriage Without Bridegroom:—A novel marriage, unprecedented in the history of Malabar Nairs, was celebrated at Ayenthe near Trichur where a woman was married to one Bala Krishna Menon who was at Singapore at the time of the marriage. The marriage was performed before a large gathering by a novel method of garlanding the photo of the bridegroom. The wife will leave for Singapore shortly to join her husband, on whose direction the marriage was conducted in this manner.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

406
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 29]

THE DOWRY EVIL.

The heart-rending news of the death of three Bengali sisters who, along with a fourth who survived the tragedy, entered into a suicide pact to end their lives with opium in order to save their father the worry of finding heavy dowries for their marriage, came as a terrible shock to the public a few days ago. At the Coroner's inquest was revealed the whole pathetic story of the inability of a father of eleven daughters, five of whom were married, to cope with the demand of heavy dowries made on him for the disposal of the others in marriage. The dowry evil though prevalent all over the country seems to be acute in Bengal. The self-immolation of Snehalata some twenty five years ago has not afforded apparently any relief to the solution of this problem, in spite of the fact that it created a great stir and young men were not wanting who banded themselves together and took pledges to put an end to the practice. The recent tragedy does not seem to have stirred them to make even good resolutions.

In these days of unemployment and economic distress it would be too much to expect young men to forego the dowry and even those who have shown an inclination to do so are prevented by their avaricious parents. The only healthy solution to this problem is a radical change in the outlook of girls who are at present taught to look upon marriage as the be-all and end-all of their existence. Instead of dinning in their ears day-in and day-out the ideal of becoming good wives and mothers, if the parents only took care to educate them and place them in the way of an independent career, much of the tragedy and humiliation of hunting for bridegrooms will disappear.

As customs die hard, our Women's organisations and Social Reform Associations should seriously consider and help in putting down the dowry evil. It is a pity that none of the numerous women's organisations has so far thought this problem worth while taking up. Now that the evil has been glaringly brought to the forefront by the action of these young girls, women's organisations both in Bengal and elsewhere should initiate and carry on a nation-wide propaganda for the abolition of the dowry. They should take pledges from young men and women to abstain from marrying where a dowry was involved. They should establish adult classes for girls and young women, in which teaching, Social service and nursing, more or less on the same lines as in the Poona Seva Sadan, is imparted, thus enabling them to stand on their own legs. The women's organisations could also educate the mothers of girls by holding public meetings and explaining to them that marriage to which they pin their faith so much for their daughters, if not rightly brought about, means only the shifting of the responsibility from their shoulders with a good deal of misery for their girls.

Social Reform Associations can help by issuing posters and leaflets setting out the evils arising from the dowry system in the chief vernaculars and distribute them freely during marriage seasons. The radio and the films are other mediums for combatting the evil.

Public memory is short; and before the ashes of these young bodies are cold, the whole episode will be forgotten. Should we not bestir ourselves and purge our society of this evil?

N. K. AKSHI.

Nehru's Autobiography:—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has almost finished his business in London. He has written an autobiography which will be published at the end of March.

EDUCATED UNEMPLOYMENT.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's elaborate report on unemployment could have been more exhaustive and thorough. He was specially qualified for dealing with the task, and because of his long years of experience as a public man and constructive politician and lawyer, solid proposals in putting down the rising mass of unemployment without further delay, were expected of him. But in his anxiety to prevent further unemployment, he has sacrificed the present for the future. He does not say what the hundreds of thousands of University trained men, both double graduates and graduates as also undergraduates, who form the main danger to society as a whole, are to do. Are they to go about begging from door to door for clerical posts or are the M. A.s and B. A.s to turn washermen and milkmen? Or are they to further spend their money on an uncertain vocational training? The most explosive power barrel which would burst at any moment are the present day unemployed graduates and if they are left to themselves we do not know what would happen in the near future.

Different kinds of unemployment are to be found in our land today. These are only various phases of the general evil of want of work. There is seasonal unemployment among the agricultural population; or unemployment may result from famines and floods. Again the evil is present among soft-handed workers like clerks, peons and others attached to uncertain business concerns, among the hard-handed workers of factories and mills but not so pronounced as in the West; and among cottage workers of several kinds. But all these forms are not so aggressive as middle class unemployment, as relief in some way can be found without much difficulty in those cases. Middle class unemployment cannot be solved so easily because of the innate hardships associated with it. The position of the middle class itself in this as well as other capitalistic countries is very trying. They have not the means to live comfortable and happy lives; at the same time social prestige stands in the way of their taking to menial and low class occupations where competition would highly develop if the ranks of those seeking them are flooded. Neither are the middle class physically qualified for such a kind of work. Hence the problem amongst them can only be hostile to the country.

It is this middle class that has produced the vast number of educated unemployed men. The graduate of a rich family can at least live even if he fails to secure a suitable post—and in most cases he manages to know of something lucrative either by influence or otherwise. The moneyless graduate alone is eventually left to wander in streets in search of jobs. Weak, emaciated in frame and mind, houseless, penniless and clothesless he enjoys a vengeful nemesis, the reaction for having enriched a University! Many exploit life in one way or other. He is ready to be submissive as a dog for a meal a day. If some wealthy business manager takes pity on him he extracts fourteen hours of work from him by asking him to sit before the type writer or sit adding and subtracting in violation of all human sympathy and mercy, and then leaves him to his woes. If he is talented in any way, good-bye to all his talents. How can they display themselves when the craving for food is so pressing?

What is the remedy? The one clear remedy for him which will end all his miseries is suicide. We have had so many applications of this curative by young men that it is not an absolutely hopeless one. Often we hear of desperate cases. But all men are not so adventurous as to put a premature end to their

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

407

lives. They drag on a wretched existence in spite of lack of food, clothing and housing, not to say of comfort. Their ranks are swelling day by day and if serious calamities are to be averted the Government should take immediate steps to relieve the swollen ranks. Not only men, but women too aggravate the situation. Let the women of India understand, and take this as a solemn warning that they are perpetrating the greatest crimes of their lives, against man, against society and against country when they are allowing their daughters to enter the portals of the University Colleges. They may wish for education, for equality with men, for the right of vote, their essential rights as human beings, but they cannot and should not displace men from their posts so long as the country is not fit to receive them, so long as no suitable provisions could be made for these educated unemployed and so long as the country has not adapted itself to the changed conditions. So many educated girls have not secured any job; no body would marry them for they are clamorous, and present-day husbands, excepting a microscopic minority, do not want their wives to revolt at each and every step of their domestic lives, so that their position is worse than men's. Let them realise this and pause where men have failed to stop.

We of India believe too much in Government, but that is because, individually and collectively, we are powerless. Therefore, the prime responsibility of coping with the situation rests with our rulers who, if they fail to take a decisive step may have to rue their lack of foresight, for the situation is so dangerous. Sir Tej's recommendations such as limiting general education, vocational training, making Universities the laboratories of industry, raising primary schools, are, whatsoever their merits or demerits be, for the future only. The Government alone can relieve the tension and they will have to find out new methods to satisfy the hunger of the present army of middle class educated unemployed men. Really, their task is an immensely hard one but they have to perform it. They could reduce immediately the fabulously high salaries of their officers, to effect economy and increase the number of low paid posts. India wants many more thousands of miles of road and rail; more co-ordinated health and sanitation; propaganda to intensify her agriculture by the use of her own modern manure, and to make her people utilise her own products is required. All these could be done and would be done by young educated men if they get their food. No prolonged training is required for employing them in these various pursuits. Large numbers of them, with the exception of experts and skilled men, could be absorbed if capital programmes are undertaken; and such things as dams, bridges etc., are only long felt wants. The country is in need of large scale industries such as heavy chemicals, motor, ship, locos and aeroplane building; arms manufactures etc., etc. In all these people with general education could easily find employment. We hope, the Governments, Central and Provincial, would start various programmes without regrettable delay. The large number of posts, now reserved for Europeans, should be offered to Indians not only in the Government but also in the railways, shipping, plantations and other big firms. All the latter must be compelled to take in more of the educated youths than at present. These are the easiest ways of averting revolutions and armed outrages as in Bengal, more feasible and much better than other measures. Ways can be found if the will is there and Government must soon bear the responsibility on its own shoulders.

Madras.

V. VENKATACHALAM.

"CONGRESS AND BHARATHA NATYAM".

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir, The credit of driving sex promiscuity into the open to perish, from its agelong shelter under religious and social custom which it enjoyed, certainly belongs to my esteemed friend, Dr. (Mrs.) Muthulakshmi Reddi and as such her apprehension of the evil having a relapse, and that under the aegis of the Congress, deserves sympathetic understanding from all right-minded men and women.

As one who has been watching the trend of progress from the days of the anti-nauch movement started 45 years ago, the concern of the fair Doctor gives rise in my mind to reflections of a most delicate character. Justice requires that the moral evolution to which the reform has in the interval led, deserves to be examined in all its implications and its far-reaching consequences, if we want to arrive at what may be compared to a profit and loss account.

I well remember the time when the agitation of the day against this element of social evil in the nauch, roused public opinion to such a pitch that the custom gradually came to be indulged in the sly with none of the bravado and apparent respectability which it used to claim before. During Holi festival-week every year it was a recognised custom in the Ceded Districts and it must have been the same elsewhere—until 40 years ago for people to indulge in this social amusement in all its hideous effects to the demoralisation of Hindu family life; and I recall to my mind the sight of the leading men of towns and big villages at the week end of the festival, leading the bevy of these fallen dancers in bright coloured saris, attractively decorated with gold and flowers, on a house to house visit to collect subscriptions for them after performance at each place. This has all completely disappeared now. What is more, caste organizations are springing up for uplift from within with the motto of self-help to purge kalavantulu sect of its moral poison; the upheaval is growing in volume and recognizing sanctity of married life with a secret sense of growing communal repentance, for a motive power; all proving a heartening reward to the band of men, of whom you were one, dear Editor, that, heroically raised their voice against the evil custom amidst much ridicule and contempt. This is a negative achievement of no mean order.

On the constructive side what is of a positive character in the shape of a national gain, is the rapidity with which the fine art of music, to begin with, is being rescued from its old objectionable associations and installed on the high pedestal of family life in South India, thanks to pioneers like (Mrs.) Alamelu Jayarama. Iyer and Saraswathi Bai of harikatha fame leading the renaissance. As I write this, we have amidst us just arrived in Penukonda a family brahmin lady musician, Sreemathi Udipi Lakshmi Bai from the Canara country, whose performance this evening made those who attended it feel lifted up to a higher moral and spiritual level.

The change has for long led us to cease to identify the fine art of music with sex evil, and one may say without fear of contradiction that the unmarried woman who is now found here and there to take to music or dance for a vocation takes care not to parade as of old, her art as a snare, even assuming that she is still addicted to her old ways, to tempt unwary men. It may be asserted with equal safety that the moral outlook of the sterner sex has also considerably improved and such of the few who may be weak-minded enough to think otherwise are sure to experience a secret sense of shame in doing so.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

408

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 29

realpatidar.com

Amidst such changed outlook, to associate any unmarried woman who has taken to music or dance for a living, with moral delinquency will be quite out of tune with the growing trend of wholesome public opinion. In the altered circumstances, it would be outrageous even to think of a woman badly, simply because she has taken to Bharatha Natyam for an accomplishment or vocation as a fine art. It is this sense of chivalry if not justice that is perhaps responsible for the Congress movement not to start with the presumption that any woman singer or dancer is necessarily leading an evil life. Its attitude, therefore, may be a wholesome source of encouragement to such of the women who may be still walking in secret in the old ways, making them retrace their steps.

It is no longer possible nor is it necessary to penalise a woman simply because she sings or dances and if there happen to be among such some addicted to loose morals they need not be taken notice of any more than we do men in various walks of life found in similar positions.

With the growing advance of the cinemas and talkies, music and dance are bound to prove a new source of employment for both sexes and if these new conditions portend a moral danger, society has to devise new ways and means to combat the evil.

'There is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance.' Is it a wonder if the Congress is actuated by a sentiment like this towards women performers coming under its influence?

Penukonda
(Anantapur Dt.)
16th February 1936.

T. SIVASANKARAM.

RAMAKRISHNA CENTENARY MESSAGE.

The President of the Ramakrishna Math and Mission has issued the following message on the eve of the Centenary: "The dawn of the New Age is breaking over the World—the Blessed day is at hand that will illumine our hearts with the glory of its effulgence.

"Knowingly and unknowingly man is moving forward along the road of salvation inspired by the Master's message of the harmony of all religions and by his unique realisation of the essential oneness of Karma (Action), Jnana (Knowledge), Bhakti (Supreme Devotion), and Yoga (Psychic Control). The day is not far off when all lands and seas shall witness the establishment of a universal kingdom of peace and when in loving response to the call of the Master, all nations and peoples, in one glorious confederation joining, shall sing with jubilant acclaim, yea, with no heat of strife and no passion of controversy, the Master's message—"As many faiths, so many paths." Then the full meridian light of the Master's advent will light up this world of ours and that song will ring from end to end, and the sons and daughters of men, will stand side by side under the banner of the New Age in Spiritual Comradeship.

Many of the citizens of the world on this blessed day, understand the meaning of the Master's Coming. This and this alone is my fervent prayer.

Peace, Peace, Peace unto all.

Hindu Temple in London:—The Gaudiya Mission have taken up the task of constructing for the first time a Vishnu temple in a respectable quarter of the city of London, for which purpose they have invited a suitable design with elevation plan and rough sketch of sections to be drawn by engineers and architects interested in the line. The designer of the approved plan will be awarded a gold medal.

EVOLUTION OF CONGRESS POLICY.*

(By S. G. WARTY.)

MRS. BESANT'S WARNING.

Among other successes gained by the Congress during this period, the modification of the partition of Bengal was the most important. This was partly due to the attitude of non-co-operation maintained by Bengal, even Mr. Surendranath Bannerji refusing to be elected to the Imperial Legislative Council. But Mr. Gokhale also played a most valuable part as a negotiator and Lord Hardinge, the most sympathetic Viceroy since Lord Ripon, did the rest. The South African settlement and Lord Hardinge's despatch of 1911 were other successes of the Congress.

War came, and as India gave her assistance voluntarily, her expectations grew and British politicians also made profuse promises. But now appeared on the scene Mrs. Besant, a most dynamic personality, who with her political insight warned India not to trust wartime promises and go to sleep, but to carry on vigorous agitation. It was she who made India's struggle internationally known, and brought her worldwide influence and connections to bear on the question. It was significant that when she was incarcerated, the Congress Committee, at the suggestion of Mr. Tilak, seriously discussed the starting of passive resistance.

The ill-fated Rowlatt Act passed against all moderate counsels, goaded the Congress to cast all loyalty to the winds and declare an open rebellion. Even then, like the American Olive Branch Petition, the Congress accepted the Montford reforms, but when it was found that the so-called heroes of the Jallianwalla Bagh were not properly punished, but Britishers had raised a fund for their benefit, the breach was complete, and the Congress passed under Mr. Gandhi's controlling influence.

Under Mr. Gandhi's influence the Congress made a complete departure and declared an open rebellion. It was significant, that men like Pandit Motilal Nehru, Mr. C. R. Das, Mr. Vithalbhai Patel, men who were reputed to be very circumspect and practical, willingly joined his banner, having despaired of every other method to bring redress.

The early fathers of the Congress asked for reforms leading to Swaraj which they regarded more or less as a gift from the British. Mr. Tilak regarded it as India's birth right, and Mrs. Besant demanded it on the ground that it was good for the peace of the world. Mr. Gandhi accepted all this and stated further that it was good for England herself to grant it immediately, because he thought that oppression in India was demoralising the British people. Mr. Gandhi was a humanitarian and loved Englishmen as much as he loved Indians.

In Mr. Tilak's time, the movement was not known, outside the country, but Mrs. Besant made it internationally known, and as Mr. Gandhi was a world figure and as his methods were of a novel character, the world began to take greater interest in India's struggle. Gandhi's power of endurance and suffering were also unsurpassed and the masses came to regard him as a saint. Even women were drawn into the movement.

The early fathers of the Congress were more interested in rousing the British conscience and hoped to win by arguments alone, and their methods were sincerely loyal. As regards the extremists under Mr. Tilak their loyalty was make-believe and their methods retaliatory. Mr. Tilak hoped to conquer the British by diplomacy and cunning in which he excelled.

* Concluded from the last issue.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

409

MR. GANDHI AND NON-VIOLENCE.

But Mr. Gandhi thought that the British were past masters in this game and could not be thus conquered. And besides, it would result in a race in rascality, which Mr. Gandhi as an ultra-moralist and a humanitarian abhorred. His ideal was truth and he placed all his cards on the table. The British people could understand Mr. Tilak's methods but Mr. Gandhi's methods were a puzzle to them.

In the non-co-operation movement, passive resistance, boycott of councils, Hindu-Moslem unity and khaddar were the most prominent items in the programme. To tell the masses to break laws was a dangerous experiment as it was bound to result in disturbances, especially when people had yet fully to imbibe the spirit of non-violence.

Similarly a country-wide boycott of councils was not practicable. It was true that, as against the partition of Bengal, it had partly succeeded under Mr. Surendranath, but then it was confined to one province and the franchise then was practically limited to politically-minded people and it was exercised to meet a specific grievance to which every Bengalee was alive. It was due to Mr. Gandhi's personality that the people responded even to the extent they did.

As regards Hindu-Moslem unity, it had been wisely fostered by the Moderates under Mr. Gokhale's fruitful lead, and Mr. Gandhi had nearly succeeded in cementing it by espousing the Khilafat. But the wind was taken out of his sails by the British Governments declaration about Turkey, and the Civil Service also was casting its crafty nets skilfully round. If Mr. Gandhi had a colleague like Mr. Gokhale who was trusted as an intimate friend by all parties and communities, the Hindu-Moslem relations would not have been strained.

It was true that the first non-co-operation movement failed in its main purpose but it brought about an un-paralleled awakening among the masses and raised their self-esteem, and the servile temper and the slave mentality began to disappear. A subject people regained their soul.

Nobody can deny at this date that Mr. Gandhi greatly miscalculated and especially his promise of Swaraj within one year was highly speculative. But, let us remember the very astonishing fact that wise and practical-minded leaders like Pandit Motilal and Mr. Patel fully acquiesced in this programme and evidently thought like Mr. Gandhi.

The birth of the Swaraj party with its Council programme of obstruction, was not first favoured by the Congress, and Mr. Gandhi himself thought that Government would thrive by opposition. But under the incomparable leadership of Pandit Motilal, it achieved signal successes and justified itself and today the Congress had created a Parliamentary Board and even Mr. Gandhi has blessed it.

The Congress movement has now to be considered as a regular war of Indian independence on non-violent lines. There have been and there would be retreats on either side, honourable and hasty, but every time some ground would be gained for India. But growth of parties within the Congress and attacks on it from communal institutions like the Moslem League and the Hindu Mahasabha, are trying to check its influence. At this stage, all non-communal and national-minded parties, especially the Liberals and the Congress, must come closer together. When bad men combine the good must associate.

RELIGION AND RELIGIONS.*

O. KANDASWAMY CHETTY.

It is necessary to make a very important distinction, namely, between Religion and Religions. As the Tamil Poet and Saint, Thayumanavar says, "Religions there are myriads: but Religion there is one." We should distinguish between inward religion and outward religion, between personal religion and communal religion between subjective religion, consisting of spiritual experience, of inward motives and sacred affections, of self-examination and reflection, of contemplation, prayer and communion with God, and objective religion, institutional in character, consisting of Temples, Churches, Mosques, Ceremonies, Festivals, Priesthoods etc., all involving vested interests of one kind or another. The one is personal religion with freedom to change and to develop; the other is corporate religion demanding social conformity. The one is ethical religion and the other is formal and mechanical. The one is thoughtful religion and progressive, the other is unthinking and conservative. The one is fervent and the other is fanatic. The one is a religion of service and self-sacrifice, and the other is a religion of selfish security and salvation. I have thus briefly and rapidly indicated the distinction in broad outline, and expect you to fill in the picture from your own knowledge and experience.

If we will all learn to make this distinction in our lives and teach others to make this distinction too, we shall soon see that what matters in religion and what will go to form our personality and will endure in us for ever, is the religion of the heart and not the religion of the priest. We may then be inclined to join with the poet and say,

"For forms of faith let senseless bigots fight,
He cannot be wrong whose life is in the right."
Only this life is not merely outward life visible to all men but also inward life, based upon a sense of the eternal verities of the Universe, sometimes visible only to God.

If instead of concentrating our attention and wasting our passions upon the externals of our religion whatever religion we may profess, we direct our thoughts to its ethical contents and spiritual suggestions, if we transfer our affections and energies from the outward shell, hard and indigestible, to the softer nutritive kernel within, we shall feel ourselves insensibly drawn in sympathy and mutual appreciation to those who are enjoying similar but not exactly the same kind of satisfying nutrition from other religions than our own. Then we shall feel no antagonism or sense of separateness from them. We may have different views of things from them, we may not see eye to eye with them in all things, we may differ from them even in our view of life as a whole, of Man and Nature, of God and the Universe, but shall respect them and feel no bitterness or suspicion or strangeness towards them. We would even like to share in their spiritual experience and thus widen our outlook and enlarge our sympathies and enrich ourselves in the inmost parts of our being. For instance, would you expect a foremost Protestant preacher of America confessing himself at Rome, at the religious worship of different religions? This is what Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, the minister of the famous Riverside Church in New York city, a beautiful and imposing structure on the banks of the Hudson River,—says in his book,—"Religion as I see it".

It is only over-emphasis on external forms and precise definitions,—over-emphasis on the part of both the protagonist and the antagonist that breeds

* Presidential address Coconada Inter-religious Conference.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com 410

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 29]

a sense of rivalry between different religions. A desire to emphasise and to appropriate and assimilate whatever is good, true and beautiful in any religion, whether own or other, will throw into the shade whatever is unseemly, untrue or evil, and deprive it gradually of its power to influence the lives of people. I do not wish to say that in our study of religions, we should notice only points of agreement and ignore points of difference; but I do say that I would first of all appreciate the points of agreement before dwelling on the points of difference; because the former process helps friendliness and the latter tends to hinder it. For example, I would notice the points of agreement between Islam and Christianity,—and these are many—before I see how they differ from each other. Similarly I would find out the points of agreement between Islam and Hinduism in any of its phases—and these points of agreement are not a few and not unimportant—before I notice how they differ from each other, I would use the points of agreement as a common platform on which I could cultivate fellowship, and use the points of difference as a means of correcting my views or adding to my knowledge. Thus I would go on expanding my knowledge and the range of my appreciation, and widening my sympathies and my area of fellowship by bringing into the circle more and more of these religions.—Christianity, Zoroastrianism, Jainism, Sikhism,—until at least my mental, moral and spiritual equipment, shall in the course of years consist of truths, forms of goodness and features of beauty belonging historically to the different religions with which I am brought into contact in a living way. For it is not a mere academic exercise I would indulge in, nor a mosaic of different religions I would amuse myself with: but a living organic development through experience and assimilation that I would subject myself to. For this kind of sympathetic contact with different religions and their professors cannot but result in the interaction of different elements, and lead to a critical appreciation, a criticism based upon an understanding sympathy and not prompted by any sectarian propaganda.

I can easily imagine persons saying or at least thinking, that this is all too vague and amorphous to be accepted by the followers of different religions in the country. They want something definite to live by: but if what they have is not sufficient to answer the demands of a rapidly changing world and has not helped in securing the unity and the peace which are necessary for progress, it is time that they look within and review the situation and revise their view of life. What India badly needs today is a common religion over and above the particular religions which the people profess and practice. Even as we are most of us a bi-lingual if not a poly-lingual people, with a common language which binds us together and helps us to understand one another and cultivate fellowship and friendship over and above our vernacular language with its hoary literature and sacred associations, we require a common body of religious beliefs and attitudes and social practices resulting therefrom which, while reacting towards reformation, reconstruction and reconciliation upon the several religions of the country, will bind their professors by a common bond of tolerance, mutual respect, and mutual understanding into a united people working their way towards freedom and a fuller life. This would solve the various communal problems with which we are confronted, besides helping India to take her place as a free member in the world family of free nations. I am convinced that a common religion for India transcending and fulfilling but not necessarily supplanting the various religions of the country, was in the mind and soul of Raja Ram Mohan Roy, fitly called the Father of Modern India. I have often thought that if the Brahmo Samaj movement had gone on developing on the lines of its original insights, without being driven by the hostility of persons from without and from within the country into a self-protecting cave instead of spreading and leavening the religious, social and political life of the whole country, the inter-communal tensions and frictions which mark the life of the people to-day would not have appeared at all. But it is not yet too late to go back to the religious and inter-religious spirit which animated Raja Ram Mohan Roy and successors: Devandra Nath Tagore, Keshub Chandra Sen and Mahadev Govind Ranade, and is still preserved for us and for the world by Rabindranath.

UNTOUCHABILITY AND CONVERSION.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Dr. Ambedkar declared at the Yeola Conference that the untouchables will get their grievances redressed only if they abandon Hindu religion and become converts to some other religion. This affirmation and declaration by an educated man like Dr. Ambedkar has attracted the attention of many people in India, as it is a question of vital importance, affecting a population of about 7 crores of people in this country. It, of course, appears to be a big move on the part Dr. Ambedkar, and, therefore, one does not restrain oneself giving vent to one's thought that it is a blind leap beyond the scope of the ignorant masses and at the same time a move which does not warrant any social benefit or elevation even after conversion to another religion. So far as religion is concerned, it is dear to the untouchable and caste Hindu alike and the idea of change of religion for the emancipation of the untouchables will be certainly revolting to even a reformed untouchable; while the uneducated masses living in villages will not at all be agreeable to this way of improving their status. Hindu women are deeply religious, they will not easily submit to this change of religion; if some class deserves credit for clinging to religion and for upholding the same, it is due to the women-folk in India, who deserve the highest credit in the matter. Dr. Ambedkar expects and is over-confident that within a period of 7 or 8 years, there will be complete conversion amongst the untouchables and by this drastic method, their grievances will be redressed without looking to the sympathy and help of the caste Hindus.

History for the last 25 years shows that the untouchables are on their way to social uplift. Are the caste Hindus not trying their best to remove this social sin? Is not the young generation trying its level best to give the untouchables their ordinary rights and equality in society even at the cost of their being upbraided by the Sanatanists? Is not the Hindu Mahasabha trying for the removal of untouchability and has it not passed resolutions supported by no less a person than His Holiness Dr. Kurtkoti of Karvir Peth in its recent sitting at Poona for the elevation and uplift of the untouchables? The efforts of the Hindu Mahasabha are really splendid and the work of Mahatma Gandhi is too noble to be appreciated by the ordinary people. He has been striving hard for the uplift of the untouchables for many years.

The untouchables will completely lose the affection and sympathy of the caste Hindus if the former are converted. Untouchability will be removed by

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

411

the co-operation of the caste Hindus, who alone will destroy the curse on the society. The Hindus will not be so cruel to the untouchables as to drive away a big section from their religion and the present move of Dr. Ambedkar is totally un-called for.

If we observe the sub-castes and differences existing among the untouchables themselves, we find that there exists the same evil of untouchability among them, and unless the untouchables show a united front the prospect for the total removal of untouchability is remote. Though inter-dining is practised between untouchables and caste Hindus in some places, still among the different sections of the untouchables themselves we find such amenity does not exist. Such being the case how can any one remove the general untouchability without the removal of the untouchability existing amongst the untouchables themselves? The disease should be cured at its root and it should not be cut superficially by allowing the root to grow again. Education will alone remove the prejudice among the untouchables and Government and the public are both trying hard for spreading education among them. It will thus be seen that in the near future the desired end will be achieved.

Satara
18, February 1936. } R. D. PATANKAR

ITALY AND COLONIAL POSSESSIONS.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your leading article last week you quote the Italian propagandist's figures showing that, out of the ex-enemy possessions in Africa, Italy was given only a much smaller area of land than she apparently expected or had been promised by England and France.

Considering that Italy joined the Allies only two years after their declaration of war against Germany, she was not unfairly rewarded with 80,000 square kilometers of land with 70,000 inhabitants for her exploitation.

The Americans, who claimed that they brought victory to the allied arms, and complained that they were ill-rewarded for their sacrifice, received the following reply from the late Mr. Kipling:—

"At the eleventh hour he came,
But his wages were the same
As ours who all day long had trod
The winepress of the wrath of God.
"Since his back had felt no load,
Virtue in him still abode;
So he swiftly made his own
Those lost spoils he had not won."

This the Americans compared to the German hymn:

"French and Russian they matter not,
A blow for blow and a shot for a shot,
We love them not, we hate them not,
We hold the Wechsel and Volga's gate,
We have but one and only hate,
We love as one, we hate as one,
We have one foe and one alone—England."

I give below the dates on which the various countries declared war on Germany.

Russia, August 1st, 1914.
France, August 3rd, 1914.
Belgium, August 3rd, 1914.
England, August 4th, 1914.
Serbia, August 6th, 1914.
Montenegro, August 9th, 1914.
Japan, August 23rd, 1914.
Portugal, March 9th, 1916.

Italy, August 28th, 1916.
Rumania, August 28th, 1916
America, April 9th, 1917.
Cuba, April 7th, 1917.
Panama, April 10th, 1917.
Greece, June 29th, 1917.
Siam, July 22nd, 1917.
Liberia, August 4th, 1917.
China, August 14th, 1917.
Brazil, October 26th, 1917.
Guatemala, April 23rd, 1918.
Hayti, July 15th, 1918.
Honduras, July 22nd, 1918.

The following countries broke off diplomatic relations with Germany:

Bolivia, Nicaragua, Santo Domingo, Costa Rica, Peru, Uruguay and Ecuador.

The world will soon know how these same countries will array against one another in the forthcoming European war for the re-distribution of non-European possessions.

Sylvan, Coonoor, } Yours, etc.,
19th February 1936. } M. G. JOSEPH,

THE AGA KHAN ON MUSLIM POLICY.

To define the attitude which Indian Moslems should adopt regarding future Indian politics, a large number of Moslem leaders met under the chairmanship of H. H. the Aga Khan in New Delhi on the 15th February.

Those present included Sir Fazli-Hussain, Nawab of Chhatari, Sir A. H. Ghuznavi, Sir Feroze Khan Noon, Sir Mehr Shah, Sir G. H. Hidayatullah, Sir Mahomed Yakub, Sir Shafaat Ahmed Khan, Abdul Qadir of Badaun, Haji Rahim Baksh Sahabi, Mushir Hussain Kidwani, Mr. Shafi Daudi, the Hon'ble Abdul Hafiz, the Hon'ble Mr. Mahomed Suhrawardy, Capt. Sher Mahomed Khan Mr. Nauman, Sir Yamin Khan, Nawab Jamshed Ali, Hon'ble Mr. Mahomed Padsha Sahib, Mr. Abdullah Haroon, Nawab Mahomed Hayat Khan, Raja of Salimpur, Dr. Ziauddin, Messrs. Allabaksh Tiwana, Azhar Ali Raja Ghaznafar Ali, Mir Maqbool Rashid Ahmed, S. M. Abdullah, Maulana Shaikat Ali, Abdul Matin Chaudhuri, Haji Sattar Essak Sait, Badrul Hassain, Khurshed Ali and Mazruddin.

H. H. the Aga Khan took the chair amidst cheers. He read out a statement which was frequently punctuated with applause.

H. H. the Aga Khan said:—The first half of the nineteenth century saw the sovereignty of India pass out of Moslem hands into the British hands. The responsibility for the events of 1857 was laid at the door of Moslems, and this made the thoughtful section among them to think of their future position in India. It took Indian Moslems quarter of a century to make up their minds, and the result was that of the great Sir Syed Ahmad Khan of Aligarh's policy of concentrating on education and avoiding political agitation of an acute kind. A few Moslems joined the Indian National Congress, but the community as a whole stood apart.

"As a reaction to twenty years of inactivity, the All-India Moslem League came into being in 1906 and the co-operation between the Congress and the League culminated in their agreement in 1916 which was the basis of the Montford Reforms. Thus in the first decade of the 20th century, Moslem India reconsidered its policy, and in the second decade, formulated a new one. Had it not been for the World War, things may have been different, but the problem of political advance was pressing and Indian Moslems decided that, despite being a minority in India, they will not stand in the way of their Motherland placing before itself the goal of

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

412
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 23]

Self-Government. Indian Moslems realised that most of them were of the same blood as their Hindu brethren, that many of them were of mixed blood and those who had come to India with Moslem invaders had settled down in India for many centuries and had made India their home and had no home outside India, and that they were natives of India just as their Hindu brethren were natives of India. The mere fact that they professed a religion which was professed by the inhabitants of other countries also made no difference. Just as the Afghans would not like Arabian domination and Arabs did not like Turkish domination, there is no occasion for India to doubt the genuine feeling of Indian Moslems for Indian Nationalism. Our cultural and spiritual links with Moslems of other countries do not, and cannot prevent us from following purely national programmes for Self-Government. Having made their choice, they were ready for political advance, and the 1916 agreement between the League and the Congress was the result. Hindu leaders assured Moslem leaders of their religious and cultural integrity and readily agreed to separate representation through separate electorates, and assured Moslem leaders of adequate representation in future as the Moslem community took to politics. Unfortunately, the co-operation did not last long.

ATTITUDE TO REFORMS.

"What would Moslems do in the matter of further reforms? Moslem leaders gave this their most careful consideration and came to the conclusion that they were in a minority and at that, a weak minority. Though the attitude of their powerful sister community had been cold and distant, their patriotism and their sense of self-respect and honour did not permit their going back on their ideal of Self-Government for their country. So they decided to ask for maximum reforms and to this object they adhered all along. They knew Provincial Autonomy in Central Provinces, United Provinces, Bihar and Orissa, Madras, Bombay and Assam would spell ruin for them if worked in a communal spirit, but they hoped that better sense would prevail and all communities would work for the betterment of their Motherland, instead of against each other and in return, they only wanted to have the satisfaction of being a majority community in the Frontier Province, Punjab, Sind and Bengal, knowing full well that their majority in the Punjab and Bengal was only nominal, while in the Frontier Province, on account of its geographical position and economic condition, it was not likely to have much of real Provincial autonomy. Thus the Moslems were not improving their communal position in any way, but still they were for political advance. Why, they were for this political advance solely from national motives. Their objective, therefore, in the matter of representation was to secure such a position as would enable them to have a majority in the Legislature of some of our Provinces. They succeeded in the case of three Provinces, but failed in the case of Bengal.

"In the case of the Central Legislature they retained their proportion to a certain extent, but with the extinction of the official bloc, from the communal point of view they were not going to be as strong in the future as in the past. But here again, their motive for political advance was national, not communal. They failed to secure a clear enunciation of their undoubted rights to adequate representation in the Services in the Provinces, but have been feeling that their case is so strong that no Government claiming to be civilised would be in a position to refuse their just demands. They are not elated by the successes achieved, nor are they too depressed by the failures suffered. Success and failure in life and particularly in political life was inevitable and regardless of them we should go on. India is now entering a new phase of political life. Indian Moslems are ready to take their due share in developing political life in the best interests of the country. The political goal is Dominion Status. They feel India's most pressing needs are externally securing recognition in other countries. Indians are not fairly treated, whether in Dominions or the Colonies. At home, Indians must have economic reorganisation. There is a wide gulf between different sections of Indians—extreme poverty, hunger and nakedness, emaciated and enfeebled body, and ignorance that they are human beings by courtesy only. To add to this economically depressed status, they are intellectually depressed.

"With this denial of divinity in mankind there is a denial of human brotherhood, and we have developed intolerance in matters religious and sectarian. The whole economic, social and religious fabric calls for immediate relief—the uplift of the weak—economically, intellectually and culturally, that there may be left no one to be called downtrodden. Faith is a matter of individual convictions and should not be allowed to create ill-will between the various communities of India. Islam teaches tolerance and the smallest and the humblest should feel that in a self-governing India, his faith and religion would be secure and also his culture.

"I have so far referred to the past. What is the immediate future, which is to be the object of political changes that are coming? What are we to strive for and pledge as a programme to our countrymen? What is the real work to be accomplished? The future programme is the "uplift", personal, spiritual, moral, intellectual and economic, not only of families but also of the poor masses, the needy and the backward. It is this noble work of uplift with which we should concern ourselves irrespective of considerations of caste, colour and creed. This is the prescription which thoughtful Indians prescribe for the betterment of India's position abroad."

Sir Shafaat Ahmed Khan moved the following resolution:—

"This meeting of the Executive Board of the All-India Moslem Conference places on record its grateful thanks to His Highness the Aga Khan for the constructive lead he has given to the community at this juncture in his statement made at this meeting and adopts the policy therein enunciated as an integral part of its programme and appeals to Indian Moslems of all schools of thought to give effect to it."

The above resolution was passed after a large number of speeches were made, paying glowing tributes to the services of the Aga Khan. The question of amalgamating the Moslem League and Moslem Conference was not put forward in view of the Aga Khan's opinion that it should be left over for the decision of Moslems elected to the new Provincial Legislatures.

BENGAL WHIPPING ACT.

A Bill to make certain offences against women punishable with whipping.

Whereas it is expedient to make certain offences against women punishable with whipping,

And whereas the previous sanction of the Governor-General has been obtained under Sub-section (3) of Section 80A of the Government of India Act to the passing of this Act,

It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. (1) This Act may be called the Bengal Whipping Act, 1936.

(2) It extends to the whole of Bengal.

2. Whoever—

(a) being member of an assembly of two or more persons the common object of which is to commit an offence punishable under Section 366 of the Indian Penal Code, abets, commits or attempts to

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1938] realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

413 commit such offence, or

(b) abets, commits or attempts to commit in respect of any female person any offence punishable under section 366A, 366B, 367, 372 or 373 of the said Code; may be punished with whipping in lieu of or in addition to any other punishment to which he may for such abetment, offence or attempt be liable under the said Code.

Section 366 states: "Whoever kidnaps or abducts any woman with intent that she may be compelled, or knowing it to be likely that she will be compelled, to marry any person against her will, or in order that she may be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, or knowing it to be likely that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine."

"And whoever, by means of criminal intimidation as defined in this Code or of abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion, induces any woman to go from any place with intent that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person shall also be punishable as aforesaid."

Section 366A states: "Whoever by any means whatsoever induces any minor girl under the age of eighteen years to go from any place or to do any act with intent that such girl may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine."

Section 366B states: "Whoever imports into British India from any country outside India, any girl under the age of 21 years with intent that she may be, or knowing it to be likely that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person, and whoever with such intent or knowledge imports into British India from any State in India any such girl who has with the like intent or knowledge been imported into India, whether by himself or by any other person, shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine."

Section 367 States: "Whoever kidnaps or abducts any person in order that such person may be subjected, or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being subjected, to grievous hurt or slavery or to the unnatural lust of any person, or knowing it to be likely that such person will be so subjected or disposed of shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine."

Section 372 states:—"Whoever sells, lets to hire, or otherwise disposes of any person under the age of 18 years with intent that such person shall at any age be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose or knowing it to be likely that such person will at any age be employed or used for any such purpose shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine."

Section 378 States: "Whoever buys, hires or otherwise obtains possession of any person under the age of 18 years with intent that such person shall at any age be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose or knowing it to be likely that such person will at any age be employed or used for any such purpose shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine."

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
 Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MNL Agent, Ahmedabad.)
 Sheth Todarmal Chhimanlal Samal Beehar, MNL Agent Baroda.
 Toolsidas Kiliachand Esq., (Kiliachand Devchand & Co. Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda.
 Raj Ratna Bhalilal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M. S. G. I. (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co. Ltd., Baroda.)
 Seth Pransukhlal Ma.atal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)
 Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
 Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Bombay).
 Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager;

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
 Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
 Burma calling at Galle Tutuocoria
 Colombo and other coast ports
 according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

A. N. S.

Sudama House, 81, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 29

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,00,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.
CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE
Central Bank of India, Ltd.
SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT
with us and earn interest on Daily balances
SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. FOCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kalwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panhala)
Paighar (" ")	Kalyan (" ")
Kalyan (" ")	Akluj (District Sholapur)
	Katol (" ")

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhobjee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Sarlaja, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshvaji, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandekar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) --- Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 |
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

415

QUALITY 1.

So-called cheap silk fabrics do let you do want any time and cost you more in the long run because they are made down to a price and not up to a standard.

Leading Stockists.

Mysore Government Silk Weaving Factory fabrics are recognised throughout India for their superior quality, reliability and attractiveness and are guaranteed free from admixture either with artificial silk or foreign yarn.

The choice is in your hands.

Buy Mysore Georgettes, Mysore Crepes and Mysore Satins and have full satisfaction.

Agents:—

The Mysore Products, Princess Street, BOMBAY.

The Mysore Silk Depot, Swadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	20s Annually.
	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
Outside the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	21s. Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,

Phoenix, Natal.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

416

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Feb. 29]

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference was sent to us for circulation in India and they have been sold out. A further supply is expected in about a month and orders can be booked for at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R.-36.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 105 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MARCH 7, 1936. No. 27

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The Late Mrs. Jawharlal Nehru
Bombay Legal Aid Society.
Marriage Temple at Allahabad
Mr. Subhas Bose's Visit to Dublin.
Immigration to U. S. A.
Delimitation Committee's Report.
The Indian Budget
Shahidganj Dispute.
Council of State Elections.
The Next Viceroy.
A Correction.

What Japan Thinks.
The Joint Family System.
Married Women and Employment.
Free Legal Aid for the Poor.
The New Outlook Towards Social Problems.
Inter-Religious Conference.
The Social Service League,
Bombay.
In Defense of Indian Universities.
Subhas Bose in Ireland.

NOTES

The Late Mrs. Jawharlal Nehru:—The news of the death of Kamla Nehru, wife of Pandit Jawharlal Nehru after a prolonged illness at a sanatorium in Switzerland, has called forth country-wide sympathy for the President, designate of the next session of the Indian National Congress. The Nehru family has won for itself an abiding place in the affections of the Indian people by its services and sacrifices in the cause of freedom. Mrs. Jawharlal Nehru fully shared in her husband's political and public activities. The varying phases of her long illness were followed by the public with anxious interest. It appeared that she had benefitted by the climate and treatment in Vienna and Switzerland; and her death, on the eve of the Pandit's departure for India to preside at the Congress, came as a great shock to the Indian public. In Bombay, the principal markets were closed and a crowded public meeting was held to express the citizens' condolences to the Pandit and his family. Similar demonstrations of sorrow and sympathy have been held all over the country. As President of the Congress when the new constitution is about to be inaugurated, the Pandit has a heavy responsibility which has been heightened by the personal sorrow which has befallen him.

Bombay Legal Aid Society:—We print today a summary of the speech made by Mr. B. G. Kher at the public meeting held on Monday under the chairmanship of Sir John Beaumont, Chief Justice of the High Court, to create public interest in the Bombay Legal Aid Society. The Society was started 12 years ago to perform social service rendered imperative by present-day developments. The maxim that every one is assumed to know the law, was, perhaps, true in societies which were governed entirely by customary law. It was partially true so long as the criminal law, which most concerns the poor, ran along the lines of the current moral code and was based on it. But now-a-days, laws are made which have no relation to current ideas of right and wrong. In fact, the law itself recognises a distinction between offences involving moral turpitude and offences which do not involve such turpitude. The average citizen who in this country is, in eight out of ten cases, illiterate, may find himself in trouble without being conscious of having done any thing wrong. If he is found guilty, he is sent to jail. If he is acquitted, his case is even worse. What little money he might have had, is lost in defending himself; and while his brother in prison is assured of his daily meals, the acquitted man is ruined and is left to beg or perhaps to steal. A society to assist such helpless people, is therefore, a necessity and the Bombay Legal Aid Society has a very good record of service to its credit. We strongly support the appeal which was made for public support to it by the Chief Justice and other speakers.

Marriage Temple at Allahabad:—Hindu marriages in South India are cheaply and expeditiously performed in temples. The Tirupati temple is most resorted to for this purpose. A lead, first of its kind as a practical step in socio-religious reforms in the United Provinces, has been given by Baba Girdhari Lal, Advocate of the Allahabad High Court, in the form of opening a Central Marriage Temple of India in Allahabad. The object of the temple is stated to be: "To give effect to the speeches and resolutions of the various religious and social sabhas, societies and conferences to simplify marriage ceremonies, curtail expenditure and abolish unnecessary and improper, expensive and uncivilised customs and practices, so eloquently advocated by many leaders." This is a purely religious and social institution in which the parties to the proposed marriage, if they so desire, can get married any evening within three hours after giving 24 hours' previous notice of the proposed marriage. The wedding party of not more than six persons may arrive at the temple and depart the same evening. The actual marriage including the fees of the officiating high priest and other expenses will not be permitted to exceed Rs. 5. The ceremonies will be those prescribed by the Hindu Law for legality of marriage according to Vedic rites as recognised by the Sanatana Dharma,

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

418

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

{ Mar. 7

Arya Samaj or any other recognised faith of the bride-groom or the bride. The marriage will be duly recognised and witnessed. We trust it will also be registered under the Gour Act.

Mr. Subhas Bose's Visit to Dublin:—It was stated that Mr. Subhas Bose was visiting Ireland in pursuance of the wishes of the late Mr. Vithalbhai Patel who left a legacy to Mr. Bose for utilisation on behalf of the Indian national movement in foreign propaganda, and who had founded an Indo-Irish League when he visited Ireland some years ago. We reprint to-day the account given by the Dublin correspondent of the Amrita Basar Patrika of Calcutta of the reception of the Indian leader in the Irish capital. Mr. De Valera treated Mr. Bose as a sort of ambassador from India and other leaders were also equally cordial. Mr. Bose, it is said, is considering ways in which Indo-Irish trade may be developed. The economic policy which is being pursued by the Free State and to which we made a passing reference in an editorial note (Reformer February 15) has many features of interest to us. The promotion of international understanding and goodwill, is in itself a service to the cause of humanity. Mr. Subhas Bose is gifted with high intellectual qualities and the Irish people, we are sure, will think of this country with greater regard as a result of his visit to them.

Immigration to U. S. A.:—The February number of Current History gives figures relating to immigration into the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935. The number of quota immigrants permissible under the law was 17,291. Only 11 per cent of this number obtained admission. This was not due to stringency of administration of the law but to most of the countries eligible, sending few or no immigrants. There were no immigrants from Afghanistan, Andorra, Ethiopia (which is allotted 100), Liechtenstein, Muscat, Nauru, Nepal, New Guinea, Saudi Arabia, Southwest Africa or Yap. The Irish Free State, with a quota of 17,853, sent only 322 immigrants. This is eloquent proof of the success of the De Valera administration under which £ 6 millions worth of food commodities, which used to be exported, is consumed in the country itself. The largest number of immigrants were from Germany (4,653) and Italy. The German immigrants, no doubt, consisted in large part of Jews. Next after Italy came in order Great Britain, Poland and Austria. Eight Japanese obtained entrance, as did 42 Chinese. It appears from this list that many countries in Asia are on the quota and that Chinese and Japanese, although they are not on the list, are able to secure admission, under a Gentleman's Agreement. There is no reason why Indians should be excluded. The Reciprocity Bill which Mr. Govind Vallabh Pant has drafted for introduction in the Legislative Assembly, will facilitate negotiations with the American Government in securing fair treatment to India. Sir Girja Shanker Bajpai told the Assembly a few days ago that the Government of India have addressed His Majesty's Government regarding the disabilities of Indian merchants in the United States whose merchants enjoy full rights in India. We are sure American self-respect will urge reciprocation of the hospitality which Americans have been long enjoying here.

Delimitation Committee's Report:—The committee appointed by the British Government to define the electorates under the new Indism constitution, have made their report. The Committee consisted of three members, Sir Laurie Hammond, Chairman, and Justices Sir M. Venkatasubba Rao of the Madras High Court and Din Mahommed of the Lahore High Court. In their despatch to the Secretary of State, the Committee express their keen disappointment at not being able to base their recommendation on a uniform plan for all the Provinces because of the differences of opinion which they found prevailing in the different provinces. For instance, on the distinction between rural and urban constituencies, the Bombay and Madras Governments took the view, which is the right one, that the distinction was largely artificial. The Madras Government, indeed, said that there was no question of urban and rural in their province, and that if they had had a free hand they would have recommended the abolition of urban constituencies altogether and would have divided the whole Presidency into territorial constituencies without distinction of rural or urban. The Bombay Government did not go so far but they also maintained that, except a few large towns, the others were merely market towns which did not differ in their characteristics from villages. The Hammond Committee somewhat reluctantly acquiesce in these views so far as Bombay and Madras are concerned and accept the proposals of the local Governments. The only noteworthy change which they have made in the Bombay proposals, is grotesque. The Women's seats assigned to Bombay city, three in number, are to be filled by election by the women voters only of two Wards, Girgaum and Bhuleshwar, though women candidates may live in any part of the Presidency! The reason given for this absurd proposal, as it seems to us, that it will prevent undesirable women from being present at the polls, is ridiculous. There can be no undesirable women without undesirable men, and if the latter are not objected to on account of their morals, the exclusion of women who are mostly their creatures, does not seem to be logical. The Hammond Committee was not appointed to uphold the double standard of morals. Moreover, we are not sure that there are no undesirable women in Girgaum and Bhuleshwar.

The Indian Budget:—The Finance Minister of the Government of India, Sir James Grigg, is able to show a surplus of three crores of rupees while all the provinces are suffering from large deficits. The United Provinces budget shows an excess of 74 lakhs expenditure over revenue. Bengal is 41 lakhs short of her needs, the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

419

Punjab 16 lakhs, Bihar, 11, Central Provinces, 8 lakhs. Bombay just manages to scrape through owing to the 'betterment' resulting from the amputation of Sind. On a broad view, it is plain that the seeming prosperity of the Central Government does not reflect the economic condition of the country but is attained at the expense of the provinces. The Indian Finance Minister's proposals for distributing his surplus are unsatisfactory. The restoration of the minimum limit of income-tax to Rs. 2,000, and the doubling of the weight of letters carried for one anna, will afford relief to classes who stand most in need of relief. But these two items cover only a fifth of the surplus. Nearly twice as much is absorbed by a reduction in the surcharge and supertax on the higher incomes. The reduction of the rates on postcards would not only have afforded relief to the public but would, as last year's experience shows, have increased the revenue of the Post Office. The compliments paid to Sir James Grigg for producing a surplus budget, are unnecessary. Any one can do the trick by starving the country while keeping taxation high. The following from an editorial in the Times of India, is a welcome sign that non-official Anglo-Indian opinion is beginning to view Indian problems from the nationalist standpoint. 'The Secretary of State's pledge about the restoration of the pay of Government servants was one of the worst blows India has received for a long time. The scale of pay in all departments of Government in India is grossly in excess of the country's capacity to pay. Nowhere in the world are posts of all kinds in administration, in education, in transport, in the medical service and elsewhere so highly rewarded as in India. The situation is scandalous. But at this transitional stage in constitutional development it is vital to maintain financial stability. The widest considerations do not make it expedient to throw out Provincial budgets as a mark of indignation. But it would be a good thing if all Provincial Legislatures made it quite clear that as soon as the new constitution is on its feet there will be a demand from all of them for such cuts in the pay of Government servants as are reasonable in relation to the country's capacity to pay.'

Shahidganj Dispute :—Sir Herbert Emerson, the Governor of the Punjab, is entitled to credit for not allowing considerations of prestige to come in the way of supporting the attempts of Mr. M. A. Jinnah to negotiate a friendly settlement of the dispute which has arisen over the demolition of a structure, claimed by Muslims to have been a mosque, within the precincts of the Shahidganj Gurudwara or Sikh temple. The Muslims had started a civil disobedience movement in connection with the dispute and the Punjab Government had interned some leaders and prosecuted others for disobeying their orders. At Mr. Jinnah's suggestion the civil disobedience was given up, and the Government responded with a general amnesty and released all who were interned or imprisoned for connection with civil disobedience. Mr. Jinnah has had friendly talks with Muslim as well as Sikh leaders. He has stated that he found in all with whom he conferred an earnest desire to have the matter amicably settled. The Sikh leaders are willing to agree to any settlement provided it does not affect their religious sentiments with reference to the possession and rights in the Shahidganj area. Muslim leaders seem to be equally insistent on having the mosque restored or at least the sites of it fenced round and kept vacant without any Sikh structure being raised on it. It is obvious that there is not much chance of agreement so long as the dispute is maintained on these premises. On the other hand, it may lead only to further recriminations. Indian Muslims, notwithstanding the distinct injunctions of the Prophet, have not in the past invariably acted in the spirit of toleration to shrines of other religions. The best prospect of agreement lies in all communities realising that they have to live together and that God is not pleased to have His children fight with each other in His name.

Council of State Elections :—There is vigorous canvassing for the forthcoming elections to the Council of State. Voters should insist on candidates undertaking to support social reform measures and particularly to oppose any attempt to repeal or water down the Sarda Act. Mr. Shantidas Askuran who is standing for re-election to one of the Bombay seats, has sent the following assurance to a voter: "I need not assure you that I, being a reformer myself, am for the Sarda Act from the very beginning. It shall be a pleasure and a privilege of mine to associate myself with all the social questions that will crop up before the House." Similar assurances should be taken from other candidates. A determined effort is sure to be made to get the Sarda Act out of the way in the near future.

The Next Viceroy :—The new constitution has few friends in this country. But there is goodwill everywhere to the next Viceroy and the wish that he and his family may have a happy time here, is general. On the part of Lord Linlithgow, what is needed is that he should respect Indian opinion regarding the new scheme and go about his business of administering it without unnecessary insistence on his personal views on the subject. There is another thing. Lord Linlithgow will find that the Indian public expect the Viceroy to say exactly what he means, not to indulge in diplomatic periphrases, and to discard the old idea that Indians love to flatter and be flattered. We are led to make these observations by Reuter's summary of a speech which the Viceroy-designate made at the London Provision Exchange dinner on February 26.

A Correction :—By mischance the figures of the Reserve Fund of the Bank of India was shown in their advertisement in the last week's Reformer as Rs. 1,00,00,000. The right figure as it appears today is Rs. 1,04,00,000.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

420
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 7

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, March 7, 1936.

WHAT JAPAN THINKS.

Japan has her own way of doing things. It is a way peculiarly puzzling to the western mind because it cuts across all its preconceptions. Last week's military rising in Japan which seemed about to overturn everything including the Throne, has subsided as suddenly as it broke out. The Premier, Admiral Okada, whose murder was circumstantially reported, was not murdered after all. He is alive. It seems that his escape was due to his brother-in-law, who bears a resemblance to him, being mistaken for him. Eighteen of the officers concerned in the revolt have been "authorised" to commit harikari and are not to be regarded as criminals. Their family escutcheons will remain untarnished by their crime. They are said to have despatched themselves not with the traditional dagger but with modern revolvers. The War Minister attributed the rising to his own lack of virtue. It should not surprise any one if he also commits harikari to atone for his faults. The delay in suppressing the revolt is explained as having been due to a desire to avoid bloodshed. The result has vindicated the wisdom of this course. The Japanese are going through a process of acute disillusionment. General Araki, who was Minister of War two years ago, told Mr. Chamanlal of the Hindustan Times when he last visited Japan, that they were making great preparations to rebuild Japan on a fresh enlightened and moral basis. Asked as to what he meant by rebuilding Japan, the General replied: "We are reviving the original civilization of Japan and are discarding the evil contamination of the West adopted in great haste. We are discarding what is bad and retaining what is good." The General was regarded by Foreign Governments as a fire-eater but Mr. Chamanlal writes of him that, from his most simple dress, clean shaven head, and simple and polite manners, one would feel that he was more of a sage than a warrior. But all the same, he adds, Araki is the Hitler and Mussolini of Japan today and carries the whole nation behind him, because of his strong military policy. It was stated last week that Araki had set up a military dictatorship. That is what a European in his place would have done. Personality is the core of Western civilisation. But in the East Impersonality is the highest principle. Araki would never think of acting disloyally to the Emperor who is regarded as the head of all Japanese families and as their common ancestor. That Japan is reacting violently against western influence is obvious but her reactions will be shaped by her old traditions which are still very much alive in the hearts of the people.

It is noteworthy that the Japanese Foreign Office alone was not involved in the recent rising. While the other offices and residences of Ministers were surrounded, the Foreign Ministry and Minister, Mr. Koko Hiroto, were left unmolested. Mr. Hiroto has been a strong Minister and his foreign policy is evidently in accord with Japanese sentiments. In an important speech delivered in the Japanese Diet last January, Mr. Hiroto declared that Japan had in view an even greater mission than rebuilding herself. She wished to be helpful to the world at large. She had made herself a great Power by borrowing from the West. "Now," he said, "it is time for us, I believe, to try to introduce our arts and culture to other lands and thus contribute towards international good understanding, to the enrichment of world civilization, and to the promotion of the peace and happiness of mankind." The white man, in fairness to him, should no longer be left to shoulder his burden alone. Immediately, the objectives of the Japanese Government, according to the Foreign Minister, are three: suppression of communist activities for the stabilisation of East Asia and of the world; early diplomatic recognition by China of Manchukuo; and basic readjustment of Sino-Japanese relations and her effective collaboration with Japan. The Foreign Minister informed the Diet—we do not seem to have heard of this through Reuter's Agency in this country—that the Chinese Government had not only indicated its concurrence with these views but had recently proposed to open negotiations on Sino-Japanese rapprochement. Mr. Hiroto added that the Japanese Government sincerely hoped to smooth the progress of the newly established Commonwealth of the Philippines. The prospect of an early settlement with China of all outstanding questions, was indicated also by the Commander-in-Chief of the Japanese Navy at about the same time. Vice Admiral Kenkichi Takashahi said: "It is likely that Japan's economic advance in Manchukuo will soon reach its limits, and, therefore, the Empire's future commercial expansion must be directed to Southern Seas, with Formosa or the mandated islands of the Equatorial Pacific as bases." Whatever view may take of the significance of these observations of responsible Japanese authorities, it does not lie in the mouths of other Powers to condemn Japan.

This was the gist of some addresses (published as a book) delivered by the Japanese Ambassador to the United States Mr. Hiroshi Saito, and the Unity, edited by Dr. John Haynes Holmes, has the fairness to admit that the Ambassador's argument is unanswerable, except by America and other nations overhauling their own economic and general policies. "There is no need for suspicion of Japanese policies," Mr. Saito told the Woman's Club at Richmond last year. "They are based on facts. I venture to say that the policies of no other rational people similarly situated would be very different from ours. They are the result of existing conditions. We must exist and we must be secure. We must not menace others

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

421 and we want to no menace to ourselves. These are the fundamentals of our national policies." How does this differ essentially from British Ministers' oft-repeated declaration that, while they are all for peace and disarmament, they can not in the existing conditions avoid strengthening the Defence Forces of the Empire? At Birmingham last week Sir Austen Chamberlain who, thought not a Minister, seems to enjoy nowadays an authority before which Ministers quail, emphasised that Britain had no warlike ambitions but there were portents which she could not neglect. He declared that he was never an alarmist but in the face of a world which was rearming, his view was that it was not safe for Britain to neglect her defences any longer. Unity takes the same view as we did of Japan's right to naval parity. It writes: "Japan's desire to see navies reduced, disarmament achieved, is predicated on her determination to have security. And her experience is that she knows she can not trust the so-called Christian nations. They have attacked her shores so often for her to feel safe, unless she has an equal navy. Let us equalize our navies and then scrap them all".

THE JOINT FAMILY SYSTEM.*

I have received your printed letter No. 775/160/35-36 dated 27th inst. soliciting opinion on a questionnaire re: Joint Hindu Family System.

While I am of opinion that the disabilities of Hindu women in a joint family should be removed by placing them in the same position as male members, as has been done in Baroda in regard to succession and in the Bombay Presidency by the recent Privy Council decision enabling a Hindu widow to adopt a son independently of the permission of coparceners, I feel strongly that the institution with suitable adaptations should be of great value in modern India. One of the needs of the time is a supply of public workers who, in the nature of things, must be relieved more or less from the necessity of earning their own livelihood. A joint family is a convenient means by which this can be done. Several public workers would not have been able to devote themselves to such work but for the help and support given to them by their uncles, brothers and other relatives.

There is an even more important aspect of the question. We have been able to do in this country to-day without a poor law and several other measures of relief now in force in the West owing to the joint family and the caste system undertaking the responsibility of looking after their own aged, feeble and destitute members. This responsibility has been tending to weaken. Nevertheless, it still exists and I am strongly of opinion that if the joint family is to be abolished by legislation, it cannot be before the State is prepared to undertake these responsibilities as is being done in Western countries.

In connection with this I will call your attention to the observations made by Prof. Wadia in a paper on "Parsis of Bombay and Parsi Charities" part of which is reprinted in the current issue of the Reformer (Nov. 30, 1935). Prof. Wadia says that the Parsi Community is handicapped in competition with the Hindu communities, owing to its having discarded the co-operative joint family system which still continues among its neighbours and that this is one of the main reasons why the number of individuals and families who depend upon Parsi charity funds has steadily tended to increase during the last 20 years.

I will also call your attention to an extract in the Indian Social Reformer of the 23rd November headed "The present Tendencies in the Japanese Family." You will find therefrom that the Japanese family system is in essentials the same as ours and that even the joint family still survives. Nevertheless, Japan has become one of the great powers of the world, thus disproving the assumption that the backwardness of India is primarily due to our family and caste system. The whole question requires to be considered carefully in the light of contemporary social evolution which has departed to a startling extent from some of our nineteenth century preconceptions.

MARRIED WOMEN AND EMPLOYMENT.

The question of married women and employment cropped up for discussion some time ago in the Bombay Corporation, in spite of that body having only recently declared itself for the principle that marriage should not be a bar to Municipal service. A doubt arose because the Municipal Commissioner, in contravention of the principle, did not allow an extension of service to a married woman doctor employed in the Corporation. From the report which appeared in the press, it was amusing to read the solicitude exhibited by the Commissioner that the lady concerned should not neglect her wifely duties. One would have thought that it was the lady's business to determine whether she would devote herself solely to marital duties or continue in her employment. Since she had chosen the latter course, there was no rational ground for not retaining her services unless she was found incompetent. Subconsciously, the Commissioner seems to have been influenced by conditions obtaining in his home country and parts of Europe, rather than by those existing here. In the two countries on the Continent where Dictatorships prevail, women's position and status have been adversely affected; they have been forced back to their home to fulfil their duties as wives and mothers and employment has become the monopoly of men. In England, though we read of stray cases of married women ousted from their jobs in order to make room for unemployed men, no movement is on foot for that purpose. In citing the example of the above countries the excess of women over men should be taken into account, which compels many of the former to earn their own livelihood.

Now, in this country where literacy of women is hardly two percent and the percentage of women professionally trained is still lower, it is a distinct loss to the community if their training is not put to use. Hence it is not surprising that, in rural and backward places, marriage, far from being a bar to women in service, has been even a recommendation. Instances are not wanting of married couples being employed in educational and other institutions, the women occupying posts as heads, while the men are employed in one or other subordinate capacity in the same institutions. The inclination among the educated women themselves is to drop out of their occupation once they are married. The few who stick to their jobs do so actuated by the desire either to be useful to the community or to supplement the income of their "bread-winners." I have noticed in the North that a trained nurse, wife of a Tanga driver, makes a larger contribution to the family income than the fares collected by the husband, and, that too, with the handicap of a burka which she had

*Copy of the Editor's letter to the Legal Remembrancer to the Government of Baroda.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 7

to put on every time she went on a professional call. Her husband, illiterate as he was, never objected to the wife earning. Instances like this are many.

It is generally found that the lower the strata of society, the greater is the recognition that women should work. In fields, in mines, in factories, women take their equal share of work with their men. Why not the same thing happen among the educated classes? With few openings for educated men and women, and the professions overcrowded, the competition for available jobs is very keen. This is especially so in cities. Though there is no opposition from men to women taking up employment when it is an economic necessity for them, there persists the feeling that married women need not join in the general hunt for work. With more women entering the professions, the tendency seems to be to eliminate more and more the married women from employment as her economic position is better than that of her unmarried sister and as her added responsibilities require more of her attention. But as things are at present, the altruistic motive of giving up one's job for the jobless, does not find favour with economically better situated women. On the contrary, there are to be found many middle-aged and elderly women with families of children and grand children occupying important positions in institutions which would benefit a great deal by the infusion of new spirit and modern ideas. This can only be done if the older women are replaced by younger, energetic and more competent women.

For those married women who do not find outlets for their intellectual attainments in domestic work and care of families, it may be suggested that the vast field of social and welfare work affords ample opportunities for them. Our women have still to realise that pleasure and profit can be derived to a degree which salaried employment cannot give by rendering service to others. A lady who figures prominently in the social, medical and welfare work of her province once bitterly complained that, though there were a number of women graduates in her part of the country she could not get them to interest themselves and much less help her in the numerous activities in which she was engaged. "Soon after their graduation, the girls are anxious to secure jobs," said another woman leader. It is but natural that economic independence should have an attraction for women, whether married or unmarried, after centuries of dependence on others, which has been their lot. In order to make this independence widespread, our women should undertake to enlighten and raise their sisters to the level to which they themselves have risen.

Among educated women very few have entered public life. They can do much useful work by entering municipalities and local boards where the opportunities of supervising and improving the standard of primary education and physical culture of the boys and girls, are plentiful. Women's powers of organisation have enabled them to achieve great things in the world—in England their political freedom and in Soviet Russia the citizenship of free and full standing in the State in addition to their recognition as independent economic entities.

Unwise Officials:—The Dnyanodaya, the well-known Christian missionary organ, writes: "How unwise some Government officials can be was illustrated in another happening of last week, when the semi-official volume, India In 1933-34, was published containing unfortunate aspersions on Indian politicians. That this kind of thing must cease if India and Britain are to remain united, was shown by many angry Indian comments."

FREE LEGAL AID FOR THE POOR. *

(B. G. KHER.)

The history of the origin and growth of the Legal Aid movement is extremely interesting. Just 60 years ago, i. e., on the 8th March 1876, a few Germans met in the office of a lawyer in New York and decided to form an organisation to render free legal aid to German immigrants who were in those days being exploited by dishonest employers, boarding-house keepers and others owing to their poverty and ignorance. In course of time, the value of its work and the sound instincts which had prompted it, enabled this small Society to become one of the largest organisations in New York rendering assistance to all poor persons unable to obtain justice owing to lack of means—not confining its activities to the poor and helpless of any particular nationality but extending them to all alike. To-day, each large town in America (and several countries in Europe) has its Legal Aid Society. Thousands of poor and helpless people take advantage of its beneficent activities. Millions of dollars have been recovered by Legal Aid lawyers for the poor and helpless and a considerable amount of misery and heart-burning have been relieved by their efforts.

It is a great pity that Legal Aid work has not yet obtained in this country the recognition which it deserves as a highly important and useful branch of social service activities. Thus, for example, while we find a ready response to appeals for free medical aid for the poor, a similar appeal on behalf of Legal Aid falls on deaf ears. We have just heard from the President of the Bombay Legal Aid Society what splendid work it has done during the past ten years. It must, however, be admitted that our progress has not been as swift nor the extent of our operations as great as our cause entitles us to expect.

The reasons are two-fold. (1) First: There is considerable misapprehension in the minds not only of laymen but also of lawyers as to the meaning of Legal Aid, the kind of suffering a Legal Aid Society seeks to relieve and its proper functions. Very often, when I requested members of the Bar in some District to start a Legal Aid Society in their town, the reply made was "O! but we do not charge the same fees to all clients and when we have a client who is too poor to pay our fees, we do not always refuse him: we do his work without charging any fees—there is no need for a Legal Aid Society in our District." Now a little thought should reveal the fundamental difference between individual members of the Bar working for poor people without charging fees as a favour and an organised Society rendering free legal aid to all deserving poor people who are unable to secure justice owing to lack of means. Moreover, conducting cases in Court without any fees is not all that is expected of a Legal Aid Society. In fact that is only one out of the many functions which it is meant to discharge. It may perhaps be worth-while, therefore, to deal with this subject at greater length.

In theory, the law is the same for rich and poor alike. Equality before the law is the only basis on which a democracy can safely be founded and the equal protection of the laws is the sole guarantee of the individual's right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. But unfortunately, these ideas of social justice do not work themselves out in practice.

The function of a Legal Aid Society is to do in an organised way what has heretofore been done privately by many members of the Bar in their own offices. Organized attempt makes the work more efficient and there is no sense of obligation or embar-

*Speech at the public meeting held on Monday on behalf of the Bombay Legal Aid Society.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1938 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

423

ressment on the part of the Legal Aid client. Legal Aid work supplements and does not compete with the work of the Bar. So, no cases are received, where the applicant can afford to pay a fee to lawyers. Our laws have recognized the duty of providing free legal aid to the poor by making provision for pauper petitions, but practical experience has shown that in this country at any rate, there are many, who are too ignorant and too poor to avail themselves even of this facility, unless guided by somebody. Besides, there is a very large amount of work outside the Courts, which a Legal Aid Society has to do and the pauper procedure takes no count of this. Far from encouraging or increasing resort to the Law Courts, a Legal Aid Society avoids hasty resort to the Law Courts by conciliation, arbitration, persuasion and proper advice. Having thus given an outline of the functions of a Legal Aid Society, let us see how it works and whom it is intended to help.

A Legal Aid Society helps the poor applicant i. e., one who has no income or whose income is just sufficient to maintain himself but insufficient to meet extraordinary demands. As soon as such a person comes to the office of the Legal Aid Society, he is asked to give particulars regarding his own name, age, etc., as also those of the person against whom legal aid is required, particulars of his income and those who are dependent on him, the name of the person who referred him to the Society and the other details of his case. His application is then referred to a Committee which carefully considers whether he has a just grievance remediable by law. This, sometimes, necessitates repeated interviews and discussions. The Committee also considers the ethical aspect of the case, the means of the applicant, his chances of success in a Court and numerous other practical questions. If it is decided to admit the application, a letter is usually sent to the opponent stating the claim, a member of the Committee interviews him if advisable and in a large number of cases, recourse to Law Courts is found unnecessary. The applicant gets proper advice as to his own rights and the rights of his opponent, the opponent knows that the applicant is not so helpless as he believed, and in a number of cases, a satisfactory solution of the dispute is arrived at by negotiations. If this fails, then the Courts have to be resorted to.

I shall now turn to the other reason, why our Society in Bombay has not made greater progress. In most of the American Legal Aid Societies, the rule is to retain a commission of 10 per cent on all collections of five dollars or over. A retaining fee of 10 cents is also charged for each case and in cases, where any drafting of documents or appearance is necessary, a further fee of 15 cents is usually charged. In deserving cases, this small payment is no doubt waived, but small as the sum appears to be, as the recoveries made by the Society on behalf of applicants are fairly large, its funds are always receiving an income. In Bombay, for our expenses, we have to rely merely on the small annual subscription of members, who also render personal services to the Society as volunteers. We have, therefore, no separate office, or paid Secretary, or staff to assist and no regular organisation devoted solely to the furtherance of this movement. We are, therefore, handicapped to a certain extent for want of proper machinery to accelerate our pace.

I would take this occasion to draw attention to another of our disabilities. Even if a Legal Aid client succeeds in an action in Court and costs are awarded to him, he is unable to recover them from his opponent, as he has been given legal aid under an agreement that the services are rendered free of cost.

If our Society were allowed to recover and retain the amount of costs awarded to a successful Legal Aid client, we will soon be in possession of sufficient funds to extend our organisation and render more efficient service.

It will not be disputed that the work is very noble. We must bring it to the notice of those to whom movements for social welfare make an appeal. Already, the Courts and Judicial Officers in Bombay recognised the utility of our work and frequently applications made to them by people in distress for legal aid are referred by them to the Legal Aid Society. If it were generally known what an amount of suffering is relieved by the mere knowledge that there is some one to turn to for help even when you have not got a pie in your pocket, no Legal Aid Society would lack for funds to carry on its good work. "I've heard of hearts unkind, kind deeds with coldness still returning; but the gratitude of men, hath oftener left me mourning," is the frequent experience of a legal aid worker.

There is another aspect of the movement which I would like to emphasise, particularly so far as lawyers are concerned. Nobody loves a lawyer. He is generally considered to be a selfish member of society, if not an unworthy pest in it. One need not point out how mistaken this view is. One must remember that just as a soldier is necessary to defend the country against unlawful aggression from outside and a policeman to keep peace and order within it, so is a lawyer necessary to society to uphold the cause of justice between man and man. It is his province to help the weak and the oppressed, to obtain justice as against the strong and the oppressors—regardless of whether the former can pay for it or not. It is pre-eminently the business of the lawyer to make justice available even to those who are without means to obtain it. The stigma which, rightly or wrongly, attaches to the profession of a lawyer and the charge of selfishness laid at his door, will be at least partially removed if lawyers organize a movement such as the Legal Aid Society. Thus even if all other noble considerations are left out, from the purely selfish point of view also, lawyers would be well advised to organise and carry on this movement vigorously.

I would, however, personally prefer to appeal to the nobler side of human nature, which prompts us to assist the poor and distressed—regardless of any thought of return. We must place before us the high and noble ideal of making justice not only equal but free to all. The lawyer must work and prove his usefulness to society not merely because it brings him a pecuniary recompense but because looked at from a proper point of view, there can be no profession or calling which can be deemed more honourable than that of upholding the noble cause of justice, of defending the poor against the oppression of the mighty, of restoring peace and harmony where strife and bitterness prevail—these in brief are the high ideals actuating the Legal Aid Movement.

Rural Uplift Grant for the Punjab:—

The Department of Public Health, Punjab, has been allotted a sum of Rs. 2,44,151 out of the grant of Rs. 8½ lakhs, which the Government of India has placed at the disposal of the Punjab Government for the promotion of rural uplift work in the province, says the Director, Public Information, Punjab. The Department has taken in hand three different items of public utility programme, comprising sanitary improvements in 81 villages of Gujarat district, provision of bored-hole latrines in Gurdaspur district, and the supply of wholesome drinking water to seven important rural centres.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

424

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 7

realpatidar.com

THE NEW OUTLOOK TOWARDS SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

"The first thing that we have got to impress on the public is the extreme complexity of all social problems. When men and women come and tell me that they know the right way to act in any of these grave social matters, I anticipate either the inspiration of genius or the rashness of folly." Karl Pearson.

It is a cardinal feature of this age that the centre of gravity of the world of controversies has definitely shifted from theological abstractions to social problems. All over the world diverse social problems are being hotly discussed, great scientists and social thinkers are in search of adequate remedies that will mitigate the social crisis. In America persons like Ben Lindsey have been baffled out of their wits at the ghastly figures of the divorce-rate, and the problem of the mulatto. In France people are scared away by the population problem, the decrease in birth-rate and the enormous use of contraceptives. In England the population is almost stationary, and the family is gradually disintegrating. In Germany Hitler is 'going back' to medieval times, in the face of the whole civilized world, with high pretensions of being an apostle of Aryan purity.

In India everybody knows how bitter these controversies have been. Inter-caste marriage, the desirability or otherwise of the caste-system, and sects that have been almost water-tight compartments, the growing necessity of the means of birth-control etc., all these have been the causes of internal dissensions I believe that these social problems are seldom approached in a manner in which they ought to be. Whenever these are tackled there is a top-heavy clamour, people indulge in needless rhetoric and cheap platitudes, all sound and little sense. It does not dawn upon them that the social problems come within the purview of the social sciences. If anybody tells them that sociology or biology is vitally connected with social affairs it comes to them as a revelation. The method of discussion in which people habitually indulge is frankly an a priori method which is opposed to all logic and scientific investigation. This is an age of cant and commonplace sayings by which the populace is easily deluded. Havelock Ellis has sufficiently exposed the cant of "Divine Love" and Feminism which first culminates in delicious flapperdom and then into racial suicide. Eminent biologists like D. M. Bateson and Karl Pearson have exploded the myth of democracy and the pernicious nature of the caste-system. The right way of approaching these social problems is to consult these social sciences viz. biology, psychology, or sociology without which any solution is bound to remain inherently defective.

As Julian Huxley remarks, "The discoveries of biological science, during the last hundred years have quite altered our outlook upon many familiar aspects of human life. One of the spheres where the change has been most obvious is in regard to heredity and racial problems. While dealing with society and its problems we must thoroughly investigate the biological basis of human nature, the evolution and the structure of society. It has come to be recognized that man is a biological specimen, as much as snakes and ants, his affairs are biological affairs, and must be carried on in accordance with sound biological principles."

If we just visualised the diverse problems that confront us in our daily life such as marriage, education, moral or survival values, criminality and the high talk of individual freedom, divorce, sex education, family as the unit of social organization, it is incumbent upon us to investigate very carefully the nature of these problems and deal with them in a scientific way. It is an amazing fact that modern youths who are so proud of living in this scientific age want to show themselves off as basing their considerations on the findings of modern science. They profess to have a scientific outlook; they are knights out for the destruction of hypocrisy: their slogan is reason. But this is a travesty of words, a mere 'fiction'. The 'fact' is they are too impatient of scientific erudition, reason is thrown to the winds to the painful realization that after all that "Man acts as he feels and not as he thinks". In the preface to Saint Joan, Shaw tells us that in the modern world credulity and intolerance are on the increase 'the layman superceding the theologian'. People are little aware of the fact that biology has much to say in the advance of human civilization. The idea that "the conduct of life and society should be based on sound biological maxims" (Jennings) becomes a paradox.

Biology is the science of living organisms. Within the span of fifty years, it has wrought marvels in contributing to the knowledge of mankind. Recent researches into heredity the genes and hormones, the blending of racial stocks etc., clearly testify to the fact that biology has to play the first fiddle in solving the world problems of social structure, population and racial improvement. The prohibition of any marital relation between Aryans and non-Aryans, discouraging women from falling into a dynamic industrial life, an earlier age for marriage, the sterilizing of defective individuals these are some of the features in which the biological tendency is being manifested in the Western nations.

The familial disintegration, the declining birth-rate even in the midst of differential fertility, the "south slaves danger," the exuberant growth of social pathology, these are some of the problems which have profoundly disturbed the conscience of Western civilization. In 1880 the average English family had four children, the present average is two (4.58 to 2.14 to be exact) the fall in the birth-rate from 34.2 per thousand in 1880 to 16.3 in 1930. America has always been styled as "a museum of races in a melting pot". It is well worth remembering that various races and illustrious dynasties have been mercilessly obliterated from the face of the earth. The Nordics are hastening towards extinction.

These illustrations are sufficient to point out what a potent influence biology wields over human affairs; and a solution to any social problem should be fortified by such considerations.

635, Bhanwar, }
Poona 2. }

V. R. TALASIKAR.

Dr. Pelt's Visit :—Mr. A. Pelt, the Director of Information Section of the League of Nations, Geneva, was among the prominent passengers who arrived in Bombay by the "Strathnaver". Mr. Pelt, in an interview, said that he was visiting India for the first time and his visit had twofold object, namely, to establish closer relations with the Government of India and also to inspect the League of Nations local office in Bombay. Mr. Pelt is now on a visit to Delhi meeting Government members and members of the Legislative Assembly. He will return to Bombay after a week's stay in Delhi and will meet officials and non-officials here. Since the visit of Sir Arthur Salter seven years ago, said Mr. Pelt, no high official of the League of Nations had visited this country on behalf of the League and, therefore, it was that he had been sent out. Mr. Pelt hoped to visit Madras and Calcutta if time permitted.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

425

INTER-RELIGIONS CONFERENCE. COCANADA-1936.

In pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of Brahma Workers in Andhradesa held in Berhampore (Ganjam) in March 1935, an Inter-Religions Conference for promoting peace, concord and fellowship among the people, through a realisation of the harmony, unity and universality of all religions, was held in the Town Hall of Cocanada on the 22nd and 23rd of March. Persons attended from almost every important town in the Province, Masulipatam, Rajahmundry, Bezpada, Pittapuram, Amalapuram, Narasapur, Madhavaram, Nidadavole, Gandhredu, Peddapuram, Kovvur, Tuni, Gudivada, Thotapalli and Ramachendrapur and also from Madras and Mangalore. The attendance at the three sessions in spite of the inclement weather varied between 250 to 300.

The proceedings began with the singing by a choir of three girls of Rabindranath Tagore's Bharata Geeta, followed by a prayer led by Mr. E. Subbukrishnaiya, Brahma Minister from Mangalore. Thereupon Mr. K. Kalliana Swami read the Secretaries' statement giving the history and activities of the Andhra Brahma Sadhanasram under whose auspices the Conference was convened. The opening address was given by Rao Bahadur C. V. Krishna Swami Aiyer, who pointed out that the way to achieve religious unity was to emphasise the essentials of the different religions and to discourage the exaggeration of non-essentials.

In welcoming the representatives of different religions Mr. D. V. S. Prakasa Rao, Chairman of the Reception Committee, pleaded for the popularisation of the highest wisdom of the different religions of the land as a means of bringing about unity and concord among the people. Mr. O. Kandaswami Chetty, was elected President of the conference. In his presidential address Mr. Chettiar pointed out how by formulating the harmony, unity and universality of all religions as the basis of this conference the Reception Committee carried the Inter-Religions movement in the country one step further than a similar Conference held in 1934 at Bangalore under Muslim auspices, and another held later in the year under the auspices of Sri Sankara Charya, Dr. Kurtikoti. These Conferences had to content themselves with inviting representatives of different faiths to expound the teachings of their religion. The Cocanada Conference ventured to focus the teachings of different religions upon the solution of the crying problem of Unity in India and thus create harmony and fellowship among these religions. This the President said was in harmony with the spirit and message of Ram Mohan Roy and his successors in the Brahma Samaj. Dabendra Nath Tagore and Keshub Chandra Sen, and of Justice Ranade of the Prarthana Samaj. He believed that if the message and spirit of these religious leaders was absorbed by the people throughout the country over and above their distinctive faiths, many of the social religious and political problems of the country including the communal problems would be easily solved.

The reading of papers specially prepared for the Conference followed the reading of messages received from leading gentlemen in different parts of the country, among whom may be mentioned His Holiness Jagad Guru Sankara Charya, Dr. Kurtikoti, Babu Ramanand Chatterjee, Editor, Modern Review, Dr. G. S. Arundale, President, Theosophical Society, Mr. D. G. Vaidya, Secretary, Bombay Prarthana Samaj, Dr. Sir Radhakrishnan, Sir R. Venkata Ratnam Naidu, Dr. James Cousins, Mr. L. Patnaik, Dewan of Parlakimidi, Dr. D. S. Ramachandra Row,

Mr. V. R. Shinde, Depressed Classes Mission, Poona, Dr. Heramba Chandra Maitra, Ex-Principal, City College, Calcutta, Babu Satis Chandra Chakravarti, President Sadhanashram, Calcutta and Mr. Nyapathi Subba Rao Pantulu.

Mr. D. S. Sarma, M. A., the principal of the Rajahmundry Government Arts College, sketched the task before those who wished to bring about religious unity as fourfold, to unite in fighting irreligion, to condemn the abusing and ridiculing of ones' neighbours' religion, to encourage a reverent study of other religions than one's own, and to reform and strengthen one's own religion. The oneness of Religion was the subject of Rev. A. E. Massey who pointed out how religions found their unity in Love. Rao Bahadur A. Rama Rao, B. A., B. L., in illustrating and enforcing the fellowship of Faiths quoted from Emperor Akbar's Prayer. "Thy elect have no dealings with heresy nor with orthodoxy. Heresy to the heretic is orthodox; but the dust of the rose petal is dear to the heart of the perfume-seller." Sir Nawab Amin Jung of Hyderabad's paper on Unity and Union in Religion on the basis of a few fundamental beliefs and practices, was read by the probationary Sub-Registrar Mr. M. A. Khayum B. A., a member of Executive Committee of the Conference. This brought the first session of the Conference to a close.

The second session began the next morning at 9 with prayer led by Mr. K. Hanumanta Rao. Mr. T. Prakasa Nayudu M. A., then read his paper on the Religion of Man in which he said he would turn away from all divisive doctrines and try to find his oneness with his brother man at any cost. Fraternising; not proselytising, is the crying need of the times. He would identify truth with love and love with truth. Swami Omkar of the Santi Ashram in the Tottapalli Hills had his paper read by Mr. D. V. S. Ross, B. A., B. L. The way to realise the Universality of Religions, said the Swami, through peace is to cultivate God consciousness or universal Love in our individual hearts and thus pave the way to the establishment of peace on earth and goodwill among nations. This was appropriately followed, on the suggestion of Rev Mr. Massey, by the observance of two minutes' silent meditation on Love, Harmony and Peace. The Catholicity of Islam was explained by Khan Bahadur Mr. Zindah Sahib B. A., who said that far from being a sectarian religion Islam thought that other religions too demanded respect and toleration. The Democracy of the gods was the title of a paper read by Mr. M. V. V. K. Rangachari, B. A., who identified the gods whom men worshipped with the forces of nature which worked impartially towards all men. Speaking last in the morning session, Mr. B. Venkateswarlu M. A., claimed for Hinduism all the elements of universality in as much as it found a place in its system for every kind of faith.

The afternoon session opened, after prayer by Mr. G. Satyanarayana Murti, with an exhaustive exposition by Mr. T. H. M. Sadasivayya M. A., B. L., Additional District Munsiff, Amalapur, of Veerasaivism, as a middle way between Advaitism of Sankara and the Dwaitism of Ramanuja. The various tenets and practices of Islam were explained at full length by Mr. Abdul Karim B. A., D. F. O. of Vellore, whose paper was read by his fellow theosophist, Mr. A. V. Narayana Swami Aiyer M. A., of the local Gautama Lodge. The sufficiency of the principles and methods of Hindu prayer was the subject of the oral address delivered by Mr. J. Purushotam M. A., of the Sanskrit College, Kovvur. Dr. B. Seshagiri Rao M. A., Ph. D., of Vizianagaram sent a learned thesis, read by Mr. S. Atchanna Pantulu, B. A., B. L., tracing the points of identity between Islam and

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 7

Hinduism both in theory and in practice. Christ and Religious Harmony was the theme of Rev Dr. J. B. Mc Laurin, D. D., of the Canadian Baptist Mission. He dwelt on the ethical teachings of Jesus which sought to unify all classes of people whether rich or poor, educated or ignorant. The last paper was by Mr. E. Subbu Krishnaiyya, M. A., B. Sc., B. D., missionary of the Brahmo Samaj, who quoted Pandit Sivanath Sastri's description of Universal religion, as based on a belief in the progressive nature of religions, the several religions being imperfect attempts of man to grasp God under various intellectual, moral, social and political conditions.

In bringing the proceedings to a close the President pointed out that the various papers read evidenced the working of an inter-religions mind among the followers of different religions in India. Every one sought to expound his religion in the light and the terms of other religions. A noteworthy feature of the papers read was the tracing of a parallelism between one religion and another. These were preliminary steps towards a unification of faiths in India. The most important thing they should care for now was the will to understand other religions than one's own and an attitude of fellowship and love in their mutual relations.

Mr. K. Kaliana Swami, Secretary of the Conference, then announced the personnel of the Standing Committee of the Inter-Religious Conference for 1936, as appointed by the Andhra Brahma Sadhanasram.

THE SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE, BOMBAY.

Twenty-five years ago, on 19th March 1911, for the first time in India, an institution started specifically for rendering social service was formally founded in our great city by the late Sir N. G. Chandavarkar, Kt.

Through the kind financial help the League received in its infancy from great philanthropists like Sir Ratan Tata and Sheth Damodardas Gordhandas Sukhadwala, it was able to make a very decent beginning in the very first year of its existence. We deem it our good fortune that during the last quarter of a century, by the grace of God and by the generous support accorded to the League by the Bombay public and specially by well-known citizens like the late Sir Vithaldas Damodar Thakersey, Kt., the late Sir Dorab Tata, the late Sir Ratan Tata, Sheth Kanji Karsondas and the Trustees of the late N. M. Wadia Charities, the League has been able to carry out almost all its aims and objects for which it was started. We feel much gratified that in spite of the most adverse circumstances through which our city has been passing during the last fifteen years, our League has kept up its beneficent activities. The fact that we have been able to show a clean record of genuine service is our legitimate cause of pride. We are fully conscious of our limitations. We are also quite aware as to how unfortunate circumstances compelled us to curtail our usual activities, yet in spite of this, it is a matter of intense satisfaction to us that we can present before you a substantially good record of social service.

Further it is a matter of great rejoicing that the founding of the League in Bombay has been followed by several Leagues in India.

The specially prepared Silver Jubilee Report for the years 1911 to 1935 will be shortly out; in the meanwhile, to make you acquainted with the League's past, present and future aspirations we place before you a summary of this Report. I request you to go through it and to satisfy yourself as regards the justification of the existence of an institution like ours in our city.

Our wants for the future are many. We require the League to be re-invigorated with new blood. The future of the League is in the hands of the youth of Bombay. We wish intensely that on an occasion like this a large number of them should come forward and get themselves enlisted as the League's Standing Militia of Social Service.

My heart-felt appeal to all men and women, rich and poor, young and old, is to help the League readily and willingly according to their means so that the celebration of the Jubilee may result in a substantial Memorial. To my mind, the best Memorial which we could devise is to build two buildings—one for the Parel Industrial School of the Mahila Seva Mandal in the compound of the Damodar Thakersy Hall at Parel at a cost of Rs. 50,000 and another for a gymnasium at the same place, at a cost of Rs. 10,000, plans of which are annexed to the accompanying Report.

My special appeal is to the Trustees of all charitable trusts. The League being a cosmopolitan institution unites people of all castes and creeds on a common platform for rendering social service and hence it eminently deserves recognition at their hands.

In this appeal, I wish to draw your pointed attention to the item of the Variety Entertainment in the programme. The Entertainment will be given over two days: one on Sunday the 15th March from 10 to 12 a. m. when all primary school children and all secondary school students will be admitted at a flat rate of 8 annas, and the other for adults on 21st March (Jamshedji Naoroz Day) from 9-30 p. m. to 11-30 p. m.—both at the Royal Opera House. Tickets will be available for the first show both at the Opera House and at the League's Head Office (Servants of India Society's Home, Sandhurst Road) and for the second show at Mrs. H. J. Kania, B. A.'s Bungalow at Ridge Road, Malabar Hill, or at the League's Head Office.

The League's much-curtailed annual expenditure for maintaining its usual activities is Rs. 55,000. We very badly need all the help that you can give, either by giving donations, big or small, or by becoming Patrons, supporters, Life members or ordinary members or by rendering social service in any of the various directions of service the League has undertaken.

Yours faithfully,
KRISHNALAL M. JAVERI,
President.

Indian Women in Science:—Mr. Robin Dr. Mohan Datta, M.Sc., writes in the Modern Review: "Indian women, who are now keen on being trained according to Western methods of education and going in for education, health culture, aeroplane training, etc., do not lag behind in the domain of science. In the twenty-third session of the Indian Science Congress, held this year in the month of January at Indore, many women read papers of considerable value and many joined in the discussions. In the Chemistry section the following joint papers were read, one of the authors in each case being a woman. Condensation of Bromal with Urethanes, by Prof. N. W. Hirwe and Miss K. D. Gavankar of Bombay. Action of Hydrogen Sulphide on Oxalones Oxides, by Miss B. N. Katrak and Prof. T. S. Wheeler of Bombay. Studies in the Anthraquinone series, by Prof. P. C. Mitter and Miss Tanima Sen Gupta of Calcutta. The Chemistry of indigenous fatty oils, Part XI. The Chemical Composition of the fat from the seeds of Garcinia Indica, by Prof. P. Ramaswami Ayyar and Miss P. Devi of Bangalore. In the Psychology section, Miss S. B. Gupta of Calcutta read a very interesting paper—Application of newly devised tests to find how children of seven years reason. In the Botany section, a paper entitled Common Plants of Northern Sikkim, was contributed by Mr. K. P. Biswas Curator of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Sibpur, with Miss H. P. V. Townend of Calcutta.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

427

IN DEFENCE OF INDIAN UNIVERSITIES.*

Dealing with the criticisms that an alarmingly large number of students was receiving University education and that the Universities were responsible for wastage and unnecessary duplication of teaching arrangements, Mr. Shyamprasad Mookerjee Vice Chancellor of Calcutta University said they should examine the situation dispassionately, and ask themselves whether the criticism levelled against the Universities in India had any foundation at all. The following excerpts are from his speech.

Let me first take our own University. We serve the needs of Bengal and Assam, with the exception of a limited area which is controlled by Dacca. We have thus practically one University for a population of about fifty million in Bengal and nine in Assam. The number of students reading in the University and the colleges is about thirty-one thousand and the total expenditure on higher education is eighty-six lakhs of rupees, Assam spending about four. Take the whole of British India with a population of two hundred and sixty-three millions. India has only sixteen Universities and the number of their students will be about one lakh and twenty thousand. The total expenditure on higher education in India is less than four crores of rupees.

Let me now turn to other countries. The British Isles afford a good illustration for comparison from the point of view of population which is about forty-five million; but the number of Universities is as many as sixteen—what we have for the whole of India—and fifty-five thousand students receive instruction under their jurisdiction. About six crores and forty lakhs of rupees are spent on higher education only in England and Wales. To Universities alone within this area the State annually contributes two crores and twenty-seven lakhs of rupees.

Let me take the figures for a British Dominion. Canada, which has a population of ten million, has as many as twenty-three Universities and eighty-five thousand students pursue higher education. In Germany the population is sixty-six million with twenty-three Universities which have an enrolment of about eighty-eight thousand students. In Italy, which has a population of forty-one million, there are twenty-six Universities and fifty thousand students receive higher education. In Japan with a population of sixty-four million there are six Universities and seventy thousand students.

Let me now give some figures for secondary education. In Bengal the number of pupils in different grades of secondary schools is about four lakhs and sixty thousand, of whom about three lakhs belong to high schools recognised by the University. Assam has, in addition, an enrolment of seventy-seven thousand pupils in secondary schools. For every seventeen who receive secondary education, one proceeds to the higher stage. If we take the whole of India, there are about twenty-four lakhs of students in schools, and for every twenty, one goes up to the University stage. But what about other countries? In the British Isles seven lakhs of pupils read in secondary schools, and one in every twelve proceeds to higher education. In Canada one in every three joins the University. In Germany the proportion is one to nine; in Italy and in Japan it is one to ten.

The number of candidates at the Matriculation examination of our University often disturbs the peace of mind of our critics. May I bring it to their notice that if about twenty-five thousand candidates will appear at our Matriculation examination this year, four years ago fifty-seven thousand candidates sat for the Approved First Examination from seconddary schools in England and Wales alone—an examination which has been adopted by the Universities as a Matriculation examination—and seventy-three per cent of them were successful?

Similar illustrations might be given in reference to educational opportunities existing in other civilised countries which allot enormous sums of money to education. We have not heard it stated that the number of students receiving instruction in Universities, in colleges and in secondary schools in these countries is by any means excessive, or that it displays an unhealthy mental development on the part of the people of these lands. Neither have we heard it stated that the large number of Universities and educational institutions existing in each of these countries—which must necessarily make similar provision for teaching and research in any branches of study—are wasting national resources or are guilty of duplication of arrangements. Neither again have we heard any sweeping condemnation of their educational systems on the ground that the vast majority of the students is pursuing education as indeed they must, not solely out of respect for learning for the sake of learning but also as a means to an end.

While I make these general observations, I do not ignore certain essential factors. I recognise that each country must have its own problems and nowhere is the educational system considered perfect. I recognise that in each one of these countries there is the amplest provision for elementary education. But surely, if in Bengal or in India primary education to-day is utterly inadequate, the fault does not rest with the University; neither does it stand to reason that the educational opportunities offered at the higher stages should be curtailed or condemned. I do not ignore that in other countries education is of a varied type and affords facilities for the training of youths in diverse branches of knowledge, theoretical and practical. But surely, the remedy for the present state of things in this country would be to make provision for similar kinds of instruction in our schools and colleges and not to complain against the number of students reading in them. I do not ignore that in other countries apart from the education which thousands of students receive through the medium of the universities, colleges and schools, there are other recognised institutes and bodies through which knowledge is spread for the benefit of the people, both young and old. In our country the number of such institutions is extremely limited. I do not ignore that in many other countries, although general unemployment is a disturbing element in national life, unemployment amongst educated people, though present, is not so distressing as in India. But let us not forget that national interests in those lands have secured among the different authorities—the state, the Universities and other educational agencies and representatives of trade, industry and commerce—a better and more harmonious arrangement for the proper utilisation of the skilled services of trained men and women who are absorbed in diverse occupations and careers. In our country unfortunately such co-operation is not at present found in any appreciable measure.

I am moved to make these observations because in recent times there has been a marked tendency to throw a major portion of the blame for the existing state of affairs in this country on the Universities and to minimise the importance of the work which has been done by them. There has often been a lamentable want of realisation of the scope for far greater service which the Universities, if better equipped and organised, are capable of rendering for the advancement of national prosperity.

* Vice-Chancellor of Calcutta University's Convocation address.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

428

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 17

SUBHAS BOSE IN IRELAND.

The Dublin Correspondent of the Amrita Bazar Patrika writes :

Before he left Ireland, the late Mr. Vithalbhai Patel had promised Madame Gonne MacBride and Mrs. M. Woods, President and Secretary respectively of the Irish-Indian Independence League, that he would try and send Babu Subhas Chandra Bose to Dublin to continue the contact that he had established with the Irish people. That was three years ago.

On arrival Babu Subhas Chandra Bose was welcomed by a large number of Irish friends of Indian Freedom movement. The Bengal leader had landed at Cork that morning from the American liner, "Washington" and had travelled by rail to Dublin, having come direct from Paris. He was received by the Mayor of Cork and Mrs. MacSwiney. The welcome accorded to him in Dublin was similar to one accorded to the late President of the Assembly—warm, sincere and comradely. Apart from the Irish friends, there was also a contingent of Indian students who are mostly students of Law and Medicine in this country. Mr. Bose was garlanded by an Indian woman student in Indian fashion. As soon as he arrived, autograph hunters and press correspondents made him the much sought after man. The representatives of British Imperialist press were anxious to find out if there was to be any secret conspiracy between the Indian leader and the Irish patriots. However, when I interviewed him, he told me frankly that there was nothing up his sleeves. "I have come here," he said, "in fulfilment of the request made to me by Mr. Vithalbhai Patel before his death in October, 1933, to maintain that contact between the Indian Nationalist movement in Ireland." He would take the opportunity of meeting every political leader in the country. He has already received invitations to meet and discuss the Indian situation from various political organisations and men of influence. He would be seeing Mr. Cosgrave, Mr. Norton, the Labour Leader and a number of prominent members of the Fianna Fail Party.

Mr. de Valera has honoured the Indian leader by inviting him to see him. That was Mr. Bose's first interview in this country. The two leaders discussed many problems and the Irish President asked his Indian friend to make a survey of Irish industries. He will be afforded all facilities as, I understand, Subhas Bose, is particularly anxious to establish, if possible, trade relations between India and the Irish Free State. Though it was a long talk, the President has asked Mr. Bose to see him once again. He has also given him a hint that he might like to see him everyday during his stay in Dublin. With Mr. Norton, the Labour leader, Mr. Bose hopes to acquaint himself with the Irish Trade Union and Labour Movement. I asked Mr. Bose for his first impression of Mr. De Valera. "Your president," he said, "is a charming personality. He is a man of determined mind, with a quick grasp of essential things. I am very pleased to have had this opportunity of meeting him. My only regret is I could not see him earlier."

There is to be a big reception arranged in honour of the Indian leader under the auspices of the Indian-Irish Independence League. Though Fianna Fail Party members do not agree with many of the activities of the Republican Party they have joined hands in making to-night's function a great success, worthy of the Irish tradition in welcoming a foreign visitor. Mr. Bose will also address a public meeting and will speak through the Athlone microphone some time next week. He leaves Dublin about the 15th February for India.

Mr. Bose left Dublin on Wednesday (February 12), night. However, since writing to you on Monday, he had further conversations with the Minister of Agriculture and Lands. He discussed with him his policy of buying up the big estates and dividing them among the peasants. They also discussed its applicability to India. In his talk with the President of Sinn Fein and other officers of that organisation, Mr. Bose discussed with them the national situation in India and Ireland. He was much impressed by the activities of the organisation, though he could not wholly support many of its main features. However, there was a consensus of opinion that contacts between India and Ireland would lead to fruitful results for the two countries in their struggle for independence from foreign imperialism.

Being closely associated with trade unionism, journalism and literary work, the directors of the "Irish Press", and organ of the Fianna Fail Party, invited Mr. Bose to their office. He was received by the editor and the general manager. Mr. Bose was impressed with the organisational capacity of those who are responsible for the production of the leading nationalist newspaper. He naturally, in his discussion with the editor, took up the question of the foreign policy of the "Irish Press." He explained to the Irish journalists the main difficulty of Indian-owned nationalist newspapers and also the Press law under which the freedom of the press in India was much curtailed.

Mr. Bose demonstrated the traditional Indian courtesy by holding a reception at the Shelbourne Hotel before his departure for Cork. In an address he said that Ireland had interested the people of India for a long time and for many reasons. It was not only from the political side that the Irish movement had interested them. In Ireland he had found interest in India among people of all shades of political opinion. Other speakers included Madam Gonne MacBride, Mrs. Woods, Dr. Hanningan. Those present also included Mr. Erskine Childers, Mr. Sean MacBride, Miss B. O. Mullane, Mrs. Sean Keating, Mrs. G. Coulter. Various political and social organisations were also well represented, for we had the opportunity of chatting with Mr. T. O'Carroll of the Universities Republican Club, Miss Maire Comerford, who is woman editor of the "Irish Press."

A large gathering of Indians and Irish friends of Indian freedom saw Mr. Bose leave Dublin on Wednesday night for Cork from the Baggot Station. On the following day he sailed on the American liner, "President Harding" for Paris. Before leaving Dublin, Mr. Bose had a final talk with Mr. Sean T. O'Kelly, the Vice President of the Executive Council. They discussed the possibility of exchange of University professors between India and the Irish Free State. I am told Mr. O'Kelly assured Mr. Bose that he would bear the matter in mind.

I also took the opportunity of chatting with the Indian leader for a few minutes before his departure. I advisedly say that I chatted with the Indian leader and not with the Bengal leader. For, when I happened to mention Mr. Bose to an Irish friend as "the well-known Bengal leader," Mr. Bose resented such a suggestion. I did not realise that I was unwittingly responsible for doing injustice to him. Mr. Bose said "Why do you call me a Bengal leader? I am not provincial." I certainly accept Mr. Bose's contention. For the last few years I have had the privilege of reading his speeches and writings and I can safely say that Mr. Bose has always struck me as an Indian patriot first and Indian patriot last.

When I drew Mr. Bose's attention to the gossip that was available in the town of Mr. Bose being watched by certain plain clothes men, with a supreme

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

429

air of indifference he discounted the same. In his opinion the gossip had no foundation, though many of my Irish friends think otherwise. Incidentally, I must emphasise the fact that although there are a few Irishmen in the pay of the British Government, it does not necessarily follow that an average Irishman is a renegade to his country and all that it stands for in relation to Great Britain. I can recall an incident which took place three years ago. An Indian visitor to Dublin was chased by an Irishman, who later on followed him to London, and communicated to Scotland Yard his whereabouts. On the following morning a representative of Scotland Yard accompanied by this Irish gentleman visited the residence of the Indian with the ostensible object of interrogating him. What amused me on that occasion was the quiet and unnoticed departure of this Indian from London back to Dublin after these two gentleman had waited for him in vain at his residence for over 24 hours!

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD.

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	" 20,00,000
RESERVE FUND	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)
Sheth Todarmal Chimanlal Samal Beehar, (Mill Agent Baroda).
Toolaldas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhailal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Manatlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Bombay).
Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent, per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 3 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

realpatidar.com Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

430
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 7

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

Branches:—

- BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
- BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
- MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
- AHMEDABAD.
- AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
- CALCUTTA.
- CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
- NAGPUR CITY.
- POONA.
- POONA CITY.
- RAJKOT.
- SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up „ 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund „ 1,04,00,000
London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

“Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application.” The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been “All the Wife and Mother,” is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY
CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islamapur (District Satara)	Dhulia (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondaicha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nasik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Paigbar (" ")	Kaloj (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	B. N. Bajajny, Esq.,
Madhowsjee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	D. W. Bank, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeas,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the “Bombay Government Gazette.”

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

431

realpatidar.com

Invigorating and Health Giving.

Giving the daily bath to the baby is no worry to the mother. if she uses MYSORE SANDAL SOAP The baby likes it and he will be happy only if he gets a tablet of MYSORE SANDAL SOAP to play with

USE MYSORE SANDAL SOAP.

GOVERNMENT SOAP FACTORY, BANGALORE.

Sole Agents: for Bombay Presidency (excluding Sind and Districts of Belgaum, Dharwar and North Kanara) and Rajputana.

Messrs. RAMJANALLY EBRAHIM & Co.,
81, Princess Street, Bombay 2.

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	20s Annually.
	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
Outside the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	21s. Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,
Phoenix, Natal.

SAFELY RELY ON AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other
kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

432
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

Mar. 7

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference was sent to us for circulation in India and they have been sold out. A further supply is expected in about a month and orders can be booked for at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 105 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MARCH 14, 1933. No. 28

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Commotion in Europe.
The Shahidganj Affair.
The India Annual.
Education in U. S. A.
Marriage and Dowry.
The Catholic Church and Ethiopia.
White and Black in Australia.
Industrial Development in Russia.
Mr. Rajbhaj on Untouchability
The Hammond Committee and Women's Electorates.

Congress and Bharata Natyam.
The Roman Catholic Church and the Italy-Ethiopia War.
The Social Service League's Work for Women.
Hajians and Conversion.
The Dowry Evil I.
The Dowry Evil II.
Hajian Leader's Warning
Sanctions: Are they Right or Wrong?
Inscriptions and Monuments discovered.

NOTES

Commotion in Europe:—The Ethiopian War was overshadowed at the end of last month by the military revolt in Japan. Ethiopian and Japanese news have this week gone into the background as a result of Herr Hitler's announcement that German troops were being sent to the Rhineland in contravention of the Locarno Pact which, he declared, he regarded as no longer binding on Germany, in view of the Franco-Russian Pact recently made in violation of the same Locarno Pact. France denies that her Pact with Russia is contrary to the Locarno Pact but the German Chancellor thinks otherwise. The New Statesman, while stoutly maintaining that the Franco-Soviet fact is quite on all fours with the Locarno Pact, admits that the conclusion of the Pact, with a British blessing attached, means a serious blow to Nazi hopes and designs. After all, the Nazis today are the rulers of Germany. The journal dismissed (February 15) the talk that Germany would reply by seizing the demilitarised Rhineland as incredible, on the ground that it was a rash adventure into which even Nazis would not venture to plunge. That, however, is the very thing they have done. What is more, British opinion, while reciting the usual formulas about the enormity of breaking agreements, seems strongly disposed to condone Herr Hitler's act and to use it as a means of bringing Germany back to the League of Nations. Britain herself entered into a Naval Pact not long ago with Germany in contravention of the treaty of Versailles! France had to acquiesce in it because she is greatly dependent on British help to ensure her safety. She will have to compromise also on the German seizure of the demilitarised zone, if Britain is not prepared to support her in adopting extreme measures. Already it is said that France which had refused to negotiate unless the German troops were first withdrawn, is now demanding only an assurance from Germany, with a guarantee by Britain and Italy, that she would not fortify the area. Italy is willing to be a guarantor provided the sanctions against her are withdrawn and she be made the overlord of Ethiopia by the authority of the League of Nations and the arms, if need be, of Britain and France. There is no likelihood of war. The British public is in no mood to participate in another war even for the sake of Belgium which is really not menaced by the entry of German troops in the demilitarised area. It is not unlikely that the move is intended to help Italy in Ethiopia. If France wants Italy to guarantee a new Pact, she should first extricate Italy from the position into which she has drifted of antagonism to Great Britain and the League of Nations. This will be done. Germany will re-enter the League, there will be general rejoicings and embraces, and some one in each of the Locarno Powers will pose as the saviour of Europe. Only, Ethiopia will disappear from the map!

The Shahidganj Affair:—Mr. Jinnah's endeavours to find a settlement for the dispute between Sikhs and Muslims in Lahore over the demolition of a mosque in the premises of what is now a Sikh Gurudwara, have not succeeded but they have created an atmosphere more favourable to a friendly settlement than before his advent on the scene. He has gone back to Simla leaving behind him a Committee of Muslims, Sikhs and Hindus to work at the question. An evidently well-informed message states that the negotiations at one stage were near fruition but when Mr. Jinnah found at a later stage that it was not possible to go further for the moment, at least, he decided not to press it to the breaking point, but leave it where it was with the proposals of either party, representing the limits to which they were prepared to go, still holding the field. It is learned that the Muslims were prepared on their part to waive their demand for the mosque in favour of an undertaking by the Sikhs that they will leave the site enclosed as a no-man's land or a public place, while the Sikhs on their part were willing to make no further construction on the site as also publicly express regret, if they had wounded Muslim feelings in the past. Between these two positions various proposals were made, but no meeting place could be found. There seems to be scarcely any difference between the two positions which cannot be bridged. The only point that may demand consideration

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

434

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14

is whether Muslims are to have access to the site. If it is converted into a public place such as a garden, all communities will have access to it and the incident which began inauspiciously may be the means actually of adding to the amenities of Shahidganj. The Sikhs are capable of generous action when their susceptibilities are respected. They invited Mr. Jinnah to visit the site and in other ways they have shown him the regard due to a national leader. He, on his part, has taken pains to understand their point of view. The situation certainly has been brought nearer solution. Why have Congress leaders done nothing to promote a peaceful settlement of this dispute?

The Indian Annual :—Government have been issuing for many years past an annual review of political and administrative events under the title "India in..." It was a substitute for the Statutory Report of Moral and Material Progress which the Secretary of State for India used to present to Parliament. The series was begun by Professor Rushbrook Williams and bore his name. It was written with judgment and was a very readable production. It came to be regarded all over the world as an authentic representation of Indian affairs. A few years ago, the publication ceased to bear a name and its authorship was shrouded in anonymity. Every newspaper in the land is required by law to print the name of its editor. Government put itself above the law. In the last issue of this annual, the writer of the first chapter dealing with the political situation, forgot that he was writing in the name of Government and gave himself a great deal of freedom in dealing with the motives and actions of Indian public men. The departure seems to have been made in some sort of concert as it was noticeable not only in the India but also in the Bengal and Patna publications. The Bengal review contained aspersions on Pandit Jawharlal Nehru for which the Government of Bengal apologised. Early in the Assembly session an adjournment motion was given notice of, but was withdrawn, by a Congress member to call attention to the comments in the India annual. The question was again raised on a cut motion during the debate on the budget this week by the leader of the Congress Party in the Assembly. In reply to him, the Home Member of the Government of India took the responsibility for the writing on himself, practically justified it as being merely reproduction of opinions expressed by some newspapers, declared that the compilation of the annual was a distasteful task of which Government would be relieved on the introduction of the reforms, and wound up by saying that there was no cause for censure against Government. In the course of his speech, Sir Henry Craik interpolated a casual remark that there was not the slightest desire to throw any doubt on the character of Mahatma Gandhi's campaign against untouchability. Mr. Bhulabhai Desai clutched at it eagerly, and "having regard to the expression he (the Home member) has used with reference to one who led both these movements (Congress and Harijan)," he did not think it would be useful on his part to press the motion to a division. Except that Sir Henry Craik spoke of Mahatma (and not Mr.) Gandhi, we do not see that he said anything to justify Mr. Desai's decision.

Education in U. S. A. :—In last week's Reformer we published a part of the Convocation address of Mr. Shyamprasad Mukherjee, Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University, showing by means of comparative statistics for several countries, how little ground there is for the complaint that higher education is being overdone in India. The Department of Research and Education of the American Federal Council of Churches, has issued in its Information section, a detailed statement on the position of education in the United States. Approximately one fourth of the population (120 millions) was reported in the 1930 Census as "attending school." This did not include the four-year-olds in kindergarten and younger children in nursery schools or the adults of over 24 continuing their education. Over one million students were attending Universities and Colleges, both regular and summer sessions. The expenditure on Education was about 2,000 million dollars or 3.9 per cent of the national income. The following are stated to be the problems confronting public education in America at the present time: To provide school support which will insure adequate educational and greater equality of educational opportunity for all children, and to extend the scope of those offerings and services which make for better adjustment between the individual and society, so that the school may make the maximum possible contribution to social progress. To raise the educational standards of teachers, and concomitant with the last, provision of sufficient compensation to attract men and women of ability and education; to improve provision for education especially in areas where such provision is now generally meagre and retarded; to provide appropriate continuing education for adults; and to centre attention on the well-rounded growth of individual children rather than on mass education limited to routine skills and knowledge.

Marriage and Dowry :—We reprint to-day two important articles on the problem created by the demand of dowries, often entirely beyond the means of parents of daughters, as a condition of securing suitable bridegrooms. The first is from the Amrita Basar Patrika, the leading organ of Hindu conservative opinion in Bengal. The second is from the Guardian of Madras, which is a liberal nationalist Christian weekly. The first point to note is that the dowry evil is not confined to Hindus but prevails also among Muslims and Indian Christians. Indeed, according to the Guardian, it is rather worse among Indian Christians than among Hindus. This is another proof that social problems transcend religious beliefs in India. The Patrika and the Guardian seem to agree that the evil has been aggravated by the higher education of girls.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

435

which was expected to remove it. We are not sure that they are right. The three sisters who committed suicide to save their father the worry of finding dowries for them, were educated at home; and home education in such cases falls far short of "higher education." Apart from that fact, the dowry evil, as both the journals recognise, existed many years before girls took to higher education in this country. Almost from the very beginning (1887) the National Social Conference passed a resolution at every session calling attention to the gravity of the evil. The Patrika says that there has been a reaction in Bengal against girls remaining unmarried which, for a time, was favoured by advanced opinion. Bengal is the land of extremes, and, consequently, of reactions. The problem of dowries is not peculiar to that province. It exists among Hindus in several other provinces, among Parsis, and among Muslims and Indian Christians, as the Guardian avers. What is peculiar to Bengal is the way in which adolescent girls are left to take the matter into their impetuous hands, while the community looks on helplessly. The root of the evil is the competitive principle which has invaded not only our economic but also our social and family life. The dowry evil will not be solved except as a part of the larger question, whether the co-operative or the competitive principle is to prevail in Indian life in all its phases.

The Catholic Church and Ethiopia:—We publish today an article by an Indian Christian correspondent on the attitude of the Roman Catholic Church towards the invasion of Ethiopia which has evoked an unprecedentedly large volume of protest from all parts of the world. The gravamen of his charge is that the Church seems to be more concerned for its own safety than to uphold the standard of Christian ethics against the aggressive Power, in contravention of the Scripture that he who seeks to save his life will lose it and that he who is ready to lose his life for the sake of righteousness shall find it. The Concordat entered into with the Fascist Government by the Church has been perhaps, the cause of the lukewarm attitude of the Church. It has been criticised from different angles as derogatory to both parties. Sylvia Pankhurst, writing in the Hubert Journal for January made the specific allegation that "since the Concordat with Fascism, the Church in Italy may, and actually does, authorise a religious marriage, carrying no civil rights, between persons one or other of whom is already married to some one else." We have not seen any repudiation of this allegation in any of the Indian Catholic journals. Then, again, six Italian Professors, among whom are Max Ascoli and Gaeto Salvamini, writing in the New Statesman (February 8) declare that the denunciation of the Lateran agreements of 1929 and the separation of the Church and State will be among the reforms which the Italian Republic, which they expect to succeed the Fascist Government, will immediately take on hand.

White and Black in Australia:—In Australia intermarriage between Whites and Blacks are prohibited by law. But all the same there is inter-mixing among the two colours and this is creating a new and serious problem in the country. In an article headed "Girl Slaves in Christian Countries," Edith Jones writes in the Catholic Citizen: "In the isolated native state this position has its compensations and even its necessities, and can only be changed if the whole tribe should choose a new social order as some tribes are voluntarily doing in Australia to-day. It is, however, the girl-children of the detribalised Australian Aborigines living on the fringe of white civilisation who call for the instant attention and help of their Christian sisters. Is it too much to ask that any English women who feel stirred by their plight should call upon the women voters throughout Australia to demand from the Government of Australia urgent attention to these children? Let it be first realised that there are now 20,000 half-castes in Australia and that the number is steadily increasing; further that all half-caste children are illegitimate; there is no marriage in Australia between the white father and the black woman (or black girl-mother)."

Industrial Development of Russia:—The February number of Industrial and Labour Information, published by the International Labour Office of the League of Nations, contains an informing summary of the detailed reports on economic progress recently issued by the Soviet Government. The second five year plan, it shows, has been making rapid headway. In 1936, it is expected that a number of industries are to reach the figures which, originally, had not to be completed until the last year of the second five year plan, chief among them being engineering construction and the Donat coal industry. The progress made by the Food Industry is so remarkable that the authorities think that the food problem may now be regarded as solved. In pre-war Russia, observes the Food Commisar, Mr. Mikojan, there was practically no food industry at all, home and small scale local output sufficing to meet the demand. Not until after the Revolution was it possible to set up a food industry in the Union; and one of the factors which had made its development necessary was the new and increasing importance of women in national and industrial life.

Mr. Rajbhoj on Untouchability:—The statement which Mr. Rajbhoj, leader of the Depressed classes, has addressed to his people and an English translation of which we reprint today from the Mahratta, should make the opponents of the removal of untouchability blush for shame by its generosity, breadth of vision and dignity. These people are a fast dwindling minority. We shall all wake up one day to find that untouchability has suddenly vanished. This has what happened to other reforms which were opposed with equal and even greater vehemence like sea-voyage and the remarriage of Hindu widows.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

436
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, March 14, 1936.

THE HAMMOND COMMITTEE AND WOMEN'S ELECTORATES.

In noticing the Indian Delimitation Committee's Report in last week's Reformer, we criticised the restriction of the right to elect for the two women's seats reserved for women (non-Muslim) in the city of Bombay to the Girgaum and Bhuleswar Wards. The one seat reserved for a Muslim woman is also to be filled by the voters of Girgaum Ward. In both cases, men and woman voters will participate in the election for the seats reserved for women. Ranebinnur taluka in Dharwar district has been given the privilege of returning one woman to represent the Southern division as well as the rural area of Bombay Presidency. Mrs. Umabai Kundapur, President, Karnatak Provincial Bhagini Mandal, Hubli, writes to us strongly criticising the selection of this taluka for the privilege. "One is at a loss to know," she writes "on what principles the Delimitation Committee has based the selection of areas for women's constituencies. For instance, there are six women's seats in the Bombay Provincial Assembly. Out of these, three are given to the city of Bombay, one each to the cities of Poona and Ahmedabad, and the remaining seat to the Dharwar district. But the extent of the constituency for the women's seat in the Dharwar district is limited only to the Ranebinnur taluka. Why it should be so, one cannot understand. It is a puzzle why, of all the places in the Southern division and the Dharwar district, the Committee selected Ranebinnur taluka for the Women's constituency from that Division. Is it because the women in that taluka are more enlightened and educated and, therefore, the best fitted to become the voters for the only woman's seat in the whole Division? Nobody has ever heard of any ladies' organisation, whether social, political or educational, in the Ranebinnur taluka. There is not the least awakening of any sort among the women-folk of the area. To speak plainly, education and general awakening is comparatively less in Dharwar South, and it is even worse in Ranebinnur taluka. Hardly a handful of women throughout that constituency may understand, if explained to them, what a legislature is, what is meant by elections, polling, candidates, and their qualifications." Mrs. Kundapur does not seem to be aware that not only women voters but also men voters of Ranebinnur will participate in the election to the seat reserved for women. This, however, does not affect the force of her contention that the Delimitation Committee has chosen the least progressive part of Dharwar and the Karnatak as the most suitable place in which to try the experiment of woman suffrage. Referring to the limitation of the franchise for the women's seats assigned to Bombay city to the two Wards, the Committee state that it has the full concurrence of the representative women who appeared before it and of the Local Government. We can only say that neither the Bombay Government nor the women representatives who appeared before the Committee, seem to have known anything about Ranebinnur's competence to be selected in the Karnatak for the bestowal of the seat reserved for women. Perhaps, they were hypnotised by the rhythm of the name, Ranebinnur.

Our objection, however, is not confined to the selection of areas in this haphazard fashion. It extends to the basic principle which has guided the Committee in dealing with this subject. The Committee had two alternatives before it. The Indian Franchise Committee indicated that it would be preferable that the representatives of women in the provincial legislatures should be returned from seats set apart for women in selected urban areas, the electorate in each such area being the electors belonging to that area, both men and women, the voters having in such areas two votes, one in the ordinary territorial constituency for which they were qualified, and the other for a woman candidate. The Joint Select Committee was provisionally in favour of the reservation of seats in constituencies formed for the purpose, and containing both men and women. They suggested that it might be desirable if possible to vary the areas so selected by rotation. The Joint Select Committee's idea of forming a constituency for the purpose of electing women representatives, is not clear. The Hammond Committee's decision to constitute ordinary constituencies into special ones for electing to the seats reserved for women, is certainly preferable. The Hammond Committee has adopted the Indian Franchise Committee's recommendation. The latter had before it a better plan which it rejected on unsubstantial grounds. It was that women should stand for any constituency for which they were qualified and that those women who, not being returned at the head of the poll, obtained the highest percentage of votes as compared with the numbers of electors on the roll in the constituencies in which women competed, should be declared elected, up to the special number of seats specially reserved for women. The Indian Franchise Committee admitted that this plan had great merits. One is that no woman would be returned to the Council unless she had had some measure of success in an ordinary election. The second is that it would give valuable training for the time when special facilities were abolished, and might help a woman to win the seat outright at a later election. These are solid recommendations in its favour, while its demerits in the eyes of the Committee were comparatively trivial. Electioneering in districts, far from being particularly difficult is relatively easier for women than in urban areas. The other ground, that it may lead to the successful and the defeated candidates being

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

437

both declared elected for the same constituency, is surely far-fetched. The Hammond Committee's view that women's franchise should be considered to be in an experimental stage in this country, is totally opposed to the trend of previous pronouncements on the subject. An experiment is liable to be abandoned. But women's suffrage is now an integral part of the Indian system and a public man who advocated its abandonment will be bounded out of public life. As for the special constituencies fixed upon arbitrarily by the Committee, being educative, their educative influence will be extremely limited as compared with that of the scheme leaving women candidates free to choose their own constituencies.

The fact is that the Hammond Committee has allowed itself to be dominated by the socially most reactionary opinion in the whole country in its appraisal of the political capacity of Indian women and of their influence in national life. "At present, in one or two provinces, and in some influential quarters", it observes, "there is a distinct prejudice against women's active participation in public life. In all, there is among women as a whole at present but little political consciousness. There is no familiarity with parliamentary institutions." Every one of these assertions is more applicable to large sections of the male population who are now enfranchised than to women. The Hammond Committee seriously, advance, as a reason for rejecting reservation of seats in multi-member constituencies, "the very real difficulties which arise in Indian conditions from the presence of undesirable women at the polls." "Undesirable women" may stand as candidates and get into the legislature! But their presence at the polls for the few minutes which it will take to record their votes, be a danger to public morals. A more stupid argument we have seldom come across in a report with pretensions to be a State document. We have in the main confined our attention to the proposals for Bombay. But they are a fair sample of the recommendations for the provinces on this subject. Unlike the Bombay representatives who appeared before the Hammond Committee, Bengali women representatives refused to acquiesce in the Committee's crude plan. "In Bengal," says the Report "there was a marked difference of view between our Committee and certain of the women witnesses who appeared before us. The witnesses in question were, so far as we could gather, anxious to show that they would experience no difficulty in maintaining contact with constituencies larger by far than any ordinary territorial constituency." The witnesses knew what they were talking about. It is the Committee which has betrayed complete ignorance of the ramifications of women's organisations in India during the last ten or twelve years.

CONGRESS AND BHARATA NATYAM.

(By Dr. S. MUTHULAKSHMI REDDI.)

In the Social Reformer of the 22nd February N. K. Akshi writes as follows: "Now that the sting is taken out of the Devadasi profession, what harm can there be if these women are encouraged in the legitimate practice and cultivation of the Arts of music and dancing which have elicited the admiration of even the Western world and of which the Devadasis are recognised exponents". I am at a loss to know what makes your correspondent think that the sting is taken out of the profession. So long as a woman calls herself a "Devadasi" she has all the attributes or the qualifications of a Devadasi; none has any business to presume otherwise. 'Devadasi' itself denotes a particular individual or a class of women only and not men. Many do not seem to be aware of the fact that a girl or woman does not become a devadasi by her birth or being born even to a devadasi-mother. The daughters of a devadasi do not all become devadasis, some will get married and settled down into respectable family lives (that has been so from time immemorial and not the result of any new reform movement) while the others especially those who are fair and handsome, are taught dancing and singing and trained as devadasis. The girl has to undergo a course of training before she is dedicated to the temple and registers herself as a "devadasi." Therefore it must be clear to the readers that a special training is necessary for a girl or a young woman to enter into the profession of a "devadasi." Certain castes in South India still practise the habit of dedicating girls and women to temples as a religious custom. While the old families have become reformed and merged into the major Hindu community, new families seem to spring up here and there to keep up the supply of devadasis, dedication is still permitted in spite of legislation in certain temples even in the city of Madras, in the same way as the Sarda Act is violated by a certain section of the public in as much as both these practices are associated in the public mind with religious sanction.

Unfortunately dedication of girls and their service in temples has not yet become a thing of the past as N. K. Akshi imagines. Those girls that are to become devadasis are not only taught music and dancing but also taught, while they are quite young and unable to see the future before them, that prostitution is no sin or crime, that it is their 'Kula Dharma' and that it is a legitimate profession. They honestly believe it too. They are taught these arts neither for the love of those arts nor for making a living but primarily for getting accomplished and attractive enough to trade in vice. We must in all fairness and justice admit that a microscopical percentage of these devadasis take to respectable life in spite of such an early training and association, the divine in them having asserted itself. They invariably give up dancing, attach themselves to one man, are true and loyal to him and very often merge into his family. These angels are only exceptions and they certainly deserve our sympathy and admiration but all the same, even these cannot escape from the odium that is associated with the name of a "devadasi" and none will come forward to marry them (the men of their own community inclusive) for the reason that the majority of the devadasis lead a life of shame and vice. Therefore in South India a "Devadasi" means simply a prostitute, devadasis themselves are aware of this fact as well as the wide public. Again, a devadasi has been clearly defined in our dictionary as "an unmarried female who has undergone the ceremony of dedication or gajja puja in any place of worship."

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com
438

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14

It is a well-known fact that poor girl children and orphans are purchased by the old devadasis who are very often sterile and, having been taught music and dancing and having been made to go through the ceremony of dedication, are made "devadasis". No doubt there is a Penal Code to prevent such practices but all the same such a heinous practice is still prevalent though not to such an enormous extent as before for the simple reason that some of the public still tolerate the Devadasi institution and hence the law cannot be enforced. I have myself rescued such cases from the grip of prostitution. That is why the enlightened State of Mysore legislated against this practice as early as 1909. The Mysore G. O. says, "The Government now observe that whatever might have been the original object of the Devadasi institution in temples, the state of immorality in which these temple servants are now found, fully justifies the action taken by them excluding the Devadasi from every kind of service in sacred institutions like temples." The Madras Legislative Council unanimously passed a resolution "that this Council recommends to the Government to undertake legislation at a very early date to put a stop to the practice of dedicating young girls or young women to Hindu temples which has generally resulted in exposing them to an immoral life," and has also legislated in 1930 dispensing with their service in the temples under the Hindu Religious Endowment Act. Now, only recently Travancore and Cochin abolished their service in the temples. If these girls have been tempted and turned into prostitutes while engaged in the service of the sacred temples, there is more likelihood of their becoming so while outside such holy influences. Again, we have to realise that these present day devadasis are not the same women as those in 1912 when legislation was first undertaken by the Central Government to put down the practice; and their number though smaller is being kept up by recruitment of new girls to the profession. So long as this system is tolerated by our society a certain number of helpless innocent young girls are bound to be drawn into this evil profession in as much as the licensed brothels (?) are the centres, the causative factors and the promoters of immoral traffic in women and children.

It is a well-known fact that there are certain still backward communities in South India as well as in Bombay and in Assam which train some of their girls for a life of prostitution and dedicate them ostensibly for temple service but actually for a life of prostitution and that whole families, mothers, and sisters very often live upon the earnings of one girl prostitute. The girl is helpless and leads a miserable life. There are also married women among those castes who are respectable. Why don't the married women of those castes learn and develop these arts and why are the dancers and singers kept unmarried? I quote an extract from the lecture delivered by Swami Vipulananda at the Senate House on 'Music and Art in Tamil literature': "On festive occasions when a chieftain held his court it was not considered complete unless the minstrel and his wife 'Padini' were present. While the minstrel played on his instrument, his wife generally sang and danced. They were respected. When the chieftain was pleased with them, he would present the minstrel with a gold lotus and his wife with a gold necklace. But in spite of these presents generally, the minstrel was poor. Like all artists he used to squander away his wealth. The minstrel's wife was chaste. A dancer was not then associated with prostitution. It was only subsequently, in the beginning of the 2nd century A. D., that the dancer became associated with prostitution."

Further these fine arts cannot be a monopoly of any particular individual or caste. It is not so in other countries. Why should it be in India? Nowadays a carpenter's son does not always become a carpenter and so also with all other professions. We cannot any more live in watertight compartments, the primary four castes of the Hindu fold cannot confine themselves to their respective professions as prescribed by our old Manu, and, therefore, our society need not any more manufacture a particular class of women named "Devadasis" whose practices, at least among the majority of them, are highly reprehensible, for keeping the art of music and dance alive. The Congress or any other association by giving their music and dance prominence will certainly revive and restore a system that has been found wicked and inhuman in the extreme and hence condemned by law and by all enlightened public opinion. The name of a "Devadasi" is deservedly more odious than that of an untouchable because of its invariable association with vice, and it is time now that the system that is productive of so much evil should be uprooted so that the name Devadasi may become obsolete in our dictionary.

My friend, Mr. T. Sivasankaram, seems to think that I have objection to unmarried women of any caste taking to music and dance and that I am unkind to the devadasis. I am sorry he has misunderstood me. I am sure this article of mine will clear all his doubts on that score and that he will see that I condemn the system so as to save the individuals who are the helpless and the innocent victims of the same.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND THE ITALY-ETHIOPIA WAR.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

Those who follow the Roman Catholic Press in India will notice a good deal of special pleading with regard to the war between Italy and Ethiopia. Roman Catholic writers pour contempt and hurl invectives on those who venture to ask in the public press why the Pope who has unquestioned spiritual authority over all Roman Catholics, is unable to influence Italy or the public opinion of Italy against her unwarranted attack on Ethiopia which world opinion has condemned. Here again, it is a sad case of the most well-organised Church which claims to be the only true and catholic Church being compelled by political circumstances and made unable or unwilling to give a real spiritual lead to the millions of her votaries. By "political" circumstances one means those things which affect the future glory and success of the Roman Catholic Church as a well-knit world-wide organisation. The Roman Catholic Church believes that she is the sole custodian of truths revealed by God through Jesus Christ for the salvation of the souls of men.

Reports that come from Italy of the attitude that the Roman Church as a whole takes to Mussolini's Fascism and of some of the utterances of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics about the war against Ethiopia, go to show that it is a similar mentality that prevails even today. The interests of the Roman Church occupy an important place in the policy pursued by modern Fascist Italy. In support of this view I will quote from a document recently written by an Italian citizen on Italian nationalism and circulated privately among an international group which is making a study of nationalism in different countries. This Italian writer says:

"We can say roughly that there are on one side the supporters of absolute idealism who try to give to the State the figure and form of an absolute being, standing by itself, totalitarian and self-sufficient,

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real1933.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

439

Some recent declarations of Mussolini are in line with this: "Fascism is revolutionary and therefore, a totalitarian, organic, complete, and not fragmentary or partial, renewal of the civic values. After the unique party the totalitarian State is necessary, that is to say the State absorbing in itself, in order to transform and valorise them, all the energies, all the interests, all the hopes of a people. Last and most important condition: it is necessary to live a period of very high ideal tension."

On the opposite side stands a large group of Catholic laymen, who advocate the complete identification of Fascism with Catholicism, trying to unite the two emblems of the crucifix and the tricolour for a more powerful expression of spiritual and political authority, not only in Italy but in the whole world. They see in Fascism a new and strong ally for the revalorisation of Catholicism and consider this alliance extremely useful for the improvement of Italy, which is in their minds the outstanding supporter of the Catholic faith. This current seems to be backed also by the great majority of Catholic priests who find in Fascism a higher respect for religion and a useful means of protection against anticlerical and Protestant propaganda.

The truth is that Fascism has helped to give a more important place in the national life to all the manifestations of the Catholic faith. The Concordat has given a new authority and a new freedom to the Catholic Church, not only by the creation of the Vatican State, but also by permitting the teaching of religion in all the public schools—elementary and secondary—according to the Catholic tradition, by giving a more important part in public life to Catholic priests, by helping foreign Catholic missions morally and financially. Even in the most characteristic and fundamental expressions of the fascist life the Catholic priests take part. They have their place as chaplains of the Fascist army. No official ceremony of any kind, from the inauguration of a new street to the blessing of a warship, can take place without the presence of some priest officiating in the name of the Church. Even in the strictly military celebrations they march ranged like officers and give their tribute of honour to the Duce or to his representatives.

The Catholic faith and the Catholic Church—and for Italy Catholicism and Christianity are the same thing—seem to go hand in hand with Fascism towards the same common end. From time to time some isolated voices arise in the Catholic field against this identification of the sacred and the profane, but their number and importance seem to be decreasing."

In the light of the analysis of the situation in Italy given above we can understand what the Roman Catholic Cardinal of Milan said recently, about the Italy-Ethiopia war. He stated that Italy was opening the doors of Ethiopia to our Catholic faith and Roman civilisation... We must co-operate with God in this national and Catholic mission above all at this moment when, in the fields of Ethiopia the standards of Italy carry to triumph the Cross of Christ to break the chains of slavery and open the path for the missionaries of the Gospel. To many in India these words coming from a Roman Catholic Cardinal in Italy will sound as a miserable falling away from the spirit of Jesus, the Prince of Peace.

Is not Ethiopia a Christian country and why is the Cardinal speaking of "opening the path for the missionaries of the Gospel"? The answer is to be found in the past conflict that the Church of Rome had with the Church of Ethiopia. In the 16th century Portuguese adventurers came with their guns and strategy to the West Coast of India to acquire wealth and promote the domains of the Church of Rome. Their methods met with success in the case of the helpless Syrian Christians of Malabar and so it is we find to-day a majority of them in obedience to the Pope of Rome. About the same time they went also to Ethiopia and prepared the way for the despatch of Jesuit missionaries. They succeeded in persuading the reigning Emperor to make formal submission to Rome which meant breaking way from the ancient Eastern Church of Ethiopia. But the nation rose in rebellion, the renegade Emperor was slain and the Jesuit Mission was expelled. It is one of the great ambitions of the Roman Church to reconquer the Ethiopian Church and bring it to the obedience of the Pope and in realising this end the present war which Italy is waging is considered as a God-sent means by the Roman Catholics. The statements that the Pope makes or does not make about the present war are to be viewed against this background.

THE SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE'S WORK FOR WOMEN.

At the recent Women's Conference in Bombay, one of the opinions urgently pressed by several delegates was that Industrial classes should be opened where poor and middle class women might learn to be more self-sufficient in their own homes, and where they might be enabled to supplement their husband's incomes by their own handicrafts. Several institutions and societies are already attempting such work for women, but none on such a large scale as the Social Service League.

It was in 1922 that Mahila Seva Mandal was started by the Social Service League for the purpose of organising Industrial schools for the benefit of women of the labouring and middle classes in Parel. There are now three branches of the Mandal—at Parel, Girgaum and Vile Parle. About 850 women take advantage of the classes daily, and a visit to any of these schools between the hours of 1 & 4 P.M. will reveal something of what has been achieved. Women who, on first attending, scarcely know how to hold a needle, learn to produce, in the course of their training, well cut and well finished garments of every description. Quite apart from the many economic advantages gained from this training, the sense of proficiency achieved, has its value for women, for they gain in self-confidence and self-determination in the realisation of their own attainments and powers of production. All the work is in the hands of competent teachers and one result of these Industrial schools is seen in the frequency with which ex-pupils start small classes of their own, and thus encourage spare-time industries and occupations amongst their neighbours and friends. Besides the making of such garments as are useful in the homes from which the women come, classes are also held in Fancy work, English, Home Nursing, and Home Hygiene. Since the Mahila Seva Mandal was first started, various other activities have been organised for the welfare and education of women, including Co-operative Societies, Travelling, Libraries, Debating classes, Excursions, Visits to Exhibitions and Lectures on suitable social subjects.

The demand for the type of instructions given at these Industrial Schools is so great that every centre is crowded, and visitors are at once impressed with the need for more accommodation for this work which meets such a popularly-felt need. The Parel and Girgaum centres are particularly in need of increased accommodation, for at present the classes are held in rooms loaned by other departments of the League's work or by outside institutions. This year the Social Service League, in celebrating its Jubilee, is anxious to build and establish a thoroughly well equipped Industrial School for women, in a

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

440

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14

realpatidar.com

building of its own on the vacant ground adjacent to the Working Men's Institute in Parel. Plans for this building are already to hand, and Rs. 1,000/- have been contributed by the late Lady Dorab Tata towards the Building fund. It is hoped that the public of Bombay will make the completion of the scheme possible, and will not fail to support one of its pioneer social institutions in this laudable enterprise.

These Industrial schools, it must be remembered, form only one department of the Social Service League's undertakings. For the last 25 years, the League has been a pioneer institution for the furtherance of social reform, and for the improvement of the conditions of life for the poor and labouring classes of Bombay. Educational work by means of publications, night schools, and Technical schools—Recreational work in the form of Dramas, Scouts, Gymnasiums and outings—Medical work in the form of dispensaries are amongst the many activities of the League. In times of calamity, the trained Life workers of the League have been requisitioned for the work of relief and reconstruction, and a glance at the reports of the League since its commencement reveal a meritorious record of steady and useful service on behalf of the needy in Bombay City and in other parts of the Presidency.

It is in order to support such good work that a Variety Entertainment is being held as a part of the League's Jubilee celebration. This entertainment will be given at the Opera House on March 21st at 9-30 P. M. The programme includes music and dancing, and number of attractive items by wellknown performers. His Excellency the Governor and Lady Brabourne have consented to be present. Arrangements are in the hands of a Committee of ladies under the Chairmanship of Mrs. Maneklal Premchand. Tickets may be had from Mrs. Kania, 102, Ridge Road. It is to be hoped that generously minded citizens will give this worthy cause their enthusiastic support.

HARIJANS AND CONVERSION.

The Editor,

Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I regretted your statement that all Harijans who had turned to Christianity in mass movements had done so for economic reasons. You, of course, knew that was not strictly true but did not stop to consider how untrue. Most of my twelve years as a missionary in India were spent among mass movement Christians. I am sure most of them made the change for spiritual reasons—not that Christianity per se has greater spirituality than Hinduism but that Hinduism had neglected Harijans in their great spiritual need and Christians pointed the only way they knew—the way of Christianity. It seems as though in their great economic extremity they would have turned to Christianity or Mohammedanism as a way of escape, but in this world things have a habit of being other than as they seem. I doubt very much if any of them made the change for purely materialistic reasons. The truth, likely enough, is somewhere between your view and mine.

In mass movement areas you will find that a very large proportion of doctors, nurses, teachers, and others working for a better India are mass movement Christians or their sons and daughters. Many mass movement Christians are not as fine as they should be; neither am I. Many are fine enough to humble my spirit to the dust. Take it far and wide, Christianity has many groups of which it has much greater cause to be ashamed than of its ex-Harijan followers. In fact, hang me for an ass if you like, but I think Harijans whether they are Christians or not are nice folks. I think the same of the aborigines. I wish I might spend my life with one or the other or both groups.

Of course, if or where, mass movements are brought about by proselytism, that is despicable. Jesus is clear enough on his attitude here and his true followers can take no other.

Your criticisms were a great help to me while I was in India and I am sure most missionaries feel the same. Let the good work go on. The situation is not as one sided as it must sometimes seem. Hinduism and other Eastern religions are more and more influencing Western thought. Many of us are using all the influence we have against the Exclusion Act and other hinderances to free intercourse and understanding. It will only be when we have learned to work it out together that we will ever find that Highest good for which we are all seeking.

Yours for Human Brotherhood, under God's universal and eternal Fatherhood, Ingomar, Montana,

U. S. A.
January 30, 1936.

MABEL E. SIMPSON.

We do not recall where we said that all harijans had become converts for economic reasons. A statement of that kind can only be made after a plebiscite which we have not taken. It is, nevertheless, true that many harijans and others have embraced Christianity in the hope that missionaries, like their Master, may perform miracles for them either by feeding them, or curing them of disease or, perhaps, by even raising their dead. We do not know of any missionary warning them that these miracles are beyond his power.—Ed., I. S. R.]

THE DOWRY EVIL.*

It is impossible to read without emotion the proceedings before the City Coroner's Court in the inquest on the death of the three sisters who committed suicide in circumstances not then fully known but believed to be pathetic. The tales of the father of the unfortunate girls and that of the surviving girl have fully confirmed what the public thought was at the bottom of the painful tragedy. The tale that this gentleman told will find a parallel in many middle class families. The dowry evil has ruined numberless families and has brought down to a low economic level the condition of the upper and the lower middle classes who represent the culture, the enlightenment and the spirit of sacrifice of the whole nation. Economic causes over which there is little or no control have already depressed the middle class and what little is left of the substance of this class is being ruined by a process of mutual destruction.

It was thought at one time that the spread of education among women would minimise the evil of extortionate dowry, but the reverse has been the case. It has become increasingly difficult to find suitable matches for fairly educated girls. Marriage is not the "prearranged affair" so far as the educated middle class is concerned as it was even a decade back. Parents have to be in search of matches that would be suitable to their daughters regard being had to the education the latter had received and the way they had been brought up. This, added to the difficulty arising out of the unwillingness of many educated young men to marry, has made the task of the parents of educated girls even more difficult. It was the fashion not long ago to say that the girls should remain unmarried to the same number or proportion as the young men do as is the case in many countries in the West. But a reaction has set in, in the light of recent experience. There is again the prevailing anxiety on the part of

*Amrita Bazar Patrika.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

441

the parents to give every girl in marriage. The result has been, as we pointed out in our previous article on the subject, that the demand has far exceeded the supply. The disadvantageous position in which the bride's party is placed is fully exploited by the other party who think nothing of ruining the parents of the girl whom they have brought to be adopted as one of their own daughters. There is a large element of selfishness in this business that has come to characterise the transition of our society from collectivism to individualism. On the groom's side the expectation has gone much higher than it ever was. They now expect, as the saying goes, "half a kingdom and a king's daughter". The girl should be a paragon of beauty, highly accomplished and must bring with her a handsome dowry in cash, ornaments and presents. With that spirit of sacrifice that has always characterised middle class families, parents often sacrifice all for a groom who they imagine would bring happiness to their daughter. This spirit of sacrifice in other fields, political and educational, has made Bengal what she is—the most advanced province in all India. By our mutual exploitation of this spirit of sacrifice we are only driving the Bengali race back to the condition of the least advanced provinces. If girls are committing suicide, we as a people are committing national suicide. It is only a strong public opinion organised for systematic propaganda and such drastic action as social boycott that can mitigate the evil. The indignation, disgust and sorrow for the terrible tragedy described in all its horrors before the Coroner's Court, should be harnessed for effective action if there is anything like conscience still left in a moribund society. Not every girl placed in the situation in which these young women of Garpar found themselves, is capable of mustering courage for suicide at the pitiable condition of their parents and the despicable conduct of their neighbours. But the feeling of hopelessness and the corroding anxiety are there devastating many homes that should otherwise be happy.

The dowry that is extorted in cash seldom goes to swell the bank balance of the receiver of it. It is spent on lavish entertainments, the idea being that the father of the bride should not only bear his own expenses on this account but also those of the other party. And to make the situation worse, the standard of such entertainments has gone high both in quality and in the number of guests that are to be invited. The old naturalness that assigned to every member of society his proper duty and obligations has given place to an artificial life that calls upon every person to live and spend beyond his means. It is not enough to combat the social evil of dowry but also the practice that has grown up of indulging in expenditure beyond one's means on such occasions as marriage to keep up an artificial social prestige or promote personal importance.

The Dowry Evil.—Writing to N. K. Akshi, who is grateful for the letter, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi observes: "I thank you for the article in the issue of the Indian Social Reformer dated February, 29 on the evils of the dowry system that is prevalent in our society. I am one with you there. We are running a Home for orphan girls and a hostel for unmarried girls of poor parents. I am trying to instil into them the idea that marriage alone should not be the end and aim of life. They should first make themselves economically independent and useful to the society. I value education for girls very much and I always emphasised that it is the first duty of all parents to give as much education to their girls as to their boys. We are also running a women's magazine Stri Dharma propagating the above ideas."

THE DOWRY EVIL II.*

We print elsewhere this editorial comments of the Amrita Bazaar Patrika of Calcutta on the revelations made in connection with the tragedy of three sisters who chose death to involving their parents in distress because of dowry demands. Our contemporary is the leading Hindu Nationalist Daily of Bengal and must be taken to be an authoritative exponent of conditions prevailing in Hindu Society to-day. Every one of the details narrated in impressive array, is significant and together throw light upon the evil, not as a survival from ancient days which may be expected to disappear under modern conditions, but as an active force which has taken on a new lease of life, calling to aid even those conditions which should be hostile to it.

Higher education of girls, it was hoped, would emancipate parents and girls from the dowry demon. The contrary result has occurred. Suitable husbands are hard to obtain for highly educated women. So the prices demanded have risen rapidly. This wail from Hindu Society, stated by the A. B. Patrika, receives remarkable confirmation in a Muslim correspondent's letter to the Statesman this week, wherein he makes the identical allegation with regard to Muslims. Less than a month ago the writer of this article met a group of College girls (Christians) of Madras who discussed the dowry evil. The group was emphatic that conditions in the community were getting worse and for precisely the same reason. One of them with a fine sense of humour remarked: "Boys will not study well and if we do, this is the result". To the question whether young men did not want educated wives in these days, the reply was that young men were not in favour of higher education of women as they were afraid of not securing wives less educated than themselves.

Evidence available in every community as mentioned above, points to the direct effects of higher education of women upon dowry rates. Social conditions are such and openings for employment so limited that the hope of educated women remaining unmarried as a challenge to iniquitous demands, has not been possible of achievement as a rule, though it is true that in several individual cases the emancipation has been worked out. The delay in marriage made possible by a stay at College has proved dangerous beyond a certain stage, for not many years elapse before girls are clearly ruled out of the marriage market. The dilemma whether to be educated or not is most perplexing, for what may happen in the latter case is illustrated in the front page advertisement appearing in last Monday's Hindu: "Wanted healthy beautiful Desastha bride with decent dowry."

On the men's side the demands are unrelenting. If a man is of moderate education, he does not tolerate equal intellectual capacity in the girl he would accept. If he is of more than average university attainments, there is literally no limit to the price he would place upon himself. In this respect, there is no difference whatever between the Indian Christian and the Hindu, though we gather that in some districts there are worse sinners than in others so far as Indian Christians are concerned.

The A. B. Patrika's description reveals a highly sinister aspect of modern dowry. Rates according to ancient ideas have been replaced by rates measured by one's professional or official standing. In the case where the recent tragedy occurred, the parent's social status remained at the level to which his official position had elevated him. The programme of squandering was determined by the bridegroom's party directly according to his measure

*The Guardian, Madras.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

442
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14

and not in relation to the future needs of the young persons contemplating marriage. Once a high official, always the same, according to the dowry schedule of rates even in the days of the parent's retirement.

We may understand continuance of the evil among the comparatively uneducated classes. But it is among them that we hear of youth organizations busy with reform. Backwardness in education of the conservative classes is a vulnerable point which reformers find it easy to assail, not without success. For the villager and his type in the towns, are at least impressed by arguments of the economic consequences of the practice, though they do not carry their conviction further. But 'enlightened' people and those in affluent circumstances are secure against this attack. Ostensibly they are well placed to stand the strain of bestowing gifts upon sons-in-law (in the name of daughters!) and the evil influence of the system does not occur to their minds. In so far as it is a system that they perpetuate and not voluntary action confined to their own class, it is their duty to break its sting by restoring in the system the idea of free gift and not keeping alive the idea of obligation. But the reform would be more far reaching than this, if the leaders of society reckoned the effect of the existence of dowry among them, upon the poorer classes. All this incentive to reform is absent, for the reason, as we have stated already, that the economic strain does not affect them.

The lesson of the suicide is that girls are willing to accept the challenge as many mentors desire. But it would appear that the course open to them is that of the sisters. Few parents there are, who wholeheartedly favour a life of single blessedness for their daughters, for perhaps the very good reason, that they will have little to do when employment is not available and conditions have not developed which favour dedicated service to different unselfish causes. To remain unmarried still carries with it a stigma or at least an attitude of grudging toleration on the part of society which does not make for happiness.

Although the social reform movement has become merged in recent years in the general national awakening and has been strengthened thereby, there is need to restore some of the older methods of social reform. Particularly bad evils have to be singled out for concentrated attack and the dowry evil snapping the life of all communities, is one such.

HARIJAN LEADER'S WARNING.

In Dalitabandhu, a weekly Marathi paper edited and published by Mr. P. N. Rajbhoj, Secretary of the All India Depressed Classes League and leader of the Parvati Temple Satyagraha, an article under the heading, "Dangers of Exaggeration" appeared. For the following English translation of the article, we are indebted to the Maratha.

"Those who were dazzled by English education and mechanical advance viewed all things in India as worst and described them in exaggerated terms by comparing them with similar worst things in the West. The untouchable community was placed on a parallel with the slaves like the Negroes and we are told that the contemptuous treatment by Europeans of the Hindus in Africa and India is a result of the sin of observing untouchability which the Hindus had committed. Even those who have taken a vow of truth and non-violence, really violate the truth by using strong language in this respect.

Modernists like the communists, socialists etc., have declared the untouchables to be the slaves of Sanatani capitalists. These talkers have no knowledge of the fact that the untouchables have amongst themselves Sanatani capitalists. There can be no comparison between the untouchability of the untouchables and the slavery of the Negroes. Nor can the independent Harijan artisans following their ancestral industries be in any way likened to the millhands. But the bookish Pandits would not care to look to actual facts. They will keep to their books and their sensational outbursts.

The Aryans who came from the North made slaves of some of the original inhabitants of this country and discarded others as untouchables. Out of those untouchable classes some remained on the outskirts of the Aryan colonies doing dirty and despised work and others lived away from them in forests and hills. Some researchers tell us that the present Bhils and forest tribes are the descendants of the latter. This research is of the European type and utterly unfounded. Even if that is accepted, it is obvious that the Vedic Aryans did not tyrannise the original inhabitants in the way in which the Muslim and European invaders did in other countries. Even at present the wrongs done to untouchables are nothing when compared with the treatment given to the Negroes and the atrocities perpetrated by Muslims and Europeans.

Modern educated Hindus have used stronger words than Miss Mayo about the caste system, the dress of Hindus, the climate of Hindustan and the condition of Hindu women, as they use strong words about untouchability. The Hindu society is suffering now from the effects of their exaggeration. Dr. Ambedkar's declaration of the determination of conversion is one of these evil results. Otherwise Dr. Ambedkar would not have wished to leave a religion so tolerant, comprehensive and full of perfection as Hinduism.

It cannot be gainsaid that the Hindus should abolish the custom of untouchability with the march of the times. But it is foolish to suppose that untouchability was imposed on the untouchables by others as slavery or persecution. Because the untouchables themselves of their own accord observed it as a religious duty. But this never came in the way of their freedom or prosperity. Nobody among the Hindus entertains the idea of liberty as freedom to marry or take food with anybody. That idea of liberty was never cherished by the Hindus in general and therefore the untouchables also amongst them. Every other freedom the untouchables did possess from olden times. There are many rich untouchables now and there were many in the past.

It is a wrong idea that untouchability itself means moral degradation. The untouchables do have a moral code of their own like that of every other Hindu caste. There were saints and morally great men amongst untouchables in the past and there are even now. Untouchability came into existence owing to the occupations. As all other Hindus are abandoning their ancestral occupations it has become difficult even to preserve the caste system. How will then untouchability survive? Differences in caste do not mean high or low status, so also untouchability does not involve the idea of depravity or dirty living. It is an exaggerated notion of untouchability which should be henceforward avoided.

The man who exaggerates things and the man about whom the exaggerations are indulged in, both suffer thereby. False ideas about the custom of untouchability have greatly harmed the untouchables as well as the caste Hindus. By these exaggerations of the reformers they may have satisfied their own objectives but the untouchability did not disappear. The untouchable youths should bear this in mind.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

443

and give up these exaggerations. It is no greatness to be always an object of pity of others. By indulging in the ideal talk that the caste Hindus tyrannised us for generations and generations we seem to admit that all our ancestors were divorced from humanity. The untouchable youths should never lose sight of this.

We cannot improve our lot by abusing caste Hindus. If we go to outsiders saying that these caste Hindus deprived us of everything, the outsiders may sympathise with us for some reasons, but these outsiders realise the fact that we are people who can be deprived of everything, what else would then the outsiders do to us than depriving us? It is therefore, suicidal to call us down-trodden, backward, deprived etc. Nobody can hinder our advance based on the reliance on our own selves. We must have the grit and the courage to do it.

How will the Muslims and Europeans fail to plunder people who are deprived of everything even by the god-fearing and docile Hindu? And that kind of thing is already happening. Therefore, although by exaggerating our ills we evoke sympathy and compassion from others the exaggeration results in making us helpless and hopeless. The Harijan youths should recognise this and should avoid exaggeration and should not be misled by exaggerations indulged in by others. Human nature is the same every where. The way of advance is open for those who have the strength and courage. The weak and imbecile are always doomed to dependence on others.

SANCTIONS: ARE THEY RIGHT OR WRONG?

(DR. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES.)

If we study sanctions as laid down by the League of Nations, we will see that they are substantially of three kinds. These are economic sanctions, military sanctions, and outlawry sanctions.

Of these, the least important, it seems to me, is the outlawry sanction which provides that an offending member may be banished from the League of Nations. It is the least important because obviously, it is the least effective. The League of Nations, unfortunately, is not strong enough today in world affairs to make it a matter of any great concern to any nation as to whether it is a member of the League or not. There may come a time when the League of Nations will be so powerful that exclusion from its membership would be as disastrous as exclusion of any one of the States from the United States; but at a time when three of the greatest nations of the earth, Japan, Germany and the United States, are outside the membership of the League, and when the chief problem is not that of asking nations to leave, but to persuade them to come in or stay in, this threat of banishment is not a sanction of any serious consequence. On the contrary, in the present crisis, it is Italy which is threatening to leave the League, rather than the League which is threatening to make her leave. Not until membership in the League has become an asset and not a liability, a privilege rather than a responsibility, will this sanction against war be anything more than a scrap of paper.

This leaves but two sanctions for our consideration—economic sanctions and military sanctions. Of these two sanctions I believe that military sanctions as a means of preventing war are absolutely impossible, for the simple reason that such sanctions constitute in themselves an act of war. They are but the latest version, so to speak, of "a war to end war" which was fought out with such dreadful results in the great conflict of 1914. Let us consider for a moment, what is contemplated in this business of military sanctions.

Here is a nation which has gone to war against another nation in violation of its solemn compact to keep the peace. Under this idea of military sanctions, it is proposed that the other nations of the world shall get together to consider, as Article XVI of the League covenant puts it, "what effect military, naval or air force the members shall contribute to the armed forces to use to protect the covenants of the League." Note, if you please, that the armed forces are to be used, used to impose force upon the nation which is making war upon its neighbour. But when military, naval or air forces are used, what, I ask you, is this but war? A military sanction is simply one more endeavour to sanctify the war process, and I tell you, it cannot be done!

This brings us, lastly, to the question of economic sanctions. By this we mean the use of financial and commercial controls, to the end of peace. There are those opposed to this type of sanctions for the same reason that they are opposed to military sanctions—on the grounds, namely, that such sanctions constitute an act of war, or at least contain within themselves the seeds of war. George Lansbury of England, saintly and devoted man, whose name I cannot speak without reverence, took this position when he resigned from the leadership of the British Labor Party on the issue of sanctions either economic or military; and Lansbury was right in the sense that in England, at that time, it was proposed that economic sanctions against Italy should be enforced if necessary by the military—in this case, by the English fleet at Gibraltar, Malta and Alexandria. Such mingling of military and economic forces was bound, in the end, to make war and George Lansbury knew it, and it might well, therefore, be also described as an act of war.

What I want to point out here is that economic sanctions are not necessarily entangled with armies and navies. They need not, they should not, be enforced by any military action. Economic sanctions, I would emphasize, are to be judged upon their own merits as a control in the directions of national policy to the end of securing national and international interests of human welfare. Nobody objects to such control and directions of national policy in time of peace—not, at least, on the ground that it involves anything like an act of war. When a country, for example, imposes a tariff upon the goods of another country, it is not written in any book, neither is it believed by any public opinion, that the first country is thereby going to war against the second country. A tariff may be as abominable as you please, but it is not an act of war.

We know what war is, you and I. We know that war is an attack upon a nation with weapons of force and violence to the end of destroying the property, killing the citizens, and breaking the powers of the enemy. Why should economic sanctions be confused, either actually or potentially, with such a phenomenon, especially when these sanctions are definitely used to prevent it, or, if it cannot be prevented, to end it without delay.

So far from regarding economic sanctions as an act of war, I for one must insist upon regarding them as an alternative to war—the only alternative we have to a war which is sure to come if economic sanctions be not promptly and effectively applied. For what are we going to do, I ask you, when a nation like Japan or Italy violates its solemn pledge to peace and proceeds to make a war which throws the entire world into confusion and disorder? We cannot

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

444

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14

pick up the gauntlet of battle and fight ourselves, for this, as we have seen, would only compound the crime which we would prevent or overcome. But does this mean we must do nothing in opposition to this offense, and by doing nothing perhaps even aid the offender in his evil doing? Is there no effectual alternative to armed resistance but inaction, acquiescence and surrender?

Mahatma Gandhi of India, let me remind you, did not think so. He met this dilemma by an act of statesmanship which was as wise as it was idealistic. Gandhi would not take up arms against the British, even for so sacred a thing as liberty. His principles of non-violence forbade such a policy. But neither would Gandhi surrender to the crown, give up the fight and accept the condition of subservience to alien rule. His principles of resistance forbade such a policy. But surrender was only one alternative in his mind to violent resistance. Another alternative, destined forever to be associated with Gandhi's name, was non-violent resistance. He would resist British rule by organizing his fellow-countrymen to withdraw all relations with the Empire. At the heart of his non-violent movement of revolt were economic sanctions which took the form of a boycott of English goods intended for the Indian market, and an embargo upon Indian goods intended for the English market. When Gandhi heaped up great piles of English cotton cloth in the city of Bombay and burned them in a solemn ceremony of public sacrifice, he showed the power as well as the drama of economic sanctions.

Now, it is sanctions of this kind which I believe can be effectually add rightly applied to nations which break the solemn covenant of peace. Once it is understood that these sanctions are not to be sustained by any appeal to arms, I doubt if there will be any disagreement among us upon this point, except perhaps, on the question as to how far such sanctions should be applied.

The refusal of loans and credits, therefore, signifies opposition to a war and desire to stop it, as their bestowal assuredly signifies a desire to have it go on.

A second economic sanction to which we must all agree is the refusal of arms and munitions to any nation that ventures to go to war. To furnish such arms and munitions is to make an even more direct contribution than to furnish money. It is a supply at first-hand of the weapons of destruction without which the war cannot be continued even for a single hour.

But if arms and munitions must be forbidden, why not raw materials which go into the production of such weapons? Is there not here suggested a third economic sanction which challenges our unanimous support? A few weeks after President Roosevelt, acting under the power granted to him by Congress in the famous Neutrality Act, had banned the sale of all arms and munitions both to Italy and Ethiopia, it was discovered that ships here in New York harbor were being loaded to the gunwales with scrap iron for Italy. This was an anomalous, not to say an absolutely ridiculous, situation, for scrap iron, next only perhaps to dynamite, is undoubtedly the most essential ingredient that is involved in the manufacture of explosives. And here we were shipping tons of this iron to Italy at the very moment when we were setting ourselves up to live under a ban of neutrality as against both the belligerent powers in Northeast Africa. All of which means, to my mind at least, that an economic sanction against arms be supplemented by a similar sanction against the iron, the ores, the nitrate, and all other substances which contribute to the production or use of arms! We must ban the raw materials as well as the finished article of warfare.

To these three economic sanctions against credits, arms, and the materials of arms, there can be no reasonable opposition. Trouble being only when we come to things which enter into the business of peace as well as the business of war. Cotton, for example, is as necessary to the manufacture of explosives as nitro-glycerine; but cotton must also be used to clothe the nakedness of men. Steel is basic to the construction of tanks and battleships, but steel is also basic to the construction of railroads, office buildings, automobiles, and the myriad machines of industry. Food is as indispensable to soldiers as their guns and cartridge belts. Napoleon said that "an army travelled upon its stomach," by which he meant that an army can move only as fast and far as it can be fed by its commissary department. But food is also indispensable to women, children, and the aged. Italy cannot live without the importation of vast quantities of food which, in the division, must go equally to the military forces.

Now, what are we going to do with a situation of this kind which involves articles as necessary to life as to war itself—articles, therefore, which belong to the routine of peace as well as to the business of war? To this question I have never seen but one satisfactory answer, and that is the one offered to the Congress of the United States at the present time by the National Peace Conference in its redraft of the existing neutrality law of the nation. This National Peace Conference, in addition to the present embargo on loans and credits and the further embargo on munitions, would also put general raw materials of every kind such as cotton, oil, and food products which are useful in war and also useful in peace, on a definite quota basis in accordance with the pre-war trade of immediately preceding years. Such provision will protect the population of the belligerent country. If they suffer at all, it will be because of the action of their own government, and not because of anything that we ourselves have done.

Now, such, to my mind, is the program of economic sanctions, which I believe must be adopted for the modern world, in lieu of any effective means of preserving peace against the degradation of bandit nations. This program is justified not merely by expediency, but quite as much by the standards of right and wrong. The sanctions involved are right as adjudged by the principles of self-respect and by every ideal of a free, ordered and happy world. They are properly being applied to Italy today, as they should properly have been applied to Japan yesterday. Not otherwise, I venture to suggest, amid the complexities and confusions, the hazards and dangers of our contemporary life, can our civilization hope longer to survive. At their best, these sanctions may save our world.

INSCRIPTIONS AND MONUMENTS DISCOVERED.

Important inscriptions and monuments, throwing considerable new light on ancient Indian history and culture were discovered by Dr. A. S. Altekar, Manindra Chandra Nandi Professor of Ancient Indian History and Culture, Benares Hindu University, in the course of a tour in Kotah State arranged under the State auspices with the help of the State Historian Dr. Mathuralal Sharma. The oldest among the inscriptions are three stone sacrificial posts, commemorating the sacrifices performed by three sons of a Mokhari Commander-in-Chief. These pillars bear inscriptions dated in the year 295 of the Vikrama era, and thus prove for the first time the existence of rulers of the Mokhari as early as the 3rd century A. D.

Three inscriptions of the Gupta period were recovered, out of which one records the dedication of a 'Siva Linga'. An inscription of the Paramara

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

445

King Udayaditya, recording the grant of a village to a temple of Somanath was discovered in a temple, of Vishnu, showing hereby that Somanatha had to vacate the sanctum in favour of Vishnu, some time during the course of the last few centuries. Another inscription in the same temple, belonging to the Paramara period, records numerous private benefactions made to God Somanatha. An inscription recording the grant of a village by king Jayasinh to his poet laureate Narayana was also discovered. Numerous inscriptions were recovered showing that Buddhism and Jainism were flourishing in the State during the period 800-1200 A. D.

Among the monuments discovered may be mentioned the remains of two temples of the Gupta period discovered at Mukundara, three temples of about the 9th century discovered at Bhimnagar and a beautiful temple full of exquisite carvings, of about 10th century discovered at Kamagadh.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE
NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT - BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	" 20,00,000
RESERVE FUND	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt., C.I.E., (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dasabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda, Raj Ratna Bhallal Dalibhai Amin, B.A., M.S.C. I., (Managing Agent, Alomib Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratani (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Bombay.)

Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B.A., LL.B., A.M. Pm Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-36

Bombay.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14]

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

AHMEDABAD.

AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)

CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)

NAGPUR CITY.

POONA.

POONA CITY.

RAJKOT.

SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.
CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. FOCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL

CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Karad (District Satara)	Dhulia (District West Khandesh)
Tasgaon (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Satara (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Sindkheda (" ")
Shivgaon (" ")	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Ahmednagar (" ")	Satana (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Kalwan (" ")
Palghar (" ")	Dohad (District Panhale)
Kalyan (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Akudj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chuntiaf V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Esq.,	B. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhows D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
B. G. Saria, Esq.,	D. W. Bank, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	D. B. Lakshminarayan, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

447

realpatidar.com

QUALITY 1.

So-called cheap silk fabrics do let you do want any time and cost you more in the long run because they are made down to a price and not up to a standard.

Mysore Government Silk Weaving Factory fabrics are recognised throughout India for their superior quality, reliability and attractiveness and are guaranteed free from admixture either with artificial silk or foreign yarn.

The choice is in your hands.

Buy Mysore Georgettes, Mysore Crepes and Mysore Satins and have full satisfaction.

Leading Stockists.

Agents:—

The Mysore Products, Princess Street, BOMBAY.

The Mysore Silk Depot, Swadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	20s Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
Outside the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	21s. Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars. Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,

Phoenix, Natal.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJANI BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJANI DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

448

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 14

realpatidar.com

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by S. Waminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor :—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MARCH 21, 1936. No. 29

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice : I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Pandit Malaviya in Nasik.
Church Car-Pulling in Chetpat.
Qadians and Muslim.
Marriage Extravagance.
To hold or to let go.
Indo-British Contacts.
American Tribute to British Genius.
Some Qualifications.
The Negro Delegation.
Nasis and Catholics.
Marriage in Mauritius.
Representation of the Scheduled Castes.

The Two Ways.
Hammond Committee's Report and Women's Constituencies.
Caste in the Indian Church.
Trade Treaty Between India and U. S. A.
Scouting.
Marie Stopes on Birth Control.
Munim—Kadiani Controversy.
Catholics in the third Reich.
The Bishops' Conference at Fulda.
A European's view of Caste.
George Santayana.

NOTES

Pandit Malaviya in Nasik:—Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya has been in Nasik nearly the whole of this week on his mission of removing the blot of untouchability on Hindu Society. He has had a wonderfully enthusiastic reception from all classes and he has discussed the problem with orthodox leaders and leaders of the depressed classes. A small faction of caste Hindus has tried to obstruct his work. It was reported to have gone even to the extent of attempting physical coercion though we find it hard to believe that any section of Hindus, however much they may disapprove the of Pandit's views, would dare to lay violent hands on one who is the greatest Hindu of our time. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya has never changed except when change was forced on him by the need of the country. He has been the same simple, courteous, patient, devout Hindu, meticulously scrupulous in the observance of the rules and practices of orthodoxy, all through the seventy-five years of his life. No Shastry can claim to be more deeply versed in the sacred lore or to have been more loyal to the dictates of his dharma than Panditjee. When he feels it is his imperative duty at his age and in the weak condition of his health, to devote his energies to persuade his fellow Hindus to give up the notion of untouchability and to treat their brethren of the depressed classes as they treat one another among themselves, Hindudom is profoundly moved and the hour has struck for the extinction of this ancient wrong to millions of men and women who have never swerved in their devotion to the Hindu dharma. Panditjee has not been able to secure immediately his three specific objects in going to Nasik. They were to get the depressed classes admitted into the Kalarama temple, to have their right to participate in the car festival recognised by their fellow Hindus, and to secure freedom to them to bathe in the sacred pools in the bed of the Godavari. But there is not the least doubt that his visit has shaken orthodoxy to its foundations not only in Nasik but all over India. It is now a question not of years but of months and weeks when this hideous prejudice will pass out of Hindu mentality. The deepest gratitude of all Hindus is due to the venerable Pandit for his services in this cause.

Church Car-Pulling in Chetpat:—While the five year old controversy over the right of the Hindu castes, classed hitherto as untouchable, to join in drawing the car of the Kalarama temple at Nasik, seems to be in a fair way to settlement, an analogous affair is reported from a village in the North Arcot district of the Madras Presidency among high caste and low caste Catholic Christians. The Roman Catholics in the south of India, have retained their old manners and customs even in their religious observances. (In Western India they have Portuguese names, and affect western dress and manners, but cherish at heart and in social relations the pride or prejudice of their ancestral Hindu castes.) One of these old customs is drawing a heavy wooden wheeled structure in which the image of the Deity (Virgin Mary in this case) is placed, round the four streets which run parallel to the four sides of the temple in most South Indian towns. This year the Bishop of North Arcot directed that low caste Christians should be allowed to join their high caste fellows in this act of devotion. The latter strongly objected and even the Archbishop was unable to shake them from their opposition. As a breach of the peace seemed likely, the Magistrate banned the function in the interest of law and order. We reproduce an account of the incident with the comments of the Guardian of Madras.

Qadians and Muslim:—Reference has been made in these columns to the controversy between some Muslims and Qadians in the Punjab (Reformer February 1). The quarrel shows signs of spreading to other provinces. There are only about 4000 Qadianis in Bombay city out of a total Muslim population of 209,000. A child aged eighteen months of Qadiani parents died the other day. When the little body was taken to the Muslim cemetery, it was denied burial on the ground that its parents belonged to the Qadian sect. The matter was taken to the Commissioner of Police who was not able to bring about agreement

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com 450

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 21

between the parties. As a last resource he, in consultation with the Municipal Commissioner, secured a separate area for a Qadiani cemetery and the child was buried there after the body had been kept for a night in the morgue. A fuller account of the incident will be found on another page.

Marriage Extravagance:—The ashes of the three sisters who committed suicide because their father could not find them adequate dowries without which they could not secure bridegrooms, are still warm. It is notorious that the larger part of the sums paid as dowry—is usually spent in tamashas or entertainments, to relatives and friends. In other words, extravagance in expenditure on these tamashas is at the root of the dowry evil; and social reformers for many years past have been exhorting people to avoid needless expenditure on marriage entertainments. A public-spirited citizen of Allahabad has opened a temple where marriages can be celebrated at minimum cost with all necessary religious rites. The most effective way of bringing about this reform, which involves the happiness and even lives of thousands of young women, is by example. Men in affluent circumstance, should set the example. They should understand that men who are not so fortunately placed are obliged to follow their example not necessarily from a vainglorious motive but to protect their daughters from the taunts which the husband's relatives often heap upon the girl who brings a poor or no dowry. Within the last few days we have seen reports of marriages in wealthy families celebrated with an extravagance of pomp and show bordering on the callous, in more than one part of the country. It will be asked why, if a man can afford it, he should not please himself and his friends by spending lavishly on such occasions. The reason as we have said, is, he sets a bad example, he puts up bridegroom prices, makes it difficult for girls in less affluent families to set up homes for themselves and, in the last analysis, is responsible for great hardship to thousands of families, which lead to tragedies as in the case of the three sisters.

To hold or to let go:—Speaking at a banquet in celebration of the Jubilee of the Aitchison College in Lahore, an institution founded fifty years ago for the education of the scions of landholding and ruling families, Sir Herbert Emerson, Governor of the Punjab, observed: "In England the families with a stake in the country, whatever changes have occurred, have throughout realized their responsibilities for its welfare, have kept their hold on public life and public service, and have continuously not only consolidated their own ranks, but have added to their strength by co-opting to them all that was outstanding in commerce, industry, science and the professions; and the result in sum total has been that, whatever the changes, an atmosphere of sobriety and prudence has prevailed, and in many cases the statesmen and public men of today continue to be drawn from families which occupied these positions in the days of Queen Elizabeth or even earlier—men imbued with the inspiration and tradition of generations devoted to promoting great national destinies and the public service. You have learnt many things from England. Let her teach you this lesson also: 'Do not lose hold.' We doubt if this is the right view to take. The British ruling class or caste accepted Disraeli as its leader notwithstanding its strong prejudice against him as a political adventurer and a Jew. It accepted Lloyd George as its Prime Minister at one of the greatest crises in English history, although a few years previously it had denounced him as a 'Welshman and a thief' for proposing land taxes in his Budget. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald remarked to his colleagues when he first became Prime Minister, "Now all the Duchesses will want to kiss me." The Irish leaders who were one day denounced as murderers with whom no Government could honourably negotiate, were the very next day or week acclaimed as patriots the disinterestedness of whose motives should be considered in connection with their crimes. The lesson to be learnt from these examples by the students of the Aitchison College, seems to us to be the very opposite of what His Excellency told them. To yield at the right moment and not to cling to their privileges with fanatical persistence, is the moral which they should learn from their British exemplars.

Indo-British Contacts:—A promising sign of the development of a closer understanding between the British and Indian peoples is that afforded by the tendency of recent British foreign policy to approximate to Indian sentiments. That this is not the result of conscious adaptation but is the outcome of the logic of events, makes it all the more significant. This was the case notably in the Ethiopian affair. When the Laval-Hoare Pact was indignantly rejected by Britain, India felt that the British mind was in this matter inspired by the same purpose as itself. Notwithstanding Herr Hitler's recent remarks about India, which have been resented, Indian opinion is inclined favourably to Germany in her desire to be mistress in her own house, as the Aga Khan aptly put it on the eve of his departure last week to attend the League of Nations session. British official opinion is necessarily constrained in expressing itself by antecedent commitments, but there can be no doubt that public opinion in that country will never sanction any hostile action against Germany. Germany's re-arming in violation of the Versailles Treaty has been acquiesced in as inevitable in the circumstances. The Locarno Pact does not essentially differ from that Treaty. Technically, no doubt, Germany signed it of her free will. It was, indeed, the idea of Stresemann to have such a Pact. But Stresemann's action was condemned by German opinion at the time. The Locarno Pact was denounced as a shameful treaty by his own colleagues in the Ministry of the day. More than that, "the European idea"

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

451

which Stresemann saw embodied in the Pact, dropped out of sight almost as soon as the Pact was signed. If it had materialised Herr Hitler would not be the German Dictator today. These are hard facts which even the decision of the Hague International Court can not change.

American Tribute to British Genius:—The Unity of Chicago pays a fervent tribute to British character, commenting on Mr. Baldwin's declaration two months ago that Government would take over the coal mines of the Kingdom and operate them as a national enterprise for the use and service of all the people. It observes: "Ever since the famous Sankey inquiry, this step has seemed inevitable. Not otherwise could ruinous competition be eliminated, disastrous waste ended, and decent labor conditions established. And now the English are going to take the step, by action not of the Laborites but of the Tories, and everybody seems to be content. Theory, in other words, prejudice, dogmatism, are not allowed to operate in the English mind in a case of this kind. These cousins of ours simply face a situation as it is, do what has to be done, and then pass on to the next items of business. And, in the process, vast revolutions are achieved with no violence or bloodshed, with scarcely even a tremor of disturbance. What is there in the English genius which works this miracle? Why can't Americans be equally sensible and efficient? We do not know. But that the English, at home and abroad, are the greatest masters of government, since the Romans, is obvious."

Some Qualifications:—No great genius is needed to bow to the inevitable, as the nationalisation of the coal mines had become in Great Britain. We may be sure that the owners get better terms from the Tory than they would have got from a Socialist Government if they had held out against Mr. Baldwin's proposal. The British 'genius' for bloodless revolutions is, in any case, confined only to Britain. Outside, the genius seems to evaporate. The operations against the rebel colonists who founded the United States, were far from bloodless. The Indian Mutiny, the Boer War, and, more recently, Jallianwala Bagh, and the Irish "Black and Tans" are other instances. While bloodshed arouses horror and evokes public sympathy, some of the most excruciating forms of human suffering are unaccompanied by bloodshed and, therefore, pass unnoticed. The treatment of the suffragettes in Britain before the War, did not bring out the best side of the British character. Thousands of families in this country were made miserable, several ruined, by the Ordinance rule penalising peaceful picketting to promote swadeshi and to discourage the liquor habit.

The Negro Delegation:—The Canadian Student for February writes that the visiting delegation of Negroes to India from the United States Student Christian Movement was receiving everywhere a cordial welcome. This is true though we wish they had had greater opportunities of reaching a much larger circle than they did. The delegation did not come into close touch with the living, moving currents of Indian life. It was rather handicapped from the start by its quasi-religious character. The Christian message delivered through the delegation sounded either pathetic or else professional. The Canadian Student observes: "A people who can point to a striking development of their innate qualities under modern conditions, which are by no means favourable to their growth, have a more stirring message to modern India than our country's heritage created in a far distant past." Every one who came in contact with the members of the delegation, was much impressed by their intellectual and moral calibre but their presentation of the Christian message, through no fault of theirs, suffered from lack of grounding in the religious thought of India.

Nazis and Catholics:—We publish in another column a communication stating that there is an early possibility of a settlement of the differences between German Catholics and the Nazi Government. These differences are clearly summarised by the Foreign Policy Society of New York in its last fortnightly report on "Religion in the Third Reich." Two thirds of the population of Germany are Protestants, the remaining third is Catholic. The Reich has constituted the Protestant sects, collectively called Evangelicals, into a national Church of Germany of which the heads are appointed by the Chancellor-President. This can not be done in the case of the Catholics who owe spiritual allegiance to His Holiness the Pope. One of the crucial points at issue between the Reich and the Vatican, is the law relating to compulsory sterilisation. With the general principle and policy of the Nazi State, most German Catholics are in agreement. Herr Hitler is himself a Catholic. In the religious sphere, the main difference between the Reich and the Catholic Church is that, while the former aims at eliminating Jewish elements from Christianity including the whole of the Old Testament, the latter holds that without the Old Testament, Christianity has no meaning. It is interesting to note that the Tannenberg Bund, inspired by General Ludendorff and his wife, attacked Christianity on the ground that the Bible was not original and that important elements in it were merely borrowed from Indian sources. It will be interesting to know how the fundamental differences between Nazism and the Catholic Church, are sought to be reconciled.

Marriage in Mauritius:—Every country has its own problems. In India for a single vacant job hundreds of applications pour in. There are no doles for the unemployed here. In Tottenham, England, Mayor E. A. Jay published the letter of an unnamed British soldier stationed in Mauritius, asking for a wife "who is blonde, lively, a non-smoker, about five feet three, not too plump." Mayor Jay got applications from 250 British women, and forwarded them to Mauritius.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, March 21, 1936.

REPRESENTATION OF THE SCHEDULED CASTES.

The Hammond Committee in their Report have dwelt at length on the perplexities created by the Poona Pact in devising a scheme for election to the seats reserved for the scheduled castes known hitherto as the untouchable castes. The important clause of the Pact is as follows: "Election to these (reserved) seats shall be by joint electorate, subject, however, to the following procedure: all the members of the depressed classes registered in the general electoral roll of a constituency, will form an electoral college, which will elect a panel of four candidates belonging to the depressed classes for each of such reserved seats by the method of the single vote, and the four persons getting the highest number of votes in such primary election shall be the candidates for election by the general electorate." The circumstances in which the Pact was framed are well known and they precluded a detailed consideration of its implications. Some of the latter were quite obvious at the time. In a leading article immediately after the conclusion of the Pact (Reformer, October 1, 1932) we wrote: "Two objections to the proposed primary elections strike us. One is that the community will have to find six hundred men (for the 150 reserved seats in all the Legislatures) to stand at the general election with the certainty that three fourths of the number will not be returned. Even if in consideration of the special circumstances of the community the deposit required of candidates be waived, the expenses of an election would still be a heavy burden to them. An even more serious objection is that the primary elections must lead to rival canvassing by the candidates; and even in more advanced and politically experienced communities election quarrels do not cease with elections. Would it be wise or safe to expose the infant electorates to risks of this kind?" The Pact is now an integral part of the Communal Award incorporated in the Government of India Act, and these doubts and difficulties were beyond the scope of the Hammond Committee. But there were others with which they had to grapple before they could frame a scheme of election for the seats reserved for the scheduled castes. The first question which they had to consider was whether the panel of candidates to be elected at the primary election, should consist of only four, or may consist of more or less than four. The number, four, was certainly not a minimum, as the caste Hindu opinion before the Committee is said to have maintained. There would be numerous difficulties in getting even four men of the scheduled castes to stand at the primaries. The Committee has rightly decided that the four is not obligatory and that, if there is only one candidate as the result of the primary election or on account of subsequent withdrawals, that candidate should be returned unopposed for the reserved seat at the final election. The primary election will, in that case, be a formality. Gandhiji has recently stated that if it is found to be inconvenient or unnecessary, it is not obligatory to hold a primary election.

Another question which the Committee considered was whether, under the Pact, an otherwise qualified voter could stand for a general seat without submitting himself to a primary election. The Poona Pact did not take away the right of a voter to stand as a candidate in his electorate. A Maratha or a woman is not disqualified to stand for the general seats, though they have some seats reserved for them. It cannot be different in the case of the scheduled castes. The wording of the Pact is peremptory that only a candidate chosen at the primary election, shall be a candidate for election by the general electorate. But the Pact deals only with the reserved seats. Not only would it have been against the main object of the Pact to impose restrictions on the freedom of candidates irrespective of caste to compete for the unreserved seats. It would have been an interference with the right of a general constituency to elect the best man available to represent it in the Legislature. A Bombay general constituency is surely entitled without the formality of going through a primary election to elect Dr. Ambedkar for an unreserved seat. So also a Madras constituency to elect Mr. M. C. Raja. The Pact was intended to secure a minimum of representation to the scheduled castes beyond the chances of a contested election. The Committee has decided that, in all provinces except Bengal, there should be no restriction on a member of the scheduled castes standing for an open seat. The exception made in the case of Bengal, is sought to be justified on the ground that, in the other provinces, the proportion of the scheduled castes to the whole electorate is so small as to render unnecessary the provision that only candidates on the panel of primary elections should stand for the open seats. This is hardly convincing. The heavens will not fall if both the reserved and unreserved seats in a general constituency are won and held by candidates belonging to the scheduled castes. 'Untouchability' as it exists in Bengal and so far as it exists there, is a very mild variety of it as it prevails in Malabar or South India. In fact, some authorities hold that what exists in Bengal cannot be classed in the same category. One large caste, the Rajabansis numbering over 1,800,000 who were included among the scheduled castes by the Bengal Government, demanded to be excluded and the Indian Franchise Committee agreed that they should be excluded. There is a strong case for drastic revision of the scheme of the Pact as well as of the Hammond Committee based on it, so far as they concern Bengal. The

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1938
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

453

Marquis of Zetland, the present Secretary of State for India, in a paper read before the East India Association on the reforms had declared that, in his opinion, the Poona Pact would operate with great harshness and great unfairness, especially in Bengal. The grounds on which the Delimitation Committee recommend making an exception of Bengal in requiring that only panel candidates should compete for seats in the general electorate, more than justify the exclusion of Bengal from the operation of the Pact or, if this is not possible at this stage, a considerable reduction in the number of seats reserved for the scheduled castes, since they postulate that these castes are strong enough, numerically and economically, to win the reserved as well as the unreserved seats in that province.

THE TWO WAYS.

It is generally accepted that the two greatest World Teachers are Gautama Buddha and Jesus Christ. Both were moved by an intense sympathy with human suffering. Both did their best to alleviate it. But there is a sharp distinction between the methods adopted by the two Teachers. One instance was alluded to in the article headed, "Faith and Fire Walking," in the Reformer of February 29. It is as follows. A child playing in the fields is bitten to death by a cobra. The bereaved mother takes the child to where Buddha was sojourning at the season and begs him to revive it. He tells her to bring five mustard seeds begged from the householders of the neighbouring township, but they must be from a house or houses in which no one had died. The woman goes round the village homes. Every one is sympathetic and readily hand her the mustard seeds. But when she enquires if any one had died in the family, they all say with one voice, alas, we have lost this or that beloved one. She returns the mustard seeds and comes back empty-handed to the Master with her story that she could not find a single home in which no one had died. Buddha explains to her the meaning of her experience:

"My sister! thou has found," the Master said,
"Searching for what none finds—that bitter balm
I had to give thee. He thou lovedst slept Dead on thy bosom yesterday: to-day Thou know'st the whole wide world weeps with thy woe:

The grief which all hearts share grows less for one.
Lo! I would pour my blood if it could stay
Thy tears and win the secret of the curse Which makes sweet love our anguish, and which drives—

Over flowers and pastures to the sacrifice—
As these dumb beasts are driven—men their lords.
I seek that secret: bury thou thy child!"

Kisagotami became the first woman disciple of the Master and she rose to be one of the great saints of Buddhism. Jesus in analogous circumstances is said to have called the dead to life, though Jesus himself did not claim to have done so. He told the wailing relatives the dead Lazarus was not dead but was only sleeping. Lazarus was evidently suffering from a kind of sleeping sickness. How the Church came to represent this as raising the dead in the face of the distinct statement of Jesus, I have not been able to discover. No great Teacher has suffered more from the misrepresentations of his followers than Jesus Christ. In that wonderful story—Brook Kerith—Jesus after the "Resurrection," goes to the Order to which he belonged, far away among the mountains. There rumours reach him of the doings of his disciples. He goes to the Head of the Order and asks permission to return to Jerusalem to correct the erroneous stories told of him by his followers. But the Abbot forbids. The people will not believe you if you told the truth, he says.

The current number of the Mahabodhi narrates the following under the heading "How the Master Ministered to the Sick" which I do not remember to have seen before.

"Tissa, a fair youth of Savatthi, heard the Lord preach one day, gained faith, left home, entered the Order, and lived with the Brethren, loved of many. As time went on, he became ill of a certain skin disease. Eruptions, which first were as small as the seeds of mustard, soon grew big, even as big as Vilva fruits, and the venerable brother's case became incurable. The sores sent out ill-smelling exudations, and so loathsome was his body that friends called him "Tissa the putrefied", and fled from him. As he lay alone in bed, his flesh became more and more corrupt and bones fell from their joints.

And as the Lord surveyed the world thinking, "Whom shall I save?" He saw the poignant sorrow and agony of His own son, left alone dying.

"To my Tissa, there is none but me to befriend him" thought the Lord, and coming out of the Fragrant Cell, with his own holy hands, the Lord washed a large earthen vessel, filled it with strained water and boiled the water Himself. Then He went to the room where Tissa lay helpless, and tried to lift up the bed in order to bring him to the bathroom. But other Bhikkhus, who had gathered by now, stopped the Father saying "We will bear him, Lord."

Then the Lord ordered a tub to be brought in and had the robes of the brother washed in warm water while He himself did bathe the patient tenderly, rubbing the sores so softly with his own healing hands, even as a mother bathes her new-born babe. By the time the bathing was over, the robes too were dry, and when Tissa, refreshed, was laid gently on his bed, serenity came over his mind and body. And as a mother broods over her babe, so did the Lord stay by his side, even near the patient's pillow.

Tissa forgot his fear and found comfort in the Lord. Then in His divinely sweet voice, the Lord said unto the brother:—

"Impermanent, alas, is this body. It will, ere long lie on the earth, void of consciousness, even like a useless log."

When the Lord had thus ministered unto the afflicted brother's mind and body, calm and happy, he slept the sweetest sleep.

And it was noised abroad that, even on his death-bed, "Tissa the Putrefied" became "Tissa the Sanatified."

Owing to the practice in the early days of Buddha's ministry of his disciples wearing only cast-off rags, there was much skin disease prevalent among them. The rule was modified by the Master on this account and disciples were permitted to accept gifts of fresh clothes from the laity. Tissa's complaint seems to have been of a leprous character. The point we wish to emphasise here, is that the Buddha while he did his best to relieve the patient did not offer to cure him. Buddha's method was to change the mental attitude of sufferers and not their material condition.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

454
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 21

HAMMOND COMMITTEE'S REPORT AND WOMEN'S CONSTITUENCIES.

(By MRS. UMABAI KUNDAPUR.)

As we go deep into the study of the Hammond Committee's Report we find that many of its proposals are without any principle behind and uniformity between them.

India will be divided under the new constitution into eleven Governors' provinces or presidencies. But for the three provinces of Bombay, Madras and U. P., all the remaining presidencies have only urban areas selected for their women's constituencies. Bengal, which has got five women's seats, has all its women's constituencies limited to big cities (vide, Vol. II page 71). Same holds good with the C. P. Punjab, Bihar, Assam, Orissa, Sindh, and others. None of these has any rural area for women's constituencies. It is true the two provinces of Madras and U. P. have them. But their selection seems to have been based on a principle. Only the leading, the most educated and enlightened Talukas in three of the districts in each of these provinces have been proposed for women's constituencies. In the former Bellary Taluka which, according to our information is the most enlightened in that district, has been selected. In U. P. Cawnpore Taluka from the Cawnpore District has been marked out for the purpose (pages 10 and 99 respectively). If it were the intention of the Hammond Committee to have in the Bombay Presidency at least one rural constituency for women, they could follow the principle they did in Madras and U. P. and accordingly the constituency would have gone to Dharwar Taluka.

Again there is one more impropriety in this case. In the third volume of the Report the evidences given by representative women in different provinces have been reproduced. But no such evidence of any lady from the Bombay presidency (which is one of the leading provinces of the country) appears in the Report. It is said in the first volume that some women representative were consulted. But there is no mention who they were and what they said. The evidences of women coming from even the small provinces like Orissa and Sindh have been given in full while the Report is silent on the opinions of women from our presidency. Hence we do not know who represented the women of Bombay and what they opined.

On pages 78 to 94 of Volume III there appear evidences from which it is clear that women are in favour of having all their constituencies in urban areas and preferably in big cities at least during the initial stages of the new reforms. Otherwise they say, due to the women's social, religious and economic conditions prevalent in the present Indian society, lady candidates for legislatures will find their task very difficult. The larger the constituency the greater will be the expenditure to be incurred by the candidates. The greater the ignorance among the electors the more difficult is the propaganda. Hence some of the women representatives are of the opinion that at least for some years to come their constituencies should be limited only to big cities by rotation, if necessary. Later on, they say, as female education goes on increasing more and more even into the villages, rural constituencies may be created instead of the urban. This is the gist of what our sisters like Shrimati Lejhawati Jain, Kumudini Basu, Mrs. Braj Sundar Das and others say before the Committee. On page 82 one of them says, "I take the strongest objection to this arbitrary and whimsical method which I characterise as the negation of all laws, rules and procedure." From this it is evident what some of the women representatives feel about the decisions of such Committees.

Though the constituency is limited to the Ranebinnur Taluka any woman voter in the Dharwar

District who can vote at the provincial Assembly elections can also stand as a candidate for these elections. This is our inference on reading the Report. One can obviously see how inconvenient it is for woman residing in other parts of the district to go and stay in Ranebinnur Taluka for months together and carry on propaganda and other work in connection with the election. From the point of expense and labour it is most difficult and impracticable. As stated in my preceding letter female education and the general awakening being very little in the Ranebinnur constituency one may predict safely that very few women may stand as candidates from the area itself. And if our sisters comparatively advanced educated and enthusiastic but residing in other Talukas of the district intend standing for election they will have to leave their homes, go to the remotest taluka of the district, stay and work there for a considerably long time. The difficulty and impracticability of such a task are self-evident and need no comments. We only reproduce what Mrs. N. C. Sen said before the Committee. "What will the poor women do? I have lived in England for 16 years and have seen many women campaigns there. How difficult it is for women there to canvass inspite of the fact that they have so many organisations and more freedom than the Indian women... when you are giving it (women's constituency) for the first time do you not think you should make it easier for women?"

This according to Mrs. Sen is the condition of women in England and efforts are being made there to remove the obstacles in the ways of women candidates in that country. Is it not necessary then that the path of the Indian women for election purposes be made as easy as possible?

On page 123 of the first volume of the Report the Committee says, "We wish to provide a representative electorate and to ensure that the constituencies in which the women's seats are filled are small and select and so framed as to minimise the difficulties of canvassing, the hardships of communications in rural areas and the obstacles likely to be met by a member in maintaining contact with her constituents."

Now let me ask the Committee whether by choosing Ranebinnur in the Southern Division they have fulfilled their objects enumerated above. Is that taluka a select area in the whole of the Division? Has its selection minimised the difficulties of canvassing? When the Committee allows any woman voter in the district to stand as a candidate for the women's seat, is it not necessary to choose a central place as far as possible equidistant from the corners of the district with a view to enable her "to maintain contact with her constituents"? The report again says that their own disposition in these circumstances was definitely in favour of confining the women's constituencies to urban areas. When such was the Committee's disposition we know not who prevailed upon them to choose the rural area and that too of a taluka like Ranebinnur.

These constituencies, says the Report, are experimental and it is uncertain to what extent women generally would be prepared to contest seats. If any constituency on account of its backwardness fails to show keen desire on the part of women in matters of Council and Assembly elections the Government may feel that the Indian women themselves are not enthusiastic about their own political rights and they, therefore, do not deserve the franchise, the special seats, and other concessions granted to them. This may exhibit to the world that the Indian woman is not particular about any political or administrative powers. It is for this reason that we should strive to send into the legislatures the best available material from the select parts of the country, so that

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

455

the Indian woman may show her mettle and grit and prove in course of time that she is in no way inferior to her sisters in other nations. Hence our desire to get transferred the women's constituency of the Southern Division to a central and better area.

CASTE IN THE INDIAN CHURCH.*

The Madras Mail reports an interesting incident among Roman Catholics in a village in North Arcot in the Madras Presidency which illustrates the strength of the caste spirit in the Indian Christian community.

In Chetpat, the yearly Catholic festival of "Our Lady of the Lourdes" was from February 24 to March 4. From March 1 to March 4 were important days of the festival and the Car of "Our Lady" ordinarily is dragged in procession. The Car hitherto had been drawn only by caste Catholics, by mamool (immemorial custom). Adi Dravidas had never before participated. This year, however, the local priest, Father Carlatto, proposed that Adi-Dravida Catholics, too, should join in dragging the car in procession. His Grace, the Archbishop of Madras, Dr. L. Mathias, approved the suggestion, and came to Chetpat from Madras towards the latter part of the festival. The entire mass of caste Catholics vigorously objected to the proposal, stating to permit Adi-Dravidas to join in dragging the car was an infringement of the immemorial rights of caste Catholics. On March 1, the day of the car procession, over 10,000 Christians mostly caste Catholics, from surrounding areas collected in Chetpat and demonstrated against Adi-Dravida Catholics taking a part in dragging the car.

The Archbishop's efforts to arrive at a compromise between the rival parties failed and the Sub-Magistrate of the place seeing that feelings ran high, issued an order under Section 144 Cr. P. C. prohibiting the car procession for two months. The suggestion that it may be conducted within the Church compound was also discountenanced by the officer.

The incident near Vellore arose because the custom in danger was regarded as an "immemorial one". Entrenched "right" persist in other or minor forms among non-Catholics also and if a start is to be made, systematic education should begin at the bottom and be maintained persistently.

The disgraceful incident brings out what is often ignored. The theory that the time spirit will solve the problem has been abandoned in the non-Christian community. We fear that the same conviction has not come to the Indian Church. There are silent tragedies occurring because of caste in the community which are no less deplorable than the upheaval near Vellore. Leaders of the Church are however under the delusion that the refined and respectable manner in which divisions lurk is not harmful. If the Church had any programme of reform for the community, caste evil would form the foremost item. Such however is totally absent because there is comfort in the thought that some of the virtues of the community are a complete expiation for its many sins.

* The Guardian Madras.

All-India Rabidas Conference:—Sj. Balu Babaji Palwankar of Bombay, at one time well-known as a cricketer, will preside over the forthcoming session of the All-India Rabidas (Chamar) Conference to be held at Monghyr on 28th, 29th and 30th March. Well-known depressed class leaders, such as Mr. Kajrolkar of Bombay, Mr. Rajbhoj of Poona, Choudhari Beharilal of Dehradun and Mr. Radhanath Das of Calcutta are expected to attend the conference, which is likely to be of great importance in view of the fact the Rabidas community as a body is stated to be strongly opposed to Dr. Ambedkar's move to renounce Hinduism.

TRADE TREATY BETWEEN INDIA AND U. S. A. *

There is more than one reason why a trade treaty should be concluded between India and U. S. A. In view of the recent trade treaty between Canada and U. S. A., and the more recent reports that negotiations of an exploratory nature are afoot for a trade treaty between the United Kingdom and the United States, it seems opportune to consider the question of a trade treaty between India and the U. S. A.

At present there is no direct trade treaty between India and U. S. A. Replying to Sirdar Sohan Singh's interpellation in the Indian Legislative Assembly on 13th February 1934, the Hon. Sir Joseph Bhore, on behalf of the Government of India said:

"There is no direct trade agreement between India and the United States of America, but there is a Convention of Commerce concluded as long ago as 1815 between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, Article 3 of which is applicable to India. The provisions of this Article are unilateral inasmuch as they make no stipulations for the treatment of Indian trade in the United States of America."

The chief purpose of the Convention was to provide a "reciprocal liberty of commerce" and the most-favoured-nation treatment as between the two countries. This purpose is secured in Articles I and II of the Convention. On the British side the scope of the two Articles is limited to "all the Territories of His Britannic Majesty in Europe."

India is mentioned only in Article III, and then only to give U. S. A., the most-favoured-nation treatment in India without, however, conferring a reciprocal advantage on India. Says the Article:

"His Britannic Majesty agrees that the vessels of the United States of America shall be admitted and hospitably received at the principal settlements of the British Dominions in the East Indies videlicet, Calcutta, Madras, Bombay and Prince of Wales' Island, and that the citizens of the said United States may freely carry on trade between the said principal settlements and the said United States in all articles."

The Article does not confer on Indian citizens the right freely to carry on trade between India and U. S. A. That is why the Government of India characterized it as unilateral.

U. S. A. has trade treaties with Borneo, Ethiopia, Liberia and Siam, among other countries. The U. S. A. trade with the first three is apparently so insignificant, if there is any at all, that no mention of it is made in the official report on "Foreign Trade of the United States."

The trade between U. S. A. and Siam is but a fraction of the trade between U. S. A. and India. From the point of view of U. S. A., India ranked nineteenth in the matter of exports and eleventh in the matter of imports.

There is yet another reason why there should be concluded a trade treaty between India and U. S. A. as soon as possible. India is perhaps alone in being subjected to a disability which does not apply to any other people, white, black or brown. The Immigration Act of 1924 denies admission into U. S. A. to all those who are "ineligible" to naturalization. Under the Act of February 18, 1875, amending the Act of July 14th, 1870, naturalization is open only to "aliens being free white persons, and to aliens of African nativity and to persons of African descent." And the Supreme Court of U. S. A. held that "a

* The Servant of India; March 27.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 21

high-caste Hindu of full Indian blood" born in India was not a "white person" within the meaning of the naturalization law (261 U. S. 204 of 1923).

The same disability applies to most Asiatics, and in particular to the Japanese and the Chinese. It does not seem to apply to the Syrians, the Turks, the Armenians, the Persians and the Parsees.

The U. S. Immigration law, however, exempts certain defined people from the bar against entry, though not from naturalization. Among these are what are called "treaty-merchants." A treaty-merchant is "an alien entitled to enter the United States solely to carry on trade under and in pursuance of the provisions of a present existing treaty of commerce and navigation" (Section 3 (6)). Inasmuch as the United States has trade treaties with China, Japan, Siam and Borneo, bona fide merchants from these countries may enter the United States as "non-immigrants" and carry on trade, though the citizens of these countries are debarred from entering U. S. A. As there is no trade treaty between India and U. S. A., no Indian merchant may enter U. S. A. Merchants of the "white" and the "black" races may enter U. S. A. because of their racial qualifications; merchants of China, Japan and Siam may enter because of trade treaties, though racially ineligible. Merchants from India alone may not enter because they are racially ineligible, and there is no trade treaty between India and U. S. A.

Whether a trade treaty between India and U. S. A. to be concluded hereafter will place the Indian merchant on the same basis as the merchant from Japan and China under the existing immigration law is not without some doubt. It is conceivable that the courts may hold that inasmuch as the statute speaks of the "present existing treaty", the rights secured thereunder will not accrue under treaties made subsequent to the passing of the Act in 1924.

Even so, a trade treaty between India and U. S. A. will confer a right on Indian merchants already in U. S. A., which, in view of the few and diminishing rights of Indians in U. S. A., may not be despised. At present no Indian, who is already in U. S. A. and who cannot be deported, can introduce his Indian wife or minor children. An amendment of U. S. A. Immigration Act of 1924, passed on 6th July, 1932, however, permits a treaty-merchant to introduce "his wife and his unmarried children under twenty-one years of age." This provision will give relief to but few Indian merchants, but India cannot afford to despise even trifling advantages.

To sum up. In the trade relations between India and U. S. A., India suffers from an unfair discrimination, though there is reason to believe that it was due to a historical accident and not due to any deliberate policy on the part of U. S. A. The merchants of U. S. A., have a unilateral advantage in India, and Indian merchants enjoy no reciprocal facilities in U. S. A. Indian merchants are denied rights in the U. S. A., which merchants from China, Japan and Siam enjoy. U. S. A., has trade treaties with Borneo, Liberia and Ethiopia with which she has hardly any trade but not with India with which she had a volume of trade which is not negligible and which is increasing, and which she may well cultivate.

The fact that India is a subject country and her Government is a subordinate administration under the British Government need not stand in the way of a trade treaty between India and U. S. A. For recently a trade treaty was concluded between India and Japan, though, for diplomatic reasons, the treaty was signed in London between Great Britain and Japan.

New York.
26th January 1936.

P. KODANDA RAO.

SCOUTING.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Prof. Sundaram of Annamalai University would have us accept—if the Hindu report of the 2nd instant is correct—that "Scouting is of very recent growth in the country." On the other hand, tradition, social institutions, literature and history all teem with proof to the contrary indicating in unmistakable traces that the scout idea is quite indigenous to the genius of the Hindu race. This vision in perspective is such as to tempt one to jump up to join issue with the learned professor and challenge his suggestion.

Referring to Ramayana, the earliest epic—one of Sir John Lubbock's 100 Books—there are two characters among a host, Hanuman and Lakshmana, who stand perhaps for the last word and probably for all time to the attitude of life corresponding to the scout idea of the present day. The immortal story of Hanuman's quest of the missing Sita and of his thrilling exploits and resourcefulness in bringing mount Sanjeevi with its life-giving herbs to save the dying Lakshmana on the battle field, with the dynamic combination of his selfless zeal, daring and loyalty, interspersed with fun and frolic investing it with endless thrills of perennial interest to the young and old alike, is transcendental; perhaps designed to be such by that creative artist, Valmiki. There is a significance in the chapter narrating Sita's quest in Ramayana being called 'Sundara Kandam' which means "Canto the Beautiful"—and when our ancestors prescribed it out of all others for religious reading with the emphasis that merit would accumulate with repetition, they must have meant to make the scout spirit soak into the very life-blood of the race in its entirety.

As between Hanuman and Lakshmana it is really hard to choose. The latter's devotion to his brother and his consort during their exile of 14 years, spending sleepless nights, protecting them from the dangers of forest life and sharing their joys and sorrows, always in cheerful spirit apart, the story of the way and the quickness of decision with which he dared to face his end is such as to afford supreme illustration of the height of sacrifice which should characterise a scout's outlook of life. I recount the episode below in brief.

With the killing of the demon Ravana Rama's mission in life came to an end. Just about then, so the story goes, a sage visitor appeared at the gates of the royal residence and asked Lakshmana, the gentleman in waiting, to announce his arrival to the Emperor, within which he did. Rama rose, advanced to the Rishi receiving him with all honours due to the sage, when the latter stipulated that they should confer in private and that the king should undertake to behead any one—rather a drastic injunction—that might happen to intrude while they were thus engaged. Rama readily agreed warning Lakshmana at the doorway at the peril of his life not to let in any one. When they were closeted together the sage announced that he had a message for him, from the God of Death and that he came to invite him to his final abode leaving him the option to continue on earth if it pleased him. Before the interview ended the irate Rishi, Durvasa, notorious for his temper, so the story goes, rushed up to Lakshmana at the doorway wanting him to announce his arrival forthwith to the king inside, when he was told that the king was engaged with another and that the time was not opportune for his seeking him. This Durvasa took it as a personal slight, flew into an uncontrollable rage as was his nature, threatening to curse with extinction the entire dynasty of Raghu if he delayed announcing him another minute.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

457

Lakshmana, ideal scout as he was, having had to decide quickly in the twinkling of an eye thrust himself into the king's apartment risking his life choosing his own death as a lesser evil than the dreadful and immediate prospect of race extinction. With such a tradition who could dare to say that the scout idea was foreign to Hindu culture and civilization?

Garuda is yet another character answering to the most modern scout ideal the very first to appear in the arena of Mahabharata. When he grew out of his childhood, the very first thing, so the story continues, which puzzled him, was to find his mother Vinata, a serf to her rival, his step-mother Kadruva. He enquired the reason why and was told at the end by the slave-holder that she was prepared to free the serf if he would secure for her ambrosia from Indra Loka for ransom. Quick was the decision of Garuda and he set about the task without a moment's hesitation, secured the prize and liberated his parent in trouble. This achievement should be of an inspiring character to our young scouts of the day, with many of whom to shout 'Bharat Mataji Jai' once is 99 p. o. patriotism.

Coming further down in the story of Mahabharata as found narrated in Aranya, Virata and Udyoga parvans and particularly during the 'Agnatha Vasa'—period of exile incognito—the scout suggestion is simply marvellous and catching. The resourcefulness which each of the five Pandavas commanded to find an honest living during the trying interval of one year, with work ranging from story telling to cattle tending is such as to be an object lesson to our unemployed young men of the day in despair.

If we come to the stories in Bhagavata there is rarely any exploit attributed to the hero Krishna which does not savour of scout spirit at its best. The incident of Gajendra Moksham, of Krishna's lifting up mount Govardhana to afford shelter against rain to Gopies, of his killing the serpent Kaliya and myriad others, point in the same direction.

How the scout idea persisted even as late as the commencement of Vizayanagar Era about the beginning of the fourteenth century with twin Gods of Garuda and Hanuman—even now you come across their statues at many a corner of Rayalaseema—to inspire life was remarkable. When sage Vidyaranya met the brothers Harihara and Bukka, who afterwards became the first emperors of Vizayanagar, the picture that history presents of them is that of a couple of scouts in the most complete sense of the term dedicated solely to rescue Hindu Dharma from the Mohammadan inroads of the day; while that of Veeraballala laying down his life in the struggle reflected the same scout idea at its highest. The history of Vizayanagar of those times recording the exploits of the heroes like Kumara Kampana and Gopana is not disfigured by conquest or domination for self-aggrandizement but stands adorned for all time in true scout spirit by a righteous resistance to harm threatened to the Hindu Dharma.

If subordinating self in daily life for the welfare of a community with unflinching loyalty to a leader and a feeling of fellowship and harmony inter se from the discipline that is required to make one a real scout then our Joint Hindu Family system in its ideal has been for ages an unparalleled training ground in every household for the creation and fostering of this scout virtue.

There is the word 'Kynkaryam' in Sanskrit vocabulary which is the noun form originating from the phrase 'Kim Karomi' (which means "what can I do?")—not in despair but in quest of service, for an attitude of life. There again is in a nutshell the potential idea. With a majority of our young men scouting is largely associated with periodical spectacular externals and ceremonials with little response to the heart of the movement. It is for the Temples of Learning and culture, like our Indian Universities, to instil into the scout movements of the day a new orientation revivifying national life on lines chalked out by our wise ancestors of old.

Penukonda. } T. SIVASANKARAM.
(Anantapur Dist.) }

MARIE STOPES ON BIRTH CONTROL.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

You give great space to Mr. Gandhi's objections to scientific birth control and since 1930 when I reviewed him very fully he has somewhat shifted and improved his position, but still it betrays a very grievous misunderstanding of the fundamental position of sex union in human life.

To deal adequately with Mr. Gandhi would require columns, so that I can only pick out a few of the more important points briefly. It is with no personal hostility that I may trenchantly criticize some points in the attitude taken by Mr. Gandhi; but in a small space devoted to an important matter nothing less than the truth will avail, and the truth when simply stated must appear hostile because it demolishes his main arguments.

Mr. Gandhi touches on a very fundamental principle when he urges married people to regulate, so far as it is humanly possible, the number of their progeny by moral restraint, and on totally another when they do so in spite of sexual indulgence. The false facts, and consequently false deductions, contained in this paragraph lie in the words "sexual indulgence." What right has Mr. Gandhi to talk of sexual "indulgence" when he really means the use of coitus in marriage? He is jumping to a scientifically false conclusion and balancing himself on the presumptuous pinnacle of "moral superiority" which is a creation of his and other ascetic minds, but which is essentially untrue and an insult to the Creator who made human beings, male and female, in the natural need for union with each other. When this need is satisfied with love-union in marriage it is physiologically correct living, it is not sexual indulgence, and it is an act of pharisaical impropriety to malign it. Again, as Mr. Gandhi's position is largely built upon this scientifically false and morally arrogant statement, his whole logical argument falls to the ground.

He considers continence the highest state. The mistaken idea about humanity is propagated by some of the ascetic-minded of many religions and in many countries of the world; and one may point out, as a parallel, that it is no argument to multiply the statements that the world is flat in order to disprove the fact that the world is round.

Gandhi's ill-considered arrogance can scarcely go further than his statement; "Union is a crime when the desire for progeny is absent." Surely it is a serious thing for a country when one of its most prominent leaders can gain a hearing with such a preposterous mis-statement of fact. The sex union of human beings is the result of a mutual need and a mutual fulfilment on three planes—physical, mental and spiritual—and the human pair is mutually enriched by true union. To the animals who unite, no knowledge even of the fact that progeny will result is vouchsafed, and the cow and bull who mate as a result of their own need and who benefit from the mating, have not the very faintest desire

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

458
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 21]

for progeny, nor can it possibly be correlated with their idea that months after a calf will result from their union.

In humanity, higher in organization and much more evolved and with bodily, mental and spiritual results from union in coitus greater than in any animal, the results are more far-reaching. The act of coitus is not a mere fertilization of the woman, but, as has been proved by physiological science, it is the placing within the woman's body of the active spermatozoa in millions (where one only is required for fertilization) together with the secretions of several glands which have no bearing whatever on fertilization and the production of progeny, but which are absorbed by the woman and benefit her system. Similarly, I have presented the scientific deduction, accumulated from a large number of cases (which although not absolutely proved is almost proved, and, therefore, a very sound hypothesis) that the man also absorbs and benefits from the woman when coitus is performed in the proper way, which, I may say, it far too seldom is by ignorant human beings.

The use of sound, scientific methods of birth control does incalculable good in making motherhood more precious, in enhancing the health and happiness of children and making it possible for parents to have the God-given need for mutual coitus satisfied wholesomely and properly. To-day in the clear and joyous light given by science, a young man and woman may marry and live in faithful love all their lives, satisfying their own physical and mutual needs (and thus being happier and consequently better members of the community) and love their children before they are born, because they themselves will their parenthood at times when they have the health and strength to bear the burden and do their best for the young life entrusted to them.

Between this happy state of affairs and the Indian people who would benefit, stands Gandhi and other ascetics calling upon them to lead unnatural lives of deprivation and consequent deterioration. I trust that science and not superstition will soon hold sway in India as elsewhere.

Full information can be obtained from the Headquarters of the movement for Constructive Birth Control Clinics, 108, Whitfield Street, London, W. 1, England.

108, Whitfield Street,
London, W. 1.
26th February 1936. }
MARIE C. STOPES,
President,
Society for Constructive Birth Control & Racial Progress.

Congregational Divine Service for Hindus:—D. B. Raja Narendra Nath, Goswami Ganesh Dutt, Rai Bahadur Lala Ram Saran Das, Diwan Bahadur Kishen Kishore, R. B. Lala Binda Saran and other Hindu leaders have issued the following appeal to the Hindus of the Punjab and the N. W. F. P.:—"To provide the Hindus of all shades of opinion with an opportunity to assemble at one place and unite their hearts in prayer to Almighty, it is most essential that congregational Divine services be conducted with great éclat and enthusiasm in all localities and important cities of the Panjab and the N. W. F. Provinces, at least once a month, presumably on the 3rd Sunday at any convenient time according to the requirement of the season. We appreciate sincerely the movement of holding congregational prayers set on foot by the Young Men's Hindu Association, Lahore, and we have great pleasure in bringing it to the notice of the Hindus of the province, with the hope that they will put their shoulder to the wheel in this noble task of bringing about solidarity and fellowship between all the sections of the Hindu community. We hope the congregational Divine Service of the Hindus of Lahore to be held on Sunday, March 15, at the D. A. V. College, will be a great success.

MUSLIM—KADIANI CONTRETEMPS.

The Kadianis, of whom there are hardly forty families in Bombay, are said to belong to a comparatively recently formed reformist section of the Muslim community. They claim to be Sunni Muslims, but the Sunni Muslim leaders of Bombay City refuse to recognise them as such. These differences in religious denominations came to a head last week, when the body of a Kadiani child of fifteen months, named Bashir Ahmed, was taken by the parents and relatives of the child to the Sonapur Muslim cemetery for burial.

The manager of the cemetery did not raise any objection, but some Sunni Muslims, it is said, at the cemetery are alleged to have refused to allow the dead body into the cemetery. They said that Kadianis were 'Kafirs,' and were, therefore, not entitled to use the Muslim cemetery. They were even prepared to resist the burial by force, if necessary. Thereupon, the parents of Bashir complained to the Princess Street police. In a short time, a number of police officers endeavoured to effect a peaceful compromise between the parties. The alleged fanatical element, however, would not hear of any compromise.

Eventually, the dead body was taken charge of by the police, and the Commissioner of Police was duly informed of the situation.

Later the Commissioner sent for the trustees of the cemetery, the Head Kazi and other Muslim leaders in the City to discuss the matter. The leaders were not prepared to assert categorically that Kadianis were not Muslims, but they maintained that this sect like other Muslim sects should have their own separate burial ground.

The Muslim leaders would not yield. The Police Commissioner later consulted the Municipal Commissioner and the Health Officer. It is understood that the Kadianis have been allotted a separate burial ground in the Haines Road cemetery. The body of the child, which is lying in the morgue, will now be buried at the Haines Road cemetery.

CATHOLICS IN THE THIRD REICH.*

The first round in the Catholic-Nazi struggle was won by the Nazis with the dissolution of the Catholic Center party on July 4, 1933. Although the political influence of the Church was exercised through the Center party, the Vatican—apparently considering it expedient to establish a modus vivendi with the new Nazi state—consented to a Concordat with the Reich. This document was virtually completed on July 3, 1933—the day before the demise of the Center party but was not signed until July 20 and did not go into force until September 10. The Concordat sanctioned dissolution of the Center party by forbidding Catholic churchmen to speak or act politically and conceding the right of the State to destroy all Catholic organizations having even a semi-political program. The Hitler government, for its part, pledged itself to establish uniform educational laws throughout the Reich and to permit confessional schools even in districts where they had been forbidden. The Vatican, moreover, secured direct control of university theological professorships, although the state was given the right to question future appointments to episcopal sees. Catholic organizations having a religious objective were recognized as legitimate.

Despite the Concordat, many Catholics were victims of the Nazi terror during the summer of 1933, and as time went on the struggle between the state and the Evangelical church brought out the fundamental issues at stake for all organized religions.

* Foreign Policy Report, January 29, 1936.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

459

Catholic realization of this fact was strongly shown in 1933 by the Advent sermons of Cardinal Faulhaber of Munich, which attracted wide attention both in Germany and abroad. The Cardinal—a recognized authority on the Old Testament—demonstrated that the Church is unalterably committed to acknowledging the Old Testament as a revelation, and that Christianity is not conceivable apart from Judaism.

Meanwhile, despite the Concordat, the recognized Catholic organizations, especially the youth groups, were experiencing grave difficulties and Catholic publications were censored and suppressed by the Nazis. With the incorporation of the Evangelical youth organisations in the Hitler Jugend at the end of 1938, moreover, the Catholic youth organizations were the only ones outside that official association. Members of the Catholic groups were constantly molested by the Hitler Jugend, and their activities were curtailed; priests criticizing the Hitler Youth were jailed. By July 1935 Catholic Youth organizations were officially forbidden to engage in sport, social or educational activities. The Hitler Youth, moreover, had become more outspokenly anti-Christian, and reports concerning ancient pagan rites at their convocations had become more frequent.

Even before the July outburst against the Catholics the Nazis had begun prosecution of priests, nuns and monks on charges of smuggling foreign exchange out of the Reich. These trials, accompanied by wide publicity, have since continued; and it is estimated that the total fines imposed on Catholic charitable and monastic orders for such smuggling amount to about 5,000,000 marks. The Nazis have made use of the trials to discredit Catholicism and prove to the German people that Catholic priests and leaders are enemies of the Third Reich.

Thus the Hitler government seems determined to do all in its power to undermine the influence of the Catholic church in Germany. Its determination to abolish Catholic youth, sport and working men's societies is at present hampered by the Concordat. Double membership in the Hitler youth and Catholic societies, however, is forbidden. This conflict over control of youth organizations will doubtless be further sharpened by plans announced on January 4, 1936 for conscription of all German boys and girls between 10 and 18 in a Reich Young League under the leadership of Baldur von Schirach. Civil servants are already virtually forced to enroll their children in the Hitler Youth; workers must belong to the Labour Front in order to secure or keep their jobs, while Catholic workmen's groups are denied membership in the Labor Front.

The church, for its part, is fighting to retain control of the education of Catholic youth through confessional schools and the youth organizations; for the right of the clergy to discuss questions of collective ethical import, such as sterilization; and, finally, for immunity of the clergy in the pulpit. The Catholics are absolutely opposed to Nazi sterilization and race laws; the prosecution for the alleged violation of foreign exchange decrees, moreover, virtually constitutes state warfare against the Catholic orders in Germany. And the neo-pagan influence on the Hitler Youth, the difficulties of Catholic schools in Bavaria, besides the virtual suppression of Catholic youth organisations, are regarded not only as a violation of the Concordat but as a dangerous threat to the church.

Social Reform in Kumbha Mela :—Pandit Dhananath Sidhantankar, Organising Secretary, Bihar Provincial Vidhava Vivah Sahayak Sabha of Sir Gangaram Trust, Lahore, was specially deputed to Allahabad to work in the Kumbha Mela. He has just returned from there after working for 11 days. Leaflets on this subject were distributed in abundance in Hindi, Bengali and Urdu languages.

THE BISHOPS' CONFERENCE AT FULDA.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT)

Under the Presidency of Dr. Bertram, the Cardinal of Breslau, the Catholic Bishops of Germany assembled at Fulda in the first half of January. As the traditional gathering at Fulda usually takes place in September of each year a special reason was attributed to the unexpected convention. The news spread with astonishing rapidity in both ecclesiastic and political circles while at first neither the newspapers nor the Church published any information on the matter.

It is reliably stated that the coming Reich Youth reforms strengthened the desire of the Episcopate to re-open discussions with the Government on the Youth question and certain lines of actions are said to have been decided upon at the Conference.

Officially nothing has been heard of the outcome. However, the Reich Minister for Church Affairs is to be informed of the views exchanged at Fulda. The Bishops, Count von Preysing (Berlin) and Dr. Berning (Osnabruck) were chosen as spokesmen for the German Episcopate in negotiating with Government quarters. It remains to be seen whether this preliminary contacting will in due course form a basis for more concrete arrangements. From what can be learned the Fulda gathering seems fundamentally willing.

The men who have been chosen as representatives permit the hope that the Church is seriously prepared to settle the Catholic Church situation. If this were not the case the meeting would hardly have been convened at this unusual time. The Bishop of Osnabruck is a member of the Prussian State Council and is known to be favourably disposed toward the political regime. Count von Preysing is also well endowed for the roll of intermediary possessing the necessary diplomacy and intelligence. The new Bishop of Berlin seems to enjoy an excellent standing both in the Vatican and as a promising member of the German Episcopate.

Outwardly, in keeping with the traditions of the Catholic Church, the Episcopate naturally represent a united whole but there is no doubt as to the existence of conflicting opinions in regard to the Church—political situation of Catholicism in Germany. The attitude of Cardinal Dr. Schulte of Cologne, the youngest in rank of the three Cardinals in Germany, presumably played a special part at the recent session. The New Year's wishes are called to mind which this latter prelate exchanged with Germany's Head at the turn of the year. As neither Cardinal Dr. Bertram, Head of the Episcopate, nor Cardinal Faulhaber (Munich) extended this courtesy there were all manner of conjectures as to the different trends with the Church. The meeting which took place between the Cardinal of Cologne and Dr. Goebbels in December of last year also attracted attention.

It is widely thought that the present Bishops' Conference is largely due to the influence of Dr. Schulte. Obviously another attempt is to be made to arrange for a settlement with the State. The details to the regulations governing the Concordat of 1933 are still outstanding.

Accordingly, it would seem as though the Church was now prepared so to revise the Catholic Youth organisations as to divest them of their centralist character while retaining them as purely youthful sections of the local parishes thereby eliminating all chances of conflict with the State and the Hitler Youth. A conciliatory programme has been drawn up after it was ascertained in an interview with the Minister for Church Affairs that official readiness for a settlement existed. Thus it has every appearance that the more pacific elements led by Dr. Schulte have succeeded in gaining the upper hand in the Episcopate.

realpatidar.com

realpatidar A EUROPEAN'S VIEW OF CASTE.

The Varn Vyavastha (caste system) conference opened here on the Gurukul grounds at Hardwar in the main pandal this afternoon amidst a huge gathering of audiences. Dr. Mees could not be present, his presidential address was read out by Mrs. Coomaraswamy, wife of Mr. Anand Coomaraswamy of America.

In a lengthy address Dr. Mees had submitted that it was his belief that there was nothing of such importance, of such psychological as well as sociological significance, both to cultured and to the less cultured Indians, as an unprejudiced and scientific study of caste and class. He held that the ancient theory of Varna (caste) was not a theory applying to Hindu society. The ancient Hindu sages were far wiser than we now imagined. His critical study showed that we must regard the theory of Chaturvarnya as a universal social theory. In various ages theories of class had been evolved. Most of the theories of class propounded the existence of four basic classes of human society. Directly related to four Varnas were without doubt the four classes of the Iranians: Athravan, corresponding to Brahmins, Rathestar (Kshatriya,) Vastya (Vaish), Huiti (Sudra). Not only the Iranians but also Plato compared the state to the human soul and Aristotle more appropriately compared the State with the human body. The great Abul Fazal, perhaps inspired by Hindu teachings, perhaps by Plato or Aristotle, also divided society into four classes. Today the labourer and the capitalist were struggling with each other for supremacy. But neither was in the natural course of things meant to rule. Not the mass but the group with the ability to rule, were meant to rule. Only the true Brahmin, in every country, was a leader of the society, leader of public opinion, education of the social mind, influencer of practical politics. In India he appealed to every man and woman to propagate and broadcast the ancient theory of the ideal of Varna in order that the evils of the present caste system should vanish.

It was a wrong way to try to directly change the outer forms of any institution. They must try to change the conceptions about the institution first. The modern man seemed to be very impatient and wanted to do things before their time. Were they going to make the people more religious or to change the rituals of their religion? A change from within would change the outer form. A leader of men must not commit the mistake of projecting his own psychology into the collective psychology. The masses had their limitations and they were stupid and slow; they were also very dangerous. The only direct way to bring about social reform was to steadily influence the collective mind.

GEORGE SANTAYANA.*

George Santayana, distinguished philosopher and poet who abandoned a brilliant academic career at Harvard in 1912, is now 72. From the hotel room, in Rome where he has lived obscurely since 1923, George Santayana has looked back to Harvard and New England for his fable. Born in Madrid, December 16, 1863, he was 9 when he was taken to Boston, where his half-brother and half-sisters were members of the famed Sturgis family of New England. A strange set of circumstances lay behind this migration. "None of us," Santayana once wrote, "ever changed his country, his class, or his religion." Santayana's Spanish-born parents met in the Philippine Islands. His mother's first marriage was to George Sturgis, Boston merchant with offices in Manila, to whom she had borne five children at the time of his death. When she married Agustin Ruiz de Santayana, retired Spanish civil servant, it was with the understanding that the Sturgis children were to be brought up in Boston, as she had promised their father before he died. The family was thus separated, George Santayana remaining with his father in Spain, his mother and her older children moving to Boston on an arrangement that was "friendly, if not altogether pleasant to either party." After unsuccessful attempts to live in both countries, George was left with his mother, while his father returned to Spain to live in retirement.

Educated at the Boston Latin School, at Harvard, at Berlin, Santayana became an instructor of philosophy at Harvard at 26, moved freely in academic circles without being intimately known in any. Impersonal, self-contained he lived modestly in Stoughton Hall, became a member of the brilliant group of Harvard philosophers that included Josiah Royce, William James, George H. Palmer, Hugo Munsterberg. Three times each week he walked to Brookline to visit his mother, who continued to speak Spanish and who was entirely unknown to his Cambridge acquaintances. Occasionally he invited his more promising students to tea, was lionized by Cambridge hostesses as a handsome and mysterious foreigner, could be found most frequently, outside his working hours, at the athletic fields, watching the training for football and track.

While he remained a familiar mystery on the campus, his fame soon reached beyond Harvard. His first poems were published when he was 31. In the next eleven years he had produced The Sense of Beauty, which Munsterberg called the best book on esthetics ever written in the U. S., two more volumes of verse a series of interpretations of poetry and religion, the five volumes of his urbane, skeptical statement of naturalism, The Life of Reason. Although Santayana himself had declared that he was no poet, comparing himself to Don Quixote; the Spanish-American War aroused him to "the Dionysiac frenzy and impassioned tenderness" that he considered essential for true poetry. When the Spanish Fleet at Santiago was destroyed; Admiral Sampson made the "boorish jest" of calling the victory a Fourth of July present to the U. S. people. Santayana wrote Spain in America as an answer. The poem is a lament for Spain's "sadness and dishonour," a moving and eloquent cry for a marriage of the two cultures, the spirits of the North and South.

When Santayana's second philosophical work was published in 1900, William James wrote of it: "What a perfection of rottenness in a philosophy. I don't think I ever knew the anti-realistic view to be propounded with so impudently superior an air... Although I absolutely reject the Platonism of it, I have literally squealed with delight at the imperturbable perfection with which the position is laid down, page after page." When The Life of Reason appeared in 1903, James had changed his opinion: "Santayana's book is a great one, if the inclusion of opposites is a measure of greatness. I think it will probably be reckoned great by posterity. It has no rational foundation, being merely one man's way of viewing things; so much of experience admitted and no more..." Other professors of philosophy gave less qualified praise, saluted Santayana's scholarship, the fascination of his style, suggested that no such exquisite philosophical literature had ever been composed.

A popular lecturer, Santayana's courses became famed. His students included T. S. Eliot, Conrad Aiken, Walter Lippmann, Bronson Cutting, Felix Frankfurter. Robert Benohley attended his classes,

* The Times, February 8, 1933.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1938 J
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

461

said that he could not understand the words but that the music fascinated him. Continuing to live in isolation, Santayana was commonly considered snobbish. Disliking Boston society, he called it "a Harvard faculty meeting without any business." Although he enjoyed teaching, described it as "a delightful paternal art," he admitted disliking "the taste of academic straw," was ironically amused when President Lowell declared that he was not interested in the degree of intelligence in Santayana's students, merely wanted to know how many of them there were.

In 1912 Santayana received an inheritance, immediately resigned from Harvard, settled in Oxford. Repelled by German culture, at home in England, he was pro-Ally during the War, wrote Egotism in German Philosophy during the War years.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman),
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhalilal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S.C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Marathilal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B.A., LL.B., A.M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 3 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate, 2-26

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

462
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 21

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches :—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000
London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to :—

THE SECRETARY
CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad).
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulia (District West Khandesh).
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nasik).
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kalwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panch Mahals).
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Bajajny, Esq.,
Madhowsjee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	P. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur B. V. Vandeekar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL :—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,94,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to :—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1938]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

463

Invigorating and Health Giving.

Giving the daily bath to the baby is no worry to the mother. if she uses MYSORE SANDAL SOAP The baby likes it and he will be happy only if he gets a tablet of MYSORE SANDAL SOAP to play with

USE MYSORE SANDAL SOAP.

GOVERNMENT SOAP FACTORY, BANGALORE.

Sole Agents: for Bombay Presidency (excluding Sind and Districts of Belgaum, Dharwar and North Kanara) and Rajputana.

Messrs. RAMJANALLY EBRAHIM & Co.,
81, Princess Street, Bombay 2.

"INDIAN OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)

For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Within the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	20s Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
Outside the Union	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	21s. Annually.
" " "	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN OPINION,
Phoenix, Natal.

SAFELY RELY ON AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other
kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT. realpatidar.com
BOMBAY & MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

464
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 21

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 106, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 29.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MARCH 28, 1933. No. 30

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Mohenjo Daro Inscriptions.
Franco-German Deadlock.
Pandit Malaviya in Nasik.
The Deaksha.
King George's Memorial.
Mr. Subhas Bose's Case.
Education in 1933-1934.
Girls' and Depressed Class Education.
Marriage Extravagance and the French.
Germany's Position in Madras.
Marie Stopes on Marriage.

Education, a Public Responsibility.
The Cama Hospital Golden Jubilee.
Marriage Legislation in India.
Philippine Fellowship of Faiths.
Portuguese and Malabar Christians.
Marriage Extravagance.
King George V Memorial Fund India Civilisation.
Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru.

NOTES

Mohenjo Daro Inscriptions:—The theory of an Aryan invasion of India from the Northwest has been challenged and, though it has not altogether disappeared, it is no longer asserted with the assurance that it used to be. The discoveries at Mohenjo Daro near Larkana in Sind have opened up new vistas of pre-historic India. The Rev. Father Heras in his lecture last week on the Indus Civilization at the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, declared that the civilization revealed by the inscriptions unearthed at Mohenjo Daro was the oldest civilization of Asia and that it was the parent of the subsequent Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian and even Chinese civilizations. We print a summary of his lecture on another page. If colonies from the Indus valley went out to Central Asia it does not seem probable that colonies from Central Asia entered India at the same or a later time. It rather goes to confirm the theory that if there was a migration it was from India and not into India. Father Heras seems, however, to cling to the belief that there were two distinct peoples known as Aryans and Dravidians in India. The Mohenjo Daro civilization, he says, if not pre-Aryan is non-Aryan. Even in the sketchy summary before us, there are evidences to show that the Indus civilization was the source and parent of the later Indian civilization and there was a remarkable continuity between them. Father Heras himself says that the totemic signs of ancient Indian tribes are recorded in ancient Sanskrit literature. The seven countries mentioned in one of the seals found in the excavations, passed on to Sanskrit literature. Father Heras' observations on the astronomical information gathered from the inscriptions are of special interest. The publication of the paper in the next number of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society's journal is awaited with great interest.

Franco-German Deadlock:—The difficulty which had arisen over the sending of troops by Herr Hitler in to the demilitarized zone in Rhineland continues to be acute. Britain which first proposed neutral zones on both banks to be policed internationally pending negotiations, dropped the proposal so far as it related to the French side and asked Germany to accept it for her side alone. A more maladroit proposal it is impossible to imagine. The methods which succeeded at the Indian Round Table Conference were totally out of place in dealing with "a man of iron" as Herr Hitler described himself in one of his election speeches this week. The British proposal met with indignant rejection. Germany refused to negotiate with France except on an equal footing. There can be no doubt that Germany will have her way. "They have rights who dare maintain them". One thing which one appreciates in Herr Hitler is that there is no doubt about his meaning. British statesmen seem to have lost the gift, if they ever possessed it. Their course is becoming increasingly beset with difficulties just because there is always a gulf between their profession and practice. The reasons which guide their action are not the ones which they publicly profess they are. A French publicist writing in the current number of the Round Table points out how a serious misconception in France might have been avoided if Britain had stated "honestly" that she sent her Home Fleet to the Mediterranean before the Italo-Abyssinian war began, because Italy had threatened Egypt by her preparations for massing troops on the Lybian frontier. "But the Frenchman knew nothing of this," he writes. "And how should he have known, when Great Britain herself, instead of explaining what was happening, went on denying that she had any sort of personal grievance against Italy, and reiterated that the only conflict at issue was that between Italy and Abyssinia." British statesmen will be able to do more for the peace of the world as well for that of their own minds as also for good understanding between Britain and her component units, if they cultivate precision instead of the vagueness which they so much to affect in their speeches and despatches. For example, they need not insist on dubbing as democracy a scheme of government which is conspicuous by its violence to every principle which constitutes the essence of democracy.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

466
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 28

Pandit Malaviya in Nasik—In commenting on the visit of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya to Nasik last week, we doubted the authenticity of the report that an attempt was made to assault him by a group of orthodox Hindus who resented his work for the depressed classes. The Nasik correspondent of the Mahratta contradicts the report. "The reports of assault on Shree Shankaracharya and insult to Pandit Malaviya are utterly false," he writes. "They were openly contradicted by both the leaders in the open meeting on the very same day. The truth of the matter is as follows: the Reception Committee had sent invitations to various Shastris and Pandits throughout Maharashtra; and Pandit Gandale, of Pandharpur and others had come to Nasik under the impression that Malaviyaji had invited them for personal discussion. On coming to Nasik when they and other Sanatanists at Nasik found that Malaviyaji was not giving any heed to them, and that he was engaged in embracing untouchables, they made a row on one occasion and complained that the meeting with untouchables is preferred to that with Sanatanists. But there was no assault on anybody. Malaviyaji at once accepted their demand for discussion. For two days these discussions continued but unfortunately no agreement could be reached."

The Deeksha—The method adopted by the Pandit to admit the depressed classes to the caste Hindu fold, was carefully devised so as not to infringe traditional beliefs. The study of the Vedas is forbidden to castes other than the twice-born. All religious reformers respected this rule. But they also found that the Shastras themselves had provided other ways by which all classes, men and women alike, could attain salvation equally, if not more effectively, than by the rites prescribed by the Vedas. The great reformer who composed the Bhagavad Gita expressly declared that the path of salvation which he indicated was a surer and easier one than that prescribed by the Vedas. To one who followed his precepts, the Vedas, he said, were as little useful as water to one swimming in a flood. The Pandit following in the line of this tradition administered a simple vow to the depressed classes. The Nasik correspondent of the Mahratta describes the scene. He writes: "Deeksha means taking a vow that in the name of God I shall remain pure and shall be one with Him." This is the practical solution Malaviyaji has found out from Shastras for the removal of untouchability. On the 17th Tuesday, he gave the Deeksha to nearly a hundred Harijans, who had come from villages specially for this purpose. Mr. Rajbhoj worked with tireless energy for the Deeksha ceremony. Completely for two hours in the hot sun of March, Malaviyaji stood bareheaded on the bank of the Godavari, managing every item of Deeksha. At the end of Deeksha, when each Harijan asked for his blessings and when his frail hand lovingly touched each of them, tears glided from the eyes of all that had gathered there. The picture recalls another enacted centuries ago on the banks of the Jordan, the Deeksha on that occasion being not dissimilar, "all flesh shall see the salvation of God."

King George's Memorial—With reference to the appeal for subscriptions towards a Memorial for the late King issued by His Excellency the Governor, we should like to suggest that the idea of combining some utilitarian object with it, should be dropped altogether. It is the duty of the State and Society to provide for their sick, destitute and infirm. To seek to succour these under cover of a Memorial, blurs the sense of public responsibility besides sacrificing the real purpose of the Memorial, which is to create something by which a great and good King would be best remembered. The large Fund raised to commemorate the Jubilee last year, has been absorbed by three or four institutions entirely unconnected with the King or his reign. The memory of the Jubilee is not kept alive by this means. The death of King George evoked public appreciation in this country to such an extent as to surprise outside observers by its depth and sincerity. This feeling should find adequate expression in the contemplated Memorial, undiluted by any other sentiment, however desirable or praiseworthy in itself. A statue of His late Majesty will, of course, be an item. We deprecate bringing any other consideration except that it should be a faithful representation and a worthy work of Art in deciding on its execution. But a statue by itself will only become, as other statues are in Bombay, a perching place for crows and pigeons. The statue should be the central feature of a scheme every part of which is carefully designed so as to bring out one or other of the outstanding events of His Majesty's reign mostly, but not necessarily exclusively, related to India.

Mr. Subhas Bose's case—The public had formed the impression that, in view of the improved political situation and the desirability of ensuring a favourable atmosphere for the new constitution, the Government of India would, as in the case of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, make no difficulty about Mr. Subhas Bose being restored his liberty. Mr. Bose recently paid a visit to the Irish Free State and was on the point of embarking for India when he received an intimation from the British diplomatic representative in Vienna, where he had made his head quarters, that if he landed in India he was liable to be placed in confinement. To a question in the House of Commons why the Government of India had kept him under control for four years without putting him on trial for a definite offence, the Under Secretary of State for India, asked for notice. The India Office will probably press the Government of India either to prosecute Mr. Bose on a definite charge or to restore him his freedom, as the late Lord Morley did in the case of the late Lala Lajpat Rai. Meanwhile the Congress party in the Legislative Assembly carried a

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936.]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

467

motion for adjournment to call attention to the action of the Government in holding the threat of detention over Mr. Bose's head should he return to his native land. The position is curious. Mr. Bose is not prevented from coming to India. But he is told that if he returns, he may not retain his liberty. In the debate in the Assembly, Government narrated a long series of incidents purporting to show that Mr. Bose was a member or was associated indirectly with the party of revolutionary violence. If they really thought that the evidence in their possession was reliable, they should surely prosecute Mr. Bose before a judicial tribunal instead of confining him under a century old Regulation. The Law Member of Government, Sir N. N. Sarkar, said that Mr. Bose was confined under the Regulation and not prosecuted under the Criminal Law because Government wished to provide a liberal allowance to his family as a State prisoner! Did Mr. Bose ask for it or was it done out of pure generosity by the Government of India? Government have seldom shown such tender consideration for the families of political prisoners. The Law Member's statement is not consistent with the reasons given by his colleagues of the Home Department in the debate for the detention of Mr. Bose. It is not known whether Mr. Bose proposes to come to India in spite of the warning conveyed to him.

Education in 1933-1934:—The progress of education, as set forth in the Government of India publication 'Education in India 1933-34', has not been as rapid as is necessary to liquidate the huge mass of illiteracy in this country. The author of the report is fully conscious of the fact when he compares the present progress with the state of education 20 years ago. If he had not been so complacent, he would have taken stock of what other countries have achieved in the same But as things are, it is considered a matter for congratulation when less than 5% of our population is receiving instruction. Even this much progress has placed the Government on its guard, for the report says: "The need for caution in the quantitative expansion of mass education has been fully recognised and consolidation and concentration are being attempted in most provinces," with the result that there is a large decrease in the number of institutions in most of the major provinces. With the increase in the number of pupils under instruction, the decrease in the institutions is all the more glaring. The number of institutions, both recognised and unrecognised, in the Bombay Presidency, decreased by 141, whereas the number of pupils registered an increase of 42,209. The increase in the University enrolment has perturbed the Education Department which has devoted some two pages on remarks about the unemployment among the University products, though the report recognises that dealing with this problem does not fall within its scope. Taking the cue, evidently from Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's Committee on Unemployment in the United Provinces, the report recommends restriction of the number of those seeking University education by the raising of the standard and by increase in fees. No one will object to the former course if it is adopted in the interests of education and not to keep down the numbers entering universities, without having recourse to the drastic method of increasing the fees which are already much too high. It is wrong to argue that a young man hailing from a family occupied in manual employment should not strive for intellectual attainments. There are ways and means of dealing with the problem of unemployment by the Government, which it has so far neglected, if it sets itself to do so.

Girls and Depressed Class Education:—The report is not without its redeeming features. The increase in the number of institutions and in the rate of progress in most of the provinces in the education of girls, as well as the phenomenal increase in the number of enrolment in the various institutions of the depressed classes, make cheerful reading. Specially noteworthy is the progress made in Muslim girls' education in all stages in the country. If the progress is kept up, Muslim girls bid fair to outstrip their brethren in education. As it is, in the Punjab there has been a decline in the figures of Muslim boy scholars which, we are told, was mainly due to agricultural depression. But the depression has not prevented the rise in the number of Muslim girl scholars in the province for the same period, and the depression could not have affected the boys alone. If anything, the tendency at times of depression would be to withhold girls rather than boys from school. The propaganda carried on for the education of the depressed classes and the facilities afforded them by the Government, have resulted in reducing illiteracy among them to a large extent. In Madras Presidency in which untouchability exists at its worst, it is encouraging to know that roughly 1/3 of the depressed class children were under instruction. Education is a great leveller; the insistence and the increased recognition on the part of the public to admit the depressed class children in ordinary schools will go a long way in the eradication of untouchability. Another noteworthy feature of the report is the absence of prejudice against co-education in the primary stage. In fact, in some places there were larger attendance of girls in co-educational institutions than in those specified for girls.

Marriage Extravagance and the Press:—Lady Nilkant in her letter which we publish to-day makes pointed reference to the part played by the Press in aggravating the evil of extravagant marriage expenditure. We had intended to refer to this ourselves but she has anticipated us. The Indian Press as a whole shows some sense of responsibility in such matters. The Anglo-Indian section is the worst offender. Not only has this section ceased to exercise the wholesome influence it once did in moral and social problems of the day, but it has actually become a serious stumbling-block in the way of healthy progress.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

468

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 28

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, March 28, 1936.

GERRYMANDERING IN MADRAS.

In noticing the Draft Orders in Council on "Excluded Areas", since adopted by Parliament, we showed that, while the strong protest of the Government of Madras against the inclusion of certain proposed areas in the schedule, prevailed with the Government of India, a similar protest with much greater reason, though in less strident language, by the Bombay Government was dismissed summarily. The same thing has happened in regard to the recommendations of the Hammond Delimitation Committee. That Committee had recommended the creation of multi-member constituencies for Bombay and Madras. The Bombay Government strongly advocated this arrangement and the Hammond Committee accepted it. "We hesitate," they observed, "to submit a recommendation markedly in opposition to the general desires and opinions of an ancient and historic province, more particularly when, in supporting that recommendation, the local Government are in a position to advance cogent arguments based on the peculiar position of the Presidency and on the experience of fifteen years." The Madras Government, however, insisted on having single-member constituencies, except where they were necessitated by the reservation of seats for the scheduled castes. This was the view taken by the majority of the Provincial Delimitation Committee. But a minority of that Committee had dissented and had strongly urged the continuance of multiple constituencies which were created in 1920 when a large proportion of reserved seats was provided in the interests of safeguarding the non-Brahmin community. It was, however, found in practice from the first that the fears of the non-Brahmin community were baseless and that it could—and did—obtain a majority of seats in open competition and that the reservation of seats was entirely superfluous. The Madras Government, dominated by the Justice Party, are now strongly opposed to the safeguard that may be afforded by multi-member constituencies to minorities in the Hindu community and are irrevocably in favour of single member constituencies. The Hammond Committee felt obliged in spite of their strong opposition, to recommend that, in the conditions prevailing in Madras, multi-member constituencies were needed to afford protection to minorities in the Hindu community. "Caste feeling, as is well known" they observed, "has at all times been a marked feature in Madras, and the advocates of multi-member constituencies urge that organised political parties on the British model do not as yet exist in this country, and we cannot now visualise the course of events in regard to their evolution. But at the present time communal strife and communal feeling are so great, not only among the main castes, but also among the sub-castes that they can not be ignored. This undesirable state of things would be further emphasised by the creation of single-member constituencies...Single member constituencies would perpetuate the domination of the main caste or sub-caste in each electoral area, and the minority opinion will never have a chance of being represented in the Legislature." The Committee also found that an important section of the Legislative Council and an influential section of the Press strongly supported multi-member constituencies. The Committee had a conference with the Madras Government. "They remained of their previous opinion" the Hammond Committee observed, "and we found that a consideration of dominating importance with them was the production of a strong party government, and that they regarded it as of more importance to produce a majority of such a character as to guarantee a stable government, and to avoid changes of government which could not but enure to the disadvantage of the harmonious working of the new constitution in its earlier years, than to produce a scheme which would ensure beyond dispute that every minority, however small, should have some hope of securing representation. The local Government was not satisfied, apart from this, that there was any case for affording special protection to minorities within Hinduism. In their view all that was necessary in the way of protection for minorities was that afforded by those provisions of the Government of India Act which reserved seats for women, for the scheduled castes, for the representatives of the backward areas, for tribes and for labour."

The Hammond Committee were not satisfied that they would be discharging their duty by accepting the views of the local Government. "We are of the opinion" they observed, "that given the intensity, the bitterness and the importance of inter-caste strife in Madras, there is, at any rate, under present conditions, a strong case for taking steps to remove it. We are satisfied apart from this, that, despite the opposition of the Government and of the majority of the Madras Delimitation Committee, the current of public opinion in the Presidency which demands multi-member constituencies is too strong lightly to be ignored. On a consideration of the problem as a whole, and with the fullest appreciation of the objections to rejecting the considered opinion of a local Government on a matter such as this, we have, therefore, decided to recommend the creation of a certain number of multi-member constituencies in Madras in addition to those proposed to us by the local Government and those necessitated by the reservation of seats for the scheduled castes." This considered decision of the Hammond Committee has been upset by His Majesty's Government in the Draft Order on the Report. The Madras Government, states the Explanatory Memorandum accompanying the Draft, very strongly represented that the Committee's plan was unacceptable to them and their objections had the support of the Govern-

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1926 J
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

469

ment of India. "They urge that the arrangements proposed by the Committee will tend to perpetuate and intensify religious and caste antagonisms among numerous castes and sub-castes of the Hindu community which are to be found in that province and by tending to encourage the formation of small groups will be inimical to the development of party government which, during the past fifteen years, has shown a strong tendency to emerge in that province more than in any other...In these circumstances, His Majesty's Government have not seen their way to force upon the Madras Government" multi-member constituencies as recommended by the Hammond Committee. In contrast to this subservience, His Majesty's Government has rejected out of hand a small, almost trivial, request of the Bombay Government to be allowed to allot to Poona a Muslim seat recommended by the Committee to be given to Surat and Rander. The danger of perpetuating and intensifying existing prejudices would be real if the Committee had recommended the creation of caste electorates on the lines of communal electorates which are so lavishly created by the new constitution. The multi-member constituencies by giving a chance to minority castes to return their candidates, would not only minimise asperity but tend actually to promote the habit of collaboration in public affairs and thus to pave the way to mutual understanding and goodwill. It is an extraordinary doctrine of the Madras Government that to allow minorities a means of representation, not through separate water-tight electorates but through plural constituencies, would intensify differences. The scheme adopted on their recommendation is virtually one for suppressing minorities a parallel to which must be sought in Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany. But there is every prospect of the Justice Party which, no doubt, hopes to escape the fate which befell it at the last elections to the Legislative Assembly by this gerrymandering of electorates, being hoist with its own petard. During the fifteen years that it has been in office, it has done nothing, absolutely nothing, to promote the grandiose social programme to the achievement of which it professed to seek political power as a means. On the contrary, caste asperities have been fomented and intensified. The significance of Mr. Srinivasa Sastry's advice that all parties should vote for Congress candidates as the only organised party with a national outlook, seems to have been lost on His Majesty's Government.

Darwin Centenary Stamps:—Postage stamps commemorating the centenary of the visit of Charles Darwin to the Galapagos Islands in September, 1835, have been made by a London firm for the Government of Ecuador. These stamps (says the "Christian Science Monitor") will also serve to let the world know that the Enchanted Isles, as they were formerly called, are Ecuadorian property, and to honour the Darwin Memorial Expedition. Stamps of six denominations form the series, and bear a map of the islands.

MARIE STOPES ON MARRIAGE.

We published in last week's Reformer a letter from Mrs. Marie Stopes criticising some of Gandhiji's views on the Birth-Control movement with which she is so prominently identified. The reason she wrote to the Reformer and not to Gandhiji himself, is that the Reformer, she says, gave much space to his objections to "scientific birth control." It is the long-established policy of this journal to give, as far as its limits permit, its readers the material to form their own judgment on a consideration of all sides of questions with which it deals, while expressing its own view of them. Gandhiji is one of the men in India or elsewhere, who has thought about the great issues of human life and not only thought, but tested his conclusions on the touchstone of his own personal experience, and has placed before the public the results as truthfully as is possible to human beings. If he errs on the side of over-emphasis somewhere and under-statement elsewhere, it is plainly not due to conscious intention. It is in the same spirit and from a similar consideration that we published Mrs. Marie Stopes' letter. She is one of the outstanding figures who has stirred the social thought of our time and has earned the right to be heard respectfully when she writes or speaks, whether one agrees or not with her opinions.

It is not our purpose here to defend Gandhiji's opinions against Mrs. Marie Stopes' criticisms. There is no need to do so. What we shall do here is to examine the main propositions laid down by Mrs. Marie Stopes in her letter. A brief reference to the history of the birth control movement on whose behalf she writes, is necessary as a background to the subject. Malthus's essay on Population which started the discussion of which the birth control movement is an off-shoot, recommended self-restraint as a check on the tendency for population to grow faster than the production of food necessary for its sustenance. The neo-Malthusians carried the question one stage further. They thought self-restraint was not enough and applied themselves to invent chemical and mechanical devices which would dispense with the need of self-restraint and at the same time prevent the sexual act from leading to conception. The neo-Malthusians, be it noted, were still, like Malthus, chiefly aiming at the avoidance of over-population. Later, the movement got mixed up with the movement for the rights of women. Husbands were represented as tyrants bent on inflicting motherhood on reluctant wives. Among the rights of women to be fought for, was the right to decide whether and when they should bear children. The obvious answer that a woman who did not wish to have children was free to remain unmarried, did not occur to these champions of women's rights. Men on their part did not care to defend themselves at the expense of their wives against the charge of tyranny. Even today when women have gained all or most of their rights in marriage, 250 British women within a few miles of Mrs. Marie Stopes' headquarters have applied in answer to a call from an anonymous British soldier in Mauritius for a wife to bear him children! (Reformer March 21.)

Mrs. Marie Stopes' letter carries the question another stage. She maintains that marriage, unless deprived of its incident of childbirth by the expert use of contraceptives, can not yield the highest happiness to husband or wife. Let us quote her exact words: "The act of coitus is not a mere fertilization of the woman, but as has been proved by physiological science, it is the placing within the woman's body of the active spermatozoa in millions (where only one is required for fertilization) together with the secretions of several glands at which

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

470
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 23

have no bearing whatever on fertilization and the production of progeny, but which are absorbed by the woman and benefit her system." When and where did "physiological science" prove that one germ or cell was enough to fertilize and all the other attendant millions benefit the woman's system even if that one is absent or destroyed by a suitable trap or poison? Or that the trap or poison which prevents or kills the one cell does not obstruct or kill the others also? As for the supposed benefits to the woman's system, how is the fact to be explained that mortality of women at the childbearing ages is always greater among wives than among widows? And if the millions of supernumerary cells which are said to benefit the woman's system, do really benefit it, prostitutes should be the most healthy instead of being the most diseased section of the female population. An enquiry some years ago revealed that the average active life of inmates of Bombay brothels, is less than five years.

Mrs. Stopes goes further and makes out that continence is a crime and asceticism a vice. Her idea of morality is, whatever conduces to the fullest sexual enjoyment without fear of children resulting therefrom. She pictures Gandhiji and others of his way of thinking as standing between the Indian people and the millennium which the institution at 108, Whitfield Street, London, is ready and eager to confer upon them. There are one or two observations which strike us in reference to Mrs. Stopes' gospel of sexual beatitude. When there is a mechanical way and a moral way of effecting the same object, a considerable number of people would prefer the mechanical to the moral, and the latter will eventually die of disuse. The introduction of mechanical contraceptives will most certainly weaken the moral restraints which actuate a great number of husbands, pace the Stopes's and Sangers, from regarding their wives as women whose only function is to minister to their sexual appetite. While, prevention of childbearing can and should be prevented where childbearing is likely to be harmful to the mother, a propaganda on the lines of Mrs. Marie Stopes' letter can only have the effect of undermining the moral basis of marriage. There is another thing. Christianity by its dogma of Immaculate Conception condemned motherhood through sexual union as unworthy and unclean. The Indian religions, on the other hand, exalt the married state not only for humans—but for gods also. The assumption that husbands compel unwilling wives to bear children is obviously untenable in a land where fatherhood has been sought to be enforced by the terrible 'sanction' of a special hell after death for childless men. Mrs. Margaret Sanger, Mrs. Marie Stopes and others, whose good intentions we readily acknowledge, should understand the Indian background before they seek to help us by their ministrations. They will find that while in some respects they are carrying coals to Newcastle—the sex question was studied in India centuries ago with the express purpose of ensuring marital happiness—that in others the conditions here are totally different from those in Europe.

Mrs. Stopes and her School hold that unhappy marriages are mostly due to what, for want of a better word, may be called sexual misfit, arising from want of knowledge of the right technique. Coitus in the proper way, she says, is far too seldom performed by ignorant human beings. We have unfortunately very few candid accounts of the causes of marital unhappiness by persons who have gone through the bitter experience. But there is one remarkable book which deals with this matter with utter frankness. It is the autobiography of Countess Tolstoy, From the accounts of himself which Tolstoy published and from self-revelations in his books, notably in the Kreutzer Sonata, as also from the reminiscences of the Countess and the number of their children, it is clear that the unhappiness of their married life was not due to defective sexual functioning on either side. The Countess says that their disagreements began as early as twelve months after their marriage and that the cause of it, from her point of view, was that Tolstoy would not take her into the sanctuary of his intellectual and spiritual life. This is the true cause of many disagreements among married couples. Marriage begins, as Westermarck says, where the sexual relation ends. Husband and wife are not always thinking of each other, as the Stopes' School seem to imagine, in terms of sex. They most generally envisage their mutual relationship as derived from their common offspring. This is the case in India.

EDUCATION, A PUBLIC RESPONSIBILITY.

(By CYRIL MODAK.)

It is a notorious custom among law students to attend classes by proxy. A friend can usually be persuaded to answer the roll call and another to lend his notes. This custom among students of law is innocent enough to evoke laughter. But it becomes pathetic rather than humorous when we find the habit growing among our educated classes of discharging public responsibility by proxy. Perhaps a representative form of government lends itself to civic tepidity. We have returned our representative to whatever body it be, and hence we are no longer responsible. In fact, even the election of the representative is more his business and the business of his party than ours. If the candidate sends a car to take us we may feel disposed to go to give our votes. But having expended that much of our time and energy for public welfare, we feel we owe it to ourselves to lean back in a comfortable easy chair and think of our own more pressing problems. It is likely also that the joint-family system helps to develop our sense of irresponsibility. During the father's lifetime we hold him responsible and the eldest brother after him for everything save the choice of our own amusements, friends and luxuries. Of course it is the business of the head of the family to supply our financial needs.

But, whether it suits our convenience or not, as citizens we have our individual public responsibilities just as we have domestic obligations as members of a family. Education is such a public responsibility. As parents or members of a family, as civilized beings or members of a social unit, as citizens or members of a national group, it is the solemn obligation of each one of us to further and not to hinder the sacred cause of education. And in recent times educational questions have inspired so much eloquent speaking and scholarly writing that it seems we are approaching the new constitutional reforms with a keener civic-consciousness than we ourselves expected. That is a happy accident. It is as it should be. The constitutional changes to be brought about in a year are designed to be a test of the ability of the whole nation to cope with the problem of education. Whether the India Act has our assent or disapproval, whether it succeeds or fails, the greatness of the Indian nation will depend not so much on political acumen or communal amity as on the enlightened reaction of the public. As individuals how are we going to meet our civic obligations? As individuals how are we going to ensure that the reaction of the public is enlightened? No responsibility is discharged by proxy or in a burst of vituperation. Criticism is frequently necessary. A

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

471

critical appraisal of a system is required if that system is to be improved. The official system of education like a foster-mother has attracted a large measure of criticism. That should not become an end in itself. Criticism must be a prelude to reconstruction. It is the duty of critics to offer a scheme of constructive possibilities. And it is because the quiver has been well-high emptied at the official system of education that it becomes a duty to outline a scheme of supplementary activity. This we propose to do, however deficiently. And in doing so, we shall, perhaps, become unpopular. But there is no alternative. Having had the advantage of looking at this, our country, from across the seven seas what remains imperceptible at close quarters has become evident. You may feel the perspective unfamiliar. There is no intention to cast aspersions at anybody. But the intention is to be honest. We do not wish to press sugar-coated pills of studied flattery against our palates. We are in earnest.

Those whose onerous privilege it is to be Headmasters will recall the somewhat common occurrence of a father or guardian coming to the office to complain that his son or ward has not passed although he has been attending school all the year. Those who have ever ventured to discuss the probable causes of the boy's failure, and dared to suggest lack of parental supervision as one cause, would have been met with an infuriated assertion "I put the boy in a school. What more could I do? The school should do the rest. It is the teacher's fault that my son failed." It was startling to find this attitude once in a college professor. As parents, are we not to some extent responsible for the child's education? Does the home have no contribution to make in educating the growing boy or girl? Of the twenty-four hours of a student's daily life at best seven are spent in the atmosphere of the school. Who is responsible for the atmosphere of the remaining seventeen hours of each day? Sleep takes care of seven hours. There are still ten hours of each day 3, 6 5 0 hours, or 152 days in each year for which the home and society must be held responsible. The vast majority of our schools and colleges being non-residential, are compelled to depend on the co-operation of the home and of society for the continuation and completion of the student's educative process. It would be such a tremendous inspiration for so many schools if we, as parents, were to demand Parent-Teacher Associations to provide a means of intelligent and effective co-operation between ourselves and the school. As parents, do we not want to keep in touch with what our children are doing at school? Do we not desire to know what the school is doing for them? Have we no interest in the ideals, habits, and skills that the school teaches our children? It is only when we have occasional peeps into the ordinary life of our children at school that we can endeavour, during the hours that our children are with us, to supplement the activity of the school. Every school should organise a Parent-Teacher-Association. Every parent and every teacher should religiously attend the meetings and put forth his utmost energy to bring about that community of ideals and that co-ordination of activity which are best calculated to further the full, desirable, and requisite development, mental and physical, of every student. What greater satisfaction, what dearer joy can parents have than the thought that we have had our share in the cultural and practical education of our children, who will think of us when they remember their school and their teachers with affectionate regard?

As members of a social group we are expected to provide an environment for encouraging and directing the student to form such a scheme of values as society requires for the advancement of its purposes and interests and the preservation of its integrity. It is our business to set our faces against iniquitous social injustices and inequalities, disreputable social abuses, mischievous social customs that claim age as their only right to be. It is our duty to realize that a clear vision and tenacious drive for high ideals cannot be built on a static, inhibitory basis of experience and hence the social environment of the student ought to encourage the process of creative experimentation and the expansion of values. What have we done to save our students from the cramping influences, the stultifying prejudices, the misleading errors of our static social system? Professional life, artistic achievement, social leadership, learning and craftsmanship of any kind, can grow as we identify our growing aims with newly realized standards of achievement. Year after year, decade after decade, generation after generation have we not allowed ourselves to perpetuate the incongruities of the past and positively hinder the education of the younger generation? It is not entirely the fault of the system of education that our educated young men and women give such meagre evidence of dynamic growth and dynamic purpose, of being drawn by an evergrowing outlook and an ever-widening horizon to fearless, dynamic living. It is definitely the fault also of the social system in which our schools and colleges function that we have produced hundreds of thousands of spineless creatures. What can the nation hope to achieve when the vast majority of the population is deprived of the mental and moral stamina that comes with the right sort of education, when the vast majority of the population has acquired the habit of accepting responsibilities with mental reservation? We are loud enough in insisting upon the punctilious observance of social rites, the strict obedience to social taboos, the fastidious adherence to the ways of our forefathers. We groan at the growing incompatibility between the older and the younger generations. But how do we actually try to effect a better adjustment? How do we seriously try to help the student community to steer clear of the traditionalism which like an iceberg causes countless shipwrecks? How do we earnestly try to ensure that the rich and varied complexity of associated living evolves a process of directly shared experience, to the end that the original raw but susceptible endowment of human nature, in the rising generation, be so conditioned as to result in socially desired, socially creative, socially significant behaviour? It is the business of the home, of society, and of the school to correlate their energies so as to make sure that all the imaginative, explorative, self-assertive tendencies of the child are nurtured not dwarfed; that his interests are aroused and directed not killed that all the latent potentialities of the personality are developed not crushed. Only thus shall we too have many more creative thinkers, progressive reformers, and victorious leaders. The strait-jacket that is put on our children at birth is not removed in most instances until the cremating fire loosens its hold. Everything has to be adapted to this strait-jacket mentality. What are we doing to help change the old order of things?

Indian Hockey Team for Germany :-

The members of the Indian hockey team to represent India at the Olympic Games were entertained to tea at the Calcutta German club. Mr. C. R. Rasmuss, in a brief speech, said that the record and standing of Indian hockey was so high that he had no doubt that the present team would return to India with the highest honours. Dhyani Chand was practically a little god in Germany and the Indian team could be assured of a wonderful welcome there.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 28

THE CAMA HOSPITAL GOLDEN JUBILEE.

Plans are now being formed for the celebration of the Cama Hospital Golden Jubilee which falls due this year.

Under the chairmanship of Lady Beaumont a General Committee has been formed of keen women, enthusiastic at the service of others. This General Committee has been at work for some months organising and planning the raising of a Fund of approximately Rupees five lakhs with which to extend the buildings and improve the equipment of the Hospital, the first of its kind in the presidency to be staffed entirely by women for the relief of women of all classes and creeds.

Various Sub-Committees have also been formed chief of which are the Appeal Sub-Committee under the chairmanship of Lady Beaumont, the Women's day Committee of which Mrs. D'Monte is in charge, an Entertainment Sub-Committee under the guidance of Mrs. Blackwell and a committee under the leadership of Lady Cowasji Jehangir which is arranging for a public meeting on April 2nd 1936 at which His Excellency the Governor of Bombay will preside.

During the week of the celebrations from March 26th onwards, various courses for Nurses and Graduate Medical Women will be organized and a dinner in connection with the Women's Medical Association will also be held. On April 5th and 6th, a Fete will be held in the Hospital grounds and on the 8th the entertainment arranged by Mrs. Blackwell will be given in Sir Cowasji Jahangir Hall under the patronage and in the presence of Their Excellencies the Governor and Lady Brabourne.

All those desirous of helping this excellent cause should communicate with the Honorary Secretary, Cama Hospital Jubilee Fund Committee, Cama Hospital, or with the Honorary Treasurer, Miss. R. H. Coyaji, 13 Hughes Road, Bombay.

MARRIAGE LEGISLATION IN INDIA. *

(MR. S. S. PATKAR.)

It would be appropriate on this occasion to trace the history of the legislation relating to the marriage reform up to the present times, and to indicate the lines on which it has proceeded in the past, and the directions in which it is desirable that it should proceed in future. Sir Henry Maine drafted a bill in 1868 which was a Civil Marriage Bill for all Indians except Christians, as Lord Lawrence who was a great admirer of Mr. Keshab Chandra Sen pledged his word to give adequate relief to Brahmos who found that the Hindu religious observances at the time of marriage were opposed to their altered religious views and progressive ideas. The bill of 1868 was circulated for opinion but was unanimously condemned, and it was considered that the Bill should be confined to members of the Brahmo Samaj. Sir James Stephens recast the bill, and it was called the Brahmo Marriage Bill. The new bill also met with opposition from a party of the Brahmos called the Adi Samaj. A third bill was introduced by Sir James Stephens and was passed by the Legislature as Act III of 1872. The object of the Act was to provide a form of marriage for persons who did not profess any one of the eight religions in India vis, Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Mahomedan, Parsi, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain religion and to legalise certain marriages, the validity of which was doubtful. The principal features of the Special Marriage Act III of 1872 were (1) the insistence on the principle of monogamy, (2) the requisition of the consent of the father or guardian in the event of either party not having completed the age of 21 years, (3) the necessity of the parties not being related to each other in any degree of consanguinity or affinity which would render the marriage illegal, (4) registration in substitution or addition to any religious observances at the time of marriage, (5) a declaration by the parties to the marriage of formal renunciation of any of the eight religions prevalent in India, and (6) the application of the Indian Divorce Act to the marriages contracted under the Act. The insistence of the declarations amounting to the formal apostasy required by the Special Marriage Act III of 1872 was an undesirable feature in as much as many of the persons contracting marriage under Act III of 1872 lived as followers of the religions to which they belonged in spite of their formal renunciation.

In order to obviate the necessity of making such a declaration of formal renunciation of religion by a party to the marriage which was against his conscience and opposed to his conviction, Mr. Basu's Bill to amend the Special Marriage Act was brought on the legislative anvil in the year 1911/12. The Presidency Social Reform Association carried on a vigorous propaganda in favour of Mr. Basu's Bill which aimed at facilitating inter-marriage between different sub-sections of the same caste and also between members of different castes. It was urged on the other side that there were very few persons who were deterred from resorting to the form of Civil Marriage sanctioned by Act III of 1872 owing to scruples of conscience in connection with the requisite declaration described as a "negation of faith in all the religious system of India," and that legislation should not be undertaken unless absolutely necessary, or unless there was a demand for it on the part of a considerable portion of the public, or unless it was necessary to put down crime or any cruel practices sanctioned by custom. Mr. Basu's bill was eventually thrown out.

Mr. V. J. Patel introduced his bill "Hindu Marriages Validity Bill" in the year 1918. The mover of the bill relied in favour of the bill on the following circumstances, (1) that the bill was permissive and only sought to remedy a wrong, (2) that it obviated the necessity of the declaration required by the Special Marriage Act III of 1872 and (3) that the interpretation of the law was not correct and caused hardship to individuals and retarded the progress of the country. The bill was intended to validate not only marriages between parties belonging to different sub-divisions of the same caste even though they were opposed to long established usage, but also between persons belonging to different castes of Hindus including Pratiloma marriage. Mr. Patel's bill met with a fate similar to that of Mr. Basu's bill.

In 1923 Dr. Gour introduced his "Civil Marriage Amendment Bill" which was piloted in the face of considerable opposition and an attempt was made to meet all reasonable objections. It was claimed that the bill was in accordance with the sentiments of the orthodox Hindu community, and at the same time asserted the liberty of the conscience of the individual. The bill was referred to a Select Committee who recommended that the Christian, Mahomedan, Jewish and Parsi communities should be excluded from the scope of the Bill, and that the rights of the Brahmos to whom the Act applied since 1872 should not be interfered with, that the bill should be permissive and the marriage should be strictly monogamous as provided by Act III of 1872, that the effect of the marriage should bring about separation of the party marrying from the joint family, that the provisions of the Indian Succession Act should apply to the succession of the *Speech delivered at a public meeting on the anniversary of the passing of the Special Marriage Act, 1872.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

473

property of the person marrying under the bill and of the issue of such marriage, and that the parties to such marriages should have no rights of adoption. The principal feature of the bill was not only to preserve the declaration of renunciation of any of the eight religions for those who wished to make such a declaration, but also to permit a declaration that either party professed one of the four religions viz. the Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain religions. The bill was passed. The other provisions of Act III of 1872 were operative and sections 22 to 26 were added to the old Act giving effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee viz. (1) that the marriage effected a severance from the joint family, (2) the person belonging to one of the above-mentioned four religions and marrying under the Act should have the same rights and be subject to the same disabilities in regard to succession to any property as person to whom the Caste Disabilities Removal Act 1850 applied, except the right to any religious office or service or management of any religious or charitable trust, (3) that the succession to the property of such person and to the property of the issue of such marriage shall be regulated by the provisions of the Indian Succession Act, (4) that such a person shall have no right of adoption, and (5) that the father of such a person, if he has no other son living, shall have the right to adopt a son. It is anomalous that the succession to the property of a person making a declaration that he professes the Hindu religion and marrying under the provisions of the Act is governed by the Indian Succession Act, whereas the succession to the property of the person making a declaration of formal renunciation of the Hindu religion is governed by Hindu Law.

In 1935 a bill has been introduced by Mr. Bhagvandas which is on the same lines as Mr. Patel's bill and which aims at securing validity of marriages between different castes of the Hindus and seeks to provide that no marriage among Hindus shall be invalid by reason that the parties thereto do not belong to the same caste, notwithstanding any custom or interpretation of Hindu law to the contrary. The bill does away with the necessity of registration and preserves the performance of the Hindu religious observances at the time of the marriage so as to invest it with the sacramental character. According to the interpretation of Hindu law in the Bombay Presidency an Annuloma marriage i. e. a marriage of a man belonging to a higher Varna or caste with a woman belonging to the lower Varna is valid but a Pratiloma marriage i. e. a marriage of a man belonging to a lower Varna or caste with a woman belonging to a higher Varna is invalid. The bill validates marriages between different castes of Hindus including Pratiloma and Annuloma marriages. It is however necessary that there should be a provision enforcing strict monogamy. It is a matter of common knowledge that even educated men contract second marriages even though they have previously married wives and issues of such marriages. In order to avoid the provisions of the Special Marriage Act III of 1872, they seek change of religion, and become Sikhs and marry under the Anand form of marriage under Act VII of 1909. It is regrettable that a change of religion is resorted to or advocated as a matter of convenience, or to secure a temporal advantage. The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association attaches the highest importance to monogamy as the basis of a stable family and social life, and has approached the Government of India for an amendment of the Anand Marriage Act VII of 1909 so as to make it applicable to those who are born Sikhs and are inherently entitled by virtue of their birth and up-bringing to observe the custom of marriage by Anand form, and in case of converts only to those who have no husband or wife living by a subsisting marriage.

One of the cogent reasons for celebrating the anniversary of the Special Marriage Act III of 1872 is its insistence on monogamy. It lays down as one of the essential conditions that neither party must at the time of marriage have a husband or wife living. Another reason is the recognition of the rights of women by the provision made for divorce and the application of the Indian Divorce Act. The rights of succession of the widow and the issue of the marriages under the Act including the daughters are secured by the application of the Indian Succession Act. The Act secures the liberty of the conscience of the individual and free and unrestricted choice of partners in life. The undesirable feature of the necessity of a formal renunciation of any of the eight religions in India is done away with, and an option of a declaration of professing any one of the four religions referred to above is provided by the Gour's Act of 1923.

I would suggest that Mr. Bhagvandas should give due effect to the remarks quoted above, insist on monogamy and provide for the rights of succession of the widow and issue of the marriage including the daughters.

PHILIPPINE FELLOWSHIP OF FAITHS.

DR. WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.

For several years the writer has been interested in a world movement called the "World Fellowship of Faiths" which has been mentioned in the pages of the Reformer on numerous occasions. He was privileged to speak several times in New York at meetings of the Fellowship. The last occasion was at the farewell given for Sir Francis Young-husband on the s.s. Aquitania on the night that Sir Francis sailed for England after a trip through the United States in preparation for the second World Conference of the Fellowship which is to be held next July in London and Oxford.

Recently the writer came to the Philippine Islands and found here two other members of the Fellowship from the United States. We were able to form a small organising committee and have succeeded in interesting a number of residents of Manila in the idea.

On March 3rd the first public meeting of the Fellowship in the Philippines was held with fifty present and was addressed by the American High Commissioner, the Honorable Frank Murphy, who is a member of the National Committee of World Fellowship in the United States.

When Mr. Murphy was Mayor of the city of Detroit, he spoke at a very large gathering of the Fellowship in that city and was very deeply interested in the movement. In the Manila meeting he expressed himself as being exceedingly anxious to promote the movement here and called upon all those present to do everything in their power to forward the aims of the organization.

In addressing the group, Mr. Murphy spoke particularly of the underlying and abiding relationship between Jews, Roman Catholics, and Protestants, saying that the Catholics and Protestants had a common background in the Jewish faith, that Protestants quite frequently did not realize how much they were missing when they did not look back at the 15 centuries when the Christian faith was promoted by the Catholic Church, and that the Protestants had contributed a skeptical attitude

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 28]

towards spiritual values unless those values were based on practical experience.

His appeal was for a recognition on the part of each group to recognise the benefits derived from other groups instead of constantly discussing and emphasising differences.

It seems to the writer that one of the outstanding challenges today to men of all faiths, creeds, colors, and religions, is to have a very clear understanding of the values in human development in all sections of the world coupled with a ready acceptance of the truth gained through experience everywhere.

We need a united check upon the forces of aggressive evil that are abroad in order to make it possible for moral and ethical principles to live and for the higher human values to be advanced.

The recent trends in India, represented to some degree by the statements of Mr. Ambedkar, will indicate that human values must in the future be placed above any historical, social system even though such a system has accomplished beneficial results in the past.

The resentment on the part of the rural sections in Japan against the militarist regime in that country is largely based on the lack of opportunity of millions of Japanese to find their way into a larger expression of the personalities of the people involved.

Any support that any of us can lend to movements such as the World Fellowship of Faiths will serve to off-set in some degree at least, the forces that are tending to tear down and destroy the human structure that we call "civilization."

PORTUGUESE AND MALABAR CHRISTIANS

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In his interesting article published in the Reformer dated the 14th instant, the writer says: "In the 16th century Portuguese adventurers came with their guns and strategy to the West Coast of India to acquire wealth and promote the domains of the Church of Rome. Their methods met with success in the case of the helpless Syrian Christians of Malabar and so it is we find today a majority of them in obedience to the Pope of Rome." Italics mine.

It is ungracious to designate the Portuguese missionaries, many of them Jesuit Fathers, as "adventurers." Their admiration for and desire to help the Syrian Christians of Malabar animated all their activities. In his letter dated the 14th January 1936, St. Francis Xavier wrote to St. Ignatius Loyola as follows: "There is a town called Cranganore where Fra Vincenzo, a true friend of our Society, has founded a really fine seminary where quite as many as a hundred native students are maintained and are formed in piety and learning. Fra Vincenzo has asked me again and again to provide a priest of the Society who may teach grammar to the students. There are a great many Christians living in sixty villages in the neighbourhood, descended from those whom St. Thomas made Christians. The students of this seminary are of the highest nobility." P. 15 "Christianity in Travancore", by G.T. Mackenzie, British Resident.

The Europeans usually consider as worthless or evil those Indian usages which are beyond their understanding, and the early Jesuit Fathers were no exception to this. They believed erroneously that St. Thomas Christians were steeped in Nestorian heresy and, in urging "reforms", they had recourse to the resources of their secular government; but they were imbued with the purest motives in all their doings on the Malabar Coast. Their help and guidance have brought the greatest blessings upon the Romo-Syrians who are the richest, the most progressive and the best disciplined Christian community in India.

The printing press the Portuguese Jesuit Fathers set up at Vaipicotta in 1577, was the first in South India, if not in the whole of India. Even the most scholarly Syrian Christian has not so far written a book in Malayalam comparable in style and substance to the several acceptable books written in that language for the benefit of the ancient Christians by the European Fathers, at immense personal sacrifice to themselves.

The fact that the Syrian Christians successfully resisted at the Synod of Diamper on the 20th June 1599, attempts by the Portuguese to abandon their Syrian Liturgy in favour of Latin; that they still retain and use the Eastern picturesque Liturgy in their churches and that they have their own Bishops and clergy, shows that they were not a "helpless" people. Their submission to Rome involved no change of their faith. Until the Catholic Church made her abject surrender to Mussolini, she has been the most orderly and the best organised institution in the world. In recognising this, the Syrian Christians were no more "helpless" than the great English Cardinals, Newman, Wiseman and Manning who followed their example two hundred and fifty years afterwards.

Sylvan, Coonoor. }
19th March 1936. }

Yours, etc.,
M. G. JOSEPH.

MARRIAGE EXTRAVAGANCE.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue of 21st March 1936 you have indeed given a good warning to those who incur great expenses at marriage festivities. It is really the rich, as you suggest, who should lead others in having simple weddings so that others might follow without being criticised. The rivalry and competitions in making demonstrations of one's wealth seem hideous in other people's eyes. But unfortunately great publicity is given by papers to these by gorgeous and picturesque descriptions of such occasions. For instance, the presents given by the brides' party to the bridegrooms or vice versa carried by large parties along in such a way that all passersby might view them and with big tom-toms so that people inside the houses might come out and see, are nothing but a parade of one's financial superiority. Under the circumstances, rich people vie with one another in making great shows, big dinner parties, expensive lights and so forth. The poor and middle class through foolish vainglory try to imitate these, and parents of large families use their life's earnings at times like these and in many cases incur debts. Marriage in a family may no doubt be a festive occasion but there are limits to exhibitions of wealth. In a poor country like ours those who have superfluous wealth can spend it in a thousand good causes rather than a few days tamasha. But the truth of the matter is that on such occasions overjoy unbalances the minds of most people and a mentality is created where vanity takes the place of sanity.

VIDYAGURI RAMANBHAI NILKANTH.

Ahmedabad,
23rd March 1936. }

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

475

KING GEORGE V MEMORIAL FUND.

A public Meeting of the citizens of Bombay was called by the Sheriff on Tuesday, February the 11th, 1936, for the purpose of expressing their deep sense of grief at the death of His Majesty King George V, Emperor of India. It was resolved, at that meeting, that a Fund should be started to commemorate, in a fitting manner, the beloved memory of His late Majesty.

The poignant grief that was manifest all over India made it abundantly clear that His Majesty's death has left a void in the hearts of the Public. The deep impression made by His Majesty, during his two visits to this country, by his earnestness to take all possible measures for the welfare of his Indian subjects, and the interest he continued to show in their well-being throughout his reign of over 25 years have, I am convinced, left an indelible mark on the minds of the citizens of Bombay, and I feel confident that they will be second to none in giving a tangible expression to their sentiment by raising a fitting Memorial to the memory of their late King-Emperor.

A Committee of the citizens of Bombay has been appointed to collect Funds for an object which was dear to the heart of His Majesty and which will benefit the public of Bombay in a direction where the need is the greatest.

While fully realising the numerous calls that have been made, in recent times, on the public-spirited citizens of Bombay, I am now appealing to you for funds for a Public Memorial to our late beloved King-Emperor. A small part of these funds will be used to erect a Statue of His late Majesty on a suitable site, and the bulk of them will be used for the benefit of the sick and suffering of Bombay City. The scheme under consideration at present is for the erection, equipment and endowment of an Infirmary to take chronic patients who are now occupying beds in the City hospitals. Should this scheme not prove to be practicable, the amount available, together with the balances remaining in the Silver Jubilee Fund, will be used to benefit the hospitals in such ways as to render them more efficient to carry out their great task. It is not the intention of the Committee to erect any new buildings unless they are in a position to endow them fully for the future.

I am confident that the public of Bombay will respond to my appeal with their usual generosity.

23rd March 1936.

BRABOURNE,
Governor of Bombay.

INDUS CIVILIZATION.

'The so-called Indus civilisation, which was the civilization of the whole of pre-Aryan India, is the most ancient civilization of Asia, the originator of the Sumerian civilization which afterwards developed into Babylonian and Assyrian, and the cause of the civilization of China that afterwards spread to Corea and Japan.' This was one of the conclusions arrived at by the Rev. H. Heras, S. J. Professor of Indian history and archaeology, St. Xavier's College, Bombay at a lecture on the Mohenjo-Daro script given before the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society on Wednesday, March 18. Fr. Heras first surveyed the work done by other scholars in connection with the script of Mohenjo-Daro, who seemed at times to have been influenced by pre-conceived ideas due to the spread of Aryan civilization in India and its amalgamation with pre-Aryan culture. Perhaps on account of this script of Mohenjo Daro has not been deciphered. The civilisation of Mohenjo-Daro is evidently pre-Aryan. This has been so successfully proved after the study of the remains of those ancient sites that if any day scholars were forced to put the Aryan invasion earlier than the date assigned to these cities, even then we would be compelled to declare that the Mohenjo-Daro civilization if not pre-Aryan is evidently non-Aryan. After explaining the modern theories about the origin of the so-called Dravidian people, the lecturer gave an account of his comparative studies of the Mohenjo-Daro script with other sixteen ancient scripts including Iberian, Etruscan, Minoan, Egyptian, Sumerian, Proto-Chinese, South and North Indian Brahmi, Easter Island, Pre-historic marks of Southern India and marks on the Purana coins. After this he studied the inscriptions themselves drawing the following conclusion.

The inscriptions are on steatite seals, on small copper plaques and on a few broken pieces of pottery. The majority of the seals and plaques bear besides the inscription the figure of animals sculptured with great skill. Several sorts of animals are represented on these seals—the Unicorn, the Buffalo, the Bull, the Alligator, the he-goat, the Elephant, etc.—They are the totemic signs of the ancient Indian tribes whose names are still recorded in ancient Sanskrit literature, as the Mahishih, the Nagas, the Garudas, the Vanars, the Matsyas, etc. Other seals have different figures, probably of a religious meaning.

Religious inscriptions are not as many as some of the previous scholars who tried to decipher them once supposed. Yet when the whole bulk of inscriptions will be deciphered, they must probably will give a fairly good survey of the pre-Aryan religious thought. According to those inscriptions hitherto deciphered, one sees that the worship of trees was very common. There is, moreover, a deity whose eyes are called 'fish eyes', just the pre-Aryan denomination of 'Minakshi', the title given to Parvati in Madura. Yet, one of the seals bearing this denomination seems to refer it to Siva, for three eyes are mentioned in it.

The inscriptions referring to social life disclose that there existed arable lands belonging to the city, i. e., to the community of citizens, a custom which prevailed in many parts in ancient India and which is still now subsisting in Portuguese territory of Goa. Finally, the castes or ancient tribes of the Paravas and of the Maravas who exist to the present day in Southern India, and others, are also referred to in some of these inscriptions.

The south of India is twice mentioned in the geographical inscriptions. One of these historical inscriptions record that two canals were constructed in the month of hulam (Aquarius) and mina (Pisces) in the woodpecker country. Another informs us of the building of another canal which apparently was much larger than the others, for 13 months were spent in its construction. It is, indeed, interesting to realize that irrigation was much developed by those ancient people. Another seal mentions the seven countries or kingdoms, a phrase which latter on passed to Sanskrit literature.

By far the most interesting seals are those that supply astronomical data of great importance, practically always in connection with the signs of the Zodiac. The pre-Aryan people of India reckoned the time by the solar months. Hitherto it was always said that the Zodiac was invented by the Chaldeans. But the so-called Dravidian people of India had already recorded their astronomical observations based on the Zodiac on these seals thousands of years before the Chaldeans had learnt the Zodiac from them. One of the inscriptions mentions the fact that the Zodiacal sign of Aries (the Ram) goes faster than the others. This could only happen when

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

476

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 23

realpatidar.com

this constellation was in or very near, the winter solstice. At present this constellation corresponds to April and May, but owing to the movement of precession of the ecliptic, Aries was in, or very near, the winter solstice about 6,502 B. C. In any case it must be said that as we begin the solar year in the spring equinox, these people commenced it in the winter solstice. Several seals confirm the same calculation. There are also some inscriptions referring to lunar observations.

The most difficult problem in connection with the decipherment of these seals is the language. There is no written record of the language spoken in India during that early age. This language must be different from all the Dravidian languages spoken now-a-days, but it must also be related to all of them. That language should be called proto-Dravidian language.

The Sumerian tradition points to the south as the place from where their civilization came. Buddhist tradition recorded in the Jatakas shows the Indian arriving at Mesopotamia for the first time; and the seals with inscriptions similar to those of Mohenjo-Daro, discovered in Ur, Kish, Susa and other ancient cities of those countries confirm the truthfulness of those traditions. The Indian script of Mohenjo-Daro is the parent of the Sumerian script and, therefore, of the cuneiform script that succeeded the Sumerian. With this script the so-called Dravidian civilization was propagated through Sumer, Babylon and Assyria, as the Zodiac proves.

In a similar way according to Chinese tradition, kept in the earliest historical chronicles of the nation, people who came from India across the mountains spread many inventions throughout China during the 3rd millennium B. C. one of these inventions was the script. In the proto-Chinese inscriptions of the Shang Dynasty we come across many signs which are very similar, if not equal, to the signs of the Mohenjo-Daro seals.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL NEHRU.

(By MR. SACHCHIDANANDA SINHA, BAR-AT-LAW.)

Jawaharlal—who was born at Allahabad, in November, 1889—is the only son of his distinguished father, the late Pandit Motilal Nehru. Young Jawaharlal was given the best education his father could give. When, forty years back, I first met him in November, 1896, in his father's house at Allahabad he was only seven. It is something to have had the privilege of having been introduced at that age to one who was to be a twice-elected President of the Congress. At that time his father was anxious more for the health of young Jawaharlal than for his intellectual development; and so in 1897, he took him with the rest of his family to Kashmir. I was one of the members of that personally-conducted tour by Pandit Motilal, and have vivid recollections of Jawaharlal's antics in Kashmir.

In 1905—at the age of fifteen—Jawaharlal left India for education in England, and took his admittance into the famous public school at Harrow, from which he went later to the Trinity College at Cambridge. He also joined in London, the Inns of Court, and was called to the Bar, by the Hon'ble Society of the Inner Temple, in 1912. He returned to India in the same year after taking second class honours in Natural Science, at Cambridge. Later, the degree of Master of Arts was conferred on him by his University. It is to be noted with gratification that in spite of work in other and wholly different spheres, he has not lost touch with his first love—science—as is evidenced by the publication, in 1929, of his Letters from a Father to his Daughter, which is an excellent, illustrated outline, in remarkably simple English, for children. It is not only interesting but instructive, and merits a wide circulation amongst those for whom it is intended.

During his stay in England, Jawaharlal took great interest in Indian affairs. He was deeply stirred, in 1907, on receiving the news of the deportation of Lajpat Rai, and was greatly interested in the then new upheaval in Indian politics due to the activities of "Bal, Pal and Lal"—as Bal Gangadhar Tilak, Bipin Chandra Pal and Lajpat Rai were, in common parlance, called in those days. These three eminent Indian leaders, and Mrs. Besant, were to him then the outstanding personalities in the Indian political world, and their views influenced him substantially. But though his youthful views were affected largely by them, he had not evidently then any settled political convictions. From 1913 to 1920 he practised in the Allahabad High Court, but evidently his heart was not in the work and he does not seem to have striven after, or aspired to professional success. He formally renounced practice on the inauguration of the non-co-operation movement in September, 1920, and is not likely to resume it. So his professional career may be taken to have ended at that time. Shortly after his return to India, Jawaharlal attended (as but a 'visitor') the session of the Congress held at Patna, in 1912. But even while practicing, Jawaharlal was deeply interested in public activities. In 1914 when Gokhale issued an appeal for funds, for public purposes, Jawaharlal collected about Rs. 40,000. In 1917, he took a prominent part in Mrs. Besant's Home Rule agitation of that year, and was appointed Secretary of the Home Rule League. In 1919 when his father started at Allahabad an English daily (called the Independent), Jawaharlal was one of the directors of the concern, and also one of the principal literary contributors to that paper. If it died after only a short life, its death must be attributed to others than Jawaharlal. In the same year he went to the Punjab, immediately after the martial law period, and took part in the Congress enquiry there. Later, in that year, he took a prominent part in the agrarian agitation in Oudh, which resulted, it is believed, in a substantial change in the tenancy law in favour of the tenantry. In 1920, he was externed by Government from Mussoorie on his refusal to give any undertaking that he would not meet the Afghan delegates, who had come there for the Peace Conference. His refusal was on 'principle' and was withdrawn after a few days.

Since the inauguration of non-co-operation in September, 1920, (at the special session of the Congress held in Calcutta, under the presidentship of Lajpat Rai) Jawaharlal has been, of course, very prominently connected with that movement, and in December, 1921, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. Released after three months, he was re-arrested after some weeks, and was, on a second conviction, sentenced to a term of one year and nine months. Discharged after nine months he was again arrested in the latter half of 1923, in the Nabha State (where he had gone to see to the treatment accorded to the Akali Sikhs) and was sentenced, for disobedience of order to leave the State, to six months, and also to two years for an alleged conspiracy. Both the sentences were apparently indefinitely suspended, and he was discharged almost immediately. Later, in 1934, he was convicted (by the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta) for sedition and sentenced to imprisonment for two years, but was released last year before the expiry of the term, owing to the illness of his late lamented wife, Srimati Kamla Nehru who was then in Europe.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

477

Since 1923 when he was elected General Secretary of the Congress, Jawaharlal has been intimately associated with that political organization the fortunes of which he directed, for the first time, as its President, in 1929. In the course of his strenuous public activities, he spent the greater part of 1926-27 in Europe, where he brought to the fore, on platform and in the press of the several countries, the problem of India's economic and political freedom. He was at Moscow in November, 1927, on the occasion of the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the foundation of the Soviet Republic. In 1928 he issued an informative book on some aspects of Soviet Russia, and presented in it an interesting account of the then political and economic conditions in that Bolshevik State. Evidently influenced by his travels in Russia, he went to the Madras session of the Congress, in 1928, and brought up there his resolution urging India's claim to 'Independence', but failed to get it adopted.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman),
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MNL Agent, Ahmedabad,) Tootsidas Khashchand Esq., (Khashchand Devchand & Co., Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallai Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratiai (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 3 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager,

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 21, Spratt Road, Ballard Estate,

2-38

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

478

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Mar. 28

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,

Sheik Memon St., Bombay.

BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,

3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

AHMEDABAD.

AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)

CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)

NAGPUR CITY.

POONA.

POONA CITY.

RAJKOT.

SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
 Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
 Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000
 London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramatti (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nasik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Paighar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chuni Lal V. Mehta, K.G.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
R. G. Sarfaya, Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) — — — — Rs. 12,96,998

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

479

QUALITY CLOTH

So-called cheap silk fabrics do let you do want any time and cost you more in the long run because they are made down to a price and not up to a standard.

Mysore Government Silk Weaving Factory.
fabrics are recognised throughout India for their superior quality, reliability and attractiveness and are guaranteed free from admixture either with artificial silk or foreign yarn.

The choice is in your hands.

Govt Silk Weaving Factory Buy Mysore Georgettes, Mysore Crêpes and Mysore Satins and have full satisfaction.
Leading Stockists:
Agents:—

The Mysore Products, Princess Street, BOMBAY.

The Mysore Silk Depot, Swadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.

"INDIAN—OPINION"

(Founded by Mahatma Gandhi in 1903)
For The Moral, Political and Social Advancement
Of South African Indians.
SUBSCRIPTION RATES

Within the Union	20s. Annually.
Outside the Union	10s. 6d. Half-yearly.
" " " " " "	21s. Annually.
" " " " " "	11s. Half-yearly.

For Further Particulars Apply to:—
The Manager, INDIAN OPINION,
Phoenix, Natal.

SAFELY RELY

ON AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF
Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other
kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT. realpatidar.com
BOMBAY & MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

480

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

(Mar. 28)

realpatidar.com

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager, The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 106, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay; and Published by Swaminath Natarajan, for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDA, BOMBAY, 26.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY APRIL 4, 1936. No. 31

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Two New Provinces.
India and the League of Nations.
New Orientation of Christian Missions.
For Record.
Concert of Muslim States.
Mr. Subhas Bose.
The Ottawa Pact.
Men in Women's Constituent Bodies.
A Astonishing Blunder.
A Message of Peace.
Education, a Public Responsibility.

Aspirations After the Unknown.
Draft Resolutions for Lucknow Congress.
Mitsubara Joint Hindu Family.
Harijan Sevak Sangh.
A Windfall to Shantiniketan.
The Aga Khan at the League of Nations.
Unemployment in Germany.
Chinese Trade and World Peace.
The New Russian Peasant.

NOTES

Two New Provinces:—On the 1st April two new Provinces have been called into existence under the Government of India Act. Orissa was divided among three larger provinces and there was good ground for the complaint that the interests, material and cultural, of the people, suffered thereby. The constitution of Orissa into a province by itself, is, therefore, justifiable on sound administrative principles. The separation of Sind from Bombay is on a different footing. It is undeniable that, during the eighty years of her connection with Bombay, Sind has made notable strides in all directions. There are Sindhis who profess to think that their province has suffered from being dominated by Bombay, but they do not seriously mean it. The fact remains that every year Bombay had to subsidise Sind to the extent of two crores of rupees. The separation of Sind, were she able to support herself, would have been a matter for congratulation. Bombay may feel that she has helped Sind to set up house for herself. But this is not the case. Sind passes from the kindly guardianship of Bombay to the casual charity of the Government of India shortly to be transformed into a ramshackle Federation. The Governor of Bombay, with a finer sensibility than his Finance Minister, has issued a graceful farewell message on the eve of the separation. Recent researches are bringing to light the ancient greatness of Sind which archaeologists are beginning to regard as the cradle of civilisation. For both the new provinces, we wish a prosperous and happy future.

India and the League of Nations:—Mr. A. Felt Director of the Information Bureau of the League of Nations who is now travelling in India, has in more than one place admonished Indians that they are happy in not having to concern themselves with international politics and that they would best devote attention to the social side of the activities of the League. He repeated this in Madras. It is incorrect to say that because we have no voice in international affairs, we have no concern in them. This is really our misfortune. If war breaks out tomorrow between France and Germany, Indian troops will be the first to be called out, as in the last war, to protect Paris in fulfilment of the obligations of Great Britain to France. India bore the full brunt of the last war as much as any other country except France and Belgium, without having the satisfaction, such as it is, of having in the least degree contributed to the outbreak by any deliberate or impulsive act of hers. Mr. Felt is right in so far that Indians are not called upon to deliberate whether they will or not take part in a quarrel. All the same when the fight is on they have to bear their share and more than their share of it.

New Orientation of Christian Missions:—We publish today the prospectus of "A Movement for World Christianity". It is the direct outcome of the Laymen's Committee's famous Report, "Rethinking Missions". The Movement is based on a conception of Missions which faithfully represents Jesus and his Gospel; which recognising every aspect of human need, lays a demand upon the Church to meet these needs in the light of new world conditions and changing forms of thought; and which makes for increased co-operation among religious and social groups, free from ecclesiastical and doctrinal divisiveness and from all sense of national and racial superiority. Christianity, since the Reformation, has gradually surrendered extensive spheres to secular control until it has shrunk to a formal creed divorced from practically the whole of an individual's and a nation's life. The new Movement seeks to retrieve the position so lost. It recognises the responsibility of the Church for Christianizing the whole range of influences—economic, cultural as well as religious—both within Christendom and in the impact of those influences upon non-Christian peoples. The Movement postulates a new attitude to non-Christian peoples; one of appreciation instead of one of denunciation as has been too often the case. On one point of great interest and importance, we have not been able to find any definite indication of the Movement's view in the papers sent to us. What is the attitude of the Movement to proselytisation? It follows

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

482
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 4

from the leading principles of the Movement that it can not be the same as at present. We should much wish to know what else it is.

For Record :—In the Reformer of January 25, in an editorial note on "Women Under Fascism" we called attention to the allegation of Miss Sylvia Pankhurst in the Hibbert Journal that the Catholic Church may, and actually does, authorise a religious marriage, carrying no civil rights, between persons one or the other of whom is already married to some one else. As no contradiction was forthcoming in the two leading Indian Catholic journals which are among our exchanges, we again called attention to the statement in the Reformer of March 14 in the course of an editorial on the attitude of the Catholic Church to Ethiopia. Both the Catholic journals comment on the editorial. The Catholic Leader writes at some length but avoids referring to Miss Pankhurst's statement. The Catholic Examiner is more intrepid. It observes : "Catholics hold that divorce is not merely wrong but is strictly speaking impossible, i. e., that where there is a valid marriage no human power can possibly break it. Consequently "civil divorce" and power to "remarry" during the lifetime of the true partner in reality only mean that the State will not prosecute these people if they choose to live in public concubinage. That, of course, is not the legal view, but it is God's view—it is the truth. Hence the absurdity of saying with Miss Pankhurst and the Indian Social Reformer that 'the Church in Italy may, and actually does, authorize a religious marriage...between persons, one or other of whom is already married to some one else.' The Church could not possibly do anything of the kind. But what is true is that not every union which the State calls "marriage" is either recognized by the Church, or is in fact a true marriage." If we understand the Examiner aright, it virtually says that the Church regards civil marriage as no better than legalised concubinage and, therefore, allows a person living in such concubinage to receive its sacrament of marriage, regarding that state as no impediment. And, be it noted that it is not only man but also woman who is allowed this latitude. From the secular point of view it would seem that not only polygamy but also polyandry may find sanction under this conflict of civil and religious marriages. Does the Examiner's argument apply only to Catholics in Italy?

Concert of Muslim States :—It was recently announced that treaties of alliance have been entered into between Turkey, Iraq, Iran, and Afghanistan. Egypt and Saudi Arabia are the two large Muslim States which remain out of this concert. Turkey naturally takes the lead and the political alliance is a symbol of the great influence which the example of Turkey is having on the social and religious life of Western Asia. An incident which excited comment in this country is the closing of the Persian frontier to Muslim pilgrims from India during Mohurram. A Press note issued last week states that information is available from Meshed that the Iran Government have now admitted that they refused visas to Indian Muslims proceeding to Meshed in connection with Mohurram. The actual number of pilgrims thus held up on the Persian border is not known. Two possible explanations are given. "Firstly, that there is a certain amount of fanaticism at present in Iran and it will be inadvisable to allow Muslims to go there lest they should be subjected to inconvenience. The second reason is connected with the nation-wide attempt, following Turkey, to unveil the women of Iran, and therefore, the fear of introducing unnecessary complications by allowing Muslims from India." The obvious inference from this statement is that the movement to abolish the purdah in Persia is encountering opposition from the priestly classes who are dominant in Kerbela and other important pilgrim centres in Iran; and that it is considered undesirable by the Government of Iran to admit foreigners who may complicate the situation by taking sides in a pre-eminently social controversy. The offerings of the pilgrims will add to the resources of the priestly opposition. Evidently, too, Indian Muslims are not regarded in Iran as a progressive element in social matters.

Mr. Subhas Bose :—It was stated in a Reuter's message on Tuesday that Mr. Subhas Bose had left Vienna to catch an Italian boat which is due to arrive at Colombo on the 10th April. The Conte Verde does not apparently stop at Aden where Mr. Bose would come under British jurisdiction. When he went to the Irish Free State some time back, a question was asked in the House of Commons as to the eligibility of one who was not permitted to land in England to visit the Free State. The answer was that it was a matter within the sole competence of the Government of that Dominion. Ceylon is not a Dominion. The intimation given to Mr. Bose by the British representative at Vienna, however, was that he should not expect to enjoy his freedom if he landed in India. He will, therefore, be allowed to come to India. Whatever action the Government of India contemplate will be initiated when he sets foot on his native soil. Meanwhile an interesting situation has arisen as the result of the discussion in the Legislative Assembly where a motion of adjournment was carried to call attention to the published intention of Government to make him a State prisoner under the old Bengal Regulation if he came back to India. The speeches made from the Government bench in justification of the decision, contained allegations against Mr. Bose of a serious character which have not been subjected to judicial scrutiny. According to the recent ruling of the President of the Legislative Assembly, speeches made in the Assembly are privileged only in the Assembly and newspapers publishing them are liable to be called to account under the ordinary law. The speeches of Government members about

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER :

483

Mr. Bose were widely published in the newspapers. It will, we think, be open to Mr. Bose to take action against any of the papers and they will have to withdraw and apologise, if Government do not make available for their defence the evidence on which the Home Member and the Law Member based their allegations against Mr. Bose. The President's ruling may be right or wrong but, so long as it stands, Mr. Subhas Bose is as much entitled to take action under it as Government in the case of the Abhyudhaya for publishing Mr. Krishna Kant Malaviya's speech in the Assembly on the Criminal Law Amendment Bill.

The Ottawa Pact :—The Legislative Assembly by a decisive majority carried the resolution moved by Mr. M. A. Jinnah to end the Ottawa Pact. Mr. Jinnah's resolution recommended that bi-lateral treaties should be made between India and other countries including Britain for regulating trade between them. The second part is merely recommendatory. The Government of India have pledged themselves to abide by the vote of the Assembly on the Pact and we have no doubt they will abide by their pledge. We more than suspect that His Majesty's Government will not be much concerned about India's decision to denounce the Pact. They had themselves had a bitter experience at Ottawa, and they are not likely to invite its repetition in a hurry. Speaking two months after the Ottawa Conference in the House of Commons, Mr. Baldwin said: "What have we got out of this? What does it mean in trade? I answer quite frankly—I do not know." Viscount Snowden in his Autobiography writes: "Mr. Neville Chamberlain gave us a sidelight upon the harmony of the proceedings at Ottawa when he said that he had found the bonds of Empire had worn very thin. The 'harmonious' proceedings at the Conference were on the point of breaking up at two o'clock in the morning of the day when the British Delegation was due to leave Ottawa. A complete breakdown was only averted by further concessions made by the British Delegation. All the Dominion delegates were obsessed by the idea of economic nationalism, and they threatened that, if the British Delegation would not agree to their demands, they would make arrangements with foreign countries." For all the bullying they had to submit to at the hands of the Dominion delegations, the British Delegation sought and found amends from the Indian Delegation. This was quite understood in this country although details of the proceedings were lacking. We are well rid of this incubus. As for other countries not being in a hurry to enter into independent agreements with India, neither are we in a hurry to have them. Foreign trade has bulked too largely in the eyes of those who happen to have in their hands the shaping for the time being of India's economic destiny. What is far more important is the development of trade and industries in the country so as to make it self-sufficient in respect of all the necessities and amenities of life. The interests of the people of India have been too long sacrificed to the fetish of being able to borrow at 3 per cent in London. The so-called balance of trade, in a country so favourably situated as India to produce all that she wants, is of minor importance. Let us use up our raw materials ourselves, in our own industries, and if industries can not be developed with sufficient rapidity, let us produce just as much as is needed for our own consumption. The role of hewers of wood and drawers of water for the world, has become galling and cannot be borne.

Men in Women's Constituencies :—Referring to the participation of men in the special electorates which they proposed for the election of women to the seats reserved for them in Provincial Assemblies, the Hammond Committee observed: "We have been strongly urged to restrict the electorate for the Mahomedan women's seat in Sind to women. One lady of influential position declared that from the Mahomedan woman's point of view it was "disgusting" that she should be expected to solicit votes from men. We had to inform the ladies who represented this case to us that this question was disposed of by the Act, and so falls outside the scope of our enquiry." The Draft Orders placed before Parliament to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee, in contravention of the Act, oust men from Muslim constituencies for electing to the women's reserved seats not only in Sind but also in the Punjab. Does the Act give power to His Majesty's Government to extend its provisions in a way which was felt to be outside their scope by the Hammond Committee?

As Astonishing Blunder :—We wonder how an experience journalist like the editor of the Hindustan Times passed for publication the circumstantial story about Lord Halifax having written to Gandhiji requesting him to meet the new Viceroy and have a frank talk with him, and of the suggestion having been made with the knowledge of the Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin. On the face of it, this message has emanated from a source which is apprehensive of a change of policy on the part of the new Viceroy and is determined to prevent it by any means. Assuming that Gandhiji had received a letter from Lord Halifax—which he has categorically denied, denouncing the whole thing as a fabrication—he would certainly be the last man to send it out for publication. The Secretary of State has officially contradicted the allegations made with an appearance of authority. We do not hear nowadays of any one personage being able to "deliver the goods." If it was ever anything more than a mere phrase, it is quite obvious that it has ceased to have any significance now. We trust that Lord Linlithgow will not feel embarrassed in pursuing a conciliatory policy by this blatant attempt to prevent it.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

484
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

April 4

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, April 4 1936.

A MESSAGE OF PEACE.

We have received a copy of a revised English version of an appeal for peace and mutual goodwill, which was addressed to the communities of India twenty years ago by Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad, the Founder of the Ahmadiyya movement. It is issued on the occasion of Tabligh day, the 29th March, by the Anjuman Ahmadiyya of Lahore. An interesting Foreword narrates the circumstances in which the message was composed. Hazrat fell ill about the end of March 1903 and an inner voice told him that it was to be his last illness. Knowing this, he set about composing his last message to his people and the last lines of it were delivered only a few hours before he breathed his last. The publishers are, therefore, right in claiming that the circumstances in which it was written invest it with a peculiar appeal, the power and sincerity of which few will fail to appreciate. The message shows how Hazrat had at heart the true interests of his country and his countrymen. There has been a recent controversy among Muslims as to whether the Qadians, as the Ahmadiyya sect is known from the place where the Founder established his principal centre, should or should not be regarded as belonging to the fold of Islam. Seeing that the inspiration of this message is wholly drawn from the Holy Koran, it is difficult to say if the Qadians are not Muslims, what else they are. Hazrat's religious outlook is very wide and broad. He maintains with intense conviction that God is God of all races, creeds and nations, and that it is impious to regard Him as especially favouring one or another of them. He holds likewise that God has never ceased to guide the thoughts of his creatures. "I can testify" he says, "that revelation and experience of God have not been intercepted in our time, God speaks even now as He spoke in the past, and He listens as He listened in days of yore, and none of His perfect and holy attributes has, or shall ever, become lapsed." This experience is wholly in consonance with Hindu beliefs and we are surprised that Hazrat should think otherwise. He seems to have specially in his mind the Arya Samaj, but, as he himself observes, the Arya Samaj counts only a small proportion of Hindus as its adherents. The niyoga doctrine ceased long ago to be followed by Hindus and even Arya Samajists do not practice it now. It was not a special feature of Hinduism as it prevailed amongst Jews and was known as the levirate in ancient times. It was an institution adapted to the conditions of a certain stage of social evolution. Much acrimonious religious controversy is due to confounding social practices with religious ideals. Hazrat speaks with reverence of Sri Krishna and with fervent admiration of Guru Nanak. Of Sri Krishna, he says that there can be no doubt at all that he was a prophet of his time and an avatar, and that he was favoured by God by the word of His mouth. Of Guru Nanak, he says that he completely refuted the doctrine which holds that there is to be no revelation nor any signs of God after the Vedas. We have already said that there is no such doctrine in Hinduism. Nanak, says Hazrat, was the last avatar of the Hindus. He was obviously ill-informed. The followers of Chaitanya claim him as an avatar, neo-Vedantists claim that Sri Ramakrishna was an avatar, and Pandit Jawharlal Nehru quite recently felt constrained to deprecate the belief that Gandhiji is an avatar. Every great thought, wrote George Eliot, is an inspiration. In the same sense, every good man may be said to be an avatar.

Hazrat makes what may be called a sporting offer. "If", he writes "in order to have perfect peace, the Hindus and the Arya Samajists are prepared to accept our holy Prophet (peace and the blessings of God upon him!) as a true prophet of God, and if they are prepared to give up denying and defaming him, I would be the first man to sign an agreement that we, the followers of the Ahmadiyya movement, will always believe in the Vedas and will speak respectfully of the Vedas and the Rishis. We will bind ourselves to pay the Hindus a penalty of Rs. 3,00,000, in case we fail to fulfil the agreement. If Hindus cordially wish for peace, they also should sign a similar agreement in some such terms." Millions of Hindus have no occasion at all to speak of the Prophet of Islam, and those who have occasion to do so, always speak of him in terms of reverence similar to those which educated men use of other great Teachers and Prophets. The reward of three lakhs of rupees which Hazrat offers is, therefore, unnecessary. But as he says of himself that he can not guarantee that other Muslims will endorse his offer, no Hindu leader can undertake a similar obligation. There may be some Hindus who in direct contravention of the precepts of their religion, speak slightly of other Prophets. But surely, this is against the age long tradition of India. Hazrat desired that the agreement such as he proposed should be signed by at least ten thousand sensible men on each side. This can be easily done. Hazrat denies that the differences between Hindus and Muslims are mainly political. They are religious though politics may aggravate them somewhat. Since it is not possible that all Hindus should become Muslims or all Muslims Hindus, he suggests that an agreement to respect each others' religious Teachers and Prophets, is the next best thing calculated to allay animosities. Real unity can only come from sincere respect for each others' religious Teachers. "You may join hands with each other for some time like hypocrites" warns Hazrat his Muslim co-religionists "but real peace and tranquility can only be attained if, from the bottom of your hearts, you accept the Vedas and the Rishis as from God, and your Hindu brethren likewise expel all malice from their hearts, and

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

485

accept our Holy Prophet as a true prophet of God. Remember that this is the only course which will bring about real unity between you and the Hindus. It will act like water and wash away all hatred from your hearts. If the time has come for the two long-separated people to unite, God will open their hearts to accept this proposal, as He has opened ours." Belief, of course, is not enough. It must express itself in behaviour. But Hazrat is right in thinking that if the belief is sincerely held it must eventuate in conduct which will harmonise the relations between Hindus and Muslims in India. It is a great message though the line of reasoning may seem medieval to modern readers.

EDUCATION, A PUBLIC RESPONSIBILITY.

(BY CYRIL MODAK.)

(Concluded from the last issue.)

Public institutions come into being as instruments for the expression of social values. It is only right to expect that these public institutions collaborate with educational agencies for the promulgation of knowledge. Good libraries with trained, efficient and courteous librarians can bring ample advantages within the reach of many. Different types of library can be made to serve different purposes. Good reading material for varying age-levels is a public need. Orphanage and widows' homes ought to become educational centres giving special attention to vocational courses. So many inmates of widows' homes have talent, have ambition, have energy, who, if trained, can be of definite service in village schools and educational work among women, but who are allowed to fill their idle hours with rebellion. Organizations of a communal type, or with a political bias, ought to turn their attention to the educational needs of the people they wish to serve. As members of society, as sponsors of some one or other of these public institutions, can we not join the great campaign against illiteracy? Have we lent our support to the over-whelming task of educating the masses of our nation? Or do we wait in expectancy for a miracle?

Society evolves certain agencies of administration for the application of its standards, for the maintenance of peace and order, for the organization of its varied activities. In India these agencies are grouped under "Reserved Subjects" and "Transferred Subjects". With the first we have nothing to do. We are concerned with the local self-governing department of "Transferred Subjects". As members of these local self-governing bodies, of Local Boards, of District Councils, of Municipalities how do we plan and work for the liquidation of illiteracy in this vast sub-continent? We squander so much of our energy on puerile wrangling, so much of our time on plots and counter-plots and petty tactics. Our term is over, perhaps, while we are still in hot pursuit of our opponent. Meanwhile the teeming villages of India wait to be instructed, and thousands and tens of thousands in towns and cities take to obnoxious diversions for the want of educational facilities. The construction of village roads is important, the upkeep and the supervision of cattle-pounds is necessary. But far more important is the construction of the highways of knowledge and literacy for our rural masses; and far more necessary is the maintenance and supervision of pounds for ignorance and illiteracy and prejudice which stealthily ravage the minds and lives of our people infinitely more than cattle spoil their fields.

Why wait to run-up respectable school-buildings for primary schools in the villages? It would be a foolish doctor who, in a serious case demanding immediate treatment waited for some silver-papered tablets handsomely packed, and waited while the patient suffered, and may be, died. The case of illiteracy demands concentrated effort, demands all the philanthropy, all the self-sacrifice, all the talent, all the experimentation that the nation is capable of, that the country can offer. As gallant members of Local Boards and District Councils what are we doing to fight this dragon? Let us hold open-air classes. Let us prevail on malguzars to lend a building. Let us collect funds. Let us go and teach and canvas volunteers. Let us appeal to our electorates for help. Let us do something to obliterate the blot of growing illiteracy among our brethren.

In the same way Municipal Commissioners will tell you of how many lanes have been paved, what excellent sanitation work has been done, how many free dispensaries have been opened, during their term of office. All this is good. It deserves to be appreciated. But what, I ask you, what is the use of sporadic superficial efforts for public sanitation and hygiene when comparatively very little is being done for the sanitation and hygiene of minds? Darkened minds untouched by the sunlight of knowledge, these diseased minds untouched by the salutary influence of high morals cry, to you to plan and work out, at any cost an educational programme suited to their needs. So much waits to be accomplished for adult education. So many experiments can be tried for subsidiary-vocational training in classes attached to mills, factories, and the like. Such a great deal must be done for the education of women. Child-welfare centres have been a splendid boon. But welfare centres for the education of women are an equally crying need. It is by no means enough to have an annual increase in the total enrolment of primary schools. It is the duty of municipalities to make it practically useful for students to have primary school instruction, to try the experiment of diversion for vocational training after the primary stage. The veneer of a verbal literacy will do no one any good. It will always lead to "wastage" and "leakage", two official problems of the year. What India needs, what India demands of you, of every citizen, is a purposeful scheme of progressive education enabling the masses not merely to read and write after a fashion, but to take an intelligent interest and an active and worthy part in the festival of life.

Your savage deserts howling near,
Your wastes of ignorance, vice and shame;
Is there no room for victories here,
No place for deeds of fame?

Education is a co-operative public enterprise. Have we co-operated to the best of our ability? An official critic once replied to the writer that education is a transferred subject in the portfolio of an Indian minister. What right had we to blame foreigners and the officials of the education department for the continuation of a defective system? This remark, though irrelevant to the issue raised, brought home the urgent necessity of our realizing that education is a public responsibility. For the investment of a few thousand rupees we put ourselves to inconvenience and trouble and make sure that our investment is safe and profitable. Is it not incredible that we are willing to invest our substance, our hopes and ambitions, our best wealth, our children in schools and colleges with suave indifference?

It is strange that we never think of exerting ourselves for a co-operative and persistent venture to

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

484
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

April 4

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, April 4 1936.

A MESSAGE OF PEACE.

We have received a copy of a revised English version of an appeal for peace and mutual goodwill, which was addressed to the communities of India twenty years ago by Hazrat Mirza Ghulam Ahmad, the Founder of the Ahmadiyya movement. It is issued on the occasion of Tabligh day, the 29th March, by the Anjuman Ahmadiyya of Lahore. An interesting Foreword narrates the circumstances in which the message was composed. Hazrat fell ill about the end of March 1908 and an inner voice told him that it was to be his last illness. Knowing this, he set about composing his last message to his people and the last lines of it were delivered only a few hours before he breathed his last. The publishers are, therefore, right in claiming that the circumstances in which it was written invest it with a peculiar appeal, the power and sincerity of which few will fail to appreciate. The message shows how Hazrat had at heart the true interests of his country and his countrymen. There has been a recent controversy among Muslims as to whether the Qadians, as the Ahmadiyya sect is known from the place where the Founder established his principal centre, should or should not be regarded as belonging to the fold of Islam. Seeing that the inspiration of this message is wholly drawn from the Holy Koran, it is difficult to say if the Qadians are not Muslims, what else they are. Hazrat's religious outlook is very wide and broad. He maintains with intense conviction that God is God of all races, creeds and nations, and that it is impious to regard Him as especially favouring one or another of them. He holds likewise that God has never ceased to guide the thoughts of his creatures. "I can testify" he says, "that revelation and experience of God have not been intercepted in our time, God speaks even now as He spoke in the past, and He listens as He listened in days of yore, and none of His perfect and holy attributes has, or shall ever, become lapsed." This experience is wholly in consonance with Hindu beliefs and we are surprised that Hazrat should think otherwise. He seems to have specially in his mind the Arya Samaj, but, as he himself observes, the Arya Samaj counts only a small proportion of Hindus as its adherents. The niyoga doctrine ceased long ago to be followed by Hindus and even Arya Samajists do not practice it now. It was not a special feature of Hinduism as it prevailed amongst Jews and was known as the levirate in ancient times. It was an institution adapted to the conditions of a certain stage of social evolution. Much acrimonious religious controversy is due to confounding social practices with religious ideals. Hazrat speaks with reverence of Sri Krishna and with fervent admiration of Guru Nanak. Of Sri Krishna, he says that there can be no doubt at all that he was a prophet of his time and an avatar, and that he was favoured by God by the word of His mouth. Of Guru Nanak, he says that he completely refuted the doctrine which holds that there is to be no revelation nor any signs of God after the Vedas. We have already said that there is no such doctrine in Hinduism. Nanak, says Hazrat, was the last avatar of the Hindus. He was obviously ill-informed. The followers of Chaitanya claim him as an avatar, neo-Vedantists claim that Sri Ramakrishna was an avatar, and Pandit Jawharlal Nehru quite recently felt constrained to deprecate the belief that Gandhiji is an avatar. Every great thought, wrote George Eliot, is an inspiration. In the same sense, every good man may be said to be an avatar.

Hazrat makes what may be called a sporting offer. "If", he writes "in order to have perfect peace, the Hindus and the Arya Samajists are prepared to accept our holy Prophet (peace and the blessings of God upon him!) as a true prophet of God, and if they are prepared to give up denying and defaming him, I would be the first man to sign an agreement that we, the followers of the Ahmadiyya movement, will always believe in the Vedas and will speak respectfully of the Vedas and the Rishis. We will bind ourselves to pay the Hindus a penalty of Rs. 3,00,000, in case we fail to fulfil the agreement. If Hindus cordially wish for peace, they also should sign a similar agreement in some such terms." Millions of Hindus have no occasion at all to speak of the Prophet of Islam, and those who have occasion to do so, always speak of him in terms of reverence similar to those which educated men use of other great Teachers and Prophets. The reward of three lakhs of rupees which Hazrat offers is, therefore, unnecessary. But as he says of himself that he can not guarantee that other Muslims will endorse his offer, no Hindu leader can undertake a similar obligation. There may be some Hindus who in direct contravention of the precepts of their religion, speak slightly of other Prophets. But surely, this is against the age long tradition of India. Hazrat desired that the agreement such as he proposed should be signed by at least ten thousand sensible men on each side. This can be easily done. Hazrat denies that the differences between Hindus and Muslims are mainly political. They are religious though politics may aggravate them somewhat. Since it is not possible that all Hindus should become Muslims or all Muslims Hindus, he suggests that an agreement to respect each others' religious Teachers and Prophets, is the next best thing calculated to allay animosities. Real unity can only come from sincere respect for each others' religious Teachers. "You may join hands with each other for some time like hypocrites" warns Hazrat his Muslim co-religionists "but real peace and tranquility can only be attained if, from the bottom of your hearts, you accept the Vedas and the Rishis as from God, and your Hindu brethren likewise expel all malice from their hearts, and

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

285 accept our Holy Prophet as a true prophet of God. Remember that this is the only course which will bring about real unity between you and the Hindus. It will act like water and wash away all hatred from your hearts. If the time has come for the two long-separated people to unite, God will open their hearts to accept this proposal, as He has opened ours." Belief, of course, is not enough. It must express itself in behaviour. But Hazrat is right in thinking that if the belief is sincerely held it must eventuate in conduct which will harmonise the relations between Hindus and Muslims in India. It is a great message though the line of reasoning may seem medieval to modern readers.

EDUCATION, A PUBLIC RESPONSIBILITY.

(BY CYRIL MODAK.)

(Concluded from the last issue.)

Public institutions come into being as instruments for the expression of social values. It is only right to expect that these public institutions collaborate with educational agencies for the promulgation of knowledge. Good libraries with trained, efficient and courteous librarians can bring ample advantages within the reach of many. Different types of library can be made to serve different purposes. Good reading material for varying age-levels is a public need. Orphanage and widows' homes ought to become educational centres giving special attention to vocational courses. So many inmates of widows' homes have talent, have ambition, have energy, who, if trained, can be of definite service in village schools and educational work among women, but who are allowed to fill their idle hours with rebellion. Organizations of a communal type, or with a political bias, ought to turn their attention to the educational needs of the people they wish to serve. As members of society, as sponsors of some one or other of these public institutions, can we not join the great campaign against illiteracy? Have we lent our support to the over-whelming task of educating the masses of our nation? Or do we wait in expectancy for a miracle?

Society evolves certain agencies of administration for the application of its standards, for the maintenance of peace and order, for the organization of its varied activities. In India these agencies are grouped under "Reserved Subjects" and "Transferred Subjects". With the first we have nothing to do. We are concerned with the local self-governing department of "Transferred Subjects". As members of these local self-governing bodies, of Local Boards, of District Councils, of Municipalities how do we plan and work for the liquidation of illiteracy in this vast sub-continent? We squander so much of our energy on puerile wrangling, so much of our time on plots and counter-plots and petty tactics. Our term is over, perhaps, while we are still in hot pursuit of our opponent. Meanwhile the teeming villages of India wait to be instructed, and thousands and tens of thousands in towns and cities take to obnoxious diversions for the want of educational facilities. The construction of village roads is important, the upkeep and the supervision of cattle-pounds is necessary. But far more important is the construction of the highways of knowledge and literacy for our rural masses; and far more necessary is the maintenance and supervision of pounds for ignorance and illiteracy and prejudice which stealthily ravage the minds and lives of our people infinitely more than cattle spoil their fields.

Why wait to run up respectable school-buildings for primary schools in the villages? It would be a foolish doctor who, in a serious case demanding immediate treatment waited for some silver-papery tablets handsomely packed, and waited while the patient suffered, and may be, died. The case of illiteracy demands concentrated effort, demands all the philanthropy, all the self-sacrifice, all the talent, all the experimentation that the nation is capable of, that the country can offer. As gallant members of Local Boards and District Councils what are we doing to fight this dragon? Let us hold open-air classes. Let us prevail on malguzars to lend a building. Let us collect funds. Let us go and teach and canvas volunteers. Let us appeal to our electorates for help. Let us do something to obliterate the blot of growing illiteracy among our brethren.

In the same way Municipal Commissioners will tell you of how many lanes have been paved, what excellent sanitation work has been done, how many free dispensaries have been opened, during their term of office. All this is good. It deserves to be appreciated. But what, I ask you, what is the use of sporadic superficial efforts for public sanitation and hygiene when comparatively very little is being done for the sanitation and hygiene of minds? Darkened minds untouched by the sunlight of knowledge, these diseased minds untouched by the salutary influence of high morals cry, to you to plan and work out at any cost an educational programme suited to their needs. So much waits to be accomplished for adult education. So many experiments can be tried for subsidiary-vocational training in classes attached to mills, factories, and the like. Such a great deal must be done for the education of women. Child-welfare centres have been a splendid boon. But welfare centres for the education of women are an equally crying need. It is by no means enough to have an annual increase in the total enrolment of primary schools. It is the duty of municipalities to make it practically useful for students to have primary school instruction, to try the experiment of diversion for vocational training after the primary stage. The veneer of a verbal literacy will do no one any good. It will always lead to "wastage" and "leakage", two official problems of the year. What India needs, what India demands of you, of every citizen, is a purposeful scheme of progressive education enabling the masses not merely to read and write after a fashion, but to take an intelligent interest and an active and worthy part in the festival of life.

Your savage deserts howling near,
Your wastes of ignorance, vice and shame;
Is there no room for victories here,
No place for deeds of fame?

Education is a co-operative public enterprise. Have we co-operated to the best of our ability? An official critic once replied to the writer that education is a transferred subject in the portfolio of an Indian minister. What right had we to blame foreigners and the officials of the education department for the continuation of a defective system? This remark, though irrelevant to the issue raised, brought home the urgent necessity of our realizing that education is a public responsibility. For the investment of a few thousand rupees we put ourselves to inconvenience and trouble and make sure that our investment is safe and profitable. Is it not incredible that we are willing to invest our substance, our hopes and ambitions, our best wealth, our children in schools and colleges with suave indifference?

It is strange that we never think of exerting ourselves for a co-operative and persistent venture to

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

488
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 4

liquidate illiteracy among our own people. It is only when we as parents, as members of society, as citizens of a state, as sponsors of public institutions, as representatives in legislatures and local self-governing bodies, are like-minded and throw our whole weight to further the cause of education that we can hope for a brighter, better, happier day in our chequered history. The mental and moral thralldom of countless thousands of our fellow-countrymen is far more calamitous than any form of foreign domination. Political liberty, glorious and desirable as it is, demands intellectual and spiritual emancipation as its herald.

Arise and conquer while ye can
The foe that in your midst resides
And build within the mind of man
The Empire that abides.

A story is told of a king who was rather perplexed and tired of the lethargy, physical, mental and moral, of his subjects. So he had a large stone set in the middle of one of the main streets of his metropolis. Citizens, soldiers, officials, senators, merchants, professional men all went by the stone each abusing the government for not removing such a public obstacle. A week passed by. A month had passed. The stone remained where it had been placed. Then the king called an assembly of all his subjects round about that historic stone and in their wondering, muttering presence removed it with his own hands. Under it was a flat iron casket and in the casket was a bag of gold coins. On it was inscribed "For him who removes the stone." The king showed it to his subjects and went his way. India waits for us to remove the huge obstacle of illiteracy from the path of her children. Have we not endeavoured to shift our responsibilities, wishing vainly that others would do what falls to our lot? Let us then pledge ourselves to sincere and unflinching, concentrated and sustained effort in the interests of the helpless masses who need education. They call us to determine to carry all before us in our undaunted march, bearing on our triumphant banner the motto "He who excuseth himself accuseth himself".

ASPIRATIONS AFTER THE UNKNOWNABLE. (BY A VAGABOND.)

The search after Truth : a very fascinating phrase indeed ! So search after God ; a time-worn mania. Eternity, Almighty, Soul, God, Truth these are only a few of the words which are common in the phraseology of the learned as well as the unlearned, the religious-minded and the irreligious minded, scholars, philosophers, devotional mystics, philosopher-mystics. These terms are used as a matter of course. Are they not ? The common people by which the writer means those who living according to routine, tradition, custom, habit, be they rich or poor, intelligent or dunces, assume the traditional notions about these terms ; rather they have no notion at all about these terms in terms of a logical proposition. They regard these as fixed ideas each without its context, only a hazy something indefinable, but easily taken for granted. When discussion starts, it is the common people who very seriously engage themselves in discussing such very very vital matters, vital according to their own light. So long as the discussion is between themselves, there is general agreement, a consensus of opinion congratulatory to either side. But sometimes it happens that they are confronted with another having an enquiring mind which does not accept things taken or granted, for a serious discussion, then comes the rub. Such a one is put down as irreligious, ignorant, degraded, a dunce who requires an initiation—initiation into the mysteries, and if he is not put down as a renegade, he is not seldom referred to a reverend teacher, skilful in the art of convincing argument. Needless to state if such an obstinate person is an honest inquirer, a sincere inquirer, he relies upon his own research work, more than the authority of quibbles and obstinate egotists. The simple fact is, argument is a matter which is so rare among even the learned, if it is an argument based on rational thinking.

A revered friend suggested to the writer that the writer's experiences in this spiritual subject may afford some interesting psychological study. And yet an honest inquirer even if he is an egotist will think twice before penning his experiences, however they may have been valuable to himself. For there has been such a mass of literature on this subject that an individual's experiences, whatever may be their worth, will scarcely fall outside any of the experiences recorded in books and periodicals. There should certainly be nothing new at any rate, so much has this spirit of inquiry been taking hold of the imagination of the intellectuals in these days. Well then, what can I say on these questions which are generally regarded as momentous by the generality of the public among whom we have to live, whether we like it or not ? For instance, what could be said about Eternity, God, Soul, Truth or such other items which grip the mind of a thinking sort of fellow when he begins his life from his childhood ? Really nothing. For in itself each term does not connote anything final or definable for having a correct notion about the same. For, is not Eternity a sort of nothingness, is not Truth also a sort of nothingness, and is not the very term God a sort of nothingness, when opposed to something which is definite, for example, a duration, something false or wrong, something which is called Godlike. For, similarly, when we say of duration we have a fixed notion, when we say of anything false we also have a definite reality and when we say ungodlike or godlike we have to reduce the jargon into definable human virtues or otherwise, in other words, attributes associated with a human personality, good or bad. In itself therefore, Truth also similarly becomes nothing but a discrimination of qualities which a human personality manifests to the detriment or otherwise of himself and his fellows. For do we not know that an idea considered as truth in one generation was put down by another preceding generation as falsehood ? Examples in the astronomical advance made by Galileo, Copernicus and others are very striking examples of the erring sense of their predecessors and contemporaries however, exalted such predecessors were in their own days. If by the way, the term Truth were used in the sense of the astronomical discoveries or mathematical propositions or physical sciences, truth would simply amount to laws understandable by sense and this is simply impersonal which does not enter into the life of an individual. For this really no one bothers himself, not the common people nor the uncommon also. Truth when used by these good people is something higher, something, when some say God is Truth or Truth is God, or God is Love and so on, that affords grounds for discussion, where only the mystic makes progress; only a mystic can do that and at the same time consider himself quite rational, sane and normal in his senses. But an obstinate inquirer who wants to get at this Truth—idea or God—idea has either to bury himself or leave the matter solely to mystics. The writer cannot help writing in this strain if he has to be honest with regard to himself or with regard to his friends even with regard to the memory of priceless personalities, whose career or part of career has

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com
1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

437

influenced his judgment and delineation of his mind. It often happens that not one living personality alone creates an impression upon you; a number of personalities living or dead, exalted or humble influence you; let alone some of the masters who lived centuries ago. It is the mass of accumulating thought that becomes ultimately one's own, a part of one's own humble personality, which thought becomes more sacred in the secular sense than in a religious sense. It is the expression of this accumulating thought which gathers its increasing vitality from the experiences and inquiry that becomes unequivocal with regard to the conduct of the individual, and its expression must therefore be effected without any equivocation. It is not therefore, the conception of the writer about God, or Truth or eternity or such other term that is valuable so much as the stage reached by him from the very number of years he has left behind that might become valuable or at least intelligible to any lone traveller in the pursuit of ideas which matter most for him for some time and which do not matter anything for him at other times.

Therefore, even a vagabond, can depict his impressions relying on the memory of the years which have gone before him. These will be mere random jottings, mere peregrinations in the explored regions which have yielded probably a better material to people better constituted than the writer himself.

DRAFT RESOLUTIONS FOR LUCKNOW CONGRESS.

The Secretary of the All-India Congress Committee has released the following resolutions which were adopted by the Congress Working Committee at its meeting held at Delhi on March 21 and subsequent days to be placed before the Subjects Committee at Lucknow.

CONSTITUTION COMMITTEE.

The Congress is of opinion that it is desirable to develop closer association between the masses and the Congress organization so that they may take their full share in the shaping of Congress policy and in its activities, and the organization might become even more responsive to their needs and desires. With a view to this, and further to bring about closer co-operation with her organizations of peasants, workers and others which aim at the freedom of the Indian people and to make the Congress a joint front of all the anti-Imperialist elements in the country, this Congress appoints a committee to suggest a revision of the constitution. The Committee shall report to the A. I. C. C. by the end of June 1936 and its report shall be then circulated to Provincial and District Committees for opinion. The final recommendations of the A. I. C. C. on this report shall be placed before the next session of the Congress.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

The Congress authorises and directs the Working Committee to organize a foreign department of the A. I. C. C. office to work under the general superintendence of the Working General Secretary and with such special staff as may be necessary, with a view to create and maintain contacts with Indians overseas, and with international, national, labour and other organizations abroad with whom co-operation is possible and is likely to help in the cause of Indian freedom.

GREETING TO PRISONERS, EXILES, ETC.

The Congress sends its greeting to the thousands of Indians whom British Imperialism keeps in prison, in detention and in exile, and who suffer in silence and with brave endurance in the cause of India's freedom. In particular, the Congress sends affectionate greetings to Khan Abdul Gaffar Khan, a member of the Working Committee, and to Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose, whom the British Government vindictively prevents from returning to his people and his home land. The Congress also offers its earnest sympathy to the brave people of the North-West Frontier Province, as well as to the people of Midnapore District and some other parts of Bengal.

WAR DANGER.

The Congress, at its sessions held in Madras in 1927, drew the attention of the country to the danger of Imperialist war and the possibility of India being made a tool in such a conflict for Imperialist purposes, and declared the right of the Indian people to refuse to participate in any such war without their express permission. That danger has become more evident and urgent since then with the growth of Fascist dictatorships, the Italian attack on Abyssinia, the continuing Japanese aggression in North China and Mongolia, the rivalries and conflicts of the great Imperialist powers, and the feverish growth of armaments, and vast and terrible war threatens the world. In such a war an attempt will inevitably be made to drag in and exploit India to her manifest disadvantage and for the benefit of British Imperialism. The Congress, therefore, reiterates its old resolve and warns the people of the country against this danger, and declares its opposition to the participation of India in any Imperialist war.

SUPPRESSION OF CIVIL LIBERTIES.

The Congress draws public attention again to the wide-spread and intensive suppression of civil and, in many instances, personal liberties in India by the British Government, with the object of crushing the national and labour and peasant movements; in particular to the banning of hundreds of Congress and other national organisations, and labour and peasants unions, and political and other groups, seizure and continued possession by the Government of many Ashrams and other educational institutions; the continuation of the Ordinance regime by the certification and passage of the Criminal Law Amendment Act even after its rejection twice by the Assembly, and the enactment of similar provincial Acts; the proscriptions and banning of books and periodicals; the numerous Press Laws and censorship resulting in the suppression of 348 newspapers in recent years and the forfeiture of large sums deposited as securities; the detention of large numbers of people for indefinite periods without charge or trial, the numerous special and additional disabilities under which the people of the Frontier Province have to suffer; the many encroachments on personal liberty in parts of Bengal; the restriction by externment, internment and otherwise to the free movement of persons within the country, thus preventing them from carrying on their usual occupations and business, and even obstructing humanitarian and relief work; indiscriminate and wide-spread searches of houses; the difficulties placed in the ways of Indians going abroad; and the barriers to return home of many Indians in foreign countries who have thus to live in exile far from their own people and their motherland. The Congress notes that at no period since the great Revolt of 1857 has the suppression of civil and personal liberties and the repression of the Indian people, which is the normal feature of British administration in India to-day, been so great as it is now. While recognising that this extraordinary suppression and repression are the measure of the strength and success of India's struggle for freedom, the Congress desires to point out that such is the background to the new Consti-

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 4

tution Act in spite of the statements made by representatives of the British Government that constitutional progress is being made in India.

CONDITIONS IN STATES

Further the Congress deeply regrets that in the Indian States there is a similar suppression of civil and personal liberties and in many of them, conditions in this respect are even worse than in the rest of India and almost every kind of liberty is non-existent; that in some States even the Congress had been banned and normal peaceful work of organisation prevented, and insult offered to the National Flag. The Congress realises that the effective power behind the State is that of the British Government and many of the States are under the direct control of British officers. Howsoever the responsibility for this deplorable state of affairs might be shared between the British Government and the Rulers of the States, the Congress declares that it can recognise no differentiation in personal, civil and democratic liberties as between the States, and the rest of India.

The Congress expresses the determination of the Indian people that, notwithstanding this attempt to paralyse national growth and activity, they will continue to face the situation with courage and fortitude and will carry on the struggle for freedom till independence is achieved.

MITAKSHARA JOINT HINDU FAMILY.

(By K. B. GAJENDRAGADKAR.)

A joint Hindu family consists of persons descended from a common ancestor and related to each other through the male line and who have not effected a division of the family property. Thus, a father, sons, and grandsons, through sons and great grandsons, if any, through such grandsons form a joint Hindu family. When the father in such family dies, the sons and all grandsons and great grandsons would continue to form a joint family. If any of such sons were to die the remaining sons (who are brothers among themselves) and the descendants of all the sons would constitute the joint family. Thus a joint family may consist of a common ancestor and his descendants or it may consist merely of the descendants of a common ancestor such as brothers or uncles or nephews, together with their descendants, if any.

The existence of a large volume of law known as the joint Hindu family law is a feature peculiar to Hindu law and it has no prototype in any other system of law. The Hindu law is based on the ancient shastras of the Hindus, vis. Shrutis and Smritis which governed Hindu society in ancient days. In those days the family was the unit of the society and the individual only played a subordinate part therein. Joint living and joint holding of property by the members of the family was then the normal condition. When the British Government took upon themselves the task of administering justice in the land, they decided to apply the personal law of the people to them with the result that Hindu law came to be applied to Hindus. So the joint family law came to be perpetuated in the land. The consequence is that an ancient law picked up from the shastras propounded by pandits and administered by Courts from the commencement of the British Government, has become crystallized and rigid and in that from it now governs the Hindu society.

The Hindu society has itself changed considerably in its features and in its modes of life and thought under the stress of modern economic and other world forces. The Hindu temperament no longer displays any special predilection for maintaining the solidarity of the joint family in matters temporal. A material outlook on life, an individual desire for self-advancement and a spirit of indifference to the welfare of others—which are some of the contributions of the present day culture—have sufficiently killed the spirit of family feeling, which once pervaded the Hindu society in all its aspects and have brought almost the disintegration of the family, socially and economically. The individual has become the unit of society and the family has ceased to be so. In the words of Sir Henry Maine even Hindu society has changed from “status” to “contract”.

The Bombay Law Reporter.

The basic principle of the undivided family is that an undivided family is ordinarily joint not only in estate but in food and worship. In the modern society the family is hardly joint in food. One member of the family is an I.C.S., another is a doctor, a third is a mere clerk and so on. They hardly meet even once in five years. Can this family be said to be joint in the true sense of the term? The test of jointness in worship is almost gone as no member of the family practically cares for worship at all. The only jointness, if at all there is any, is in ‘ancestral estate’ though every member fully accumulates his own property. The joint family system is an anachronism in the twentieth century and must be abolished. The Hindu law that is based on the archaic form of society hardly suits the present age. There are many disadvantages. The immediate result of the existence of the joint family law and the right of sons by birth in ancestral property, is to make it difficult for persons to enter into legal transactions with a Hindu. Searching inquiries have to be made on various points, which would be irrelevant in the case of a non-Hindu, questions such as, whether the person is a member of the joint family, whether the property to be purchased from him is his separate property or family property and if it is family property then, whether the vendor is a manager of the family, whether the intending sale is for necessary purposes—all these points will have to be considered and decided before a transaction is entered into. So also in lending money to a Hindu similar points have to be considered and decided. One can easily ascertain the property or worth of a Muhammadan or a Christian without inquiring into his family history or family surrounding and relations. So also when you make a contract or enter into any legal transaction with a non-Hindu any inquiry about his family relationship would be absolutely uncalled for. But in the case of a Hindu the matter bristles with innumerable difficulties. In the case of a purchase of property from, or a loan to, a non-Hindu the only point which the buyer or the lender has to consider will be whether the vendor owns the property to be sold or is rich enough to repay the loan and whether the contract is fair or otherwise valid. But when the vendor or borrower happens to be a Hindu this alone will not suffice. Thus the Hindu law as it now exists is an obstacle to the free and easy development of commercial or other contractual relations with a Hindu. Further, the difficulty of arriving at definite conclusions on bare questions of fact, which result from the application of the principles of Hindu law, is the cause of much litigation in our Courts. Having regard to the discordance between the archaic nature of law and the present state of society, one might wish that the legislature may by a bold stroke of the pen completely abolish the family law, or if such a course is considered undesirable, at least the rules and restrictions of the family law should be made so clear and definite that, the actual state of things,

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933-09-07

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

483 about any property or family may be easily ascertained.

The above brief discussion will convince the reader that there is no utility of the joint Hindu family system as it exists today. Though it must be admitted that it had valuable advantages in ancient times, yet it should now be discontinued by legislation.

It may well be argued that the Mitakshara does not compel a man to live in a joint family. As soon as the man becomes major, he should express his intention to separate but actual separation some times brings the cessation of co-operation between brothers. Man is after all an emotional being and he finds it very hard to express his intention of separation from his family, howsoever he may wish it. Again the joint family cannot so easily be destroyed. As soon as a son is born to a man who has got himself partitioned from his brothers a new joint family automatically starts up again. So my suggestion is that the father and sons alone should be regarded as members of the joint family. This was exactly the idea expressed in the Smiriti text: सप्तमः जीवनीः पित्रोः सखासो विधीयते। In fact the old Dharmashastra literature never contemplates the joint family as it exists today. Gautama expressly says that the sons should get their shares partitioned after the death of the father (28/2, 3, 4). Apastamba even goes further and enjoins the father to make a partition among his sons even in his lifetime (2, 6, 14, 1).

There should not be joint family between grandfather, uncle, cousins, nephews and so on. As soon as the father dies, by law the sons should be regarded as separate from one another, and if they continue to live jointly they should be regarded as tenants-in-common.

Attempts are already being made to put an end to the basic principles of joint family law. The Gains of Learning Act passed recently by which the property acquired by learning, art and similar means, by a coparcener although living in a joint family will be considered his self-acquired property, is a direct inroad on the joint family law. The recent Privy Council decision on adoption by which a widow is allowed to take a son in adoption without the consent of coparceners, is another instance of the same type. Bills are again introduced to recognize the wife of a coparcener to be a coparcener after his death. All these things show that there is a marked tendency to abolish the joint family system.

If the joint family system is not going to be abolished wholesale from the Hindu law, the whole of India must adopt the Dayabhaga joint family law of Jimutavahana. That system certainly combines the benefits of union with the advantages of self-determination. In that system not only is the father absolute owner, unhampered by his sons, but the coparceners themselves are unhampered by each other. For, in a Dayabhaga joint family, any coparcener is absolutely at liberty to alienate his share by sale, mortgage or gift during the continuance of the coparcenery. Women are as much coparceners as men. They are not dependent. When their husbands die they are still coparceners in their own rights and can claim actual partition from their husbands' brothers. There is no right of survivorship available in the brothers after the death of one of them. In this system, the son gets the share in the joint family by the death of the father and not by his own birth; obviously the son is not at liberty to demand partition from his father whenever he may wish it. The shares of coparceners are not, therefore, liable to fluctuation either by the death or birth of any coparcener in the family; for the shares are only to be determined after the death of the father. However, when the father is alive the sons are entitled to proper maintenance and education from the family fund. Thus the concept of the joint family under the Dayabhaga is far superior to that of the Mitakshara in important particulars.

HARIJAN SEVAK SANGH.

"The great Hindu community has yet to realise the peril to Hinduism if untouchability lingers long. It will be the duty of the Harijan Sevak Sangh to help to introduce this great change in the Hindu social system before it is too late" says Mr. A. V. Thakkar, General Secretary of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, in his third annual report. Continuing he says, "The year has been one of steady and satisfactory progress. But none can be more aware than the members of the Central Board of the great strides that must be made before the final object is achieved. The next year is likely to bring its own crop of problems which may necessitate a more energetic policy of the Sangh."

According to the report the total welfare expenditure from October, 1934, to September, 1935, was Rs. 8,37,055 compared with Rs. 2,04,826 in the previous year. The Sangh's activities have increased considerably. The educational expenditure for 1933-34 was Rs. 1,63,954 while in 1934-35 it was Rs. 2,75,420. From the very beginning it has been the policy of the Sangh to encourage the Harijans going in for higher education. In 1934-35 117 higher education scholarships of an average value of Rs. 15 per month were awarded, as against 99 only last year. Preference was given to girl applicants and those going in for vocational courses. In addition to this, quite a large sum was spent by Provincial Boards on the collegiate scholarships especially in big cities like Bombay, Madras, Calcutta and Poona.

A beginning was made in tanning, and a central training tannery was started at Calcutta under the supervision of Mr. Satish Chandra Das-Gupta. A select batch of 21 pupils recruited from various provinces is undergoing a thorough training in chrome and bark tanning with a view to starting provincial tanneries on a cottage industry basis. It is probable that a few such tanneries will be started by the end of 1936. The policy of this Sangh has all along been to discourage separate schools and recruits Harijan children to common schools. Progress in villages is naturally slow, and the Sangh is obliged to open special schools, which are really preparatory schools meant to be feeders of other schools. In 1935 there were 1,298 such schools with 34,273 boys and 3,816 girls. The total expenditure incurred on these schools was Rs. 1,06,438. An attempt was also made to give some systematic training to teachers employed by the Sangh.

The very segregation and distance of the Harijan resident from the village proper necessitate the sinking of new wells, even where public wells exist. The Sangh must confess that the opening of about 16 public wells to Harijans during the year is not an achievement, of which the Sangh or the Hindu community can be proud. A little more was done by way of sinking new wells and 847 wells were either repaired or constructed.

The conflict between the Nattars and the Harijans in the three Taluks of Karaikudi sub-district in the extreme south of Madras for the last few years has been exercising the workers of the Sangh. Until March 1935, all attempts at relaxation of such customs and reconciliation between the parties failed. As a result of Nattar obduracy, nearly 350 families have turned Christians and more may follow.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

490
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 4]

Recently a party, consisting of D. B. V. Bashyam Aiyangar, Dr. T. S. S. Rajan and R. B. M. C. Rajan, toured the area on behalf of the Sangh to get into touch with the parties and persons there. It is believed that since then the attitude of the Nattars has undergone a welcome change and in order to secure complete results, work of a permanent nature should be started in their midst.

At the present moment an important Bill—the Hindu Depressed Classes Civil Disabilities Removal Bill—of Rao Bahadur Rajah, is before the Assembly. The passing of that Bill into law and its speedy enforcement will go a great way in ameliorating the condition of Harijans. The Sangh and its various branches will try their best to mobilise public opinion in favour of the Bill and will approach the members of the Assembly to give it their warmest support.

A WINDFALL TO SHANTINIKETAN.

Poet Rabindra Nath Tagore has issued the following statement through the "United Press":—

"The financial position of Viswa-Bharati has been unsatisfactory for the last few years as a result of some of the annual grants having been unaccountably stopped and some of our investments failing to bring in proper return owing to economic distress in the country. We had run into debts to the extent of Rs. 60,000, and it was mainly this which drew me out of my seclusion to these distant parts with a begging bowl. The evening of my life was clouded with worries of this debt. A very dear friend of mine having learnt this came to my succour, and our united prayers have been answered by God in the form of the following letter:

Respected Sir,

Please find the enclosed draft for Rs. 60,000, which, we believe, is the deficit of the expenses on Shantiniketan to cover which you have been exhibiting your art from place to place. When we heard this, we felt humiliated. We believe that at your advanced age and in your weak state of health you should not undertake these arduous tours. We must confess that we know very little of the institution except that we have heard the name, but we have not been unaware of your great fame as the Poet of the age. You are not only the greatest poet of India, but you are the poet of humanity. Your poems remind one of the hymns of ancient Rishis. You have by your unrivalled gifts raised the status of our country, and we feel those whom God has blessed with means should relieve you of the burden of finding funds required for the conduct of the institution. Our contribution is a humble effort in that direction. For reasons which need not be stated, we prefer to remain anonymous. We hope that you will now cancel all the engagements taken for raising the sum above mentioned. Praying for your long life to continue the services you are rendering to the country,

We remain,

Your humble countrymen.

It has deeply touched my heart, for it comes as the spontaneous expression of love and appreciation of my cultural work from a few friends whose names I shall never have the good fortune to know, and to whom I can only express my gratitude through the agency of the Press.

Poet Rabindra Nath Tagore, in view of this letter received from some anonymous friends donating a sum of Rs. 60,000 for the conduct of Viswa-Bharati, will not in his failing health undertake the rest of his tour programme. He will, however, go to Meerut to receive an address arranged there.

THE AGA KHAN AT THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The report of the delegates (H. H. the Right Hon. the Aga Khan, Sir Denys Bray and Rao Bahadur S. M. Bapna) of India to the 16th (Ordinary) session of the Assembly of the League of Nations has been published.

In course of the general discussion, His Highness the Aga Khan said:—"On the one subject that is dominating the mind of this Assembly there is much that I could say. But I am a man of few words, and I shall be brief.

"In India criticism of the League of Nations is growing. India is troubled by the League's lack of universality, the incompleteness of its composition, and the tiny representation of Indians in its organisations. She is troubled by the great preponderance, as India sees it, of the energies of the League devoted to Europe and European interests. She is troubled by the magnitude of her own contribution to the League Budget—large in itself, for it is larger than the contribution of any non-permanent Member of the Council—disturbingly large when placed side by side with the poverty of so many of her many millions.

"She is troubled by the League's dramatic failures—troubled by the Disarmament Conference, long drawn-out, infructuous—and here I speak feelingly as a member of it from the beginning—whereas the re-armament of States Members is in full swing. She is troubled above all by the wars, declared or undeclared, that have been waged between its members. And now a fresh trouble, greater than any of these, has arisen. Should the worst come to the worst—which God forbid—who dare foretell the evils, world-spread, age-lasting, that might follow?

"India's criticism of the League is directed to its shortcomings, not to the ideals of which the League was the outcome and which inspire her being. On the contrary, the conception of collective security is appealing to Indian thought as the only alternative to international anarchy with ever growing force. The world is at the parting of the ways. Let wisdom guide her choice."

UNEMPLOYMENT IN GERMANY.

The three main groups of German Unemployed, are as follows: The centralisation of employment exchange in the Reich Labour Agency and Unemployment Insurance, the Central Bureau for combatting unemployment, has only been in operation for the past two months, but a reliable picture of the activities of individual agencies is already obtainable from the uniform system of registration. Of the 1.8 million unemployed who, according to Dr. Syrup, the President of the above Federal Exchange, will remain as an average for 1936, one third, approximately 600,000, is in every sense of the word unemployed, or better unemployable, that is, at present without work and without prospects of work, being unfitted for work either through age, incapacity or for some other reason. There has always been such a percentage even during German economic expansion prior as well as subsequent to the War, one that is found everywhere, at least to a relative degree, in any highly industrialised country.

The second group comprise people who have been unemployed for a long time, whose workmanship and dexterity has suffered in consequence. With the aid of the labour agencies or the special trade sections of the Labour Front they must be re-qualified for their former callings or new ones. In this respect, the systematic catalogue worked out by the Federal

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real1936.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

491

Exchange as to labour requirements in all branches of economic life is invaluable. The third group is largely composed of day labourers, jobbers and those not regularly engaged on full or half-time jobs and, therefore, figuring as unemployed. It has been found that quite a number in the second category have tied themselves up too hastily without serious reflection to a home of their own. This would seem to indicate that the housing and settlement policies of recent years are not always 100% in keeping with the labour policy, revealing unexpected demerits that do not, however, detract from the merits of the larger aims of National Socialism. They are, nevertheless, a warning against pursuing the two policies independently of each other. Both are phases of national economy, an integral whole based on the principle of totality.

CHINESE TRADE AND WORLD PEACE.

A brochure is published in German, entitled Deutschlands Gegenwärtige Gelegenheiten in China (Germany's Present Opportunities in China) by Judge Paul Linebarger, Legal Advisor to and Special Envoy of The National Government of China. It gives some illuminating information concerning not only the German, but also the general foreign opportunities for trade with China at the present time. The release, below, explains the nature of the brochure.

Judge Paul Linebarger, eighteen years the international legal advisor of Sun Yat-sen, the founder of the Chinese Republic, and now the legal advisor and special representative of the Chinese Government, declared that the Chinese markets could make the present struggle for colonies unnecessary. "Germany and other countries seeking colonies for trade expansion should realize that force defeats its own ends. The nations now without colonies are better off without them. Colonies are a burden. Chinese trade can bring prosperity to all nations seeking outlets," declared Judge Linebarger. "In a publication I have just published for circulation in Germany, entitled Deutschlands Gegenwärtige Gelegenheiten in China, I tried to explain that force was not only ineffective, but unprofitable, and that if the Germans wished to promote their national welfare they could raise the level of their prosperity by trade with China." (P. 9)

The brochure of which Judge Linebarger spoke gives a vivid picture of trading methods and opportunities in China. The Germans went ahead because they did not use the worn-out methods of British imperialism, and sought to deal with the Chinese quite equitably, learning the Chinese language and trying to understand the Chinese people. The Germans did not really need colonies in China because their trading methods were superior to those of the other countries dealing there. Any nation which can learn the German lesson today can also prosper, and if the Germans build up their trade with the Chinese population, one fourth of that of the whole globe, Germany need not acquire colonies, which are expensive and difficult to administer.

"The Chinese government," says Judge Linebarger "itself possesses the power in China. It is not subject to the pressures of unseen predatory power. There is no invisible government of greedy interests behind China's National Government. For this reason, the Chinese are easier to deal with; trade with them can be conducted on a more secure basis than it can in many of the nations of the world." The brochure cites interesting parallels between the Sun Yat-sen system of government in China, and the dual regimes of officialdom and special interests in the West.

Such leaders as Chiang Kai-shek, Wang Ching-wei, Hu Han Min, Lin Shen, Sun Fo, H. H. Kung and T. V. Soon are anxious that China deal extensively with the rest of the world. They know that the vast latent purchasing power of the Chinese can be developed to the mutual advantage of the Chinese and the West. The pamphlet tells an interesting anecdote of the diplomacy and tact of Chiang Kai-shek, who even on the battle-field, sought to conciliate other leaders rather than antagonize and fight them. (pp. 29-31.)

The brochure recounts an interesting recollection of Judge Linebarger, which illustrates the necessity of having a close acquaintance and conformity with Chinese manners. It so occurred that Judge Linebarger disapproved of the drinking of tea during government office hours and he accordingly arranged that no tea should be served in the building at Nanking wherein his office was located. He was considerably embarrassed when a very dear old friend, a high Chinese official, called on him and was disconcerted by the lack of tea. Judge Linebarger immediately realized that he was confronted by a custom too old and too refined to be violated, and thereafter served tea in his Legal Advisor's office. In dealing with the Chinese, the Western traders must learn Chinese manners. If they secure a proper entrance into Chinese commercial life, they can bring prosperity to themselves and their countries.

The concluding section of the brochure gives an intimate sketch of Sun Yat-sen, with whom Judge Linebarger was closely associated for eighteen years, and describes the meaning of the doctrines that Sun Yat-sen taught, which are now the official philosophy of the Chinese government. Judge Linebarger recommends that the Western traders respect Sun Yat-sen and thereby encourage the Chinese to respect the Western traders in return.

THE NEW RUSSIAN PEASANT.*

(BY LEMENT HARRIS)

The slow-moving peasant of ancient Russia is being made over. For ten years after the revolution much happened to him, but since 1929 his life has changed completely. Once the State was in the hands of the Soviets, the problem in regard to agriculture was that of moving from feudalism to socialism. The backwardness of about 125,000,000 peasants made it difficult to the point of perplexity. They were illiterate, superstitious, cruel and, above all, suspicious of anything new. Had not every scheme in the past been only a new way of forcing work out of them. Always their deepest craving had been for land, since if they had land they could somehow raise a crop and had have grain for the winter. The Bolsheviks had given them land, and they expected to farm it quietly.

Thus, for ten years after the revolution, the old life went on. The man of the house beat his wife; she beat the children; the children beat the animals. There appeared in the villages little pamphlet selling for two kopecks entitled Don't Beat Your Children. With simple words and in large type, like that of a child's primer, the pamphlet described beating as the method of bloody Czar Nicholas, while the Soviet Government stood for friendly reasoning. More than a pamphlet, however was needed to end the old dark customs. There had to be a revolution, and a revolution on whose banner was inscribed a tractor.

When the Bolsheviks took the idea of the collective farm to the villages they at first met with a cold reception. A country school

The Current History for March 1936.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

492
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 4]

teacher told me how, as a member of the Communist party, he had argued for two years in the village before the peasants were willing to try the experiment of their first little collective, and even then they entered full of doubts, with the right to withdraw after the first season if they did not like it. I made it a practice last summer to ask peasants about their new life. Their answer was usually something like this: "Not bad. We have difficulties." This was high praise. The grumbling about the lack of supplies in the country store, which usually followed this comment, only proved that the answer was a genuine expression of peasant approval. Behind his answer, "Not bad," lies the impressive fact that the peasant's income is vastly higher than it has ever been before.

Today the Russian peasant is beginning to look a little different. As a first sign of advancing civilization, the beard is gone. A peasant manages to visit the new village barber shop about once in ten days, and so most of the time he looks like an autumn chestnut burr. He is wearing real shoes, and this is a big advance over the straw and cloth with which he used to bind his feet. Now a man has enough money in his pocket to buy real shoes. When they appear in the village store there is a great rush and a few hours later all shoes are sold. The village demand for manufactured goods is greater than even the expanded industries can yet supply. This causes considerable grumbling, especially from the older peasants, to whom grumbling has always been a recognized pastime. Plenty of them are not impressed by the arguments of local officials, who explain that the war danger has forced many factories to produce war materials rather than consumers' goods.

Thousands of peasants who cannot buy what they want in the villages go long distances to the cities to shop in the big stores. I found in Moscow's largest department store crowds of peasant men and women at the shoe counters banding over their money. These peasant shoppers were not discouraged because prices were higher in Moscow than in the country.

But with the change have come new difficulties—problems of living, labour supervision, technique and management. The shift from strip tillage with crude tools to modern, large scale farming from individual to collective farming, brought with it the need to train thousands of bookkeepers and mechanics, farm specialists and so forth. And there was no one for these tasks except the medieval peasant. Yesterday he used a walking plow; today he drives a caterpillar tractor. Yesterday he could neither read nor calculate; today he must understand cost accounting.

The past five years have also been marked by an immense increase in the production of all kinds of farm machinery. New tractor factories are now running full blast, turning out an excellent product. In January, 1936, there were 400,000 tractors on the Soviet farms. (This compares with 1,000,000 tractors on American farms in 1930). Improved labour methods within the plants have raised production considerably beyond schedule, and it is expected that in 1936 more than 200,000 more tractors will be available for the collectives.

Throughout the recent period of rapid industrialization there has been a great movement, totaling millions of peasants, to the industrial centres. You find peasants of yesterday at work as trade union members in all the factories. Here is a great steel mill named after Karl Liebknecht. While standing near one of the great electric furnaces, waiting to watch a pouring, I talked with a puddler who came in from the farms six months before. He told me how he started at 150 to 200 rubles a month and now earns 300. "I go to school after work and study machinery." (I learned that 60 per cent of the workers in this plant were studying.) "But come over here, I want to show you something." He took me to the drinking fountain and told me to drink. The water was charged, like soda water, as a special service for those working in hot places.

At the same time that grain-harvesting machinery is being improved, important developments are taking place in wheat culture itself. In one of the experimental farms in Siberia perennial wheat is growing. The same stool will produce a crop year after year. It is a hybrid of a good drought-resisting variety of wheat and a mountain grass found in Central Asia. I saw this perennial wheat in a green house in one of the Ukrainian experimental stations and also in a little laboratory attached to a collective farm. If perennial wheat proves successful, the labour required for growing a crop will be reduced after the first planting to simply harvesting once a year. Harvesting this crop with the improved combines should reduce enormously the cost and labour of raising wheat. Perennial wheat would also solve the problem of wind erosion on the prairies, since the stools from which it grows have a wide root system.

Thus modern technique is closing in on the grain crop from three directions: First, the mass production of tractors and harvesting machinery; second, the development of improved machinery to operate over a greater area and handle a greater percentage of the crop, and, third, improved plant varieties which simplify the process of wheat production. How will all this affect the peasants? One combine can do in ten days the same work, with less loss of grain, that formerly required 200 peasants working for five weeks. This opens the way for shorter working hours on the farms, for an end to the tyranny of the soil.

More difficult than the mastering of technique has been the question of management. Where could presidents and brigade leaders be found who would be competent to plan farm operations? Book-keeping alone loomed as an insoluble problem. But to meet this a national call was issued for book-keepers who would volunteer for two years' service in the villages. Several thousand trained book-keepers responded and went from farm to farm, training peasants to keep accounts.

By 1935 the book-keepers had raised their craft to a higher level. They now have a special room for working on the accounts and proudly display to visitors the income and expenditure sheets. Everything is done with pen and ink, because a typewriter is still an unusual machine in a rural community. As large sheets of paper are not available, the book-keepers paste together a number of sheets for their exhibits.

Much of the success of a collective farm depends upon the wise choice of the president, who is elected by a mass meeting and confirmed by the local Soviet. Final power to appoint or remove lies with the mass meeting, but if the Soviet disapproves of the choice it can reopen the discussion and present its views.

I noticed that many of the presidents had formerly been "horseless peasants"; that is, the people who were too poor to own a horse and had to work primarily for a kulak or landlord. They were, of course, constantly in debt. After the revolution they received land, but lacking the money to buy equipment and livestock, they continued to work for the kulak by whom they were terribly exploited. When the collective farms were established, these poorest peasants joined immediately, because they saw the opportunity of earning some cash and living much better. They became the most solid and the staunchest supporters of collectivization.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

493

As the collectives developed, the kulaks saw that their days of prosperity were at an end. It was natural that they should do all they could to prevent the collectives from succeeding, and even in 1935 I encountered a case where some desperate kulaks had attempted to disorganize a collective by putting arsenic in the milk that was fed to the calves. But this battle with the kulak is nearly over. In most instances he has become a loyal member of the new society.

In 1935 important steps were taken to protect the personal security of every collective farmer. First, the title to the land used by the collective was guaranteed forever. Then every member was guaranteed a personal plot of land big enough for a garden potato patch and small orchard. In addition it became a national policy to "liquidate the cowless peasant." As a result I found that each peasant who did not own a cow was supplied with heifer at small expense by the collective farms.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. E. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1907.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohasana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mili Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Desabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda, Raj Ratna Bhallal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Pen Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Sprought Road, Ballard Estate,

2-25

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

494

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 4

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,

Sheik Memon St., Bombay.

BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,

3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

AHMEDABAD.

AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.

CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)

NAGPUR CITY.

POONA.

POONA CITY.

RAJKOT.

SURAT.

Branches :—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000

Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000

Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to :—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondaicha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nasik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kaiyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chinnil V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	B. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	E. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL :—

(Fully Paid) — — — Rs. 12,90,000

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to :—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

496

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| April 4

realpatidar.com

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Dr. J. T. Sunderland writes as follows:—"The volume will give pleasure to your friends here, and will give much valuable information to a wide circle of readers in India. It will tend to correct misunderstandings and to create real friendship between the two peoples. We cannot have too many such books."

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamaksbi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :- KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor :- K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY APRIL 11, 1936. No. 32

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

A Sign of the Times.
Good News from the Punjab.
Study of English.
Well-Deserved Tribute.
Congress and Office.
A Hasty Decision.
The King and the Pandit.
The End of the Lindbergh Baby Case.
Lord Willingdon.
The Buddha's Way.

"Soviet Sidelights."
Place of English in Indian Education.
Gaekwar Jubilee in New York.
Babu Rajendra Prasad.
The Oxford Movement in Norway.
Co-operation Between China and the League of Nations.
Mr. Subhas Bose's Statement.

NOTES

A Sign of the Times :—The great mass meeting of Muslims last Sunday, which was presided over by Dewan Bahadur K. M. Jhaveri and addressed by Swami Visvananda among others, is a sign of the times. Journalists sense coming changes long before they become manifest to the public. Harmonious relations between our communities can only be ensured by mutual respect for one another's religion. There is a vast deal in the history of Islam as in that of Christianity and Buddhism of which every race and creed can well be proud. The story of sublime heroism sustained by faith in God, which the Mohurrum celebrates, belongs to this category. Both the Chairman and Swami Visvananda spoke with unaffected fervour of the memory of the heroic martyr of Kerbela and their tributes were greatly appreciated by the audience of over seven thousand Muslims.

Good News from the Punjab :—The Punjab which a few weeks ago presented a communal tangle out of which there seemed no early prospect of its extricating itself, has pulled itself together and is settling down to work provincial autonomy. Mr. Jinnah's visit has had a magical effect in removing the Shahid-gunge dispute from the arena of communal strife. Now comes the news that Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan, who acted with much credit as Governor of the Punjab during the absence of Sir Herbert Emerson on leave, and whose presence in the province would most probably have averted the recent communal trouble, is resigning the Deputy Governorship of the Reserve Bank to resume his place in the public life of his province. The appointment of Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan to the Deputy Governorship of the Reserve Bank, might have had some esoteric reason at the back of it, but it removed him from a sphere where his presence was a great public utility to an office in Calcutta with routine duties which can be performed equally well if not better by a professional banker. Sir Sikandar enjoys the confidence of all communities in the Punjab and it is on their invitation that, according to the report in the Tribune, he is resigning his lucrative job to organise the province for autonomy. Sir Fazli Hussain who recently retired from Membership of the Government of India, has not been enjoying good health for some time and it is believed that he will be glad to hand over the leadership of his party to Sir Sikandar Khan. As regards Sir Fazli himself, whatever might have been his views in the past, his experience as a member of the Government of India has converted him into a broadminded statesman with a greatly attenuated belief in communal politics.

Study of English :—Addressing the Fergusson College students in February, Mr. Jayakar pleaded for the study of English not merely as a compulsory subject for examinations but as a valuable instrument of culture on account of its intrinsic merits. The exhortation is by no means superfluous. Owing to several causes there has been of late years a lowering of the standard of English in our schools and colleges. One of these is the attitude of the Government as expressed in an advertisement, which appeared some time back, inviting applications for a Reader in English for Elphinstone College on a salary of rupees one hundred a month, vacations excluded! What kind of a man did Government expect to secure on these terms? They might as well abolish the College as they abolished the Deccan College rather than subject it to slow starvation in this way. Students coached in English language and literature by one who is willing to accept a hundred rupees leaving out vacations not out of love for the college, is not likely to learn to appreciate the genius of the language as Mr. Jayakar, educated under a vastly different regime, can and wishes them to, do. Political prejudice, said Mr. Jayakar, should not affect the study of the English language by Indian students. English, unlike most other languages, is not associated with one nationality. Each of the British Dominions claims to be a separate nation. The United States is a great Power outside the British orbit of influence. China and Japan have English as a compulsory second language in their schools. In many countries of Europe, English has ousted French from the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

498
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 11

pre-eminence which it not long ago enjoyed as the medium of international intercourse. Unless there is something intrinsically valuable in it, it is impossible to account for the phenomenal diffusion of English in recent years. Why Indians like Raja Ram Mohan Roy acclaimed it with fervour, was that it was the language of civil freedom. It is still that, although the British seem no longer to love freedom as did their forefathers. Still, however, the genius of the language and history of their country, is felt at least to the extent that British officials, when they act as Oriental despots are supposed to act, are constrained to camouflage their conduct with the paint of freedom and democracy. If this is the case in England with a tradition of civil freedom extending back several centuries and enshrined in her institutions, language and history, it needs not much insight to guess what it will be in a country where it is an acquisition of hardly a whole century and where the tradition of unalloyed autocracy has struck deep roots in culture and society.

Well-Deserved Tribute :—The grand demonstration which was held in Patna last week to give expression to the high esteem in which Babu Rajendra Prasad is held by all sections of Biharees irrespective of their political sympathies, shows that, whatever might have been the case in Judea two thousand years ago, the saying that a prophet is not honoured in his own country, does not hold good of Bihar and India. Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha, whom we congratulate on his appointment to the Vice-Chancellorship of Patna University, presided and paid a fervent tribute to the character and work of the retiring Congress President. The Government of Madras in their Administration Report for last year testified that Babu Rajendra Prasad's speeches during his tour of that province "were moderate in tone and confined to the constructive programme of the Congress." It is impossible to think of his being anything but moderate and constructive as only men with a clear purpose and a definite aim, not liable to be distracted by side issues, can be. When the Government of India unwisely banned his contemplated mission of relief to Quetta soon after the earthquake, Babu Rajendra Prasad had the opportunity of creating a first class sensation by journeying towards Quetta in the certainty of having to return from the railway station. The temptation to the average popular leader would have been irresistible. But Babu Rajendra Prasad merely said that, if he was not allowed to serve the sufferers in Quetta, he can equally well serve them all the same when they are removed to places outside the devastated city. That, to our mind, showed the strength of the man's character. Some people may be aptly described in Bismark's famous phrase as lath painted to look like iron. The converse is true of Babu Rajendra Prasad. He is iron painted to look like lath. Even under grave provocation such as the Bihar Publicity official's ill-mannered diatribe against the administration of the Bihar Relief Fund, he preserved his composure and equipoise. We agree with Mr. Sinha that public men like Babu Rajendra Prasad are rare. The popular leader has of necessity to be a bit of a charlatan.

The crowd must have emphatic warrant,
The right arm's rod-sweep, the tongue's imperial fiat.

Never dares the man put off the prophet.

It is to the credit of the Indian people that they could appreciate and honour a man without a trace of the charlatan in him like Babu Rajendra Prasad.

Congress and Office:—The Working Committee of the Congress has wisely decided to postpone consideration of the question whether Congress members of the Legislature should or should not accept office if they are returned to the Legislatures with a sufficient majority. The sweeping victories at the last election to the Legislative Assembly are not absolutely reliable as a forecast of the probable results of the elections to the Provincial Legislatures next year. The surprising defeat of Professor K. T. Shah in the by-election for the Bombay University seat in the Local Legislative Council, notwithstanding the strong support given to him by the Congress party and Press, by Dr. Vad who is comparatively little known outside his profession, can not be explained away as being due to Deccani-Gujarati partiality. At elections to the Senate Gujaratis have practically left Deccan far behind. There is among educated men a distinct cooling down of enthusiasm for the Congress and it is difficult to judge how far this feeling has spread. Then, again, in some provinces conditions are such that if the Congress declares against holding office, few of its candidates will have a chance of being elected. New Orissa has strongly deprecated dragging that province into controversial electioneering at the threshold of its career. In Madras Presidency, the electors will have no interest in returning Congressmen unless they undertake to supplant the present Ministers in office. Apart from their merits or demerits, the province is rather tired of them and is longing to give a swing to the pendulum. It may also be the case in some other provinces that a declaration in favour of holding office, may go against Congress candidates. All things considered, the Working Committee has wisely decided that it will be time to decide the question when the results of the elections can be more or less accurately estimated. As regards the other resolutions, their ideology is bourgeois though the phraseology may smack of Marxian. Congress leaders have a difficult task to reconcile the Socialists among them to a programme which would be supported by the older leader who do not believe in bringing in the millenium by a stroke of the pen. The Congress Socialist is satisfied that the wording of the Working Committee's resolutions closely follows the draft of its party; and the substance of them.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

499 not such as need cause alarm to conservative Congressmen.

A Hasty Decision:—We publish in another column the statement issued by Mr. Subhas Bose of the reasons which led him to decide to return to India after the warning conveyed to him that he might be detained as a political prisoner if he did so. To a large extent, the Government's action made it impossible for a man of Mr. Bose's temperament to adopt any other course. Nevertheless, we agree with the Indian and European friends whom he consulted and who advised him to ignore the Government challenge and remain in Europe. Over and above the reasons which prompted them to give the advice, there is also another which should have weighed with Mr. Bose. It is obvious from the replies given to questions asked in the House of Commons that the Secretary of State for India is not at all anxious to take upon himself the responsibility for detaining Mr. Bose without trial under an antiquated Regulation. Answering a question by Mr. Thurtle on Monday whether Lord Zetland would state whether it was intended to formulate a definite charge and bring Mr. Bose to trial the Under Secretary, Mr. Butler, said that his chief must be guided by the views of the authorities in India as regards the action to be taken. The Government of India may ignore the resolution of the Legislative Assembly but they can not ignore the House of Commons; and if Lord Zetland feels that the reasons given by them for detaining Mr. Bose under lettres de cachet procedure, are not such as a British Secretary of State can urge before a British House of Commons, they will have either to bring Mr. Bose to trial or release him. By deciding to return, Mr. Bose has relieved the Government of India of a very difficult task. Instead of having to give reasons for detaining a British subject without trial, which is repugnant to the spirit of the British constitution, they have now merely to say that Mr. Bose defied their warning and that such defiance if tolerated will have a dangerous effect on the Indian masses. Sir Henry Craik has good reason to thank heaven fervently that Mr. Bose decided to return. Since the above was in type, Mr. Bose landed in Bombay on Wednesday and was promptly placed under arrest under the century old Regulation.

The King and the Pandit:—We referred last week to the story that Lord Halifax, the ex-Viceroy who negotiated the Gandhi-Irwin Pact seven years ago, had written to Gandhiji to have a frank talk with Lord Linlithgow when the latter arrives in India to take over the viceroyalty from Lord Willingdon. It was repudiated both by Gandhiji and by Government. The New Delhi correspondent of the Amrita Basar Patrika of Calcutta reported on March 26: "Riyasat, a local weekly, has published a report in its issue that while Pandit Jawaharlal was in London, the King's Private Secretary wrote to Pandit Nehru extending an invitation to meet the King. The paper says that this information was based on a letter received from an ex-Minister of Parliament. The paper mentions that the invitation had been extended on the advice of Lord Linlithgow for discussion of political issues relating to India. Jawaharlal declined the invitation on the ground that his meeting the King or Lord Linlithgow would lead to all sorts of speculations in political circles in India." The Riyasat is an Urdu paper which is not very well known outside the Punjab but the Amrita Basar Patrika has an all-India reputation and it is surprising that even after the reproduction of the story by it, it has remained practically unnoticed by the Indian Press. Pandit Jawaharlal has not contradicted the Riyasat's information. King Edward VIII during the short time since he succeeded his father, has given evidence of having a mind of his own. He has travelled all over the Empire and knows more of its men and affairs than most of his Ministers. There is no constitutional restriction on his seeing any of his subjects whom he wishes to see. There is nothing inherently improbable or improper in His Majesty desiring to meet an Indian leader who happened to be in London. Pandit Jawaharlal's alleged refusal to see the King and, even more, the reason given for the refusal, if the invitation was really given, can only be characterised as astonishing. To let go a golden opportunity of placing the cause of his country before the King who desired to know it first-hand from the President-elect of the National Congress, and to do that for fear that it might give rise to speculation in India, is hardly what one would expect of the Pandit.

The End of the Lindbergh Baby Case:—The execution of Bruno Richard Hauptmann in Trenton jail, New Jersey, on Saturday last marks the close of one of the most sensational cases in the annals of crime. The Lindbergh child was kidnapped and murdered on March 1st 1932. It took nearly four years for the final act in the tragedy to be performed. That the crime should have taken over three years to detect in a country so well equipped with the apparatus of detection in all its departments and where means of communication are the most complete, perhaps, in the whole world, is astonishing. But the cunning of criminals develops side by side with improvement in the means of detection. In this case, except a broken ladder left on the lawn near the house, there was absolutely no trace of the criminal available to the expert detectives who were put to unravel the mystery. A broken piece of wood would seem to be the last thing in the world to give a clue to a crime but in this case it proved to be the determining factor. A wood expert of the U. S. A. Forest Service was able, after prolonged investigation involving the examination of some 2,000 timber yards in the whole country, to identify the broken ladder as the plank which was found to be torn off the flooring in Hauptmann's residence.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

500

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 11

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, April 11 1936.

LORD WILLINGDON.

At a banquet given in his honour by the European Association of Calcutta, Lord Willingdon was reported to have said that his own natural preference was for the life of a country gentleman. He was more interested in breeding pigs than in dealing with people. But he married a wife—and there he was, Viceroy of India. The time is not distant when an ambitious wife will not have to seek the realisation of her ambition through a husband who does not share it but can achieve it in her own right. In the case of our retiring Viceroy, however, the diverse ambitions of husband and wife were harmonised in a unique manner. Lord Willingdon set himself to act the part of a statesman but followed his natural bent in the manner of his statesmanship. From the very first day of his connection with India, he had one main policy to which he has remained constant through the nearly twenty years for which it has lasted. That policy was to advance Indians to the higher posts which had been barred to them but to discountenance any large constitutional reforms. This was the fixed idea of British Liberals which Lord Willingdon brought with him. After several talks with Gokhale who “made no secret of his ultimate hope and design—India to be on the footing of a self-governing colony”—the phrase “Dominion Status” was not invented until many years later—Lord Morley wrote to Lord Minto: “I half suspect that what they (Indian politicals) really want a million times beyond political reform, is access to the higher administrative posts of all sorts, though they are alive to the inseparable connection between the two.” To be quite fair, there was much in the nature of the reforms demanded by Indian leaders in the pre-war era to justify Lord Morley’s suspicion. Though they might have been alive to the inseparable connection between political reform and accession to high office, Indian leaders did not see clearly enough that Indianisation of the Services was likely to prove a great obstacle to political reform except it come as a consequence of political reform. Lord Willingdon came with this idea and he has never been able to shake himself free of it. When he wrote to the Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, in January 1916 of his “profound and certain belief in the necessity for a big and generous gesture in the way of legislation both in economic and administrative matters by the Home Government” towards India, he did not visualise any fundamental change in the system of Indian government. “Of course,” he explained “it is true that the advance of the Indian means the gradual disappearance of this great Civil Service out here, but that, if the Indians are given a real chance to progress, is inevitable.” It is not improbable that the prospect of the elimination of the Indian Civil Service foreshadowed in this letter, inspired Mr. Lloyd George to declare in Parliament that nothing should be done to weaken the steel frame. However that may be, the fact remains that, during Lord Willingdon’s regime, Indians have been appointed to the higher posts which had been so far filled only by British officials, to a much larger extent than under any previous Viceroy. There can be no doubt that this is due in no small measure to the personal influence of His Excellency. Lord Willingdon also played with the idea of becoming the first Viceroy of India under a Dominion constitution. He expressed his earnest hopes in this direction in more than one of his public speeches before the National Government was established in England. But he did little else to advance the cause and, indeed, when his Government had the opportunity, they did not avail themselves of it to make a stand against the many vagaries of the Hoare scheme of constitutional reform.

But the outstanding feature of the Willingdon regime, is the Ordinances which he promulgated. These were intended to suppress the Civil Disobedience movement but they were so comprehensive and so drastic that they suppressed all political and much other activity. His predecessor, Lord Irwin, it is true, started the issue of Ordinances. But he fully realised that they were only a makeshift and no true remedy; and he made exceptions in the case of swadeshi and anti-liquor propaganda. He declared that it was no part of his policy to make a solitude and call it peace. Lord Willingdon had none of his predecessor’s scruples and he had no prevision. Much of the Ordinance material has since been enacted as part of the permanent law of the land. It is true that the Ordinance regime put an end to Civil Disobedience but it also put an end to the hope associated with Civil Disobedience of India being able to set an example to the world of carrying through a political revolution by entirely non-violent means. The policy of Indianisation of the higher offices undoubtedly helped the Viceroy in the application of his policy of ‘thorough’. The non-official Indian Opposition in the Legislature and outside was paralysed by the advocacy and defence of the repressive measures being entrusted to Indian officials. One of the Draft Resolutions of the Working Committee of the National Congress which we printed in the last issue, gives a long list of measures directed against civil liberties and avers that “at no period since the great revolt of 1857 has the suppression of civil and personal liberties and the repression of the Indian people, which is the normal feature of British Indian administration in India today, been so great as it is now.” There is some exaggeration in this, as in 1857 and the years which followed immediately after, many of the things which are catalogued in the resolution as having been suppressed such as the Congress, Labour Unions and Ashrams, did not exist. There was then really

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

501 little to suppress. Nevertheless it is quite true that the reign of law which British rule introduced, has in large part been broken into by the Ordinances which substituted Executive instead of Judicial authority as arbiter in certain classes of offences, many of which are quite new and unknown to the Indian Penal Code comprehensive as it is supposed to be. Even the elementary maxim of jurisprudence that a man should be regarded as innocent unless he is proved to be guilty, has been inverted in the case of political and press offences. Outside politics, Lord Willingdon's Government has followed the policy of developing India as an estate and not as a State within the British Commonwealth. Its fiscal policy has been directed to balance its budget by unbalancing those of the Provinces and private concerns and individuals. Lord Willingdon's Viceroyalty may be described as a personal success to His Excellency but a public catastrophe for India. It can not be altogether a pleasing reflection to him in the evening of his life that his name will be associated in the memory of thousands of the Indian people with sufferings which they had done nothing to merit.

THE BUDDHA'S WAY. BHIKKU METTAYA.*

We were interested to read the leader you wrote on March 21st, under the title "The Two Ways" wherein speaking of the Lord Buddha you remark: "The point we wish to emphasise here, is that the Buddha while he did his best to relieve the patient did not offer to cure him. Buddha's method was to change the mental attitude of sufferers and not their material condition."

This remark, we feel, is a great injustice done to the great Teacher who, to use the striking language of Dr. Oldenberg, a non-Buddhist, stands forth as the most prominent of the world's physicians that traversed India in monastic garb. In history, we see no other Teacher who cured the world as Lord Buddha did nor one who improved its material condition so much as he did. Fa-Hian, the celebrated Chinese pilgrim who came to India in the early years of the 5th century of the Christian era, describes the happy state of the "Middle Kingdom (of the Brahmans)" then in the following words:

"It has a temperate climate, without frost or snow; and the people are prosperous and happy, without registration or official restrictions. Only those who till the King's land have to pay so much on the profit they make. Those who want to go away, may go; those who want to stop, may stop. The king in his administration uses no corporal punishments; criminals are merely fined according to the gravity of their offences. Even for a second attempt at rebellion the punishment is only the loss of the right hand. The men of the King's body-guard have all fixed salaries. Throughout the country no one kills any living things, nor drinks wine, nor eats onions or garlic; but chandalas are segregated. Chandala is their name for foul men (lepers).....In this country they do not keep pigs or fowls, there are no dealings in cattle, no butchers, shops or distilleries in their market-places"

(Dr. H. A. Giles' translation)

The noble Fa-Hian is accepted as a speaker of truth both by the East and the West and if we compare and contrast this picture of India then with what it is to-day, we will know how wholly the Lord Buddha cured the world of its ills, and how, by treading the Golden Path shown by him, even the world to-day will free herself of all her misery. Asoka, the great disciple of the Lord Buddha, flourished hundreds of years before Fa-Hian. That great emperor, after his conversion, sheathed his sword never to draw it out again, and following the Lord of Compassion, became the father of all beings that breathe. At his request, the President of the Third Council sent missionaries, who were healers of the heart, to almost the whole of the then known world, and for healing ills of the flesh, the benevolent emperor established hospitals for man and beast not only in India, but even in the realm of Antiochos, the Greek King.

Every act the Lord Buddha did, He did it in compassion, and he taught his disciples also to renunciate self and to serve the World through compassion and love. The inscriptions of Asoka are but an echo of the sweet words of his master and of this emperor Mr. H. G. Wells, a non-Buddhist, and an historian of the greatest integrity says:

"For eight and twenty years Asoka worked sanely for the real needs of men. Amidst the tens of thousands of names of monarchs that crowd the columns of history, their majesties and graciousnesses and serenities and royal highnesses and the like, the name of Asoka shines, and shines almost alone, a star. From the Volga to Japan his name is still honoured. China, Tibet, and even India, though it has left his doctrine, preserve the tradition of his greatness. More living men cherish his memory to-day than have ever heard the names of Constantine or Charlemagne." (Outline of History)

We have quoted disinterested scholars deliberately and what Mr. Wells said of Asoka as a king, any honest historian may say of the Lord Buddha as a World Teacher. History tells us that there was no other teacher who walked India curing the sick, consoling the disconsolate, teaching the Truth and dispensing happiness as the Lord Buddha did. He was now at Benares, now at Rajagaha, now at Vesali and now at Savatthi and this land, when he trod it in journeying, was fully happy. He gave the same love to all alike, to Brahmin and Chandala, to queen and courtesan, to saint and slave girl. In his presence none was high, none low. Those who, in the world, were highest, sat at his feet with the lowest. He gave unity to India and the world. What the Lord Buddha did was converting the world from greed to renunciation, from hatred to love, and from cruelty to compassion. In the noble Noble Eightfold Path taught by him, the second step is Right Mindedness. The disciple of the Lord Buddha sets his thoughts on Renunciation (Nekkhamma), Love (Metta) and compassion (Ahimsa). These are saving thoughts. After thinking we act—act that the world may benefit. Giving up acquisitiveness and putting away thoughts of self, we work for the good and happiness of others. In Buddhism, the man who comes forward to serve the world, monarch, minister or monk, must have renunciation as his mandate. And it was through this portal of renunciation that all great Buddhist kings entered the path of service. Was not Asoka reluctant to rule? He would not be the ruler, but the servant and the modest adviser. Buddhist Love is never limited. Nor is it inactive. The real lover of the World works ceaselessly for its welfare. And the Ahimsa that the Lord Buddha taught the world is not merely refraining from doing any harm to the world, but it is also removing the sufferings of the world. But without renouncing self, no one would either love the world or remove its sufferings. One may speak

* Of Maha Bodhi Society Calcutta.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

502

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 11

realpatidar.com

of doing so, and pretend to do so, but one will never do good to the world or remove its sufferings without sacrificing self. And unless one sees the sorrows immanent in life and the misery the world is subject to, one will not practise true renunciation. Hence the Lord Buddha taught suffering as the first Noble Truth. We never hate a patient, we never harm him—but we always wish him well and strive to cure him. The whole world is suffering. All life is one in that all are suffering, and all life is one as all wish for happiness. Hence Lord Buddha taught man by practice first and by precept next, to strive to make the whole world happy. To who ever that went to him, Lord Buddha gave happiness. They that followed him on the Aryan Path of Right View, Right Mindedness, Right Word, Right Action, Right Livelihood, Right Exertion, Right Recollectedness, and Right Concentration, won Peace and the Highest Happiness. Foremost among Indian monarchs that followed the Lord Buddha was Asoka and he made India and the world happy. Even to-day Asoka is the prototype for any monarch that wishes to rule the earth righteously and Lord Buddha is the True Teacher that any man must accept if he is to live a life of love, purity and service. If we are to recount incidents to show how the Lord Buddha helped the world both spiritually and materially, we shall have to write a very large book. But we may make mention of some instances.

There was a Brahman named Bharadvaja, who lost all his riches. His many daughters came home with their children also and the old man fell into debt. Early in the morning creditors would surround his house and demand the debts saying "Give our money!" "Give our money!" The poor man also lost his fourteen oxen six days ago.

And early in the morning, without any hope in the world, without a single friend in the world, he wandered into the woods. Seeing him, the Lord Buddha went in compassion to him, took the old man with him to King Kosala, and told the King the pathetic tale. The good king paid away all his debts, had his wife and daughters brought to the palace, gave the daughters in marriage, and keeping the old Brahminess in the royal residence, cherished her as his grandmother. He also offered the old monk robes and requisites, and became his lay brother. Thus Bharadvaja, the Brahman, who lost all, found, through the grace of the Lord Buddha, more than what he lost, for he won Eternal Peace and Happiness also.

One day when the Lord was about to preach, a poor man oppressed with pangs of hunger came to him and the Lord said to the people of the house "Feed this hungry brother." And the Lord kept the whole audience in waiting till that man finished his meal. When he had eaten his meal, he was physically relieved and his mind became tranquil. Then the Lord preached the Dhamma and the poor man was established in sanctity.

Every step the Lord took was for the benefit of the world, every word he uttered was sweet. He who could not look on even while an animal was suffering, how could he bear to look on when man was suffering? One day some children were hurting a rattle snake, and the Lord going to them, taught them to love the poor creature and leave it in peace. One day the Lord saw a man fishing, and repaired thither. The man, on seeing the Lord, threw away his fishing rod and stood still. And the Lord, in the friendliest manner, inquired "What, friend, is thy name?" "My name, O' Lord, is Ariya" said the man. And the Lord said to him. "Friend Ariyas never harm any living being." And Ariya thereafter never did any living being harm.

There is the story of Angulimala. He had a voice like vengeance and the beasts of the forest trembled when he roared "I am Angulimala." He already had killed nine-hundred and ninety-nine men, and that day he had raised his sword to kill his very mother, when lo! the Lord saved him and mother both. So tender did the heart of the murderer grow, he later could not bear to see the travail of a woman.

You had reproduced in your valuable journal the story of "How the Master Ministered the Sick," from the "Maha Bodhi." That is one instance. There are others also. And the Lord has said "He that nurseth the sick, he nurseth Me." Further, in the questions of Milinda we read "The Buddha esteems not the gifts offered to him, but only the alms that are shared with those in need." Through the grace of the Lord Buddha even bird and beast received the love of man. In Buddhist countries there still is the custom of giving "Dana" to dogs, crows and other animals. It is a joyful spectacle to see hundreds of dogs and crows eating to their hearts' content.

No one looked on this sick world with more love than he, and he washed this earth of all its stains even as He washed the red hand of Angulimala, and he made the heart of the world pure and happy in the highest. If there ever was one who gave life to the dead world it was the Lord Buddha. For, physical death is nothing in comparisons to the other death, which is of the spirit, because a man even if he is physically alive is as dead if he is dead in spirit and the dead corpse of the Spirit spreads disease and malodour throughout the world giving death to others also. Greed is Death, Hatred is Death, and Ignorance is Death. But Renunciation on the other hand is Life, Love is Life and Knowledge is Life. He whose greed grows is on the path of death. They in whom evils grow are also on the path of death. They go from Dark to Dark. He that hates, envies and steals his neighbour is on the path of Death. The nation that tramples down another is also on the path of death. Such a killing nation is verily committing suicide. As she tramples down the other nation with her foot, her very hand strangles her own neck.

The Lord Buddha gave Life to a dead world in that he brought love to where Hatred was, Renunciation to where Acquisitiveness was, Peace to where war was and Light to where Darkness was. He gave life to the dead spirit of the world. He, and He alone taught the world the whole art of living, living for the good of the world, each man a saviour of his fellowmen. Where his teachings on the art of living followed, and only when they were followed, every other art also reached its zenith. It was during Buddhist days that Indian art was at its highest. Lord Buddha taught the world the art of living, Asoka taught the world the art of ruling and Buddhist masters taught the world the art of painting. Sir John Marshall the late Director General of Archaeology, speaking of Buddhist Art says: "In the earliest caves you see Buddhist art almost at its zenith; you mark its graceful lines; its rich but restrained decoration, its transparent sincerity, and above all its peace and tranquillity....You have passed from the realm of Buddhism.....and you realize—with a start as it were—the vast gulf that separates the two. You can see forms obviously copied from the Buddhist; but their peacefulness is gone. Bihos (if I may use a Greek expression) has given way to Pathos. They have become the incarnation of all dead forces of nature, of passion and of lust, of suffering and death. And so you go from one to another of these halls, surrounded by sombre and relentless forms, peering from their dark recesses; you surrender yourself involuntarily to the prevailing gloom, but you do not

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

503

"you cannot forget the lofty spiritual beauty of the earlier caves; and you wonder within yourself what came over the spirit or the character of the people when they forsook Buddhism."

Further, it is Lord Buddha, the Sun of Truth, that even to-day gives the silver-lining to the dark clouds in our sky. Even to-day, it is at Puri, of ancient Buddhist fame, that the children or mother India taste the bliss of unity even for one single moment. There all meet without any distinction of caste, sit together to one banquet of brotherhood and take to their homes as Food of Life the little that remains. In any Buddhist land, even to-day, this blessed unity is still found. In Ceylon, in Burma and in Siam all meet in ecstasy at the feet of the Lord Buddha. When will that blessed day come when the children of mother India, learning the lesson of Puri, again become strong in unity? And although Manu condemns the man who, having performed a rite, does not partake of the flesh to be born twenty times a beast, although the Maha Bharata bears testimony to the high value of flesh as an article of food, although Samkara defends the jyotishkama which involves the shedding of blood as an holy act, and although the Vedas and the Smritis authorise animal sacrifice, almost the whole of India is vegetarian to-day. Behold how the love of the Lord Buddha worked in the world, and how it still works, how it still serves. The great Asoka, himself giving up the chase and prohibiting the slaying of bird, beast or fish in the royal household, advised his people also, leaving intentional killing alone, not even to burn chaff with small insects. Harsha Siladitya also decreed that in his realm no living being should be killed, and the Indian people who had as rulers such benevolent men became full of love and kindness not only for men, but for all living beings. Hence even when animals were slain for religious sacrifices there was public indignation and we hear the author of the Nirnaya Sindhu saying:

"The slaughter of large bulls and large sheep for Brahmins versed in the Vedas, should not be effected being detested by the public. Further, the rule let a cow fit for offering to Mitra and Varuna, or a barren cow, or one that has ceased to bear after calving be sacrificed, is duly ordained, but such sacrifice, being opposed to public feeling, could not be performed." (For this and other information I am indebted to the late Prof. P. Laksmi Narasu. Vide "A study of Caste" by the same author.)

And although Krishna exhorts Arjuna to kill as a duty, although Jesus Christ said to his disciples "he that hath no sword let him sell his garment and buy one," and although the Koran makes Jihad, or fighting the whole world in general a duty incumbent on the followers of Islam, the Lord Buddha said to his disciples "even if highway robbers with a two-handed saw should take you and dismember you limb by limb, whose grew darkened in mind thereby would not be fulfilling my injunctions." It therefore is a 'cause for real joy that in the Land of the Lord's birth Ahimsa still reigns, and we are very grateful to Mahatma Gandhi who gave new life to that ancient Aryan Law.

These facts, I think, are enough to prove that the Lord Buddha cured the word of all its ills, that he served the world not in one way or in two ways, but in many ways and that he bestowed on it blessings both spiritual and material. During Buddhist days every country prospered, and every art flourished. The Golden Age of Ceylon was when she had true Buddhist kings. Even to-day, through the grace of the Lord Buddha, she is the happiest island. In China, when the great Buddhist Emperor Wu Ti reigned, there was prosperity and heavenly peace. Minden Min, the "Benevolent and Wise", made Burma an ideal republic even so late as the last century. Cambodia reached the zenith of glory in the reign of the great Jayavarman. And Japan at no other time was happier than during the reign of Empress Niko who had as regent her noble son Shotoku. Prince Shotoku, taking Vimalakirti, a lay disciple of the Lord Buddha as his prototype, lived a very saintly, yet useful and active life. When his mother ascended the throne the country was divided. Father stood against son, wife against husband and parent against child. But through the grace of the Dhamma he gave the distracted land peace and he made the unhappy people full happy. Shotoku reformed the Government, made Buddhism the Imperial faith, and after taking holy orders, first practised, and then preached the new faith to relatives in the court and to the multitude in the market place and people "dazed with the splendour and soul stimulus of the new culture, thronged earnestly to hear him". (Vide "Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art" by Prof. Ernest F. Fenollosa.) Shotoku was one of the greatest of the creative sages of Asia and it was during his regency that the first school of Japanese art proper, of which he was the heart and soul, came into existence. It was he who gave Japan its Ajanta, the famous cathedral of Horiuji where we encounter the most beautiful statue of a Bodhi-Satta made in Japan, before whose sweet powerful smile says Professor Fenollosa, "no serious broad-minded Christian could quite free himself from the impulse to bow down." Buddhism gave new life to Japan and even to-day Buddhism is the hope and glory of that land. History has proved that it was the Lord Buddha who cured the world whole. It has also proved that it was the Lord Buddha who gave India and the East the many treasures of art. His disciples never have harmed any person, they have not shed one drop of blood for the spread of their religion, they have not trampled truth or plundered the property of other nations, but Buddhist emperors, following the Lord's exhortation to Siha and to Upali, have been protectors and liberal benefactors of other faiths. The moment one becomes a true disciple of the Lord Buddha, he devotes all his powers for the welfare of the whole world. When Lord Buddha was Teacher, India was heaven on earth. Home was then Brahmaloaka, the realm of Love and Light. Parents were honoured like Brahmas by the children. Husband and wife lived like god and goddess, and our Brahmins did not sin even in sleep, for hearts were pure.

Even to-day there is the cure brought by the Lord Buddha, and the salvation of Aryavarta and the whole world, we believe, is through him. If the West, ever thirsting for power, listens to the words of the Lord:

Not for his own sake, not for the sake of another, should a man desire a son or wealth or kingdom.

"He should not seek to gain success for himself by unjust means; so will he be upright, wise and righteous." (Dhammapada-translation by Prof. Burlingame.) Let the world listen to Him, let none wish to gain even kingdoms by evil means, and there will be peace and happiness. Let the world walk the Path to the Deathless He showed, walking which we reach the Immortal. The Immortal, we say, for there Greed kills not Charity, Hatred kills not Love and Selfishness Kills not Justice. There Truth is not trampled down. There renunciation is the rule. And there is Peace. "not peace that grows by Lethic," but Peace whose names are also Rapture, Power, Clear sight and Love: for these are parts of peace.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

504
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 11]

"SOVIET SIDELIGHTS."

In an attractive and well-got up brochure entitled "Soviet Sidelights", Mr. M. R. Masani has embodied his experiences and impressions of Soviet Russia which he visited last year. This was not his first visit to that country. He had already been there some nine years ago. Himself an ardent socialist and with the opportunities he has had, Mr. Masani was able to see for himself and test how far the theory of Karl Marx and Lenin has found practical application in the Soviet Union which has aimed and almost achieved the greatest good of the greatest number of its people. The net result of achievements during the eighteen years of Soviet Regime, the author sums up as follows:—"The approach to a Socialist Society in the U. S. S. R., is the biggest single advance in Social Justice since the days of the caveman. A few men may for a while consume more than their less useful brethren but no one can hire out land or buildings or machinery or hire the labour of another for his profit.

The advance is not only in social justice but also in social organization. In a world where every other country is burdened with a large community of unemployed, there are literally no unemployed in the U. S. S. R., and there is everywhere a demand for more workers. At a time when the standard of living of the masses in every country in Europe and America is going down, the people of the Soviet Union are experiencing prosperity such as they have never known before. It is no objection to say that the Russian worker is still not so well fed or clothed or housed as the British or the American worker. Of course he is not. But the fact remains that he is much better fed and clothed and housed than he was under the Tsar or even in 1927, before the first Five Year Plan. The hopes of one year become the achievement of the next and alone in the world the Soviet citizen looks forward to scaling new heights of achievement, attaining higher standards of life, year by year.

The progress is not however in the material sphere alone. The cultural progress made, has been perhaps even more wonderful. In 1913, the figure of literacy of the Russian Empire was 33 per cent. In 1923 the Soviet Union had already reached the figure of 58.4 per cent and in 1932, 90 per cent of the people had attained literacy. Has a movement dispelling on such a vast scale and in such a short period the darkness of ignorance, been known before in human history?

In 1913, 2.7 million newspapers were sold; in 1933, 36 millions. Every year now, 53,800 new books are printed in 90 languages, because like India, the Soviet Union is a country of many races and languages. Sidney Webb estimates that the issues of the press and literature generally are greater in the U. S. S. R., than in England, Germany and the U. S. A. put together. This, it will be remembered, in a country which was two-thirds illiterate only eighteen years ago!

With material and cultural advancement has come physical regeneration. Sports are encouraged. Parks of Culture and Rest are full. It was after seeing the wonderful Park in Moscow that Mr. H. G. Wells remarked that if he were to die and return to Earth once more he knew of no other place where he would rather be born than in the Moscow Park of Culture and Rest!

Along with men, women and children have come into their own. Woman has ceased to be a chattel and has attained all the rights of free humanity. The laws of marriage and divorce make that abundantly clear. The successful abolition of prostitution is one of the significant indications of that change. The child has become the special responsibility of the State in the U. S. S. R. It is a criminal offence to strike a child, whether the offender be the parent or the teacher."

To have effected all these is by no means a mean achievement for the Soviet State. At the same time, the lack of individual and political liberty in the otherwise ideal Socialist state has made Mr. Masani furiously to think. Though he is inclined to believe that the dictatorship of the Soviet Union is of both Stalin and of the Communist Party, he cannot ignore the fact that the Party is denied the right to oppose the "great leader and teacher Stalin." The fate of Trotsky and others provides ample proof of it. But in this respect Soviet Russia is no worse than her German and Italian neighbours. So much for the political part of the book. The author's experience in a Soviet steamer, his descriptions of the cities of Leningrad and Moscow, his visit to Baku the capital of Azerbaijan republic; his interviews with a Commissar, the Registrar of marriages and divorce, and Comrade Judge, interspersed with wit and humour, furnish interesting reading and give a real insight into the Russia of today. "Soviet Sidelights" is a welcome addition to the literature on Soviet Russia and should be read by all on whom that country exerts a fascination.

As Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru in his Foreword to the booklet says, the Russian Experiment has passed that stage and has become an accomplished fact with vast achievement to its credit. In the New Russia risen from the ashes of the old, the life and personality of the Russian people have undergone a process of transformation as almost to amount, in the words of the Webbs, to a New Civilisation.

PLACE OF ENGLISH IN INDIAN EDUCATION

MR. M. R. JAYAKAR.

There is often a tendency to regard English Literature as being merely a vehicle of expression through the English language—a kind of facile way by which you convey, through the medium of that language, what you intend to say. In my opinion, that is rather a narrow view of English literature. As I view it, the study of English literature is something greater than merely a medium of expression, the perfection of your vocabulary, or the sharpening of your verbal weapons. It is even greater than the power of facile, elegant or refined expression. It has a far higher place in our scheme of education, though in the hurry of passing examinations and securing honours, we are apt to forget it.

Do not regard English literature as only a gift of expression; that is a small point, though largely exaggerated in India. It is a rare experience in India to hear an Indian speak English well. The very novelty of it is pleasant and secures praise. It is like a child beginning to speak. We forgive faults of expression, syntax and diction. The child speaks, and that is enough. You must therefore not attach too much importance to this. A gifted speaker, of course, like Mr. Sastri is a rare phenomenon, but it cannot be reproduced by mere imitative studies.

I want you to study English literature historically. The two characteristics of English literature, which are wellworth your study, are its simplicity and sweetness. It is as with Sanskrit—the bigger the author, the greater is the simplicity and sweetness of his diction. That is the modern genius of the English language. It is easy enough to read the poem, but what is not always clear—and that is where the Professor should come to your rescue—is

* Summarised from anniversary address to English Library Association, Fergusson College, Poona.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

505

the man and the motive behind the poem. A great poet depicts much of what are perpetual human sentiments. He is not a propagandist in a narrow sense. He is scarcely a theorist. His audience is the entire civilized world, and in proportion as he rises over the bounds and limitations of race, age or clime, does his work gain in excellence.

Simplicity of style, which is so essential in modern times, whether at the Bar or on the public platform comes from clearness of thinking. Do not imagine that the speaker who excels in speaking simple English, does nothing more than that. His ideas are clear, and therefore his words are clear. Clearness of diction arises from clearness of thinking. It may be a question of writing an essay, or it may be a question of writing a poem. Whatever it may be, try and acquire the habit of thinking clearly. Decide for yourself what you want to say, and then the words will shape themselves into literary moulds suited to your ideas.

Those who feel inclined to adopt a journalistic career, won't derive much help from the ancient models, for, when these were written, journalism was different from what it is now. Journalism is essentially the creation of the age to which it belongs. It is often born out of the conflicts of the times. Its features therefore are non-permanent and vary from time to time. The student of journalism will therefore have to plunge deep into the vortex of his times and evolve a style suited to his subject.

Coming now to the most fascinating of all professions, namely, that of the public man or the public speaker, to which I suppose the modern young student feels most drawn, you will have to make your choice from a different class of literary gifts. You may derive some benefit from the writings and speeches of the great Advocates of your times, who have been great public speakers. Burke and Brougham are now out of date, but you may derive great benefit from the speeches of great Advocates like Lord Reading.

A gift of expression cannot be cultivated in isolation from ideas. It is often a good plan, in the earlier stages, to note with deliberation how a great author expresses his ideas. Contrast it with your way of expressing the same thought. Note the difference, and ask yourself why is it so. Where did I go wrong? Why did not this way of expression occur to me? What shall I do to make such expressions my own? Mere memorizing won't help you much. Memorizing must be carried deeper than mere learning by rote. Try and understand the mental habits of the author which are the true parent of his style. Acquire these mental habits, and then his literary ways will become easier of imitation. It is an evil habit to imitate a great author by copying his turns of expression and piling them up in sentence after sentence. It may pass as literary skill with the injudicious, but can never secure an enduring place as a literary piece. The style supports the ideas. If these are weighty they will need a style corresponding in weight and steadiness. In all such matters, the one golden rule is to be natural and avoid ostentatious imitation. The danger of such ostentation is greater in the case of literature which is not in your language, sucked with the mother's milk.

It is always a good plan, in the case of a foreign language like English, to lose no opportunity of hearing a good speaker who speaks the language as his native tongue. In Poona you may be lacking in such opportunities, but whenever you get them, you should not allow them to slip by. The great beauty of the English language is its sweetness and simplicity. Its sweetness partially arises from the fact that it has a most fascinating system of accents, which does not exist in our language. I want you to note that very carefully. If you want to study and speak the English language well, try and get at the right accent. A word may contain several syllables, but the accent is generally on one syllable only. Mark out that syllable and place the accent there. A word is badly pronounced, if the accent is placed on the wrong syllable, or, what is generally our Indian way, if all the syllables are pronounced with equal emphasis. One badly pronounced word may jar on the ear of the judicious and thereby spoil the effect of an otherwise faultless speech. The next rule to note in connection with the sweetness of the English language is that the syllables, which follow the accented one, have to be rapidly slurred over. We have no system of accents in Marathi but we are equally critical of vocal errors. Fancy a good speech in Marathi, well conceived, well delivered but in which ँ and ा were wrongly inter-changed. What a bathos!

The sweetness of the English language is closely allied to its simplicity. For acquiring that excellence, one book I would recommend to you, viz, the Bible. It is the same rule as with Marathi or Sanskrit, viz., the higher the author, the simpler is his diction. Take the Mahabharat and Ramayan in the original Sanskrit, or the Dasa-Bodha of Ramdas. Do not abhor the New Testament, because it is the religious book of your rulers. Your President just quoted a little sentence from the Bible, and you noticed how it stood out of the rest of the speech like a little jewel. To this day, the Bible holds the field, as being the simplest composition in the English language, and I cannot do better than recommend its study.

It will be a mistake to allow your political dislike of British rule to come in the way of your studying English literature with appreciation and good will. You will never make any progress, if your attitude is one of hatred, contempt or abhorrence for the culture of the people whose literature you are studying. You have to get over your political dislikes, if any, and concentrate your mind upon the beauty of the literature you read. When in the field of literature, you are not a politician and have no political or social antipathies.

GAEKWAR JUBILEE IN NEW YORK.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

The Diamond Jubilee of sixty years progressive rule of His Highness the Maharaja Gaskwar of Baroda, International President of the World Fellowship of Faiths, was celebrated at a banquet-entertainment in the Hotel Biltmore, New York, on Monday evening, March 9th, by the members and friends of the World Fellowship of Faiths.

The Sponsoring Committee of this banquet included His Excellency Sir Ronald Lindsay, Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, Mrs. James Roosevelt, Mrs. Charlotte Goddard Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. James S. Cushman, Mrs. Sidney C. Borg, Mr. and Mrs. Pierre C. Cartier, Mr. James Speyer, Dr. and Mrs. John Haynes Holmes, Mr. J. Frederick Talcott, The Rt. Rev. Ernest M. Stires, Madame Ganna Walska, Dr. Cyrus Adler, Dr. Henry Moskowitz and Justice Jacob S. Strahl.

Several hundreds of people attended the banquet and after-dinner entertainment. The toast of the President of the United States was proposed by Mr. Kedarnath Das Gupta of India, Founder and General Executive of the World Fellowship of Faiths. In proposing the toast Mr. Das Gupta said, "President Roosevelt's recent radio address should be a source of inspiration to all of us, emphasizing as it does fellowship and understanding, exhorting us "to find a common ground on which all faiths

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

506 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

April 11

can stand." He further added that the people of the United States were among the most spiritually-minded.

The toast of His Majesty King Edward VIII was proposed by the Rev. Eliot White. He emphasized the democratic humane qualities of the new King. The toast of His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda was proposed by Sir Gerald Campbell, British Consul General in New York. In proposing the toast he spoke about the great achievements and reforms of His Highness and also paid tribute to India for her culture and spirituality.

Sir Albion Banerji, former Prime Minister of Mysore, who came to New York for a short visit, supported Sir Gerald Campbell in the toast of His Highness and referred particularly to the compulsory, free education which His Highness introduced into his State.

Rabbi B. Leon Hurwitz, Chairman of the Brooklyn Council of the World Fellowship of Faiths, said: "The achievements of His Highness' benevolent rule are too numerous to enumerate which include not only compulsory, free education but sanitary improvement, amelioration of the condition of depressed classes and aboriginal tribes, founding of Kalabhavan (Art school) and technical school, establishing public libraries, state bank and construction of highways, public buildings and parks, etc."

Messages of appreciation of the works of the Maharaja Gaekwar were read from eminent American and British leaders who know His Highness intimately, which included the Governor of Illinois, the Mayor of Chicago, the Rev. Dr. J. T. Sunderland, the Rt. Hon. Marquess of Crewe, Lord Lamington, Colonel Wedgewood Benn and Sir Francis Young-husband.

The dinner was followed by an entertainment with music of many lands. The singers included the Greek Opera stars, Tito Xirelli and Madame Ismene Xirelli, and the famous Sinhalese singers, Surya Sena and Nelun Devi. Moving pictures taken by the Fox Movietone at the time of the Diamond Jubilee celebration in Baroda last January were shown together with pictures of the Maharaja, the Maharani and other members of the family.

The entertainment was concluded with the presentation of a short Indian play called "Savitri or Love Conquers Death," adapted by Kedarnath Das Gupta from the Hindu epic, Mahabharata. Artists included Madame Barry-Orlova, Miss Elaine Eldridge, Mr. William Hallman, Mr. Herbert Rudley and Mr. Bhupesh Guha.

People of many creeds and nationalities were represented at this celebration. Among those who participated included Americans, Christians, Jews, Negroes, English men and women, French, Polish, German, Russian, Italian, Moslem, Hindus, Sinhaless, Greeks, Latvians, and adherents of New Thought, Theosophy, Baha'i and other modern religions. It is a happy coincidence that the international aspect of this affair occurred without planning.

It was further announced that His Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar was expected to attend the Second International Congress of the World Fellowship of Faiths scheduled in London from July 8 to 18.

Banned Film of Mecca.—At the eleventh hour the premier of the film "Pilgrimage to Mecca" was forbidden by the authorities in Alexandria. This film 4000 metres in length was taken in great secrecy at Mecca itself, although the strictest regulations obtain in the holy city forbidding the use of any photographic instruments. The owner and "camerawoman" is a European lady, Madame Mour Dahaby, who married an Egyptian and was converted to Islam. It is a mystery how Madame Dahaby succeeded in smuggling the necessary apparatus into Mecca.

BABU RAJENDRA PRASAD.*

SACHCHIDANANDA SINHA.

Since his election, in October 1934, as the President of the Congress, our honoured guest had made, more than once, most extensive tours throughout the length and breadth of India, literally from the Himalayas to the Cape Comorin, and he has done it now continuously for 18 months at all seasons of the year, travelling from place to place, and carrying the message of hope and goodwill to the people of the various provinces. Those who, like myself, know that he is a chronic invalid as the victim of asthma, can easily realise the numerous privations and the serious sufferings which he must have had to undergo during these prolonged and incessant tours. It has been my unique privilege to know, more or less intimately, almost all the Presidents of the Congress, during the last 50 years of its existence, but—without any idea of derogating in the least from the work of any one of his predecessors—I maintain that few of them brought to bear upon their work, as President, that unparalleled devotion to duty and rare self-abnegation which has been displayed by Babu Rajendra Prasad. There are present at this gathering many of those who were his colleagues at the Bar during the years he practised as an advocate in the Calcutta and the Patna High Courts, and they will, I am sure, fully confirm my statement that had he but cared to aspire after the laurels crowning the brow of either a successful advocate, or of an administrator—a judgeship, a rank in the Cabinet or the Presidentship of a legislature—there is nothing which he could not have reasonably aspired to and been disappointed of. But Babu Rajendra Prasad has been cast in a sterner stuff than many of us. His ideals and aspirations soar ever so much higher than many of us can persuade ourselves to accept as feasible for us. He represents a much higher type of humanity than many of us can aspire to be. It may be—in fact, I believe it is—that the realist element is absolutely necessary in this universe to carry on the day-to-day work on which the well-being of humanity depends, but it is none-the-less necessary to appreciate that higher type of worker, represented by Babu Rajendra Prasad, who displays a spirit of self-abnegation and self-sacrifice, coupled with absolutely disinterested public service, which is but rarely met in this world, and certainly not easily found in this country. The distinction which I have sought to draw between the two types of public workers is brought into striking relief by one of the greatest English poets, Robert Browning, in his well-known poem called "The Grammarian's Funeral." You will permit me to read out to you but one stanza from it which is highly apposite and specially relevant to the view I have tried to express in my own feeble language:—

"That low man seeks a little thing to do.
Sees it and does it:
This high man, with a great thing to pursue,
Dies ere he knows it,
That low man goes on adding one to one,
His hundred's soon hit;
This high man, aiming at a million, misses an unit.
That has the world here—should he need the next,
Let the world mind him!
This, throws himself on God, and unperplexed
Seeking shall find him."

Now Browning obviously uses the words "high" and "low" in this stanza not in their common acceptation with reference to character, but to those of ideals and aspirations of humanity. The many in this world must necessarily represent the type which

* Speech at a public reception at Patna, 2nd April.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

507

Browning calls 'low', though he does not deny that his 'low' man (in the sense of the realist) is as much essential for the well-being and progress of humanity, as the 'high' man representing the superior type of worker, whose work we must all admire and try to emulate, though we can never excel it. But while fully holding that in the economy of Providence, the 'low' man is as essential to the well-being of God's creatures as is the 'high' man, there is all the more reason that those representing the former type should express their appreciation of the work and worth of the 'high' man and the type he represents so that it may serve as a glorious example to all. And it is in this spirit that we have assembled here to-day as representatives of the various towns, cities and districts of this province of Behar, to testify our appreciation of the work and worth of Babu Rajendra Prasad, our admiration for his selflessness and our fondness for his loving personality.

THE OXFORD MOVEMENT IN NORWAY.

Synnove Larsen Baasch writes in Unity: "In all the fear and distrust now, the Oxford movement is gaining ground, the more rapidly because it stresses important matters which are common to all honest Christians, without demanding a bleeding wound of severance from one's accustomed church. To many seekers this movement has been a blessing; it has strengthened and unified their spiritual life. They no longer live on their selfish intelligence but listen for guidance from God, and thus live fearlessly. Explain it how you will, as integration of personality or as obedience to God, I know at least two people who were quite ordinary before, and who now tower above the rest of us, in insight, in power to influence others, in peacefulness. To them, religion is not a plaster on a wound, but the core of their being.

The Oxford movement is spreading like fire in dry grass. It has become fashionable in Norway. There is an institution called the Oxford tea, where upper-class women gather in smartly simple and expensive gowns to exchange stories about God and His ways. In Oslo last winter there was an enormous sale of black afternoon dresses. The marvels of His inspiration are broadcast wherever the Oxford teams meet. And so, maybe we have found the one thing that can save us from war. Maybe in our fright we have found the one piece of magic that will flatter God and stop Judgment. With or without Oxford, all thorough individuals know that this will be a test, not only of armaments, cunning, and cruelty, but first and last a test of character. Now each one stands alone to endure what must be endured.

Hitler's Seven Points:—The following are the main points of the Note of Herr Hitler, handed over to the Ambassadors of the Locarno Powers:—Firstly, Germany attacks the Locarno Agreement on account of the Franco-Soviet Pact; Secondly, she regards herself as free from stipulations regarding the demilitarised Rhineland Zone; Thirdly, Germany expresses her readiness to agree to a new demilitarised zone, provided France and Belgium also demilitarise the zone of their frontiers; Fourthly, she offers to sign a twenty-five year non-aggression pact in the West, provided Britain and Italy agree to be guarantors; Fifthly, Germany offers to admit Holland if she desires; Sixthly, she offers to conclude an Air Pact in the West, and a non-aggression pact in the East including Lithuania; Seventhly, Germany expects that within a reasonable time through friendly negotiations, the question of colonies will be amicably settled. If all these matters are agreed to Germany is ready to return to the League of Nations, provided the Covenant is separated from the Peace Treaty.

CO-OPERATION BETWEEN CHINA AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The China Committee of the Council of the League met in March to consider the present situation and the 1936 programme as regards the plan of technical co-operation between China and the League of Nations. This plan, which has been in operation since 1931, is intended to enable the National Economic Council of China to have recourse to the League technical organisations in connection with the work of national reconstruction in China; in such ways as it may see fit and as are provided for in the plan.

The 1936 programme provides for continuing the forms of co-operation already begun. This includes the maintenance of the administrative office at Nanking, and the continuance of the contract of Mr. Campbell, an expert on rural co-operation, who began his work in China in September 1935. Agriculture has always been, and continues to be, of primary importance for China, since a very large part of the population is dependent on it for its livelihood. The National Economic Council has accordingly devoted special attention to the numerous problems constantly arising in this sphere as a result of the special conditions obtaining in China. One problem relates to the agricultural co-operative societies which, in recent years, have begun to expand in a remarkable manner. The Chinese Government, being convinced of their utility, but realising at the same time the necessity for encouraging their development on the lines and according to the rules dictated by the experience of other countries, decided to obtain the advice of a first-class technician. It requested the League's assistance in this connection and Mr. Campbell, who had acquired a great reputation in Ceylon in these matters was engaged for a mission starting in September 1935 and which it was proposed, in order to achieve the best possible results, should cover several years.

Another expert in China under the plan of co-operation is M. B. Mari, an Italian, who has been living in China since the autumn of 1932 and who was engaged through the good offices of the League Economic Organisation at the request of the Chinese Government as an expert in silk culture, with the object of developing and improving conditions in the silk industry. He acts as technical adviser to the National Economic Council in this connection.

The National Economic Council of China has frequently called upon the Communications and Transit Organisation of the League in connection with its work. The representatives of the Transit Organisation have advised the Chinese Government on road questions, the conservancy of waterways and irrigation, and their co-ordinating activities in connection with these different matters have been of considerable value.

In 1935, the Communications and Transit Organisation, at the Chinese Government's request, applied to certain experts with special qualifications on various questions of capital importance for China. A mission of four experts appointed by the Communications and Transit Organisation made a careful preliminary study of the problems submitted to it, subsequently proceeding to China, where they remained from December 1934 to the spring of 1935 and were able to obtain indispensable data with a view to subsequent technical consideration. With the aid of a fifth expert, who had already been associated with the preliminary studies, a voluminous report was prepared on the basis of individual drafts by the experts specially assigned to the study of the different problems treated—viz., the Hwai River

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

508

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 11

regulation scheme, waterways of northern China, work on the Fen Ho, scheme for regulation of the Hsia Chieng Ho, regulation of the Yellow River, Kuang Ting reservoir on the Yung Ting Ho, problems arising in connection with the Yangtse Kiang, water-power in Shensi, irrigation on the Suiyau, and the general problem of road and land communications in China.

M. Bourdrez (Netherlands) of the Transit Organisation, who has been in China since the beginning of 1932, is at the service of the National Economic Council as an expert on water-power problems, in particular in connection with river regulation schemes.

Following on last year's mission sent to China, to which reference has been made above, the Chairman of the Advisory and Technical Committee on Communications and Transit took steps to improve the co-ordination on the spot of the work in application of the experts' different recommendations and their execution by the Chinese authorities by appointing one of his experts, M. Coursin, Chief Engineer of the French Ponts et Chaussées Department and Director of Public Works in Madagascar, to proceed again to China as the representative of the Committee with the National Economic Council. M. Coursin left in November 1935. His mission will terminate on October 15th, 1936. He is to spend the last few months of his mission in Europe in order to furnish the Chairman of the Advisory and Technical Committee on Communications and Transit with any observations or suggestions of value which he may have to make for the continuance of the work of co-operation between the Transit Organisation and the Chinese Government.

Co-operation with the Health Organisation—which was intended to be followed later by co-operation with the other technical organisations—was first requested by the Chinese Government at the end of 1929 and was agreed to by the Council in May 1930. The result has been a series of practical achievements by the Nanking central authorities, the Health Organisation having been represented from May 1930 down to the end of 1934 by Dr. B. Borcia, who, during this period, collaborated actively in the technical work of the Health Administration.

Dr. A. Stampar, Honorary Director of Public Health in Yugoslavia and a former member of the League of Nations Health Committee, was also placed at the disposal of the National Economic Council and the Health Administration of China in September 1933, in accordance with the new plan of co-operation inaugurated by the decision of the Committee of the Council on July 18th, 1933. He has been called upon to co-operate with the National Economic Council in the matter of rural reconstruction.

At that time, the National Economic Council had decided to concentrate its efforts, particularly in the matter of general reconstruction, on two regions, one in the north-west (Shansi and Kansu) and the other in Kiangsi. These two regions were selected partly on account of agricultural distress, some of the main causes of which were infectious diseases among human beings and animals, particularly in the north-west. As far back as November 1933, Dr. Stampar began to study the health situation in these provinces on the spot. Up to the end of 1935 he had studied from a technical aspect Kiangsi, Hunan, Szechuan, Kwangsi, Yunnan, Fukien, Ninghsia, Chinghai, Kansu, Shensi, Chahar, Suiyuan, Hopei and Hokonor.

At the request of its Chinese member, the China Committee of the Council decided upon extending the plan of technical co-operation in a new direction:

the Chinese National Economic Council attaches great importance to opportunities for its own specialists to gain first-hand knowledge of how problems of reconstruction, finance, health, waterways, etc., are handled in day-to-day practice in other countries. For this purpose, it wishes to send selected specialists abroad under the plan of co-operation with the League. These specialists would utilise the machinery of the technical organisations and Secretariat to obtain the experience and insight into administration and reconstruction work in other countries. The necessary arrangements will be made by the Chinese Government in agreement with the Secretary-General. The specialists, who will rank as temporary members of the Secretariat for the purpose, will be given the facilities they require, both at Geneva, where a good deal of information on these matters is available in the archives of the Secretariat and the International Labour Office, and in whatever countries afford the best opportunities for study of the subjects chosen, and to which these Chinese specialists could be sent on temporary missions after a preliminary stay at the Secretariat and according to a plan to be worked out by the Secretariat.

MR. SUBHAS BOSE'S STATEMENT.

"Since I received the letter of the British Consul at Vienna, I have been deliberating as to what I should do in such circumstances and have also been in consultation with some Indian and European friends, including that great lover of India, M. Romain Rolland. Most of them have expressed the opinion that it would be futile to court imprisonment at this stage when the Congress had openly given up civil disobedience and they think that I could be of some service to our cause by remaining a free man outside India. They have also expressed concern that my health which has improved greatly since coming to Europe but which is still far from satisfactory—may again receive a severe setback as a result of incarceration, from which it may be difficult to recover. A further consideration has been urged—namely, that since the suspension of the civil disobedience movement Congressmen have not in many cases been defying official orders calculated to restrict their liberty.

These are weighty arguments, but after giving them the consideration that they deserve, I have been forced to the conclusion that I should adhere to my previous resolve to return home in order to attend the ensuing session of the Lucknow Congress. In coming to this conclusion, I have ignored altogether all personal considerations and have viewed the matter entirely from the point of view of national interest and national duty. If I had felt that I could be of some substantial service to our cause while remaining outside India, I would certainly have postponed my return—in spite of the risk of being misunderstood at home. But I feel that in the present circumstances I cannot render my substantial service to our cause while remaining in Europe."

"If I had either sufficient funds at my disposal or sufficient backing from the Congress—my public utility during my stay in Europe would have been much greater than at present. But the executors of the Patel Fund, for reasons which are best known to them, have been sitting tight over that money and the Working Committee of the Congress have declined to vest me with any representative capacity. Though I have during the last three years endeavoured to advance the cause of India in spite of such difficulties, I have felt that my achievement has been far less than what it should have been; and if I were to continue my stay in Europe, my achievement is not likely to be greater than in the past."

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

509

In these circumstances, my place is among my countrymen at home. No doubt, the prospect regarding my health in the event of my renewed incarceration is a gloomy one—but that is a prospect which a public man in India will always have to face. There only remains the consideration whether I should defy an official order at a time when civil disobedience as a weapon of mass struggle has been suspended. Official interference with elementary human rights should never be taken lying down. The order (or threat) of the Government of India is a most outrageous one—because when given effect to it will be not only a case of imprisonment without trial but also a case of imprisonment in anticipation of political activity."

I would be doing a distinct disservice to the public cause I have endeavoured to serve during the last 15 years if I were to submit to such a threat.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Geetwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navaari, Mohana Dabholi, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (M.M.)
Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co., Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dasabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M. S. C. L.,
(Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co. Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Marattal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Manilal Balabhai Nanavati, B. A., LL. B., A. M. Poo Baroda.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year, will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents.

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,
2-26

realpatidar.com

(Established 7th September 1908.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheikh Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches :—

Capital Subscribed	Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up	" 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund	" 1,04,00,000
London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

 Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application. The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY.

Manager.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmednagar)
Isampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District Wai)
Karar " " "	Khandesh)
Kasgaon " " "	Doodatcha " " "
Satara " " "	Nandurbar " " "
Kirloskarwadi (" " "	Shirpur " " "
Shirala " " "	Shahada " " "
Koregaon " " "	Sakri " " "
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Sindheda " " "
Shevgaon " " "	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Ahmednagar " " "	Satana " " "
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Kaiwan " " "
Paigar " " "	Dohad (District Panchmahals)
Kalyan " " "	Kaloi " " "
Aklul (District Sholapur)

Sir Chunnilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,
 Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,
 Madhowsjee D. Thackersey, Esq.,
 R. G. Sarlaja, Esq.,
 G. P. Murchishwar, Esq.,
 S. N. Keshvain, Esq.,
 Prof. V. G. Kale,
 R. N. Rajendra, Esq.,
 A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
 D. W. Bant, Esq.,
 F. B. Laxmishwar, Esq.,
 C. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
 Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
 V. L. Mehta, Esq.

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,000

1 DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.
For Copies Apply to:—
The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi Bldg. use,
Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

511

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore
DRESS and SARI
Fabrics

MYSCORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours are permanent, fast to sun and soap. And, because they are essentially Indian, they cost far less than silks of foreign manufacture.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.
Leading Stockists:—
1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 348.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :- KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor :- K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY APRIL 18, 1936. No. 33

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice : I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The New Viceroy.
The Moslem League.
The Lucknow Congress.
The Indian Problem.
The Buddha and Miracles.
Untouchability and Sikhism.
Lord Willingdon's Administration.
Hindu Women's Disabilities.

Sir Ramakrishna Centenary.
America Faces the East.
Dewan Bahadur Raghunatha Rao.
More Working Committee Resolutions.
Untouchable Lincoln.
A Movement for World Christianity.

NOTES

The New Viceroy:—The Marquis of Linlithgow with his family landed in Bombay yesterday morning and left the same evening for New Delhi where he will enter on the duties of his office on Lord Willingdon's departure by the English Mail steamer this afternoon. They have the good wishes of the Indian people for their health and happiness during their sojourn in this land. Lord Linlithgow may be reminded that he starts his Indian career with the great handicap of having been one of the principal architects of the new Reforms Scheme which the whole country regards as an affront to Indian intelligence. There can be no two opinions about it. The President of the Moslem League condemned it as strongly as the President of the National Congress. Liberal leaders have been no less emphatic in their disapproval. That Parliament has sanctioned it does not make the scheme better or more acceptable. There is not a single representative of India in the British Parliament. Besides, Parliament has been responsible for many blunders and injustices to India in the past. The people of Great Britain who elected the Parliament and who have the opportunity of electing its successor, may accept a wrong measure in the hope of having it righted by their representatives in a later Parliament. The Indian people can entertain no such hope. They are, therefore, bound to exert their utmost to create a situation in this country, which will be felt by the British electors as needing their intervention. In some ways, therefore, it is rather a disadvantage than an advantage that Lord Linlithgow has been so closely associated with the enactment of this highly obnoxious measure. How far he will be successful in reconciling the Indian public to the humiliation of having this Act thrust on them, will depend to a large extent on how far he is able to dissociate himself from his personal share in it and to enter sympathetically into the minds of Indian leaders who are strongly opposed to it on various grounds. His Cabinet, as at present constituted, cannot help him much in this direction. In small things as in great, its members, individually and collectively, have insisted, in maintaining their own views against reason and commonsense in the face of nonofficial opposition. The refusal of the Finance Member to provide for the reconstruction of Quetta from loans and not from revenue as he wanted, is a recent glaring instance. Even on the strictest Gladstonian principle, the reconstruction of an earthquake-smitten city out of revenue, will be hard to justify. This is one instance but it is typical of the frame of mind of the Executive Council with which Lord Linlithgow will have to work. Under the regime of his easygoing predecessor the country has drifted on to dangerous shoals. Lord Willingdon managed to produce a semblance of smooth waters by methods which in their nature are liable to violent reactions. The situation, nevertheless, is not beyond the resources of wise and conciliatory statesmanship which, we trust, will be vouchsafed to Lord Linlithgow.

The Moslem League:—The Moslem League was started some 30 years ago to voice the aspirations of Indian Muslims to consolidate their position as a distinct community and to have it recognised and safeguarded as such in any political constitution that may be conferred on India. It was to a deputation of the Moslem League that Lord Minto promised that, in the franchise proposals of Government, religious belief would be an essential consideration. The Lucknow Pact between the National Congress and the Moslem League by which the former withdrew its opposition to communal electorates and agreed upon the distribution of seats in the Legislatures in a certain proportion, was the League's second great achievement. This Pact was adopted as the basis of the electoral scheme of the Montagu Chelmsford reforms in 1919. Then came the Khilafat movement and the close alliance between the National Congress and that movement. The alliance was dissolved and was succeeded by a period of the bitter antagonism of alienated confederates, on the publication of the Nehru Committee's Report the provision made for Muslim representation in which was considerate inadequate. Congress thereupon put aside the Report and several attempts were subsequently made to find a basis for unity between Congress and the League. These were unsuccessful.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 18

ful. The scene then shifted to the Round Table Conference in London. In the discussions at the first Conference fundamental differences emerged between the viewpoints of Mr. Jinnah and of the group led by His Highness the Aga Khan. In the second Conference Mr. Jinnah was dropped and the Moslem side was represented by the Aga Khan group. This was surprising as practically all the fourteen points of Mr. Jinnah were adopted as their own by the Aga Khan's group and most of them have since been given effect to in the Hoare scheme. The main point of difference between the two side centers round the Federation. Mr. Jinnah is uncompromisingly opposed to Federation on the lines proposed, as he fears that most of the States will constitute a permanent obstacle to political progress under the new Constitution. For a time it seemed as if the Aga Khan group had carried the Muslim community with it. Mr. Jinnah seemed to be isolated. He was only biding his time. There has recently been a shift towards his point of view and the meeting of the League held in Bombay was a personal triumph. According to the constitution of the League, Mr. Jinnah occupies the position of permanent President. Chairmen are elected for each session but the policy of the League is in the hands of the permanent President. The Chairman at the session held in Bombay last week was Sir Wazir Hasan, retired Judicial Commissioner of Oudh. In his address he condemned the reforms but counselled their acceptance, and suggested that the Congress President and the permanent President of the League should convene a Conference of leading Indians to frame a more acceptable constitution. He also indicated some heads of subjects on which united action in the Legislatures would be possible between the Moslem League and Congress members. But the most significant passage in his address was a casual observation that India consisted of two nations, the Muslims one and, we suppose, all the rest of the population, the other. If Sir Wazir prefers to call the Muslims a nation instead of a community, he is entitled to please himself; but, in that case, there is no reason why Christians, Parsis and Jews not to mention Sikhs and Arya Samajists, Sunnis and Shias, Qadians and Khojas should not also be called nations. Only the word 'nation' will have to be interpreted in a sense altogether different from that commonly attached to it. That the future of the country can be settled by a Hindu-Moslem Pact is a great delusion. Hindus at least are in honour bound to secure for the smaller minorities, which sought shelter in India relying on their toleration, equal rights with the largest minority.

The Lucknow Congress :—The dust and din of the Congress session at Lucknow should be allowed time to subside before a judgment could be formed as to how far and in what way that body has been affected by the conflict of ideals which found expression in its discussions. Today we must be content with some general observations on the address of the President, Pandit Jawharlal Nehru. It is a remarkable pronouncement much—not "somewhat" as the President himself said—out of the beat of presidential addresses. We earnestly trust that neither the length nor the frank avowal of the Pandit that he was a Socialist and believed that Socialism was the only remedy for India's and the world's ills, will deter any considerable number of the public from perusing it with the attention which it merits. Apart from the views expressed, the address is interesting for the revelation it affords of an intense and eager personality. With Pandit Jawharlal Nehru's insistence that the problem of India is part of the world problem and can be understood rightly only in relation to it, we are in complete agreement. For one thing, we are liable for want of knowledge of the outside world to regard our problems as unique and insoluble. The fact, however, is that every one of our problems has a counterpart in other countries and nations. But we differ from the Pandit in his view that the masses everywhere are pressing to take their destinies into their own hands. On the contrary, it seems to us that the masses are disillusioned regarding the power of the vote and are only too willing to place themselves under a Dictatorship which assures them of their daily bread. How otherwise can we explain the enthusiasm of so educated a people as the Germans for Herr Hitler or the unquestioning obedience rendered to Signor Mussolini by so artistic a people as the Italians? The nineteenth century aphorism of progress being from status to contract is being reversed. The nations are now progressing back from contract to status, most of all in Soviet Russia. Pandit Jawharlal has some fixed notions about the upper and lower middle classes and the masses, which however true of Western society, leaves out of account the powerful influence of caste and community in India, based not on economic conditions but on heredity, belief, occupation. The Soviet Republic has some great achievements to its credit but it is only twenty years old as yet and to hold it up as a model for an ancient society like ours, is a bit temerarious. Trotsky himself in his history of the Russian Revolution points out that the ancient civilizations of Egypt, India and China had a character self-sufficient enough, and they had time enough at their disposal, to bring their social relations, in spite of low productive powers, almost to the same detailed completion to which their craftsmen brought up the products of their craft. In other words, what Revolution was needed to achieve in Russia, was long ago achieved by normal processes in these ancient societies.

The Indian Problem :—The problem of India, as we see it, is largely to preserve such of the old values as exist and to recreate those which have been lost in the vicissitudes through which we have passed. They have, at the least, a survival value. They have helped us to outlive our misfortunes. We do not say that we should not seek after and secure new values. By all means, let us do so but let us not sacrifice those which we have under the impression that they are useless because they are not modern. The Pandit dislikes what he calls "vested interests." It is quite possible that they may and often do become dangerous to society if allowed to outgrow their legitimate limits but their existence is necessary to every stable society. Without them no man can go out to his work in the morning with the certainty of finding a roof over his head in the evening when he returns to rest and recuperate for the next day's toil. Babu Rajendra Prasad is reported to have remarked that the Pandit's views were derived from books. That is not a matter for criticism. The late Pandit Motilal Nehru once remarked that non-cooperators had non-cooperated with books, making immediately an exception of his son. We really think that Congress might have avoided some of its more glaring mistakes if its leaders were not so entirely dependent on their personal impressions. Many problems of the day are as old as the hills and, at least to economise errors, we do well to acquaint ourselves with what was done or left undone by those who went before us. Pandit Jawharlal should read the writings of Ranade in order to get the right perspective of the Indian problem in all its aspects. The temper of the Indian masses is reformist, not evolutionary. One word more. The smallest insect which crawls on earth, Momm-sen wrote, is far more wonderful than the most intricate machine, because the former is self-directing which the latter is not. A living society, to our mind, has the power to adapt itself to every change of environment. Planning presupposes that the thing to be planned for, has no life of its own. If it has, it has first to be killed before the plan would work. This, to our mind, is the root objection not only to Fascism and Nazism but also to Sovietism. We should add that the presence of Pandit Jawharlal at its head is a great asset to the Congress. Opinions change but character abides. A man of transparent sincerity, unflinching courage, and high ideals, the great political organisation has a worthy guide in him during the next twelve months. He is sure to make mistakes as greater men have done before him. But in the economy of life, honest mistakes are as valuable as inspired victories.

The Buddha and Miracles:—The Venerable Bhikku Mettaya whose informing article on "The Buddha's Way" we published last week, has misunderstood our remark that the Buddha's method was "to change the mental attitude of sufferers and not their material condition." In the article in which that remark was made, we were writing about miracles said to be performed by great religious Teachers. The Bhikku gives instances showing that the Buddha was not unconcerned about the sufferings of his people. We did not say he was. But the means which he used to relieve them, was not by way of miracle. In the case of the indigent Brahmin, Bharadwaja, referred to by the Bhikku, the Buddha took him to the King who relieved his wants, and did not himself feed and clothe him miraculously out of nothing. It is not the function of a religious Teacher to correct the economic inequalities of society. That can be done by others, as shown in Mr. Masani's "Soviet Side-lights" a review of which we published in the same R. former. To cure a patient of malaria, to take an instance, by administering quinine is not a miracle, though Christian Missions seem to think that it is a proof of the truths of Christianity. Gautama Buddha did not make this mistake. The Bhikku also cites authorities showing that, during the time when Buddhism was the dominant religion, India prospered and the people were virtuous and happy. There is nothing strange in that. Jesus also taught that if the people sought the Kingdom of Heaven all their material wants will be added unto them. Economic inequalities are, in the ultimate analysis, due to inappreciation of ethical values in a community; and moral reform is the only sure method of social reform. The mistake of many Socialists and Communists is to assign to the ethical and spiritual a lower position than to the economic and material aspects of society, in their schemes of social reform. Christian Socialism avoids this mistake but its basis is not wide enough to make it acceptable to all communities. A nation which is guided by religious and moral principles in all its affairs may not be the richest or the most powerful nation on earth, but it will not lack in the essentials of true happiness.

Untouchability and Sikhism:—An Associated Press Message says: "Before the commencement of the All-India Sikh Missionary Conference on the 12th April at Bagh Akalian 50 untouchables, including five leaders of the Thiya community of Kerala, embraced Sikhism at Akal Takht and were given Sikh names and kirpans or swords. Jagadguru Shankaracharya of Nasik had sent a message blessing the conference and saying that he preferred the untouchables' conversion to the Sikh faith to conversion to other religions. Dr. Ambedkar in a short speech said that all communities were agitated over the problem of untouchables who were tired of social iniquities and had decided to desert Hinduism. He could not say about his future but he liked Sikhism. Sikhs were a self-respecting and against cast distinctions." It was first reported that Dr. Ambedkar was to be one of those who received the Sikh baptism at this date, but he seems to have given way, at the last moment, to his characteristic indecision, and contented himself with saying that he liked Sikhism but preferred for the present to suffer from the "contagious disease" called Hinduism.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 18]

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, April 18 1936.

LORD WILLINGDON'S ADMINISTRATION.

Speaking before a joint sitting of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State, Lord Willingdon referred to the principal features of his five years' administration. First of these was the situation on the North Western Frontier. He congratulated himself that during his term of office the relations between the Government of India and the countries on India's border were peaceful and friendly. "If there have been," His Excellency went on to say "some incidents on the Frontier for the solution of which military operations have been necessary, I can still claim that progress has been made towards the establishment of more settled conditions in this area. If, as I hope, our present policy of gradual penetration by consent and negotiation is quietly and consistently pursued I do not doubt that my successors in this high office will find the Frontier problem far less troublesome in the future than it has proved in the past." Lord Willingdon is not the first Viceroy to claim that he had found the right solution for the Frontier problem. Lord Curzon before him thought likewise. But the problem still remains unsolved and will not be solved except by leaving the tribes alone and adopting a purely defensive policy for guarding against inroads. "The policy of gradual penetration by consent and negotiation", in plain English, bribery and bullying, will never secure peace on the frontier with the goodwill of the tribes. We have no better reason to civilize the Frontier tribes by means of air bombs and machine guns than Signor Mussolini, to civilise Ethiopia by the same means.

Lord Willingdon turned from this topic to the position of Indians Overseas. The plain fact behind His Excellency's complacent observations is that the position of Indians Overseas has worsened in every respect during the Willingdon regime. If there has been unanimity between the Government of India and public opinion in this country, as Lord Willingdon claimed, it is largely due to responsible bodies like the Imperial Citizenship Association having more than once strained their relations with the public in order not to embarrass Government in the efforts they were supposed to be making to protect the rights of Indians in British Dominions and Colonies, not to speak of foreign countries. The results of these efforts have been practically nil. In South Africa, in East Africa, in Fiji, there has been no improvement whatever in the position of Indians. A new and sinister development during the last three years is the anti-Indian Decrees passed by the British Resident who is the virtual ruler of the Protectorate of Zanzibar. Lord Willingdon's Government made large promises but their representations, for all we know, have produced no better results than if they had never been made. His Excellency's appeal to "men of my own civilization" to remove the disabilities of Indians, he knows very well, will have no more effect than the appeal of a far more powerful statesman, Joseph Chamberlain, thirty years ago. Under this head, therefore, the achievements during the Willingdon quinquennium have been less than nothing.

His Excellency next dwelt on unemployment and education. He praised the report of the Sapru Committee which, judging from his observations, he had perused only perfunctorily. That Report emphasises the failure of Government to do their part in opening avenues of employment as the main cause of unemployment. Lord Willingdon passed over this part of the Report without remark and fastened upon the Committee's somewhat superficial criticisms of the Indian educational system. On this subject he spoke with two voices. He deprecated approaching the educational question from the point of view of demand and supply; and, in the same sentence, he stressed the necessity of facing the unpleasant fact that "we have here a supply of young men for whose services there is no effective demand." It is obvious that in this part of his address he did not quite know what he had to say. Lord Willingdon warned his audience not to deceive itself with the hope that development along present lines will absorb the output of our schools and colleges in responsible positions. This output is ridiculously low compared to that in other countries. The main reason why, small as it is, it can not be absorbed in responsible positions, is that responsible positions are largely absorbed by men—and also nowadays women—of Lord Willingdon's civilization. In every other country, the first measure adopted to reduce unemployment was to prohibit the employment of non-nationals in positions for which qualified nationals were available. This is not the occasion to enlarge on this aspect of the problem. The Central Board of Education, to which His Excellency pointed as his contribution to the solution of the educational and unemployment problems, is not likely to survive long after His Excellency's departure.

Lord Willingdon's reference to the work of the Council of Agricultural Research was commendably brief. The article on "the New Russian Peasant," which we reproduced from Current History in the Reformer of April 4, contained a reference to the cultivation of a perennial wheat in one of the experimental farms in Siberia. These experimental stations are scattered far and wide so that the results of research are immediately available to the farmers who, indeed, are in close touch with the process at all stages. We are not very conversant with the achievements of the Imperial Council of Agricultural

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

517

Research. But one feature of its mode of operation has struck us as somewhat surprising. The members of the Council appear to do their Research mostly in railway trains, travelling from Simla to Coimbatore, from New Delhi to Shillong. No doubt this is intended to "co-ordinate" Agricultural Research with the development of Railway revenue. One peculiarity of the Indian administration is, if there are two ways of doing a thing, one expensive and wasteful, and the other, economical of both time and money, our rulers instinctively prefer the former to the latter. The establishment of the Council has had one good result. It has stopped the importation of ignorant "experts" who imported iron ploughs which Indian bullocks could not draw and, then, brought British bulls, which died in one season, to do the work. The next attempt to produce a new breed by intercrossing also proved a failure. The hybrids were susceptible to the diseases of both parents. This kind of Research has been mitigated by the Imperial Council of Agricultural Research. But that the Council is more actuated by Imperial than by Agricultural purposes, was evident from the reasons urged in support of the transfer of the Central Research Institute from Pusa to Delhi.

We now come to the central feature of Lord Willingdon's administration, the repressive measures, detentions of suspects, ordinances and emergency laws. His Excellency expressed his hope that terrorist outrages have been checked, though he thought that certain incidents during the last six months (when there has been no serious outrage) went to show that the movement and the spirit behind it still persisted. Has Lord Willingdon known any country in which terrorism was permanently smashed by deportations and detentions? We commend to His Excellency's contemplation during his voyage home the following passage from the "Recollections" of one of the leaders of his own Liberal Party, from a letter written by him to the then Viceroy, 26 years ago. "You have nine men locked up a year ago by letter de cachet," wrote Lord Morley, "because you believed them to be criminally connected with criminal plots, and because you expected their arrest to check these plots. For a certain time it looked as if the coup were effective and was justified by the results. In all this, I think we were perfectly right. Then you come by and by upon what you regard as a great anarchist conspiracy for sedition and murder, and you warn me that you may soon apply to me for sanction for further arbitrary arrest and detention on a large scale. I ask, whether this process implies that through the nine detenus you have found out a murder plot contrived not by them but by other people. You say: "We admit that being locked up they can have had no share in these new abominations; but their continued detention will frighten evil doers generally." That's the Russian argument: by packing off trainloads to Siberia we'll terrify the anarchists out of their wits, and all will come out right. That policy did not work out brilliantly in Russia." If Lord Morley had been living now he would have been able to find overpowering reinforcement for his Russian argument in what has happened during the last twenty years. He would have been able likewise to enforce his argument drawn from his experience of the result of "twenty years of resolute government" in Ireland, which was to have made Ireland enamoured of the British connection. When Lord Willingdon says that the terrorist movement and the spirit behind it still persist, although there are now not 9 but 1400 men and women under lock and key, we do not wonder, because the course of history is not deflected by latitudes and longitudes.

Neither have the measures adopted against the Civil Disobedience Movement, succeeded in convincing those who believed in it of its futility. Lord Willingdon said that he and his Government had to use the full resources of the State in fighting and defeating the movement. The Working Committee of the Congress in its draft resolution on repressive measures, recognised that these measures were the measure of the strength and success of India's struggle for freedom (Reformer April 4.). Lord Willingdon's acknowledgment that his Government had to use the full resources of the State to defeat the Civil Disobedience Movement, confirms the Working Committee's estimate. Was it wise, was it statesmanlike to exhaust the full resources of the State in putting down a non-violent movement, which drew its strength from, if it did not originate in, the inordinate delay and subsequent whittling down of solemn pledges made to the people of India to place their Government on the same footing as the Dominions? The direct consequence of this delay and denial was the declaration of independence as its goal by the National Congress. Among the many profound reflections strewn about in Santayana's remarkable story "The Last Puritan", is one which is as applicable to the sphere of government as to other spheres. "The secret of control", writes this philosopher novelist "is suggestion not force." Lord Willingdon left nothing to suggestion. He exhausted the full resources of the State in fighting a movement which would have been dissipated by timely reform in conformity with the pledges made of responsible government. The resources of the State having been exhausted, there is nothing left to his successors when the crisis comes next. Lord Willingdon in this as in other matters leaves a legacy to his successors for which they will not feel grateful to him.

We have little space left to comment adequately on the highly imaginative observations which His Excellency made regarding the economic recovery of the country during his regime. He referred to the rise in the price of Government loans as a sign of this recovery. People who are in the best position to know and have no interest in distorting facts, maintain that the rise in the prices of Government loans is the result

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

518
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 18

not of prosperity but of industrial depression which has greatly narrowed the field of investment. They also think that the habit of hoarding is being resumed. As for the budget surplus it is one of which the Government of India should rather be ashamed than proud of in view of the almost universal provincial deficits. By starving the country still more a larger surplus may be shown but that will only show that a budget surplus is not necessarily the same thing as national prosperity.

HINDU WOMEN'S DISABILITIES.*

H. H. THE MAHARANI OF BARODA.

According to Hindu Law the Joint Family comprises only the male members of the family; a woman is not a co-parcener, but a mere dependant, with no rights of ownership in the joint property; and when she has the misfortune to become a widow she is entitled only to maintenance and residence. The woman, therefore, upon whom her husband and her children have had to depend so largely for their welfare, is, when her husband dies, left not only probably disconsolate but definitely degraded. It is one thing to be dependent upon one's husband; it is quite another to be dependent upon one's husband's relatives. Believe me, I do not speak without knowledge or these things. My personal experience has made me only too painfully aware of the misery which some women endure because the hand of the law is against them. They have come to me with their trouble; I have seen their unhappiness, and felt it as my own; I have felt helpless before their helplessness. And so it is that I plead with you to-day to do your utmost to see that the lot of the women in this country, your women, is legally improved so that they may hold up their heads confidently in the society for the happiness of which they are so largely responsible.

The condition of the widow is unhappy enough; but it is a haven of security compared with that of a widowed daughter-in-law; for the law lays no obligation on the father to maintain his son's widow even though the law knows well enough that it is almost invariably the father who is solely responsible for the marriage of his son. Any number of legal inhibitions based on moral and religious grounds, exist to prevent a widow doing this or that, notably in the code governing adoption; and yet a father-in-law, who is obviously morally responsible for his son's marriage need not, unless he feels so inclined, accept the responsibility in its wider application when his son dies leaving a widow. Only when the estate passes to the heirs of the father does the widowed daughter-in-law become entitled to maintenance from them! There are other ramifications of this law to which I do not think it necessary to refer. I have said enough, I should hope, to show that there is a definite instance of the failure of the law to satisfy those moral standards according to which it professes to measure itself. I am glad that you, Mr. Principal, in your commentary upon this particular point of law have stressed the only-too-obvious truth that it offends not only against the spirit of a Hindu family, but against the principles of justice and equity.

You will not wonder that now I suggest to you that, if law is to maintain those principles of justice and equity, if it is not to lag stupidly behind in the progress of civilisation, some changes must be made in the law governing the aspects of the joint family system I have cited. First, a widow must be raised from that degrading position in which the receipt of maintenance from the joint family puts her; and it seems to me that the only way in which this can be accomplished is by making the widow of a deceased co-parcener, a co-parcener herself. So she would enjoy all those rights which are at the present time enjoyed only by the male members of a Joint Hindu Family. This would give her the most important right of asking for a partition of the joint property. As the law stands, she can only have a share when a division of property is made among her sons; she is not herself entitled to ask for a partition. I know the kind of argument which is brought against this reform,—that it will jeopardize the security of the joint-holding so that the security which the joint holding of property is designed to give will no longer be well founded. But such an argument is that of a reactionary, a die-hard, and not reasonable, since there is no reason to suppose that a widow will wantonly ask for a partition which she knows would lessen the value of the joint holding any more than a man. With the acquiring of the status of a co-parcener, she should also I think, acquire the sense of co-parcener's responsibility. There is no reason to suppose that the suggestion I have made, while it would undoubtedly much improve the status of widows in our society, would constitute anything but a gain to that society.

I come next to consider the law of inheritance, as it affects the position of a widow with regard to the self-acquired property of her husband. The law allows the widow to inherit only when there are no sons, grandsons, or great-grandsons to whom the property may descend. For those who think that the present right of the widow to maintenance at the hands of the Joint Family is equitable, the descent of all property of her husband to the male members of the family will seem meet and right. But a just view will see that the widow has an even stronger claim to rights of inheritance equal with those of her son, grandson, or great-grandson, where the property in question was the separate possession of her husband, than she has to be a co-parcener. Only the most jaundiced eye would refuse to see the undeniable claim of a widow to inherit her husband's private property equally with her son, or that son's son. The plea is not for mercy but for justice.

There are many other aspects of this matter which need attention, but enumeration of them would weary you, and I do not wish to try your patience too much. But one other point I must mention, and that is the right of a woman to alienate property. I know that quite a number of men learned in the law regard a woman as being quite well off in this respect, in that she can do what she likes with her Stridhana. In practice, that rarely happens. But even if it did, a woman's Stridhana is relatively only very small; and she has only a limited interest in all other property that may have come to her, and is unable to alienate it except for certain purposes recognised by law; such property descending after her death not to her heirs but to the heirs of the last male owner. It is to those to whom you owe much of what you are to-day, those who are dear to you that you say, with Manu, that they are well off since they have some control over their Stridhana, which magnificent heritage, as you well know, more often than not consists in nothing but a few trumpery, tawdry bits of jewellery. It is clear that the reforms I have already adumbrated would not be complete in their full intent if the right of alienation were withheld in respect of all property except Stridhana. I will not specify details of any

*Extract from address at the opening of Saraswathi Hall, Law College, Poona, 6th April.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

519

such alteration in the law, but will content myself with pointing out the necessity for such alteration. The effect of these suggested reforms in the law of property as it applies to Hindu women, will have an influence far beyond their immediate sphere as, for example, when they are considered in conjunction with the right of a woman to ask for divorce. They do, indeed, form an integral part of that general movement for the amelioration of the condition of the women of this country, a movement which every one who is not bigoted must do his best to help towards its goal. I need not, I hope, urge you, the youth of this country upon whose shoulders rests the precious burden of improving the condition of its people, who are engaged in the academic study of law in this College, to give your serious consideration to the substance and implication of what I have said to you to-day. And yet I wonder. Academic study often, I think, tends to obscure the real, the living issues; and, as I suppose you have gathered by now, I lock upon law as a very real issue in the lives of the women in India to-day. You are students studying in an academy; but the faces I see before me are young faces, and the minds behind them are, I imagine young minds. Why, then, do you allow your minds to be manacled and led captive, as it were, by laws which were made for a society which differed from our own as much as chalk differs from cheese? Manu and the rest of them made excellent laws for their own times perhaps. But why should you take them as a final pronouncement? Are they the will of God? Indeed, no; they are the statements of men's thoughts or their prejudices. Indeed, when I think of the laws they made against women, they seem to write like men who have been bitten by some serpent, so poisonous is their attitude. Their laws seem almost to breathe hatred for us. How can I help thinking so when the law from birth to death makes a woman subordinate, stifles her so to speak, in the cradle; and then says thus and thus shalt thou live? Live? The word in their mouths mocks us; for how can a human being live when she is deprived of any vestige of freedom from the beginning? First we must bow before our fathers, then our husbands, then our husbands' relatives; and then when we have escaped from all these bonds, we are, wards of the king, if you please. Does that strike you as a just state of affairs? Would you tamely sit down under a system of law that does not allow you even to call your soul your own? Is that true law or, true religion, do you think? I am sure you do not; you cannot be so dull of soul that you will pass these things by without more than a twinge of conscience. For these laws govern the women who are your mothers, your sisters, your wives. I want to ask, have you so poor an opinion of your own worth, your own intelligence, that you think yourselves incapable of improving on Manu and the like? I do not blame Manu, for after all, it may be that he honestly did his best according to his lights. But those lights burn dim in twentieth-century India. It is you who must trim the lamps if we are to see clearly, if we are to see justice enshrined in the law. You are every whit as capable of making laws as Manu was; and you are better off than he was, since you are able to study the wisdom that has been bred since he lived. Will you not take the torch in your hands and light us on the road to a better, a more equitable world?

Women and Council of State :—A regulation has been made that no woman, who is not by reason of her sex, disqualified for election as member of the Legislative Council of the Governor's Province shall, by reason only of her sex, be disqualified for election to the Council of State by any constituency in that Province.

SHRI RAMAKRISHNA CENTENARY.

(MR. S. S. PATKAR.)

Shri Ramakrishna Paramhansa was born on 18th February 1836. The Ramkrishna Centenary celebrations will extend for one year from February 1936. The centenary will be celebrated not only in the whole of India but in many other parts of the world. The basic principle of his teachings, that every faith is a path to God, is likely to eliminate the causes of friction between different classes and communities, and is sure to lead to a closer bond of friendship between persons belonging to different creeds and religions. In celebrating the centenary of a great apostle of religious culture, the organisers have laid special emphasis on the cultural union of the East and the West.

The scheme of the celebrations is to create permanent memorials of different categories, humanitarian, cultural, literary, aesthetic and religious. The pamphlets will give a detailed description of the activities sought to be pursued as permanent memorials of the departed saint. It is intended to create a nucleus of the central fund for relief work during flood, famine and pestilence and for mass education, to establish an institution of cultural fellowship, to publish a Centenary memorial volume and a centenary album, to raise a suitable memorial at the birth-place of the saint and to hold religious conventions and conferences. In this age of scepticism and rampant materialism, the shining example of a living faith which would give solace to and relieve mental distress of suffering humanity, requires to be placed prominently and constantly before the public gaze. It is alike the duty and interest of patriotic as well as religiously minded Indians to contribute to the realization of the cherished objects of these centenary celebrations.

It would be appropriate on this occasion to refer briefly to a few salient points relating to the life and teachings of Shri Ramakrishna Paramhansa.

The basic principles of Shri Ramkrishna's teachings summed up in his message, "As many faiths, so many paths", is calculated to lead to a better understanding among the communities belonging to different religions not only in this country but in the whole world. It is said by some responsible critics that religion is the cause of all friction and misunderstanding among the different communities belonging to diverse creeds. It is urged that crusades, war, inquisitions, riots and various other strifes and conflicts can be traced to religious proclivities and prejudices, and it is seriously suggested that religion should be done away with altogether if conditions of lasting peace and complete harmony are desired to be established. This is neither the place, time nor the occasion to enter into an elaborate controversy on this point. It would be recognized even by such critics that notions of morality based on truth, equality and justice must regulate human conduct in order to tame the brute in man and to preserve individual liberty and freedom. The fundamentals of all religions are based on eternal truths and principles of morality. The basic principles inculcated by all religions are identical. It is the dogmas and the interpretations put on religious precepts by priests and persons in religious hierarchies that lead to strife and conflict. As observed by Sir Francis Younghusband at the London celebration of Shri Ramakrishna Paramhansa the message "As many faiths, so many paths" did not advocate mere tolerance but insisted on the acceptance of the tenets of other faiths in their entirety, and that all religious faiths led in their ultimate consummation to the same realisation.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

520
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 18]

The events in the life of Shri Ramakrishna Paramahansa forcibly illustrate the same truth. Under the guidance of Bhairavi whom the saint adopted as his guru or teacher, he attained union with God by love or Bhakti. When later on he came under the influence of Totapuri, he learnt the cardinal virtues of the Advaita Vedanta. Shortly afterwards Shri Ramakrishna saw a humble Mahomedan, absorbed in his prayers, asked him to initiate him, and realised the Mussalman God. Romain Rolland observes: "His expositors have later interpreted this experience following as it did immediately upon his great ecstasy in the Absolute, in a very important sense for India, that Mussalmans and Hindus can only be reunited on the basis of the Advaita, the formless God."

Some years later Shri Ramakrishna realised Christianity. When Malik read the Bible to him, the life of Jesus secretly pervaded him and he saw on the wall a picture representing the Madonna and the child, and subsequently visualised the figures as animated by life and motion. Whatever may be the scientific explanation of these phenomena, the message of Shri Ramakrishna is pregnant with great potentialities for the unity and peace not only of this country but the whole world. He observed: "I have practised all religions, Hinduism, Islam, Christianity and I have followed the paths of the different Hindu sects. I have found that it is the same God towards whom all are directing their steps though along different paths".

The criticism has sometimes been levelled that the conduct of a Hindu in the journey of life from its inception to its end is regulated by religious precepts, that more attention is paid to the requirements of the ancestors in heaven and to the obligations necessary to secure eternal bliss after death, and adequate attention is not paid to the alleviation of the suffering of the living. Some of the incidents in Shri Ramakrishna's life point to his earnest solicitude for the relief of distress of suffering humanity. When Shri Ramakrishna went with his rich companion Mathur Babu to Deoghar during a famine, he compelled his companion to feed the persons dying of hunger, and on another occasion forced Mathur to remit the dues from the tenants of his estate. The western ideal of putting deeds before intentions and the good of others before individual emancipation or salvation, was carried out by Shri Ramakrishna's disciple, Vivekanand, to whom he entrusted the mission of alleviating the misery of the humble and the poor.

The life and teachings of Shri Ramakrishna constitute a rich heritage to this country especially as they are absolutely free from any taint of sectarianism and fervently appeal to a harmonious unity of all faiths and creeds. In the present stage of the evolution of society such teachings require worldwide publicity. It is, therefore, the bounden duty of the patriotic as well as religiously minded Indian to contribute to the success of these centenary celebrations.

Raipur Rajkumar College:—As the public are aware, the main object of the Rajkumar College at Raipur is to train the future Rulers of States and Estates, and also to educate the younger sons and relations of Rulers and Zamindars. Better to fulfil this object while at the same time preparing the sons of other Indian gentlemen for useful careers, the Governing Body has decided to admit to the school on the 1st July, 1938, ten boys unconnected with any State or Estate. In view of the projected Federation of British India with the Indian States, where Indian Rulers and British Indians will have to learn to appreciate one another's point of view this decision of the Governing Body to widen its field of recruitment and to provide a common training ground for future leaders of the Greater India is of the happiest.

AMERICA FACES THE EAST.

(WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.)

COLORADO SCENERY.

We entered Colorado across the plains; driving toward the Rocky Mountains. There were places in the road where the elevation was in the vicinity of 7,000 feet. Pikes Peak with its 14,000 feet of height was just ahead.

The visitors usually in the section around Colorado Springs in the summer were noticeably absent. We drove about the city and discovered that one of the disastrous floods that come at certain seasons of the year in many American regions had destroyed one of the principal bridges and caused other damage which the city had not found it possible to repair, though the floods had come months before.

We drove out from Colorado Springs to the town of Manitou, and then on up to the Cave of Winds some 120 feet above the town.

The Cave was discovered by two small boys in 1880. The boys were out on a Sunday School picnic and with customary curiosity were scouting around through the hills. Since that time nineteen rooms have been discovered and opened in the limestone formation.

The peculiarities of nature are graphically illustrated in these rooms of the Cave. Without any imagination at all one can find a thousand and one objects of interest which seem to be like other manifestations of nature outside. There are temples and canopies, crystal palaces, diamond halls and even an altar. It would not do to omit a section of the Cave which is called Dante's Inferno. It reminded me of the tortures of the condemned in the picturesque Buddhist Wheel of Life, which I saw in Tibetan monasteries.

A short distance from the Cave of the Winds we went through, as we had done years before, the Garden of the Gods. In this Garden the sandstone formation has been weathered into weird shapes. Unexpected views are in this picturesque section of the foot hills of the Rocky Mountains.

In the afternoon we turned south toward Canon City and the scenic Royal Gorge. The walls of the Canon rise in places to a height of nearly 3,000 feet above the Arkansas river. Through the gorge runs a railway, part of which is carried over the river by a hanging bridge. Over the top of the gorge there is a suspension bridge, probably the highest in the world. This bridge is 1260 feet long and is located 1000 feet above the river.

In this same section of the country lies the famous Cripple Creek Mining District, which is shown to tourists more as a curiosity these days than as a profit-making series of gold mines, though one or two of the mines are still operating at deep levels.

FROM MOUNTAINS TO OPEN SPACES.

We had the unexpected opportunity of driving through five inches of snow when we left Canon City to go north past the mile-high city of Denver through the Rockies to the plains beyond.

The country roads had suffered severely from the heavy and unexpected snow fall. The snow lay deep on the green leaves of the fruit trees still bearing the fruit which had not been gathered.

We avoided on this trip some exceedingly dangerous mountain roads which we had covered on our short trip to the south. There were moments when we had thought, while traveling on the clay roads, that we would never be able to pull through. Fortunately everywhere we went we had a chance to travel on wellpaved high-ways, and what difficulty

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

521

we got into was due to our own choice of attempting short cuts over the second and third class roads.

One of the curious experiences on our Colorado trip was to be taken by a friend of ours in Canon City to his Hot Spring Sanitarium with baths of Mineral water, and to realize that coming from beneath the surface there was great heat—and health-giving power in the water; the modern application of science to human health, in an ever enlarging field of experiment and successful achievement.

We skirted the western edge of the city of Denver, found our way up across the ridge of the Rockies to Laramie, just beyond Estes Park.

At Laramie, we struck our coldest weather, with the thermometer at 16° above zero. Also we found ourselves in the midst of what are known as the "Great Open Spaces."

To one who has never crossed the great plains of the Far West in the United States, it must be a rather terrifying experience to come upon those plains for the first time. From the highway life seems often to be found only in individuals who travel from one point to another, always surrounded by a great and abiding silence. The dome of blue hangs over head, and while the horizon seems a long way off, nevertheless there is a sense of power ordered by forces of nature which are still in control over human life.

SAGE BRUSH AND TUMBLE WEED.

The purple gray of the Sagebrush becomes a part of one's life experience in the days of travel across the dusty plains of Western United States. The dust is so deep during the season that we used in crossing the continent that it seems impossible for any shrub or bush to grow at all. But the sagebrush grows; and as we crushed its leaves between our fingers we caught the aroma of the sage which is unlike anything else in the way of plant life. Our youngster picked some of it, put it in a bottle and has it with her still in Manila. A curious phenomenon of the plains are the large balls of the dry tumble weed. They are as I have hinted, circular in form and go bounding and rolling for miles across the plains, blown by every stray wind that comes along. They pile up against any fences or posts and along the highway itself. There are times when we had to force our car through the piles of this tumbleweed which had stacked up to a height of several feet. They form a kind of moving life on the plains that is unexpected. For the silence leads one to feel that there will not be motion, but there is motion, and not only does that motion come from the tumbleweed blown by the winds, but also from the prairie dogs, jack rabbits and an occasional fox.

Then, too, the distant appear at intervals and the high buttes which change their colors with the movement of the sun or with passing of the clouds overhead bring a picturesqueness to the trip which adds variety in what would otherwise be a very drab period of days.

It was interesting to explain to the youngster on the trip that the blowing of the dry tumbleweeds across the plains was an illustration of how Mother Nature spreads her seeds for the new crop, broadcasting them for hundreds of square miles. The laws that govern life are always interesting in their manifestation, no matter what form or method is used. The plains are close to primitive regions and often through our understanding of the primitive, we gain our greatest knowledge.

There is something about the heat and the pressure of the sun on the great western plains that helps one to understand the place of the sun in the life and thought of India and in the development of Hinduism. There comes a sense of unity and of inevitability which is not found often in thickly settled sections.

NORTHWARD THROUGH WYOMING.

We left the well-paved highway and struck off across the prairie to the north. The road was gravel-ribbed and blinding in the sun. Smoked glasses saved our eyes somewhat. The country was ridged with low hills. Here and there great mail boxes were set up indicating that miles back from the road reached by barely-discernible trails there were ranches where a few men lived and rode the range. Now and again we came on small ranch centers on the banks of narrow streams. The greens of the fields and trees were a contrast to the dull dusty gray of most of the landscape.

The Teton Mountains appeared ahead and to the left. They stood out stark and grim with limited foliage. They gave an appearance of rough and rugged resistance to a pitiless dry atmosphere. The road wound on eventually beside them. Some peaks in the range have never been scaled, possibly never will be. Why anyone should want to climb them is beyond imagination. Yet they do stand as a challenge to those who wish to do the seemingly impossible.

That country must have seemed hopeless to early settlers. Perhaps men stayed there only because they were too weary to go farther.

We stopped at a small hotel for lunch. The dining room was well filled—but not with men of the ranches. Those we saw were road-workers and were only in the section for a short time as they built new bridges made necessary because timber has been cut off the country side. When the floods come after the melting of snows great gulleys are torn out where before were only narrow stream beds. One man told me that in the few years he had known the country bridges had had to be more than doubled in length because of the widening of streams from bank to bank though most of the year the streams were only a trickle of water.

Then a series of lakes lay beside our path—the water a contrast to the dust and alkali—through which we had been going.

Gradually we drew nearer to heavily wooded sections and in relief, drove into shadows of deciduous trees turned to masterpieces of blazing color by early frosts. These gave way to evergreens with the odors and aromas of the forest. Here the trees were under Federal protection finally—and the rush of unthinking profit-taking had been stayed—at least temporarily.

On the trip we had all the evidence necessary to prove the need of trees to conserve soil and moisture, both of which have been sacrificed over hundreds of square miles in Western United States to the greed of men who cared nothing for the future.

There is no real reason why Americans should allow their country to become a desert because of the selfishness of a few—yet due to lack of adequate control and planning it will cost far more to restore some sections than ever was gained by helping them to deteriorate.

Great plains that once supported millions of head of bison are now dreary desert. A realization of that fact should prevent Americans from allowing the process to go farther. National resources are assets that should not be squandered.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

522
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

1 April 18

DEWAN BAHADUR RAGHUNATHA RAO.

SIR P. S. SIVASWAMI AIYAR.

"The Ranade Library is becoming a sort of Valhalla, and it contains the portraits of several of our distinguished men and there is great propriety in its adding to its portrait gallery that of a distinguished son of India," said Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar, unveiling the portrait of the late Dewan Bahadur R. Raghunatha Rao last week at the Ranade Library Hall, Myslopore.

The portrait was presented to the Library by the Arya Mata Sabha of which the late Mr. Raghunatha Rao was the founder.

It was perhaps rather late in the day that they were seeking to commemorate the services of Dewan Bahadur R. Raghunatha Rao; for it was about twenty-four years that the gentleman passed away. But perhaps, it was better to be late than never. The question might be asked whether one would seek to appraise the services of a man soon after his death or a considerable time after his passing away. Much could be said for both views, but on the whole it seemed to him that it was somewhat of a disadvantage to seek to commemorate the services of a man so many years after his death. In this case, the period that had elapsed was far too long. In this country there was a sad lack of material for writing the biographies of great men. For such materials as were available of the lives of great men of the old generation, they had to depend on the industry and enterprise of a local firm of publishers. Mr. G. A. Natesan had rendered a great service to the country and to the friends of the late Mr. Raghunatha Rao by including in his publications a short sketch of his life.

Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar then proceeded to give in an outline the career of Mr. Raghunatha Rao and his services to the country. Mr. Raghunatha Rao was the scion of one of the most aristocratic—if not the most aristocratic Maharashtra families of Tanjore district. His father K. Venkata Rao, was the Dewan of Travancore for seven years, and later Assistant to Sir Mark Cubbon the great administrator of Mysore. Raja Sir T. Madhava Rao was a cousin of Mr. Raghunatha Rao. Mr. Raghunatha Rao came for his education to Madras and studied in the Madras High School—the predecessor of the Madras Presidency College. He was there the contemporary of several young men who later greatly distinguished themselves—Raja Sir T. Madhava Rao, Sir A. Seshayya Sastri, Dewan Rangachari and others. Mr. Raghunatha Rao was compelled to give up his studies when he was in the highest class but one, and he went to his village, Koviladi, in Tanjore district, where he devoted himself to the work of learning something of the revenue system of the country. The foundation for his intimate knowledge of the land revenue administration was laid during these early years of his life. Shortly afterwards, he entered Government service as Translator on a monthly salary of Rs. 35. In 1859, he was appointed Deputy Collector which office he continued to hold almost till the date of his retirement, with a few breaks when he acted as Sheristadar of the Board of Revenue and as Dewan of Indore State. His official experience enabled him to get an intimate knowledge of the country and particularly its land revenue system. As an official perhaps he was distinguished by an excess of zeal and a certain degree of impetuosity. But he had virtues of which Indians were charged by Europeans of being deficient in—great force of character, driving power and strength of will. As Dewan of Indore, Mr. Raghunatha Rao endeavoured successfully to reform the administration, to put down corruption and to modify the laws. The Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code of Indore were passed during his regime.

Mr. Raghunatha Rao came back to Madras in 1881, and it was then that the speaker came into contact with him. He (Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar) was asked by his father to pay his respects to Mr. Raghunatha Rao. When the speaker went to Mr. Raghunatha Rao's residence to do so, Mr. Raghunatha Rao spoke to him encouragingly and took a very kindly interest in him.

After retirement, Mr. Raghunatha Rao spent some years in Madras, devoting all his time to public service of various kinds. He was, Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar said, most interested in social reform—not on radical rational lines but on conservative shastric lines. He set his face against the two great evils from which he found Hindu society was suffering—child marriages and restraint on widow re-marriages—and without desiring to break away from the moorings of the shastras, he advocated reform based on what he considered the more reasonable interpretation of the shastras—an interpretation more in accord with enlightened public opinion and the needs of the time. He wrote numberless pamphlets on the subject of widow re-marriage and quoted text after text to show that it was authorised by Hindu law. In fact, he had to pay a penalty for his advocacy of social reform in that he had to suffer, along with Mr. Chenchal Rao, excommunication by the head of their Mutt. But his courage never quailed. While he was anxious to promote widow remarriage, he was anxious to provide for the happiness and moral welfare of young widows and he inserted, while drafting the Indore Penal Code, a provision penalising adultery with Hindu widows.

Another piece of social reform with which Mr. Raghunatha Rao was closely associated was that measure which led at the time to a great deal of acrimonious controversy—the Age of Consent Bill raising the age of consent to twelve. It evoked a lot of opposition—most unaccountable and most unreasonable—from orthodox people, and even from Sir T. Madhava Rao. There was a great public meeting at the Pachaiyappa's Hall where Sir T. Madhava Rao was one of the spokesman against the Bill. An uproar was created by the supporters of the measure. Sir T. Madhava Rao collapsed on account of the uproar and confusion and had to be carried away to his house—never more to attend any public meeting of that sort. Mr. Raghunatha Rao proved by reference to the shastras that postponement of the age of consummation was in no way opposed to the injunctions of the shastras.

Mr. Raghunatha Rao's activities, Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar proceeding said, were not confined to social reform. His interest in political, educational and economic questions was great, and he was never happy unless he had written to the press at least four letters on these subjects every day. He was a man who strongly believed in propaganda and his motive in doing so was not of a personal character at all. It was merely his strong desire to educate public opinion. He was a man of extraordinary energy and untiring activity, notwithstanding physical infirmities of a more or less serious kind, and he retained his vigour of mind to the last day. His services were so much appreciated and he was held in such high esteem for his character that he was nominated a member of the Legislative Council of Madras, in which body he did most useful work.

Mr. Raghunatha Rao was not merely the father and patriarch of the Indian Social Conference, but he was also in a way associated with the in-

* Speech at the unveiling of portrait in Gokhale Hall, Madras.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

523

inauguration of the Indian National Congress. It was in December 1884 that seventeen distinguished sons of India met in "Krishna Vilas"—the residence of Mr. Raghunatha Rao—to consider the inauguration of the Congress and they resolved that each of the gentlemen present should try to form a Committee in his province to promote the movement. Mr. Raghunatha Rao used to attend some of the early meetings of the Congress.

Mr. Raghunatha Rao was most proud of his Maharashtra blood. He was a man of sterling character and independence. A fearless critic of the Government he was absolutely loyal to the British Raj. A man of intense religious conviction, he loved to read the Bhagavata and give discourses day by day, wherever he was, on the Bhagavatam in the true spirit of a missionary. He was easily accessible to students and others and was a very great friend of the poor. He was systematic and industrious. Lives of great men were full of instruction and inspiration and the speaker hoped the memorial unveiled that evening would be of some service in reminding the younger generation of a great patriot and a most worthy citizen of India. The Kanade Library was becoming a sort of Valhalla and it contained the portraits of several distinguished men of India. There was, therefore, very great propriety in its adding to its gallery the portrait of a distinguished son of India.

MORE WORKING COMMITTEE RESOLUTIONS.

The following is the text of the resolutions of the Working Committee of the Congress officially released to the press:—

"Whereas the Government of India Act of 1935, which is based on the White Paper and the Joint Parliamentary Committee's Report and which is in many respects even worse than the proposals contained in them in no way represents the will of the Nation, is designed to facilitate and perpetuate the domination and exploitation of the people of India and is imposed on the country to the accompaniment of widespread repression and the suppression of civil liberties, the Congress reiterates its rejection of the new constitution in its entirety.

"The Congress as representing the will of the Indian people for national freedom and a democratic State declares that no constitution imposed by outside authority and no constitution which curtails the sovereignty of the people of India and does not recognise their right to shape and control fully their political and economic future, can be accepted. In the opinion of the Congress such a constitution must be based on the independence of India as a Nation and it can only be framed by a Constituent Assembly elected on adult franchise or a franchise which approximates to it as nearly as possible. The Congress, therefore, reiterates and stresses the demand for a Constituent Assembly in the name of the Indian people, and calls upon its representatives and members in the Legislatures and outside to work for the fulfilment of this demand.

"In view of the fact that elections for the Provincial Legislatures under the new Act may, according to an official statement, take place before the next session of the Congress, this Congress resolves that in such an event candidates should be put forward on its behalf to contest such seats in accordance with the mandate of the Congress and in pursuance of its declared policy. Such candidates must be chosen from those who fully support the Congress objective of Indian Independence and pledge themselves to carry out its policy in regard to the Legislatures.

"The A. I. C. C. shall place before the country, prior to the election a manifesto explaining the political and economic policy and programme of the Congress in conformity with the resolutions passed by it from time to time. The Provincial Congress Committees may further supplement the manifesto by adding thereto specific items which have special application to their respective provinces. All provincial manifestoes must be approved by the Working Committee of the A. I. C. C.

"Resolved further that the functions of the Parliamentary Board be discharged in future by the Working Committee of the A. I. C. C. The Working Committee is authorised to appoint such Boards or Committees as may be necessary to organise elections to Legislatures as well as to guide, co-ordinate and control the activities of the Congress members in the legislatures. Accordingly the Parliamentary Board need not be reconstituted hereafter.

"The question of acceptance or non-acceptance of office by Congress Members elected to the Legislatures under the constitution having been agitated in the country, the Congress, in view of the uncertainties of the situation as it may develop, considers it inadvisable to commit itself to any decision at this stage on the question and leaves it to be decided at the proper time by the A. I. C. C., after consulting the Provincial Congress Committee."

UNTOUCHABLE LINCOLN.*

One of the few men who have risen from the malodorous sink which is below the lowest caste of India is Dr. Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar, No. 1 Untouchable. This plump, cheery, bespectacled man of no caste, whose very shadow would outrage high-caste Hindus, managed to get a good education in Indian Government schools, was staked to courses at the University of London and Columbia University by the highly democratic Gaekwar of Baroda. Dr. Ambedkar is probably the only man alive who ever walked out in a huff from a private audience with the Pope of Rome. His Holiness Pius XI having heard from Dr. Ambedkar about the miseries of Indian outcastes, replied: "My son, it may take three or four centuries to remedy these abuses, be patient."

Impatient Dr. Ambedkar summoned 10,000 raggle-taggle Untouchables to Nasik near Bombay last autumn, said deliberately: "I had the misfortune of being born with the stigma of Untouchability. But it is not my fault. I will not die a Hindu, for this is in my power. I say to you, abandon Hinduism and adopt any other religion which gives you equality of status treatment."

Thereupon 10,000 adopted a resolution advising India Untouchables—some 60,000,000—to desert Hinduism en masse. Then a mob of Untouchables made a mighty bonfire of the most sacred Hindu books they could find. At Lucknow volunteers were solicited to force entry into Hindu temples, from which untouchables have been barred since time immemorial. At Barabanki 28,000 untouchables shouted their support of Ambedkar, laid plans for an All India untouchable Conference. Millions of leaflets bearing untouchable Ambedkar's message began fluttering out over India.

To what faith the Untouchables should turn for "equality of status and treatment," Dr. Ambedkar did not hasten to explain. Since he was reported dallying with Mohammedanism, Christian leaders in India exhibited pious skittishness. Declared the National Christian Council of India: "The harvest is ripe for the gathering in many quarters and we urge that volunteer bands be sent forth to gather it."

* The Times, March 16, 1936.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

524
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 18

This week in Zion's Herald, New England Methodist weekly, appears the first interview with Dr. Ambedkar to be published in the U. S. since he made his Nasik speech. To get it, able Editor Lewis Oliver Hartman went to India, sought out its No. 1 Untouchable, plied him with practical questions. Wrote the editor of Zion's Herald:

The (Untouchable) leader was rather critical of Christianity's constant emphasis upon personal experience at the expense of any wider reference.

'Why have you not seen the importance of a religion that reaches out into all life and all relationships?' he asked. Continuing, he declared with deep feeling, 'If you are going to compromise with evil conditions while you stress personal religion exclusively, I tell you now I am not with you.....'

'I pointed out in answer that, so far as the Methodist Episcopal Church was concerned, our watchword was this: 'Nothing that has to do with human welfare is foreign to Methodism.' This seemed to please him.....'

Of Hinduism the man whom Editor Hartman calls "India's Lincoln" said: "Hinduism is not a religion; it is a disease."

Editor Hartman's interview concluded thus: 'This much is settled,' he said to me, 'we are through forever with Hinduism. We are going somewhere, but are not ready yet to say in what direction.' 'Yes,' I answered, 'you are not strong enough yet to announce a decision. If you compromise with the Hindus, all is lost; if you choose Mohammedanism, the Hindus will crush you; if you go Christian, both the Hindus and the Moslems will be on your back.'

Exactly, replied Dr. Ambedkar. 'We are not ready—yet.'

A MOVEMENT FOR WORLD CHRISTIANITY.*

A Movement for World Christianity grew out of a meeting held under the auspices of the Modern Missions Movement in May of 1935, at the Colgate-Rochester Divinity School, Rochester, New York. After two days of earnest deliberation, it was resolved that a new movement be organized, dedicated to the world service of Christianity. This movement was to be educational in character, progressive in spirit, scientific in method and zealous in its devotion to the Church's world task. It was, in short, to combine the thoroughness of the scientist with the devotion of the crusader. In the words of the closing message at Rochester, "If this Movement, past or future, has any genius unique to itself, it is a capacity to take those two interests and blend them into a unity. If we cannot do that, we fail."

PREAMBLE TO THE CONSTITUTION.

A Movement for World Christianity is a result of the deepening conviction in the Church that God in our time calls for a more adequate expression of Christianity's world responsibility. It believes that this involves at least:

1. A conception of missions which faithfully represents Jesus and his Gospel; which, recognizing every aspect of human need, lays a demand upon the Church to meet those needs in the light of new world conditions and changing forms of thought; and which make for increased co-operation among religious and social groups, free from ecclesiastical and doctrinal divisiveness and from all sense of national and racial superiority.

2. The recognition of the responsibility of the Church for Christianizing the whole range of influences—economic, political, cultural, as well as religious—both within Christendom and in the impact of those influences upon non-Christian peoples.

3. The appreciation of the spiritual goods and

* This was held over from the April 4th Reformer in which there was an Editorial comment on it.

high aspirations of non-Christian peoples, which are also the basis upon which Christianity may hope to fulfil its mission of helping to bring to men and society everywhere the abundant life of the Kingdom of God.

4. The conviction that any enterprise, venerable as it may be, can be justified only in so far as its methods, motives and principles are constantly subjected to searching inquiry and revision in the light of the truth of the Gospel.

RELATIONSHIPS.

Relation to pre-existing movements.

The Movement regards itself as an outgrowth of a succession of developments in relation to the missionary enterprise. Among these were a series of objective inquiries into the work of the Christian churches in non-Christian lands, such as the Burton Educational Commission (1922) and the Lindsay Commission on Higher Education in India (1931). But the Movement is more immediately the outcome of the Laymen's Foreign Missions Inquiry (1932) and the Modern Missions Movement. While recognizing its abiding indebtedness to these and other notable contributions, the Movement is free to define its own methods and objectives.

Relation to missionary agencies.

While the relation of the Movement to the existing Mission Boards and other missionary agencies is conceived as independent, it purposes to be of fundamental service to these agencies and invites their reciprocal co-operation in its own undertakings. It will place at the disposal of these agencies, if desired, the results of the work of its Research Department and make recommendations for their consideration, as it will welcome recommendations by them with reference to its own activities.

Relation to the churches.

The Movement is an independent organization only in the sense that it is not officially the creature or representative of any denomination or other ecclesiastical body. It stands ready to serve the churches by providing them with concrete information concerning missionary principles and policies, furnishing lists, where desired of commended enterprises, developing a fuller understanding of the larger issues of missions, seeking with the churches a new vindication of the enterprise and creating fresh interest and conviction.

Relation to other countries.

The Movement will endeavor to increase its value to the churches by seeking information, counsel and fellowship through contacts with the counsellors, friends and critics of the Movement in other lands. It welcomes co-operation with kindred movements that may exist abroad and purposes to work with men of good-will, regardless of nationality, race or creed, for the building of a better world.

PLAN OF PROCEDURE.

The Movement will project its program progressively along the following lines as opportunity and resources permit:

1. Continue the process of objective inquiry and appraisal of the work of the existing missionary enterprise and of other factors that bear on the world mission of Christianity, and make such use of the findings as in its judgment may enhance the service of Christianity throughout the world.

2. Engage in educational activities designed to help further the reorientation of the churches under this larger concept of the world mission of Christianity and to bring vividly to their attention significant developments, trends and needed emphases in relation to that mission.

3. Organize national and regional institutes for the consideration of major problems of concern to the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 J. A.
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

525

Church, at home and abroad, in relation to the world mission of Christianity, in the light of results of surveys and inquiries of its own and of others, including those unchristian and evil contacts, whether of economic exploitation, nationalism, racial antagonism or excessive cultural pride, which poison and corrupt the interflow of good-will and the exchange of spiritual goods; focussing the attention both of the Church and of the general public upon these issues, and suggesting practical procedures in relation to them.

4. Foster such co-operative planning and activity and such other unifying processes as will make the missionary enterprise increasingly effective.

5. Encourage experiments and exploratory projects for discovering increasingly effective ways of fulfilling Christianity's world mission.

6. Foster and facilitate, through literature and exchange visits, the interchange of the prophetic spiritual leadership of the nations, races and religions.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha.

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	" 22,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman),
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MNL Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Desabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallai Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Sheth Pransukhlal Maratli (Sherrcock Mills, Ltd; Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Ulap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

516

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 18

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.
CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR,
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Saramati (District Poona).	Vitambam (District Ahmed-
Islandpur (District Satara).	dabad).
Karad " " "	Dhulia (District West
Tasgaon " " "	Khandesh)
Satara " " "	Doddachha " " "
Kirtoskarwadi (" " "	Nandurbar " " "
Shirala " " "	Shirpur " " "
Koregaon " " "	Shahada " " "
Kopergaon (District Ahmed-	Sakri " " "
nagar).	Sindkheda (District Nasik)
Shevgaon " " "	Malegaon " " "
Ahmednagar " " "	Satana " " "
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Kaiwas " " "
Palghar " " "	Dohad (District Panaji)
Kalyan " " "	Mahale " " "
Aklis (District Sholapur).	Kalol " " "

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.
Madhoojee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.
Esq.	D. W. Bant, Esq.
R. G. Sarlaya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
B. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) — — — — — Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,

Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 }
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

527

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining to the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJANI BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJANI DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

528

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 18

realpatidar.com

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSCORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

THE MYSCORE SOAP FACTORY, Bangalore

THE MYSCORE SOAP FACTORY, Bangalore

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 116, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY APRIL 23, 1936. No. 34

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

State Ritual.
A People's Viceroy?
The Ithad Party.
Courts and Custom.
Home to Roost.
Comforting Doctrine.
Mass Organizations.
Post Office Enterprise.
The King and the Pandit.
The King among Communists.
The New Viceroy.
Universities in India and their Problems.

Hindus and the New Constitution.
Sir Fazli Hussain on the New Constitution.
Sri Ramakrishna Centenary.
Devadhar Memorial Committee.
Catholics' Exploitation of Harijans.
Women under Fascism.
An Inspiring Woman.
Indians and Malnutrition.

NOTES

State Ritual:—For some obscure reason, the change of Viceroys last week was invested with the ceremonial of a King's succession. Descriptions of the Viceregal arrivals and departures, presentations to them of high officials and Princes, their rides along the streets, and presentations of Municipal and other valedictory addresses and their replies thereto, were broadcasted not only to all parts of India but also to London and New York. The inclusion of New York is probably significant of the influence which American opinion is beginning to exert on Indian affairs. The fact that the Mayor of Bombay, Mr. Jamnadas Mehta, was dressed in hand-spun was emphasised, though Mr. Mehta has long ceased to hold any position in the National Congress, and though wearing of hand-spun is no longer an authentic mark of Congress membership. Some ex-members and even non-members wear it. The acting Governor of the Central Provinces is said to be a habitual wearer of khadi including the boat-shaped Gandhi cap. Congress members in the Legislative Assembly were conspicuous by their absence at functions connected with the outgoing and incoming Viceroys. Church ritual has been given up or reduced to a minimum in most communities but its place is being taken up by an elaborate State ritual.

A People's Viceroy?:—Lord Linlithgow has taken pains to show at the outset of his Indian career that his main preoccupation as the head of the Government of India will be the interests of the masses. He had twenty-five peasants from different villages brought down to Bombay and accommodated with seats in the Gateway of India when he arrived and he had them introduced to him on his landing in Bombay last week. In celebration of the Silver Jubilee of their marriage, Lord and Lady Linlithgow had five thousand poor fed at their cost in different parts of Delhi on the day after His Excellency assumed the Viceroyalty. During his voyage to India he cabled for two stud bulls to be bought from the well-known Hissar Farm as his own personal property. It is announced that he will pay for their maintenance and stabling himself and also for their attendance, and that it is his intention to make them available free of charge for breeding purposes in the City and its neighbourhood in order to improve the quality of milch cattle. Lord Northcote when he was Governor of Bombay—and he was one of her best Governors—did much to preserve the fine breed of Gujarat cows which had been almost wiped out by the great famine which ushered in the twentieth century. We are sorry that an English newspaper tries to make out that Lord Linlithgow's endeavours to get into personal touch with the people are calculated to achieve a political object.

The Ithad Party:—Mian Sir Fazli Hussain inaugurated a new political party at Lahore on April 19. It is to be, like the Justice Party in Madras, a provincial party. The Ithad Party, as it is to be called, is open to all without distinction of race or creed who subscribe to its creed which, Sir Fazli said, would be available at the Party Secretariat. He might have given its substance at least in his long address because without it the significance of much of what he said would have been lost on his audience. This is more especially the case with readers. The new Party programme is to work upward from the bottom, the village, the tahsil, the district, the Division and the Province. To begin with, however, the work will have to begin from the Headquarters in Lahore which Sir Fazli opened. The Party, he said, would work for the uplift of the poor, the down-trodden, the villager, the peasant. No political Party avows that it is working for its own uplift. The Ithad Party has merely repeated here the slogan of all political parties. Its methods, said Sir Fazli, will not be those of communists. It does not aim at abolishing private property. It will appeal to the enlightened self-interest of the wealthy to contribute generously towards the amelioration of their less fortunate brethren. Sir Fazli warned his friends that if the gulf between the rich and the poor grows wider and wider no Government can protect the rich for any length of time. Enlightened self-interest has not been able to prevent the widening

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

530
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 25]

of the gulf in other countries. Sir Fazli is sure that it will, in his native province. It is somewhat disconcerting to see that Sir Fazli does not quite appreciate Lord Linlithgow's declaration in his broadcast speech that he was incapable of showing preference to any one community. Sir Fazli suggested that His Excellency rather overdid this protestation. Taking up the Viceroy's analogy of his children, Sir Fazli posed certain questions which only showed his chagrin and had otherwise no point in them. As we show in our leading article, the Viceroy's declaration is of no practical importance except as a sign of his personal good intentions, in view of the fact that the Government of India Act embodies all possible preferences, and leaves no room for the Governor General's discretion. Sir Fazli knows this better than any one else. His remarks on Lord Linlithgow's innocuous declaration were in bad taste and utterly ill-conceived. We understand his reference to the statements about Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan's resignation of his office, in the Reserve Bank, in order to re-enter public life in the Punjab, to mean that for the present there is no likelihood of their coming to pass.

Courts and Custom:—An instance of how Law Courts harden custom and prevent its reacting to growing public opinion, is furnished by a case in which the point at issue was, whether the marriage of a father-in-law with a widowed daughter-in-law was a valid marriage according to the custom prevailing among a caste of Jats in the Punjab where customary law is most in vogue. The District Judge who tried the case in the first instance found that such marriages were against Jat customs and were therefore void. On appeal, the Lahore High Court found that there was a valid custom sanctioning such marriages and remitted the case to the District Court for retrial. There were witnesses on both sides, leading men of the caste, some testifying to the existence of the custom and others denying it. The truth seems to be that there was a custom of the kind but that the caste was beginning to look down on it. The witnesses who denied that the custom existed were probably influenced by their own repugnance to the custom. What is the duty of a Court in such cases? There have been Judges who taking a broad view of their function have given due weight to the growth of public opinion and decided against giving effect to a practice which has become repugnant to the public conscience. There have also been Judges who in a stricter view of their function refused to recognise the growth of opinion as a fact justifying judicial cognisance. The Lahore High Court in deciding that the marriage was sanctioned by custom was obviously influenced by the latter view. The learned Judge argued: "It may be that such marriages are perhaps not looked upon with approval and are, therefore, rare. But that does not necessarily mean that they are invalid. So far as mere repugnancy to modern notions is concerned, a marriage with a deceased brother's widow can scarcely be considered to be less repugnant than a marriage with a son's widow. If the latter marriage is considered to be objectionable because a daughter-in-law stands on the same footing as a daughter, the marriage with brother's widow would equally be repugnant as the latter stands on the same footing as a sister. But there can be no doubt whatever that Jats do recognise Karewa with a brother's widow as valid."

Home to Roost:—John Bright was never tired of warning his countrymen that the methods they employ in Indian administration were sure eventually to invade their own government. The passing of a Sedition Act some time back was a proof of Bright's prescience. The English mail last week brought accounts of police action against a popular demonstration against Fascism, which are reminiscent of the doings at Azad Maidan and Darasna in 1930. We quote from the reference to it in "A London Diary" by Critic whose weekly comments are a feature of the New Statesman: "I have before me the written testimony of some forty observers most of them people with no axe to grind who agree that the mounted police acted as if 'orderly' London citizens could be knocked over with staves, pushed over or trampled on by horses without anybody having the right to complain." The New Statesman also publishes letters from correspondents and a statement by Mr. John Strachey, who presided at a meeting in support of the demonstration against Fascism, of what happened.

Comforting Doctrine:—Thus the Dnyanodaya: "Human affairs are vastly complex, and present conditions are always the outcome of the struggle among inter-acting elements in the past. In spite of the hostility of counter-purposes evident in the Indian-body-politic today there is the deep underlying unity of desire for a condition of things in which men and women will be adequately provided with the material requirements for a full life, and in which they will be free and happy. We must wait for the future to disperse the mists of these past sixteen years, and then perhaps it will be seen that Mahatma Gandhi, Lord Irwin, and Lord Willingdon, the movement of revolt, the efforts at conciliation and the counteraction, the forging of a new constitution and the new alignments and attitudes that it has brought about in individuals and in parties—that all of these have played their part in the evolution of a great people to a condition of self-respecting freedom and solid prosperity. We know that this evolution is by no means complete as things stand, and that there are many obstacles to be removed and great difficulties to be overcome. But we believe that real progress has been made in these past sixteen years and that we are in the true dawn." Why stop at the last sixteen years? Why not push the same argument back some twenty centuries? Why confine it to India, either? realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realp1936.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

531

Mass Organizations :—Mr. T. Sivasankaran of Penukonda writes : "To those who are accustomed to close thinking the Congress outlook is somewhat puzzling. With the Civil Disobedience movement suspended, it seemed that the pendulum was allowed to swing on the side of developing a constructive temper among the masses as is indicated by the intensive work in the Harijan and Village Industries movement. Sardar Patel is exhorting people not to come into conflict with the established order of things but to develop strength from within. Mahatma Gandhi retired from Congress with the object of devoting his undivided attention to constructive work. By such conscious change the country was led to believe that wisdom lay in the direction of awakening the masses to a sense of applied citizenship in matters of immediate concern in their daily life, as the only means of laying the foundation for the growth of a larger political consciousness enabling them to make the best out of the self-governing institutions spread all over the country, as a step towards the goal for Swaraj from our side, while freedom is sought to be achieved from the other by National movements in the land. Instead, to think of weaning the mass mind away from such constructive temper into revolutionary mentality would be, if slang is permitted, rubbing the wrong way. 90% of the Government whatever its cost should ever remain of a local character in this land of villages whether it is Poorna Swaraj or a hide-bound foreign constitution of the kind which is now facing the country. The greatest mercy at the present time for this unfortunate land would be to allow the masses to confine their attention exclusively to detailed working of local Government within the limits available in all branches affecting their immediate collective welfare, the talent for which, according to history, has always been in the genius of their race, whether Empires came or Empires went. I do confess that I am among those who, the more they examine this complicated scheme the more are they repelled by the ugliness in it. I for one would not be sorry if it is wrecked but on one condition, that the mass temperament is allowed to remain within constructive bounds leading to progress of an evolutionary character, building up during the interval solid and live citizenship as the only means to handle any scheme of Government making it yield to the popular will."

Post Office Enterprise :—The Indian Post Office is introducing an Identity Card which will be issued on the payment of one rupee at any Post Office. This will facilitate delivery of Money orders and other articles to the right persons when travelling in places where they are strangers and where it will be difficult for them to produce testimony regarding their identity. Further particulars will be found in another column. We commend to the Director General the following which is worthy of his attention. The French Post Office has recently established a highly efficient information and messenger service for the benefit of telephone subscribers. By dialing

"S. V. P." (French for 'please') any subscriber can receive easily available information at a charge of one franc, or information requiring research ('Where did Cain get his wife?) at charges up to 10 francs. The messenger service makes reservations for theatres, planes, trains and steamships and buys and delivers anything the subscriber desires for a nominal fee.

The King and the Pandit :—In the Reformer of the 11th April, we commented on the report published by the Riyasat on the authority of an "ex-Minister of Parliament" and reproduced by the Anrila Basar Patrika of the King having invited Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and the latter having declined the invitation. The Pandit has issued the following statement on the report : "I have just seen a reference to a fantastic story which apparently was started by a Delhi weekly newspaper and later copied by the Anrila Basar Patrika. The story relates that the Private Secretary to the King wrote to me extending an invitation to meet the King. Further, that I was unable to accept this for fear of certain political complications in India. I should like to say that this story is utterly and absolutely without foundation, and I am surprised that any newspaper should have given currency to it." The story is not so fantastic as it would be if it had reference to King George V. King Edward VIII is not a stickler for convention. In his message to the Empire he assured it that, although he now spoke to it as King, he was still the same man who, during the War and, since, had had the opportunity to know the people of nearly every country of the world under all circumstances and conditions, and whose constant effort would be to promote the well-being of his fellowmen.

The King among Communists :—Glasgow is a hotbed and the headquarters of British Communism. During his visit to Glasgow last month to inspect the new monster ship, Queen Mary, His Majesty King Edward VIII visited the slums of the city and was greeted by the crowd everywhere with cries of 'Good Old Teddy'! Quitting the Queen Mary bare-headed in a pouring rain amid fresh roars of 'Good Old Teddy,' writes Time, "the Sovereign drove off rapidly over an unannounced route with John Stewart, Lord Provost of Glasgow...Cheerfully the King, in sleek long coat and bowler, set out to repeat in Glasgow slums the sort of famed house-to-house tour he made as Edward of Wales through the bleak, starveling Welsh collieries and 'Depressed areas.' Knk-knk, tapped the knuckle of Edward VIII's middle finger on a Glasgow tenement door as he cried, 'May I come in?' 'Certainly, come right in! Who are you?' 'I am your King'. In tenement after tenement the King plodded up and down worn steps of Scottish granite to knk-knk softly and ask, 'May I come in?'. At His Majesty, 5 year old Charlie Storrie piped incredulously, 'Are you the new King?' Patting the mopet's head, the Sovereign answered 'Yes, little man, I am.' This seems to be a better and more effective way of dealing with Communists than some which are in favour with His Majesty's servants in India.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

530
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 25]

of the gulf in other countries. Sir Fazli is sure that it will, in his native province. It is somewhat disconcerting to see that Sir Fazli does not quite appreciate Lord Linlithgow's declaration in his broadcast speech that he was incapable of showing preference to any one community. Sir Fazli suggested that His Excellency rather overdid this protestation. Taking up the Viceroy's analogy of his children, Sir Fazli posed certain questions which only showed his chagrin and had otherwise no point in them. As we show in our leading article, the Viceroy's declaration is of no practical importance except as a sign of his personal good intentions, in view of the fact that the Government of India Act embodies all possible preferences, and leaves no room for the Governor General's discretion. Sir Fazli knows this better than any one else. His remarks on Lord Linlithgow's innocuous declaration were in bad taste and utterly ill-conceived. We understand his reference to the statements about Sir Sikandar Hayat Khan's resignation of his office, in the Reserve Bank, in order to re-enter public life in the Punjab, to mean that for the present there is no likelihood of their coming to pass.

Courts and Custom:—An instance of how Law Courts harden custom and prevent its reacting to growing public opinion, is furnished by a case in which the point at issue was, whether the marriage of a father-in-law with a widowed daughter-in-law was a valid marriage according to the custom prevailing among a caste of Jats in the Punjab where customary law is most in vogue. The District Judge who tried the case in the first instance found that such marriages were against Jat customs and were therefore void. On appeal, the Lahore High Court found that there was a valid custom sanctioning such marriages and remitted the case to the District Court for retrial. There were witnesses on both sides, leading men of the caste, some testifying to the existence of the custom and others denying it. The truth seems to be that there was a custom of the kind but that the caste was beginning to look down on it. The witnesses who denied that the custom existed were probably influenced by their own repugnance to the custom. What is the duty of a Court in such cases? There have been Judges who taking a broad view of their function have given due weight to the growth of public opinion and decided against giving effect to a practice which has become repugnant to the public conscience. There have also been Judges who in a stricter view of their function refused to recognise the growth of opinion as a fact justifying judicial cognisance. The Lahore High Court in deciding that the marriage was sanctioned by custom was obviously influenced by the latter view. The learned Judge argued: "It may be that such marriages are perhaps not looked upon with approval and are, therefore, rare. But that does not necessarily mean that they are invalid. So far as mere repugnancy to modern notions is concerned, a marriage with a deceased brother's widow can scarcely be considered to be less repugnant than a marriage with a son's widow. If the latter marriage is considered to be objectionable because a daughter-in-law stands on the same footing as a daughter, the marriage with brother's widow would equally be repugnant as the latter stands on the same footing as a sister. But there can be no doubt whatever that Jats do recognise Karewa with a brother's widow as valid."

Home to Roost:—John Bright was never tired of warning his countrymen that the methods they employ in Indian administration were sure eventually to invade their own government. The passing of a Sedition Act some time back was a proof of Bright's prescience. The English mail last week brought accounts of police action against a popular demonstration against Fascism, which are reminiscent of the doings at Azad Maidan and Darasna in 1930. We quote from the reference to it in "A London Diary" by Critic whose weekly comments are a feature of the New Statesman: "I have before me the written testimony of some forty observers most of them people with no axe to grind who agree that the mounted police acted as if 'orderly' London citizens could be knocked over with staves, pushed over or trampled on by horses without anybody having the right to complain." The New Statesman also publishes letters from correspondents and a statement by Mr. John Strachey, who presided at a meeting in support of the demonstration against Fascism, of what happened.

Comforting Doctrine:—Thus the Dnyanodaya: "Human affairs are vastly complex, and present conditions are always the outcome of the struggle among inter-acting elements in the past. In spite of the hostility of counter-purposes evident in the Indian-body-politic today there is the deep underlying unity of desire for a condition of things in which men and women will be adequately provided with the material requirements for a full life, and in which they will be free and happy. We must wait for the future to disperse the mists of these past sixteen years, and then perhaps it will be seen that Mahatma Gandhi, Lord Irwin, and Lord Willingdon, the movement of revolt, the efforts at conciliation and the counteraction, the forging of a new constitution and the new alignments and attitudes that it has brought about in individuals and in parties—that all of these have played their part in the evolution of a great people to a condition of self-respecting freedom and solid prosperity. We know that this evolution is by no means complete as things stand, and that there are many obstacles to be removed and great difficulties to be overcome. But we believe that real progress has been made in these past sixteen years and that we are in the true dawn." Why stop at the last sixteen years? Why not push the same argument back some twenty centuries? Why confine it to India, either?

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com
1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

531

Mass Organizations :—Mr. T. Sivasankaran of Penukonda writes : "To those who are accustomed to close thinking the Congress outlook is somewhat puzzling. With the Civil Disobedience movement suspended, it seemed that the pendulum was allowed to swing on the side of developing a constructive temper among the masses as is indicated by the intensive work in the Harijan and Village Industries movement. Sardar Patel is exhorting people not to come into conflict with the established order of things but to develop strength from within. Mahatma Gandhi retired from Congress with the object of devoting his undivided attention to constructive work. By such conscious change the country was led to believe that wisdom lay in the direction of awakening the masses to a sense of applied citizenship in matters of immediate concern in their daily life, as the only means of laying the foundation for the growth of a larger political consciousness enabling them to make the best out of the self-governing institutions spread all over the country, as a step towards the goal for Swaraj from our side, while freedom is sought to be achieved from the other by National movements in the land. Instead, to think of weaning the mass mind away from such constructive temper into revolutionary mentality would be, if slang is permitted, rubbing the wrong way. 90% of the Government whatever its cost should ever remain of a local character in this land of villages whether it is Poorna Swaraj or a hide-bound foreign constitution of the kind which is now facing the country. The greatest mercy at the present time for this unfortunate land would be to allow the masses to confine their attention exclusively to detailed working of local Government within the limits available in all branches affecting their immediate collective welfare, the talent for which, according to history, has always been in the genius of their race, whether Empires came or Empires went. I do confess that I am among those who, the more they examine this complicated scheme the more are they repelled by the ugliness in it. I for one would not be sorry if it is wrecked but on one condition, that the mass temperament is allowed to remain within constructive bounds leading to progress of an evolutionary character, building up during the interval solid and live citizenship as the only means to handle any scheme of Government making it yield to the popular will."

Post Office Enterprise :—The Indian Post Office is introducing an Identity Card which will be issued on the payment of one rupee at any Post Office. This will facilitate delivery of Money orders and other articles to the right persons when travelling in places where they are strangers and where it will be difficult for them to produce testimony regarding their identity. Further particulars will be found in another column. We commend to the Director General the following which is worthy of his attention. The French Post Office has recently established a highly efficient information and messenger service for the benefit of telephone subscribers. By dialing

"S. V. P." (French for 'please') any subscriber can receive easily available information at a charge of one franc, or information requiring research ('Where did Cain get his wife?') at charges up to 10 francs. The messenger service makes reservations for theatres, planes, trains and steamships and buys and delivers anything the subscriber desires for a nominal fee.

The King and the Pandit :—In the Reformer of the 11th April, we commented on the report published by the Riyasat on the authority of an "ex-Minister of Parliament" and reproduced by the Amrita Basar Patrika of the King having invited Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and the latter having declined the invitation. The Pandit has issued the following statement on the report : "I have just seen a reference to a fantastic story which apparently was started by a Delhi weekly newspaper and later copied by the Amrita Basar Patrika. The story relates that the Private Secretary to the King wrote to me extending an invitation to meet the King. Further, that I was unable to accept this for fear of certain political complications in India. I should like to say that this story is utterly and absolutely without foundation, and I am surprised that any newspaper should have given currency to it." The story is not so fantastic as it would be if it had reference to King George V. King Edward VIII is not a stickler for convention. In his message to the Empire he assured it that, although he now spoke to it as King, he was still the same man who, during the War and, since, had had the opportunity to know the people of nearly every country of the world under all circumstances and conditions, and whose constant effort would be to promote the well-being of his fellowmen.

The King among Communists :—Glasgow is a hotbed and the headquarters of British Communism. During his visit to Glasgow last month to inspect the new monster ship, Queen Mary, His Majesty King Edward VIII visited the slums of the city and was greeted by the crowd everywhere with cries of 'Good Old Teddy!' Quitting the Queen Mary bare-headed in a pouring rain amid fresh roars of 'Good Old Teddy,' writes Time, "the Sovereign drove off rapidly over an unannounced route with John Stewart, Lord Provost of Glasgow...Cheerfully the King, in sleek long coat and bowler, set out to repeat in Glasgow slums the sort of famed house-to-house tour he made as Edward of Wales through the bleak, starveling Welsh collieries and 'Depressed areas.' Knk-knk, tapped the knuckle of Edward VIII's middle finger on a Glasgow tenement door as he cried, 'May I come in?' "Certainly, come right in! Who are you?" "I am your King". In tenement after tenement the King plodded up and down worn steps of Scottish granite to knk-knk softly and ask, 'May I come in?'. At His Majesty, 5 year old Charlie Storrie piped incredulously, 'Are you the new King?' Patting the moppet's head, the Sovereign answered 'Yes, little man, I am.'" This seems to be a better and more effective way of dealing with Communists than some which are in favour with His Majesty's servants in India.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

532

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 25

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, April 25 1936.

THE NEW VICEROY.

Lord Linlithgow made two speeches during the few hours of his stay in Bombay and broadcasted a lengthy message from New Delhi soon after he took the oaths of office. Both in his reply to the Muslim address presented to him in this city and in his message from New Delhi, His Excellency declared that he would make no distinction between the communities of India, that he was incapable of doing so. In his message, Lord Linlithgow enforced his resolve by an illustration drawn from his relations with his own five children among whom he had no favourite though he adapted his behaviour with each of them to the needs of his or her distinctive temperament. In his message, while assuring the Services of his support in the discharge of their duties, he took occasion to remind them that they were servants of the Indian people—not the steel frame that they have been encouraged to regard themselves to be. He exhorted district officials to spend more time in touring their charges than in sitting at their desks, adding that the tent is mightier than the pen. His Excellency bade children to fear God, honour the King, and obey their parents. He pointed out that, in order to discharge his responsibilities under the new constitution, it was incumbent on him to acquaint himself personally with all shades of political opinion and that it should not be supposed that he agreed or was in sympathy with the views of those whom he might interview from time to time in pursuance of that duty. He assured the country—London and New York listening in—that it was his intention to make official information freely accessible to the public, but only in the shape of objective facts, so that it might have the material on which to form its own judgment without any officious assistance on the part of his officials. His Excellency gave a special assurance to the Press that newspapers will be treated by his Government without any discrimination on account of their editorial policies. Lord Linlithgow promised that he will give Indian publicists full credit for sincerity and disinterestedness and expected that they would do the same to him. The message as it was heard on the radio was delivered with the assurance of one who was sure of his ground and fully meant what he said. It made a very favourable first impression which goes a long way in human intercourse.

If there has been doubt or hesitancy—there has been very little—in the way in which Indian opinion has expressed itself on the Viceroy's pronouncements, it is due not to any suspicion of his sincerity but to an apprehension as to how far he would succeed in impressing his intentions on the media through which the Viceroy has to function. There is no danger today of a repetition of the experience which Lord Ripon had to undergo. Indian opinion fifty years ago was not articulate enough, neither was it organised, to support that great Viceroy who attempted to give effect in a small way to the promise of equal citizenship of the Queen's Proclamation, against the storm of fanatical fury which burst on his head. If the Services tried the game today of baiting the Viceroy, they would soon find themselves floundering in a dangerous bog threatening their very existence. Their younger members at least know this very well. The older ones will, no doubt, take their pension and retire to write letters bewailing the passing of the old order in the London newspapers. It is a great advantage that Lord Linlithgow belongs to the Conservative Party and is a Protestant, though we see that there is some grumbling at his being a dissenter, Scotch Presbyterian, and not a worshipper in the Church of England. Creed and communal prejudices pass unnoticed in British public life, but they lie not far below the surface and come up whenever any important question raises a controversy. The Morning Post's anti-Semitic outbursts against Mr. Montagu and Lord Reading when they happened to be Secretary of State for India and Viceroy for a short time, are an illustration. A greater obstacle to the implementing of Lord Linlithgow's good intentions, is the Government of India Act which his lordship had himself a large hand in shaping. His Excellency said that he was incapable of discriminating between communities. But the Act is based on such discrimination: it is shot by it through and through. Take the franchise provisions. One community has assigned to it one seat for, say, a hundred thousand of population. Another is entitled to elect one for just half or a third of that number; yet another for a hundredth or even less fraction of it. This discrimination is carried, as it is bound to be, into the Cabinet the local bodies, the Services. This in itself would not much matter. What matters very much is that all this is to be secured not by voluntary choice but by statutory obligation. How would it be if it was laid down by law that one fifth of Ministers in a British Cabinet should be Ulstermen, another fifth, Welshmen, and the rest in equal parts Scotchmen and Englishmen, including a specified proportion of Roman Catholics and women? We shall be told that there is no need for prescribing proportions in Great Britain because there are no conflict of interests there as in India. The answer is that there is no conflict of interests in Britain because the constitution does not discriminate between the different races and creeds. The case is even more conspicuous in the United States.

As for imputing motives, Lord Linlithgow will soon find that those who indulge in this game are not always or predominantly Indian publicists. Most of them are educated enough to know that motives do not count in public affairs as the different motives of various men concerned in them, tend to cancel one another.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

533

Moreover, the Executive in India has armed itself with enormous powers to put down any impugment of its motives, with and without judicial proceedings. On the other hand, public men whose motives and conduct are questioned by it from the shelter of its official barricade, have no remedy. They may raise the matter on a motion of adjournment in the Legislature but this may only lead to worse imputations which may be broadcasted through the public press with complete impunity. Any speech from the non official benches which the Executive does not like, can be practically suppressed by applying the Press Act as was recently done in the case of the Abhyudhaya. The President of the Legislative Assembly has ruled that such action on the part of the Executive did not infringe any privilege which the Assembly can lay claim to. His Excellency will be doing a service to the Indian Press if he will kindly have this point settled early in consonance with British parliamentary practice.

UNIVERSITIES IN INDIA AND THEIR PROBLEMS.

Mr. Littlehailes, Vice-Chancellor of the Madras University, and Chairman of the Inter-University Board in his opening speech at the last meeting of the Board, at Aligarh, referred to the different types of Universities in India.

Discussing the limitations of the Indian Universities, he said that each University had its own Act drawn up by the Legislature of its own province or that of all India; its own policy, as set forth and circumscribed by its Act of Incorporation, and also much more important, its own aims and objects, based upon the structure, and restricted by the achievements of secondary education, in the areas from which the University drew its undergraduates. "A University does not stand by itself in an educational system; it has, on the one hand, the limitations of the secondary educational system on which it stands, and side by side with it the other Universities of India, and other institutions for higher education like the Institute of Science, Bangalore, with which it must co-operate in the common aim of all University education—the advancement of learning and the making of men of character and of high ethical standards, who will form the leaders of our political and social life."

He described the diversity of structure in Indian Universities. (1) Leaving aside the ancient foundations, modern University education in India dates from the foundation in the same year of the Universities in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras as purely affiliating Universities with no teaching functions, (2) other Universities, e.g. Allahabad and the Punjab were set up on the same model, (3) the older Universities began themselves to teach and research, not leave teaching and research to be conducted only through their affiliated colleges, (4) Aligarh and Benares were founded, one to express the ideals of higher Muslim education and the other to express the ideals of higher Hindu education: (5) other Universities were instituted as offshoots of the then existing Universities with the main ideas of reducing the administrative areas of the older Universities and of self-development on a policy of their own which might be essentially different from previous policies, (e.g. Osmania) or scarcely differing from previous policies, (e.g. Mysore) and

* Report of Inter University Board, 1935-36.

(6) the idea of a unitary University was set forth and Universities like Lucknow and Dacca were set up so that at the present time there are now seventeen Universities in India.

There are in India today at least five distinct types of Universities, the classification being made according to (1) the location of the University and its Colleges and (2) the direct control and appointment of teaching staff, i. e., according to whether the University is itself directly responsible for teaching (unitary Universities) or whether its responsibility is exercised through associated Colleges.

(1) Unitary Universities located in one place, e. g., Dacca, Lucknow, Osmania, Annamalai.

(2) Unitary Universities not localised in one place, e. g., Mysore.

(3) Affiliating Universities, with no teaching functions, and not localised in one place, e. g., Agra.

(4) Affiliating Universities with teaching functions, and not localised in one place, e. g., Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Andhra.

(5) Affiliating Universities, with or without teaching functions but localised in one place (federal in nature) e. g., Delhi.

There is a further division of Universities in India depending upon the stage of admission to University courses. In Dacca, Allahabad, Lucknow and Agra, the stage of admission is the 'Intermediate' standard; in all other Universities in India the undergraduate comes under the control of his University at the Matriculation or Secondary School leaving stage.

Administrative problems in our Universities differ considerably, but these differences are due not so much to varying ideals and policies of Universities as to their varying structures and constitutions. These latter involve differences in the stage of admission to University courses of study, in the size, constitution and mode of appointment to the Courts or Senates, to the Academic Councils to the Syndicates or Executive Councils and to Boards of Studies. Under some of the more recent University Acts, especially, those with affiliating functions, the Court or Senate is composed of a very large number of persons (200 or more) representing, besides persons of academic influence and authority, every conceivable interest; Legislative Councils, District Boards, Municipal Councils, Chambers of Commerce, Landholders, Depressed Classes, Backward Classes, Graduates and so on. Academic Councils and Executive Councils are correspondingly large. Meetings of such large bodies whose members are drawn from wide areas involve a severe drain on the finances of a University—a drain is not experienced by localised University whether unitary or federal. The financial problems of a large affiliating University thus differ appreciably from those of a localised University.

The affiliating University with teaching functions has special problems of its own. Such a University is in fact two Universities in one—a teaching University and an affiliating University. The United Provinces when it constituted the Agra University resolved the old affiliating and teaching Allahabad University into its constituent parts; it took all affiliating functions away from the old Allahabad University leaving it a purely localised unitary University, and gave them to the then newly instituted Agra University. Is it not possible for other Universities with a dual function and contending interests (for the interests of an affiliated college are often far from identical with those of a college at the headquarters of the University) to consider resolving themselves into their constituent parts, one a purely affiliating University, the other a localised unitary or federal University?

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

534
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| April 25

Proceeding Mr. Littlehailes emphasised the advantage of localised Universities either of the unitary or federal type, and impressed the need for the retention of affiliating Universities but said that it was undesirable to increase centres of University education through colleges. New colleges would do well to set themselves up in centres where colleges already existed. College individuality could be expressed through residential halls or hostels or even by the appointment (in a federal University) of University teachers subject to their possession of some minimum qualification or their approval by the academic authority of a University. Some Mission Colleges which are supported by several Missions have solved the difficulty of appointments of staff in this manner, each supporting Mission being responsible for the appointment of the person who is to hold a named post on the staff.

Referring to some of the recent Indian University Acts which are obviously based upon the Acts of some of the modern Universities of Great Britain, Mr. Littlehailes asked if they were quite suitable for India with its vast uneducated population and, limited franchise. He further asked if these Acts would not result in administration of Universities being handed over to bodies on which persons sit who were quite unfitted for their task, persons who were unable to consider University policy on academic and ethical grounds, who concentrated on questions of patronage and political policy to the detriment of principles and standards of University education and administration, who were in fact inexperienced politicians rather than educated statesmen. He further pointed out that the University Senates and Courts had to be trained to value wisdom, integrity and imagination in their representatives on the Executive bodies of the Universities; they had to realise that their representatives might at times have to sacrifice what appears to be and, indeed, might be immediate interests of their own University in order to further the common good of all higher education and to raise the ethical standard of academic life in India.

In conclusion, Mr. Littlehailes compared the Inter-University Board to the League of Nations—members of the League were representatives of different forms of Government with different constitutions and with different policies; they met however with a common aim; the maintenance of peace. "Members of this Board represent different kinds of Universities, with different constitutions and policies; we sit together to deliberate and discuss matters of common policy and mutual good. The members of the University Board assemble to find ways and means to maintain a high ethical standard in higher education in India, and to endeavour to secure the advancement of knowledge and research."

First Indian Plane.—The first aeroplane to be made in India—and out of Indian materials—and flown, is nearing completion at Bangalore. This is a "Flying Flea," a single seater aeroplane. Professor K. Ashton of the Indian Institute of Science, Bangalore, in taking the initiative for this enterprising venture, has secured new possibilities for aeronautical engineering in India and for civil aviation. He has personally tested the Indian materials, in the construction of the plane and has utilized them as far as possible. The originator of the "Flying Flea," M. Henry Mignet, a Frenchman, claimed that an amateur could teach himself to fly in the air without the aid of an instructor in this type of aeroplane. Professor Ashton, believing in the feasibility of the proposition, has now gone far enough to its successful conclusion. The machine is specially designed for safety and easy handling by the amateur.

HINDUS AND THE NEW CONSTITUTION.*

RAJA SIR RAMPAL SINGH.

The political position of the Hindus in the coming Constitution will suffer a serious and disastrous setback due to certain novel principles embodied in that constitution. These are, broadly speaking, to devise a constitution on the basis of mere number, or counting of heads, of quantity irrespective of quality and even within the framework of a novel political arithmetic the relative values of quantity and quality are not determined by any uniform principle. As you all know, more weightages of representation and consequently of political power are given to Moslems than to Hindus and Sikhs and, in some cases, especially in the province of Bengal, the Hindus are made to lose both in quantity and quality, with a representation falling below even their population strength.

On behalf of the Hindus, I must emphatically point out that these unprecedented schemes of communal electorates, reservations, and weightages of representations, have never been the demand of Hindus either as majorities or as minorities. Standing on the platform of this Conference I must state emphatically that this is not a narrow communal platform. We in the Hindu Mahasabha have been always standing for a national solution of our communal problems on the basis of joint electorate, pure and simple, without any reservations of representation, except reservations to minorities on the basis of their population strength, as strictly a minority right, if pressed. And yet this national position of the Hindu Mahasabha has been assailed in season and out of season not merely by Moslems but even by some distinguished Hindu leaders of the Congress who are so uncharitable as to think that the nationalism of the Hindu organizations is only a cloak for communalism, that the Hindu Mahasabha is national because it is convenient to it. I know that the Congress has no religion and is neither Hindu nor Moslem. But I cannot understand how it can neither accept nor reject, and remain neutral and indifferent, as regards the vicious system of separate communal electorate and quotas and weightages of representation which are destructive of the very nationalism and democracy for which the Congress ought to stand as a matter of principle. I am sorry to say that the Congress acquiescence in the Communal 'Award' has been taken to be the acquiescence in it of the Hindus who practically constitute the Congress and this fact has set a seal on the 'Award' which has been condemned, by the Hindu world. Nor am I able to follow the logic or the consistency of the Congress which does not own any religion, but must profess one, against its own conscience and principles, for purposes of what is called Council-entry for which they are so enthusiastic. For, as you know, Indians as such cannot vote under the constitution except as Hindus, Moslems, Sikhs or Christians, and Congressmen, in professing a composite and godless nationalism, must separate, and obtain their respective religious labels to obtain entrance to the Legislatures. The constitution drives us into separate communal camps. This is a justification for the Hindu Mahasabha and its institutions.

We have now to put our own house in order and face our own problems. Our indifference to these problems has caused incalculable damage to the interests and prospects of the Hindus even in the United Provinces where they are in an overwhelming majority of 85 per cent. The position of the Hindus in the present constitution has been already reduced far below the standard of their

* Presidential address, Provincial Hindu Conference, Lucknow.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

535

numerical and cultural importance, and will be much worse in the coming constitution, if the Hindus do not properly organize themselves to protect and promote their own interest, and take a lesson in this respect from their Moslem brethren. Nay, even the constitution itself conveys to us that lesson and instigates communal organizations. Already in the U. P. Government there has been the established practice of including in it a solitary Hindu member, while for years the same cabinet had included two Moslem members. In the services, every one knows, how far the present percentage of appointment for the Hindus falls below their population strength and the result is that in some of the services they are being reduced to a minority. We have never stood for percentages and proportions in the public services of the country, for we have always believed in their efficiency and recruitment on the basis of merit, on the basis of maximum qualifications and not on the strange principal of 'minimum' qualifications dictated by narrow communal considerations. And now, in the coming constitution, our prospects threaten to be more gloomy, if the Hindus do not fully organize themselves as Hindus, and protect their own interests, as they are expected to do by the constitution.

This means that we must first of all organize a party to contest the coming elections to the Provincial Legislatures. This is a matter too important to be dealt with by me as an individual, and I must leave it to the Conference and the permanent body of the All-India Hindu Mahasabha who, I understand, have already adopted a resolution for Hindu Sabhas to contest the provincial elections. I only beg your leave to suggest for your consideration in a general way the lines on which the proposed party should be organized in the special conditions of the U. P. Firstly, the party should bring about a united Hindu front and provide a platform on which Hindus of all shades of political opinion can come together. This means that the policy and programme of the party must be wide, liberal and national, so as to give scope to progressive and democratic thought and outlook as regards our vital political, social, and economic problems, the problems of labour and capital, landlords, and tenants, peasants and workers, depressed classes, rural reconstruction, development of industries, large and small, agricultural indebtedness and cheap credit, unemployment, illiteracy, sanitation, public health and medical aid. And on the treatment of these and other problems, we must bring to bear that democratic, national, and catholic outlook by which divergent interests may be reconciled and classes welded together into a harmonious whole, without allowing any unreasonable invasions of private property and encroachment upon the home and family life which are integral parts of the Hindu social system and mass mentality.

In conclusion, I should like to remind you of the responsibilities that rest on you at this great crisis in our Hindu national history. I do not consider the Hindus, numbering more than 200 millions of people, as a community, but a nation by themselves. They stand for a type of culture which has enriched the culture of mankind and attracted some of the choicest spirits of the West as its votaries. We owe it to ourselves and to the world to conserve and extend that culture. I rejoice to think that most of the advanced western countries are interested in Hindu thought and are maintaining chairs and school of Sanskrit at their universities. Even a small state like Poland maintains a professorship of Sanskrit at each of its five universities. Should we allow this precious cultural heritage to perish or should we not promote it to the best of our powers? The whole of Hindu India today looks to the U. P. as the cradle and home of Hindu learning and culture to give the lead in the matter of our political emancipation on which depends the culture of the race. The Hindus of U. P. must rise to the occasion and to the full height of their responsibilities, so that they may win for themselves their rightful place in the coming constitution.

SIR FAZLI HUSSAIN ON THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

Mian Sir Fazli-I-Hussain, leader of the National Unionist Party—now called the Ithad Party—performed the opening ceremony of the Party's Headquarters office at the Mamdot Villa, on the 19th in the presence of a large gathering.

Sir Fazli Hussain, in declaring the New Headquarters Office of the Unionist Party open, made a lengthy speech. He said:

I have been asked to declare open the office of the Punjab Unionist Party Headquarters. It is customary on an occasion like this to say something, but I trust you do not expect any elaborate statement from me dealing with constitution making, India's position, political and economic, in the Empire or the civilised world; new constitution under the Government of India Act of 1935; whether the constitution of our legislatures can be modified under the Act and if so how? These are all matters of vital importance, of absorbing interest, but this is not the occasion for it.

Here, I will just say a few words about self-government for the largest possible number of human beings—the masses—as our ideal in opposition to the scheme of dictatorships. We in India have been moving from the centralised Imperial Government to the Local Self-Government and to Provincial autonomy—very slowly, but steadily and persistently, towards decentralisation and delegation of powers from the top to those down below. With your permission may I casually mention that the conception of Government in the past in the case of India has been of a centralised organisation. Not to go too far back in the Indian History, the Moghul Government at Delhi was, so to speak, the Imperial Government of India, and the firmans issued by the Moghul Emperors were obeyed in the Punjab as well as in Bengal and the Deccan. Later on, the Company Bahadur and still later the Government of India came into being, before the Provincial Governments were added to it, or created by it, and we were one of the latest additions. Realising that India is almost a continent, and marked variations of language, culture, dress, diet and physique and that it would be best to let the residents of different tracts develop on their respective lines of development, the British Government adopted the policy of, by stages, releasing them from the central bondage.

Political activity as such in India is about 50 years old. The Indian National Congress came into being in 1885. From 1885 to 1905 a number of political organisations in different provinces came into being but none of them achieved all-India importance. It was the All India Muslim League which tried a little later to represent the Muslims' political case, as it was felt that it was not fully represented in the Congress—may be through no fault of the Congress, and may be on account of the Muslims themselves, not having joined the Congress in sufficient numbers. Both the Congress and the Muslim League, came into being as central organisations, for the whole of India and undertook to open branches in the provinces with the desire that each province should have bran-

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

536
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 25

ches in the districts and then these districts should have branches in every town and village. The Congress organisation in some provinces was well developed and the All-India Muslim League, which came into being more than two decades later, made a little progress in some provinces and in the Punjab such success as was achieved by it was due to the efforts of the late lamented Dr. Mian Sir Mohammad Shafi, who devoted a great deal of his time and money and energy to develop the League in the Punjab and also to the zeal, enthusiasm and unflagging labour of my friends Pir Tajuddin, Malik Barkat Ali, Syed Mohsin Shah, Mr. Ghulam Rasul, Maulvi Fazl Din and Shaikh Umar Bakhsh. The relations between the Congress and the League became quite cordial in 1916 and remained so for a few years. This was the period during which they tried to secure what are called the Montague-Chelmsford Reforms which are in operation since 1921.

Up till 1921 the Government of India was the centralised Government and the Provinces were in its grip. The Montague-Chelmsford Reforms, as embodied in the Government of India Act, 1919, created diarchy and released the provincial Governments to a certain extent from the bondage of the Government of India both financially and administratively. This has continued from 1921 up till now and the new reforms which are to come into force next year mark a second stage in political development and this period of 15 years has brought in what is called the Provincial Autonomy and indirect election to one of the Central Legislatures. The Reforms are believed to render provinces free from a great deal of control, which was in the past exercised by the Government of India, and in a number of matters they have become more or less independent of the Government of India and deal direct with His Majesty the King Emperor through the Viceroy and the Governor-General. Thus the new Reforms mark the decentralisation of power, the change from centralised Imperial Government to autonomous provinces, constituting themselves into the United States of India, electing their own legislators for the centre to which legislators in the future Government of India will be partly responsible. This devolution of power, this provincial autonomy is believed to afford the provinces some chance to work out their own economic salvation and mark a distinct advance in the political life of the country.

We the Unionists, realising how India stands today, feel that we have no choice in the matter and must do our best to work the constitution which the British Parliament in its wisdom has decided to give us. We are not satisfied with it, but that is a separate matter, and for the present what we are keen on, is to find out what should be done to get the best possible service out of the reformed constitution which will be put into force next year. There is a very wide and general agreement among Indians of all schools of thought, that they have not had a fair deal in the matter of Dominion status being accorded to them. However, the British Parliament have said their last word for the present on the subject, and there is nothing more to be done by us, just now, except to submit. But let it be remembered that no Indian can take this as a decision in any way final. The struggle for further advance must continue and the claim for attaining Dominion status at as early a stage as practicable must be conducted with all the vigour and energy of which every one of us is capable.

SRI RAMAKRISHNA CENTENARY.

ALL-INDIA, BURMA AND CEYLON THESIS AND ESSAY COMPETITION.

The public are hereby informed that, under the auspices of the Sri Ramakrishna Centenary, Thesis and Essay competitions will be held all over India, Burma and Ceylon, on the lines indicated below. We earnestly hope that all irrespective of caste, creed or nationality, will take part in these literary competitions and thereby pay their tribute of love to the sacred memory of Sri Ramakrishna whose life stands before the world as a wonderful synthesis of all creeds and faiths:—

1. Thesis Competition: It is open to men and women of India, Burma and Ceylon. The competitors should possess the minimum academic qualification corresponding to M. A., M. Sc., etc., of Indian Universities. The thesis should be written in English on "The Philosophy of Sri Ramkrishna and its bearing on World Culture" and be complete in about 20,000 (twenty thousand words).

First prize: Rs. 200/- (two hundred only) in cash.

Second prize: Rs. 150/- (one hundred & fifty only) in cash.

II. Essay Competition:—

(a) Among College Students:—It is open to college students (both boys and girls) of all grades, belonging to educational institutions of India, Burma and Ceylon (Government, private or otherwise). The Essay should be written in English on "Sri Ramakrishna's Contribution to the Social and Religious Life of India" and should not exceed 4,000 (four thousand words).

For Boy-Students:—

First Prize:—Rs. 80/- (rupees thirty only).

Second prize: Rs. 25/- (rupees twenty five only).

For Girl Students:—

First prize: Rs. 30/- (rupees thirty only).

Second prize: Rs. 25/- (rupees twenty five only).

Each prize shall comprise a copy of "The Cultural Heritage of India" (the Ramakrishna Centenary Volume in two parts of about 2,000 pages of double crown octavo), one medallion and cash.

(b) Among School Students: It is open to all boys and girls of matriculation or corresponding classes in educational institutions of India, Burma and Ceylon (Government, private or otherwise). The essay should be written in their own mother tongues on "Sri Ramakrishna and His Teachings" in about 2,000 (two thousand) words. The competitors of this group are invited to write their essays in any of the following languages:—

(1) Assamese (2) Bengali (3) Burmese (4) Gujarati (5) Hindi (6) Kanarese (7) Marathi (8) Oriya (9) Gurumukhi (10) Sindhi (11) Sinhalese (12) Tamil (13) Telugu (14) Malayalam (15) Urdu.

There will be 60 prizes in all for school boys and girls. In each language group two prizes will be awarded to the best two essayists among the boys and two to the best two among the girls.

For Boys:—

First prize: Rs. 15/- (rupees fifteen only).

Second prize: 10/- (rupees ten only).

For Girls:—

First prize: Rs. 15/- (rupees fifteen only).

Second prize: Rs. 10/- (rupees ten only).

Each prize shall consist of valuable books and a medallion.

N. B. The thesis should be submitted in type or in legible handwriting to the undersigned on or before the 31st August 1936. The Essays should be written neatly and clearly on only one side of the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

537

paper and not on both sides, and should reach the undersigned on or before the 31st July 1936. The competitors should produce a certificate from the Head of the institutions to which they belong, to the effect that they are bonafide students of their respective schools and colleges. The results of these competitions will be announced in November 1936 and the prizes will be awarded at a general meeting to be held in February 1937 when the centenary celebrations will be brought to a close.

The names and addresses of the competitors should be clearly written.

Dated, Calcutta, the 26th March, 1936.

Sd. Swami Sambuddhananda,
Asst. Secretary,
Sri Ramakrishna Centenary Committee.
Albert Hall, 15, College Square,
Calcutta.

DEVADHAR MEMORIAL COMMITTEE.

An informal meeting of the friends and sympathisers of the late Mr. G. K. Devadhar, convened by the Servants of India Society was held in the Society's Home on the 18th instant to consider the steps to be taken to commemorate Mr. Devadhar's memory and to strengthen the finances of the Poona Seva Sadan Society. Her Highness the Rani Saheb of Sangli presided. Among those present were Mr. Jamnadas M. Mehta, the Mayor of Bombay, Lady Cowasjee Jahangir, Mr. J. A. Madan, I. C. S., Mr. K. Natarajan, Mr. D. G. Dalvi, Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale, Mr. B. G. Kher, Mr. Vaikunth L. Mehta, Mr. B. N. Motiwala, Dr. H. V. Tilak, Mr. Tatnis and Mr. K. J. Dubash.

Describing the selfless and varied uplift work carried on by the late Mr. Devadhar, Her Highness spoke about him in the following feeling terms:— "The cruel hand of death has snatched away from us the great leader who was the mainstay of the cause of women. A man with a heart less stout than that of Mr. Devadhar would have found it a difficult job in the earlier stages to have carried the torch of the emancipation of women as he did. All honour, therefore, to Mr. Devadhar for his ceaseless work, undaunted enthusiasm and great self-sacrifice. His death leaves his work unfinished and harder of accomplishment. That work has not lasted long yet in the country. It is, therefore, a sacred trust he has left us which should impel us who have faith in his ideal to take up the threads where he left them and to continue the work with the courage and enthusiasm evinced by him till the last moment of his life." Concluding Her Highness said:— "I feel sure that you are possessed with a consuming desire to help our women, to relieve their sufferings and to elevate them to their rightful place. I, therefore, appeal to you to take such steps as you will deem necessary to raise contributions in the city of Bombay to commemorate the memory of Mr. Devadhar which in my opinion can best be achieved by strengthening the financial position of the Seva Sadan Society."

After the President's speech and some discussion, the meeting decided to form a Devadhar Memorial Fund Committee to raise funds for the Poona Seva Sadan Society. Mr. Jamnadas M. Mehta, the Mayor of Bombay, is the Chairman and Messrs. N. M. Joshi, Vaikunth L. Mehta, Dr. H. V. Tilak and Mr. R. R. Bakhale are Secretaries of the Committee.

The following donations to the Devadhar Memorial Fund were announced:—Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Willingdon Rs. 1,000. Her Highness the Rani Saheb of Sangli Rs. 5,000; Sir Prabhaskar Pattani Rs. 5,000; Mr. M. R. Jayakar Rs. 1,000; and the chief Saheb of Aundh Rs. 500.

CATHOLIC PROSELYTISING OF HARIJANS.

"N. U." Manager, Gandhi Ashram, Tiruchengodu, South India, writes in the Hindustan Times.

The storm of controversy that raged over the mass conversion of the Harijans of Mettupalayam to Christianity and the purchase of their temple, has scarcely quieted down, when we come to know of another similar attempt at conversion and purchase of another Hindu temple by the same Roman Catholic Mission in the same taluk. The monsoon, which is ever known to be uncertain in the taluk of Tiruchengodu, has failed this year also, with the result that not only is there little work on the fields to give occupation to the ryot and the cooly, but great difficulty is experienced for drinking water. The condition of the agriculturist of these parts is well known, as also the recent plight of the handloom weavers of the whole of Salem district. While the suffering of the caste Hindus is acute, the suffering of the Harijans is necessarily worse. The plight of this helpless community is so pathetic that any description of it will fall short of the actual fact. It is just at this time that the Christian missionaries find it possible to convert them. The public is already aware of the details of the wholesale conversion of Mettupalayam and the purchase of their temple by the Missionaries. The present attempt of the same Mission to convert another Harijan village is given below.

Empalli (Perumampalayam) is six miles away from Tiruchengodu on the Tiruchengodu-Kokkarayanpet road. In this cheri there are about 60 houses. There is a Mariamman temple in the village owned by the Harijans. Of the sixty families, some have gone to the hills in search of labour. It was in this village that six years ago the London Mission people from Salem converted most of the people in the village to their faith. But at the end of five years, the converts found that there had been no betterment or change for good in their condition, except the change in their names. On their desire, in May 1935, a Suddhi ceremony was performed by the Arya Samaj representatives from Salem and no less than 59 persons were re-converted to Hinduism. After this representations were made to the Harijan Sevak Sangh regarding the urgent need of a well for drinking water for the village. The Sangha sanctioned Rs. 150 towards this and a well was dug for the village.

The French Roman Catholic Mission which was responsible for the conversion at Mettupalayam has now made overtures to the Harijans of the Empalli cheri and is taking advantage of the miserable condition of the Harijans. The monetary value of a conversion, so far as the individual converted is concerned, is gradually becoming smaller and smaller. What the Mission is doing is this: it offers 12 annas per individual per week for six weeks during which he has to attend the religious classes and at the time of Baptism, free clothing is given to them. This is the third week of their "spiritualising" labour.

What is objectionable here is that the economic conditions of these people should be exploited in this fashion, having no regard to canons of either morality or fairplay. Educated and civilized opinion of all religions of the world unequivocally condemns such mass conversions of illiterate villagers for petty considerations. These acts will be impossible, if there is a strong public opinion against them. It is not as if the public don't mind the pseudo followers of the Lord Jesus coming from far away places and purchasing people's souls for a handful of coins. The fact is that the Hindus have not yet shaken their apathy and realized the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

533

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 25]

realpatidar.com

result of their indifference. A public which is utterly callous, a Government which winks at every move either from inside or outside calculated to increase disruption and disunion among the peoples, the treatment meted out to the Harijans by the so-called higher caste people, all these are being fully exploited by the foreign missionary. But he must realize that he is doing no real service either to his religion or to the people whom he has purchased or to posterity by such unthinking and unreal conversions. These acts can only be characterised as vulgar. They cannot be called "conversions." Only when the mind has free play and the heart is in tune with it, real conversions can be effected.

We appeal to all caste Hindus, caste Hindu leaders, and newspapers which are vehicles of public opinion, to take the necessary steps to stop the rot. The members of the Legislative Council must take the matter in hand, see that pressure is brought to bear upon the Government to take a serious view of the situation. It is more than probable that refusing to take a lesson from the Mettupalayam temple affair in which a Hindu temple was purchased for cash, the French Mission will repeat the challenge in this village also and convert the "Mariamman Temple" into a Roman Catholic chapel. We are confident that all well-wishers of Hinduism and all real Christians will play their respective roles—properly, the former by inducing the caste Hindus to do their utmost to ameliorate the economic distress of the Harijans as far as may be possible and the latter by making the Mission concerned to realize the utter folly and the gross disservice it is doing to its own religion and to the people whom it has thought fit to misguide. We once again appeal to the public to realize the full implications of the issue and deal with it promptly.

WOMEN UNDER FASCISM.

In view of the Hibbert Journal having received letters from various sources alleging inaccuracy in a statement made by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, in her article under the above heading in the January 1936 number of the Hibbert Journal, the editor requested Miss Pankhurst to present precisely, the evidence upon which the contested statement was based. Miss Pankhurst in reply writes in the April number as follows:—"I have before me a copy of the Lateran Treaty, and a collection of all the State and Church laws and regulations arising from it, by Avv. Giambattista Migliori published by Casa Ed. "Pro Familia," Milan. These clearly give the condition of the law in Italy today on all matters touched by the Concordat for the use of students, lawyers and official persons dealing with these matters. In this document I find the Instructions of the Sacred Congregation (Sacra Congregazione per la Disciplina dei Sacramenti). In Capo II, 18, of these instructions are provisions of which the following is a literal translation:

"When the obstacle to the marriage proceeds from a previous civil marriage contracted by one of the two parties with another person, the parish priest (il parroco) will refer the case to the Bishop (l'Ordinario) who, if he thinks fit, will permit the religious marriage. This marriage cannot be inscribed in the civil registers of the State; therefore it is useless to notify it" (Art. 12 nn. e 2 della Legge.)

Capo III, 28 directs that State officials, soldiers, diplomatic officials, and all who are forbidden to marry without special State authorisation, may be given a religious marriage without civil consequences (cfr. Istruzione della Sacra Congregazione dei Sacramenti, April 2, 1909).

The instructions further direct that widows with pensions, and particularly war widows, may also receive the religious marriage carrying no civil rights, in order that the pension may not be withdrawn by the State (cfr. pero Istruzione della S. C. dei Sacramenti, January 25, 1927). These are the Church regulations issued by the Vatican.

The State law of May 27, 1929, N. 847, Article 12, declares that persons may not marry if they are already legally married to someone else, or in case of mental infirmity, but the Ministerial Circular of July 18, 1929, N. 2232, definitely states that the obstacles referred to in Article 12 of the law of May 27 above, impose no obstacles to the celebration of a religious marriage, but they prevent its registration. It must not be forgotten that registration of the religious marriage is "not a mere formality, but constitutes an act indispensable for the acquisition of civil rights."

The Ministerial Order of September 3, 1929, N. 2284, again clearly states: "Two persons already united by a valid civil marriage to others may later enter into a religious marriage celebrated by the priest, but this second marriage will have no legal value, and ought therefore not to be registered," unless it be in a special register merely for statistical purposes.

Hibbert Journal publishes with Miss Pankhurst's letter one from Anne Brock Griggs (for the British Union of Fascists) who says that the comparison between these laws and our own makes no allowance for the difference in outlook between the Latin and Anglo-Saxon. She adds: "Presumably the tendency to which Miss Pankhurst and those of her way of thinking take exception, is an accentuation in Fascism today of the woman as mother, and of her education for motherhood—a not unnatural reaction in Germany from the sordid days of the post-war period, in which even women themselves denied and dishonoured motherhood and its dignity."

The Editor announces that an article by the Reverend Father W. Dempsey, S. J. replying to Miss Pankhurst and dealing with the law and practice of the Catholic Church in regard to marriage, will be published in the next issue.

AN INSPIRING WOMAN.

(By Miss R. MOOSDEEN, HONGKONG.)

It was a cold gloomy day, so dull that even well-to-do people would feel uneasy in spite of their being able to afford a fire or radiator to temper the bitter weather less unendurable. The less fortunate folks will have to endure the unpleasantness with the only consolation that behind every dark cloud there is a silver lining.

Two children playing at the doorstep were indifferent to the cold, but a young lady looked up piteously towards the sky. There was no sun to dry the clothing and she would not be able to iron them for delivery and payment to meet expenses of the current day. A postman at the time threw in a letter; a youth picked it up, tore it open and his facial expression betrayed unmistakable signs of joyful expectations. "Mr. Yim has very good prospects to secure a job for me in his office and asks me to make a trip to Hongkong to interview his boss." He brought the cheerful tidings to his wife and then suddenly he frowned. "What is the matter, now?" the lady asked. "I think you are worrying about the travelling expenses, there is no cause for anxiety, we can sell or pawn some clothes not immediately required. It is unnecessary to have too many anyway, just sufficient is quite good enough."

Next morning everything was ready for George to set sail. After breakfast he remarked "I am very

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

539

realpatidar.com

sorry that I have to leave you penniless, but as soon as I am sure of getting the post I can ask Mr. Yim to advance me something to remit home." "If you can possibly help it, try not to borrow, you need not worry about me, I can manage to carry on for the time being; your clothing is not at all decent, so as soon as you can do it, make several suitably respectable ones. Managers like to see their staff well dressed, after you have replenished your wardrobe and procured other items of necessities, attention can then be paid to our domestic requirements," were the wife's parting words.

On arrival at Mr. Yim's, Geo was invited to breakfast and was brought to interview the manager. "I can personally sponsor for him," Yim said to the head when he intimated that the position was that of a shroff and that he ought to be bonded. Geo got the job and he sent his wife $400. Alas, that was the first and last time that he remitted anything until after the lapse of many years. It was Saturday night and Geo had two visitors. "We came purposely to ask you to go out with us and would accept no refusal as an answer," said Wong. George had previously declined at the office, but this time he thought he could not very well do so because they came personally to the boarding house, so he agreed. "Aren't you going to change into European dress?" remarked Cheung. "You look positively antique in those togs." "In that case, I think I had better not go," George said, glad to have an excuse for declining. "Never mind, never mind, don't listen to him," said Wong and dragged him out.

They reached Cecil Hotel by seven and did not have to wait long for their dancing partners. After introduction, Miss May asked whether George was a teacher and where he was teaching. "He is the compradore of our office" lied Cheung. To the inexperienced griffin the social flowers are certainly better than capable mothers and subtly encouraged the young man soon fell into the trap. He made it a rule to go and see Miss May after office and bought her a diamond ring, costly dresses and other luxuries. Dancing parties and musical evenings were thrown out unstintingly. He went so far as to marry her, forgetting the wife and four children at home.

It was a cold night and whilst others had retired to their cosy beds, the wife still sat sewing and the eldest child said, "Mother, aren't you going to sleep, it is so cold tonight." It was touchingly pathetic to the extreme. "I have promised to have the dress ready by tomorrow, girlie, you go to bed first to keep your younger brothers company." "I would like to hear a story first, mammy." "Alright, I will tell you a very interesting one. Once there was a young man who was very poor but honest, he worked for every cent and would never accept more than what he thought he deserved. Not long afterwards, he was well known for his honesty and was given a very good post and became rich. He never forgot his early trials and always thought of the poor. He was ever afraid that his parents could not live long enough to enjoy the luxuries of life and constantly tried to give them the best of everything." Though the stories varied every time, she always endeavour to convey to the children the moral it taught. When she finished her story the child kissed her goodnight.

Next morning they woke up early, it was not so cold as the night before yet the scene enacted in the house was none the less touching. In the midst of breakfast the second child asked "Are there any more dishes of rice." Feeling greatly aggrieved over the lack of food for her children, the mother checked back tears and said:

"We eat to satisfy hunger and not taste, and as the interval between this and the next meal is not too long, no one should take too much at a time." When the mother asked the daughter to take the dress back to their rich neighbour, the younger one cried saying "That is the dress papa took away, I want to keep it, I want to keep." But the Mother bravely said "I do not wish to imply that our neighbour is selfish but one dresses for warmth and not for show and unless we are so rich and can afford everything after thinking of the poor who have not enough warm clothing for the winter, we should not indulge in luxuries." No sooner had the kids been comforted, the rent collector came and pressed for payment; not being satisfied he had the house distrained. Mother and children were driven to a charitable institution and were given money for passage to locate George. Genuine and deserving cases seldom escape notice and they received proper treatment.

She had little difficulty in finding Mr. Yim who furnished her with Geo's address and an account of his doings. In no time she was ushered into the house. Dressed with the greatest simplicity, she had sorrow and hardship written all over her face. The other woman robed in the height of fashion was singing cheerfully with his violin played in accompaniment. Addressing the amah Geo, said "Who gave you permission to let her in", and then to the wife "Here is $10.00 take it and leave, who told you to come here?" "I don't want it, since your conscience allows it I will go away," and without another word she went out of the house. "Who is she?" enquired May. "Aren't you really well off?" she flashed, and realizing that he was an impostor and not really a wealthy compradore, she soon picked up a quarrel and left him.

When Geo reached his office the next morning he was confronted with nothing better; the manager detected that he had embezzled $1,000 and handed him over to the police. When he tried to plead for himself, Yim retaliated by saying "Besides being unfaithful to your manager, wife and friend you have been a most negligent father."

After seeing Geo, the wife patiently tried to earn a livelihood but for the sake of the children she would have done anything rashly. In the midst of her work she greeted a visitor—Mr. Yim—and she related how her husband treated her. "He can't take care of you even if he wants to; he misappropriated the firm's money and is now under arrest," informed the visitor. The poor wife was dumb-founded and he continued without interruption "I have thought of a way which can shorten his imprisonment, that is, if you will agree to it." "If it is within my power I will certainly do what you suggest, please tell me how," was the answer. "I can speak to the manager and get you to fill his place, but you must agree to accept half the salary only, the other half to be refunded to the firm as instalment to wipe out the amount of your husband's defalcation," said the Mr. Yim. "I am quite willing to work for quarter of the salary which is more than my present earnings, besides I can continue to give lessons after office," said the wife accepting the offer. "So that settles it; and I can speak to the boss tomorrow, can't I?" "Yes, please, words fail me to express how grateful I am to you and I am sorry that my husband abused your kindness, I can only hope he will have time to make retribution and treat his friend and benefactor fairly."

The boss yielded to the arrangement and was glad to find her a good substitute. She carried out her duties faultlessly in every respect. The lessons she gave were specially noteworthy; she would mould her lessons differently to suit her various pupils, the

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 25

dullest and laziest would be aroused by her painstaking and interesting explanations. In reply to Mrs. Yim's enquiry of how she can make the most tedious lesson interesting she said "I make it a rule to study the inclination of the pupil first and then alter the whole lesson to be appealing to him. I remember once I was teaching a sixteen year old lad who was unduly fond of pleasure and I told him a story of how knowledge is another way of spelling pleasure but pleasure is the disguised form of pain; he listened with great interest and after that he was completely changed.

Wherever she went she set a noble example. Lucky were those who came into contact with her. To the busy worker time is ever flying, and one fine spring morning saw husband and wife reunited; after the usual greeting Geo apologizing said, "I have been most inhuman and fully realize that what I have undergone was not half that I deserve and am ready to make amends." "If you can turn over a new leaf, let us bury the past, my prayer now is that you be an useful member of the community; in this time of our national weakness I have not been able to do any public service so what we have to do is not for ourselves but for our compatriots," inspired the wife.

On the advice of his wife Geo established a newspaper enterprise and edited many stimulating and encouraging articles on patriotism, the mother joined the Society for Protection of Children and their eldest child, a girl, joined the Ambulance Brigade, thus they played their parts to the best of their best individual ability.

Their prayer was soon heard and their country was elevated to the level of other countries.

One moonlight Saturday night, when everything was in symphony sublime, the husband said to her "You are working too hard, after office you have to take care of the house work, why not get a servant now we can well afford to have one". "Not that I want to stir up the past," replied the wife, "but my present work is only quarter of what it was when you were not yet reformed and as regards having a servant I detest that idea. Children ought to learn everything that is useful and without the mother's personal attention the girls would not be able to do any household work; besides it is very bad for children to be too much with the uneducated as most servants undoubtedly are. No one can have enough spare money to be lazy; as soon as there is any deserving person looking for a job, I am going to recommend him to the boss and give him my position. After our own comfort, not luxury, we should think of those less fortunate than ourselves, this is one of the many ways to strengthen our country in time of peace." What Mr. Yim has done cost him little, but now his house is frequented by two grateful visitors who are ever on the outlook to repay their indebtedness.

INDIANS AND MALNUTRITION.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Dear Sir,

I have learned from newspapers repeatedly of the malnourished state of the majority of the Indian population and I am greatly hurt.

Can't the better classes do something to improve their condition, whether through ignorance or poverty? Why not organize a Society for the Protection of Children to distribute milk, cod liver oil, oranges and other important diet. Donations can be solicited to defray the expenses.

Through the Indian Ladies' Magazine I know that lectures on Hygiene are being given and that relieves me a little; but I venture to suggest that stress must be laid on the point that when they are aware of their state they must not be disheartened and think only of how weak they are. On the other hand, they should take every precaution to guard and improve their health; above all not to worry because anxiety is the greatest handicap of physical fitness. Instruct them to employ their thoughts in finding ways and means to drive away any unpleasantness and assure them that then there will be no room for worry; that fresh air and sunshine are free to all—rich and poor alike, and that these are the chief factors of health.

Otherwise, instead of being profited by the lectures their resisting power will be reduced through being aware of their weakness—imagination is vivid. For instance:—A, who knew nothing about fresh air, entered a badly ventilated room, would not feel the effect till after a long time, whereas as soon as B got in he realized the want of ventilation and felt headache at once. What he should do is to open the windows and think nothing of ventilation.

Our motto should be, Light a candle, why complain of darkness? I venture to enclose an account of "an inspiring woman" (printed above) the end of which ought to be the picture of the majority, if not everyone, of the population.

Hongkong, {
2-4-36.

R. MOOSDEEN

NEWS OF THE WEEKS.

Can A Mahant Marry?—Writes the Darbhanga Correspondent of the Amrita Bazar Patrika:—Before the Subordinate Judge of Darbhanga a big case is going on for the last five months regarding the Mirzapore Asthal. The present Mahant Anand Das has married and the suit has been brought by his Chela Mahant Rambhushan Das who alleges that the Asthal belongs to the Vaishnava's of the Ramanandi Lashkari sect and according to the tenets of that sect Bairagi's cannot marry. It is also alleged that according to the usage and custom of the Asthal only a celibate Bairagi can become a Mahant and if a Mahant marries, he forfeits his Mahantship. The plaintiff claims to be the only 'chela' of the defendant and after his marriage he was declared to be the Mahant at a meeting of the Mahant's of the neighbouring Asthals of the district. The defendant's case is that the Asthal belongs to the Vaishnava Ramanuja sect and there is no prohibition against marriage according to the tenets of that sect. The defendant also denies that the plaintiff is his Chela and that neighbouring Mahants have no right to nominate or declare the plaintiff as a Mahant. The parties have examined a large number of witnesses about 160 in number including Mahants of various districts, namely Darbhanga, Muzaffarpur, Jaipur, Ajodhya, etc. to prove the respective customs alleged by each. The peculiar tenets of each sect, the principal deities of each whether they are Ramjanki or Lakshmi Varain, the 'tilaks' worn on the forehead by each are in dispute.

Postal Passport:—Identity cards which will remove all inconvenience and unpleasantness and eliminate all risks of fraud in taking delivery of insured letters, parcels and money orders have now been introduced by the Postal Department. With the advent of the hot weather the exodus to the hills has begun visitors at the Hill Stations often find it difficult taking delivery of registered or insured articles, parcels and money orders from the post office, because there is no one to identify them there.

The rules of the post office require identification before delivery. A great deal of inconvenience and unpleasantness can be avoided if the visitors availed themselves of the facility provided by the Postal Department, in the form of the Postal Identity Card. The traveller, before he leaves his place of permanent residence, should

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

541

apply for and obtain a Postal Identity Card, details about which are to be found in the Post and Telegraph Guide or can be obtained on application at the head post office. All that the visitor has to do is to produce a small passport size photograph of himself, get himself identified at the post office by any respectable permanent resident unless he himself is personally known to the postal staff of the office and to pay a fee of Re. 1/-. The card once issued is current for three years at the end of which period a fresh card is to be obtained. On production of such a card at any post office articles will be delivered to the person claiming to be the person mentioned in the identity card.

These Cards are equally useful to tourists, travelling representatives of firms and other members of the public who experience difficulty in establishing their identity in connection with postal transactions. It should be equally useful in establishing the identity of the holder in case of difficulties arising with railways, banks, police authorities and the like.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT - BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja, Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kelol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harli (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	" 20,00,000
RESERVE FUND	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirchand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)
Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharilal Desabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhaial Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrocks Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Ulap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuoorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Drott Road, Ballard Estate,

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

542

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[April 25

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.

BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,

3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches:—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000

Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000

Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Virangam (District Ahmedabad).
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulla (District West Khandesh).
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nashik).
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panch Mahals).
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.
Madhows D. Thackersey, Esq.	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.
R. G. Sarlaya, Esq.	D. W. Bant, Esq.
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.
B. N. Keshavn, Esq.	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) — — — Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

543

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and soap. And, because they are essentially Indian, they cost far less than silks of foreign manufacture.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents :—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.
Leading Stockists:—
1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by
Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombe

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 345.

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor :—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MAY 2, 1936. No. 35

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice : I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The Poona Riot.
The Willingdon Regime.
Frontier Policy.
Congress and Foreign Propaganda.
The I. C. S.
Converts and Property.
Mass Conversions and Catholicism.
The Ethiopian Situation.
The Ramakrishna Centenary.
The Sarda Act.

Bolshevism and Nazism.
The Lucknow Congress and After.
Wayside Reflections.
Mr. Rajagopalacharya on the Gita.
Third Class Travel.
Hindu Muslim Riots in Poona.
Removal of Caste Disabilities.
Study of Buddhism.
Catholic Conversion of Harijans.
Bombing on the Frontiers.

NOTES

The Poona Riot :—This is not the first occasion when a communal incident in some part of the country or a province has synchronised with a change in the Viceroyalty or a Governorship. The Poona riot is further remarkable in that the old capital of the Peishwas which is also the present summer capital of the Bombay Government, has been immune from communal trouble for nearly half a century. The Home Secretary to the Government of India implied in his statement in the Council of State that the riot was due to the District Magistrate of Poona having permitted something unusual, which should not have been permitted. The communique of the Bombay Government which we print elsewhere makes it clear that such a suggestion is misleading. An old Hanuman shrine had to be removed in order to widen and straighten an important road in a congested locality. A piece of land was granted to the worshippers nearby on which to house the shrine. Removal of a shrine for a public purpose does not involve any change in the ritual practices observed in the shrine. One of this is singing and playing on musical instruments as accompaniments of worship. The Hindu does not go before his God in fear and trembling. He rejoices to be in the presence of his Maker and likes to show that he does so. Nor does it matter to him whether the shrine is situated in a great temple or just under a tree by the roadside. When the Hanuman shrine was removed it followed as a matter of course that the worshippers were at liberty to worship in their customary way in the new shrine. We are unable to understand why the District Magistrate should have consulted Muslims as to whether their Hindu neighbours should be allowed to carry on their customary adoration in the new shrine. This practice appears to be common in Northern India but this is the first time that we hear of its being adopted in Bombay Presidency. Not only that but when the Muslim mob, in spite of the assurance graciously given overnight by its leaders, collided with the Hindus who were acting on the Magistrate's permission, he suddenly withdrew his permission! The Government of Bombay should lose no time in making it clear beyond the possibility of doubt that every community will be protected in the exercise of its civil rights and that their officers will not be intimidated by threats of mob violence from doing their duty. The Poona incident, although it has passed without more serious consequences than two killed and several not seriously injured, has produced a bad impression throughout India. Bombay has a reputation to lose in this matter.

The Willingdon Regime :—Commenting on the Reformer's criticism of Lord Willingdon's regime that it "put an end to the hope associated with civil disobedience of India being able to set an example to the world of carrying through a political revolution by entirely non-violent means", the Dnyanodaya points out that Gandhiji who originally favoured revolution was converted by Lord Irwin to the reformist point of view. This only makes the case against the Willingdon repressive regime stronger. The Dnyanodaya admits that Lord Irwin's policy was one that true statesmanship dictated. Lord Willingdon's was the very reverse of that policy. The first tried to discriminate between the good in the civil disobedience from the less good. The second aimed at destroying it root and branch whatever may be the consequence. Like the Chinaman in Elia's story Lord Willingdon burnt down the whole structure of what was meant to be a reign of law in order to roast pigs for his administrative table. The Indian political system is without the means of reforming itself in keeping with changing conditions. It is not a living, breathing entity; it is a machine operated from some six thousand miles away. But it has or can readily obtain powers to repress and suppress. Lord Irwin did not believe that suppression was the true remedy for Indian discontent and he resorted to it reluctantly, restricting it to the most urgent needs of the moment. His successor who made no secret of the fact that his policy had nothing in common with his predecessor's, recognised no distinction between violent and non-violent and, on his own showing, used the full resources of the State to repress both. The momentary success of the repressive measures relieved the pressure on the British Government and led to the reforms being whittled down to a travesty of

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

546

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 2

realpatidar.com

what the speeches of the Prime Minister and others at the first Round Table Conference led India to expect. Mr. Wedgwood Benn who as Secretary of State for India initiated the Conference, in an article in the Political Quarterly pointed out the gulf between the first and the third Conferences and the Joint Parliamentary Committee's Report. The Indian Reformists were as completely ignored as the Revolutionists in the Government of India Act. The Dnyanodaya's belief that the Hoare constitution represents the victory of the Reformists over the Revolutionaries, is, thus, without any foundation.

Frontier Policy:—Lurid light on the policy of what Lord Willingdon called "gradual penetration by consent and negotiation," and which, he said, if quietly and consistently pursued by his successors, would render the Frontier problem less troublesome, was thrown at a Conference held in London on April 7 under the auspices of the National Peace Council. A summary of the proceedings is furnished by the correspondent of the Amrita Basar Patrika. Two of the speakers were officers who had themselves taken part in Frontier operations. One of them, Commander Chamier, told the Conference that formerly aeroplanes could fly over the heads of the Pathans for only an hour but now the situation was changed. They could hang on the Pathan villages for three days at a stretch. He admitted that "delayed action" bombs have been and are being used on the Frontier. When a Pathan's house was raided the beam was first removed and burnt so that the Pathan would not be able to build another house. "They can get mud to build mud huts, but they have to come down to town to fetch wooden beams to erect those mud huts." The other officer, Captain Mumford, who spoke at the Conference was of a different type. He had also taken part in these operations but evidently he did not like them. Regarding the use of "delayed action" bombs he said that it was just as bad as using poison gas. We reprint the Patrika's report in another column.

Congress and Foreign Propaganda:—Mr. Subhas Bose has been carrying on a vigorous agitation for some time past for Congress propaganda in Europe. The Reformer has pointed out that the premises on which he based his plea were incorrect and that the advantages which he claims for such propaganda are more than doubtful. Babu Rajendra Prasad expressed a similar view. It was, therefore, a surprise when the Congress Working Committee at one of its meetings before the Lucknow session, passed a resolution authorising and directing the organisation of a Foreign Department of the All India Congress Committee with a view to create and maintain contacts with Indians overseas and with foreign countries. Mr. Subhas Bose had then announced his intention to return to India in spite of the official warning and the Working Committee was, no doubt, moved by it to adopt the resolution supporting his scheme. Since then some things have occurred to depress Mr. Subhas Bose's stock in Congress circles and there has also apparently been a cooler review of the circumstances surrounding foreign propaganda by an organisation officially sponsored by the Congress. That is how we explain the statement of the Congress President, Pandit Jawharlal Nehru, issued from Wardha this week. Said the Pandit: "I have long been in favour of our developing foreign contacts and a world outlook. But when we come to the manner of doing so, the subject is full of difficulty and under the present conditions in Europe and India I doubt if it is desirable or possible to have an official representatives of the Congress in foreign countries. This may come later. I imagine that well-known Congressmen can do good work in foreign countries even without special authorisation. Personally I would prefer to be such an independent Congressman when I go abroad than one whose words have to be weighed carefully lest they commit the Congress. Whenever I spoke in Europe during my last stay, I prefaced my remarks by saying that I did not speak officially in the name of the Congress and could not commit it. I did so even after election as President of the Lucknow Congress."

The I. C. S.:—The Secretary of State for India has issued new rules for the recruitment of members for the Indian Civil Service in England. The competitive examination system is to be diluted with a large dose of nominations. Indians are not to be allowed to enter the Service by passing the examination in London. What immediately led to the promulgation of the rules, is the paucity of British recruits for the Service through the open door during the last few years. A large proportion of persons who were appointed to the Service on the result of the examination in London, were Indians who preferred to try their chances there than in India where they have to encounter keener competition. Some men have been successful in entering the Service from London who had little chance of succeeding in the examinations in India. It is not that English candidates were not equal to Indians in passing examinations. But the pick of the successful men preferred the Home Service or even the Colonial Services to coming to India. The glamour of the great Indian Civil Service has ceased to attract them. This is largely due to the advertisement which the repressive laws have secured for the nationalist movement here. It is also due to a change in the mentality of educated Englishmen. Slogans like the White Man's burden and Trusteeship of Asiatic and African peoples, have become rather ridiculous. Whatever shred of respectability still attached to them, has been rudely torn off by the Mussolinian exploit in Ethiopia, which, he has more than once avowed, is in exact imitation of the colonialism of his censors in Europe and America. The new rules are an acknowledgment that it is no longer possible to get the pick of British intellectuals to join

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com 1936

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

547

the Indian Civil Service. They provide the re-fore for nominations to bring up the British personnel to fifty per cent of the total cadre. Eventually, the London examination will have to be abolished as the nominated men and the men who have come in by the examination door, will not be in the same class though they may receive the same pay and pension. The only rational mode of recruitment for an Indian Service is to recruit in India all candidates, Indian and English. We trust that the present changes are a precursor of that great reform. We are, therefore, not inclined to make a grievance of the closing of the English examination to Indians.

Converts and Property :—Whatever might have been the case eighty years ago when the Government of India passed a law securing the rights of apostates in their family property, at the present day when the vast majority of those who change their religion has no property to speak of, such a law would seem to have no more than an academic interest. The draft Mysore Bill, which we print elsewhere, may, therefore, be regarded as a concession to legislative convention rather than as called for by a practical necessity. If a man feels that his soul can find salvation only through abandoning his ancestral faith and adopting another, he is not likely, if he is sincere, to hang back because he can not take his possessions with him. However that may be, the Mysore Bill is carefully drafted so as not to place a premium on apostasy. In this respect it is an improvement on the British Indian Act. Conversion is sometimes nowadays a means of getting rid of marriage obligations in order to contract a fresh marriage not permitted by the religion in which a person is born. From a hasty perusal of the draft Bill, we gather that an effort has been made not to encourage this propensity. If a Hindu becomes a Christian in the hope of being able to get a divorce from his Hindu wife, he will not be able to do this under the Mysore Bill because it expressly provides that the Hindu wife will not have her status changed unless she herself wishes it by the apostasy of her husband. A Muslim who becomes a Christian can not divorce his wife by the procedure open to a Muslim.

Mass Conversions and Catholicism :—The Salem correspondent of the Hindu sends that journal an unbiassed account of the happenings in some villages in that part of the country. The villagers who are undergoing an intensive course of Catholic instruction, are not actuated by the motives of members of the corresponding classes in Bombay who are contemplating conversion to some other faith. They find that the Hindu gods have not helped them with timely and sufficient rains and they hope that the Christians' God may be more powerful. One of their number who had become a convert, has taken the earliest opportunity of re-tracing his steps, when he found that caste Catholics were as implacable as caste Hindus in their attitude to 'scheduled caste' converts. Catholicism is losing ground in Europe and is evidently anxious to find compensation for its loss here. It is obviously out of the question for caste Hindus to undertake to buy off the villagers who are now being prepared for baptism on a stipend of two annas per head a day. The ruling of the Madras Government that converts from 'the scheduled castes' are entitled to the same special concession as non-converts in education and other matters, considerably lightens the responsibility of proselytising missions and, in fact, it is likely to operate as an encouragement to them. The purchase of temples and the conversion of them into parish churches, has in it the possibilities of serious trouble.

The Ethiopian Situation :—Ethiopia has been making frantic appeals to the League of Nations, to the British Government and to women all over the world, to come to her help in her hour of dire distress. The League is still discussing what it should do and if it could do it. Its predicament today is scarcely less precarious than that of Ethiopia. The British Government has sanctioned a "sympathy loan" at six per cent to Ethiopia. The world at large is moved deeply by the impending fate of an ancient Empire but it can only act through its Governments and these are bound by their previous Karma. In this dreadful perplexity, nature has come to Ethiopia's aid. The rains have set in and the Italian Army which had counted on a victorious march on the capital, is obliged to call a halt. This is only a short reprieve. The Empire seems to be doomed. Italians claim to have occupied the region round Lake Tsana where British Soudan has vital interests. In reply to a question in Parliament as to the consequences of the Italian occupation, the Foreign Secretary stated that British interests were secured by treaties with both Abyssinia and Italy. The death of King Faud of Egypt this week is a fresh complication. His son and successor is a minor. A Council of Regency has necessarily to mark time. But affairs in Africa are moving furiously.

The Ramakrishna Centenary :—The Parliament of Religions organized by the Sri Ramakrishna Centenary Committee will commence its sittings on Thursday the 7th May in the Cowasji Jehangir Hall. Mr. M. R. Jayakar, Chairman of the Committee, will open the meeting which will be addressed by Sir S. Radhakrishnan. At subsequent meetings there will be several speeches by representatives of the important religions of India.

The Sarda Act :—The Guardian of Madras learns that some marriages are celebrated on a definite undertaking by the bride's party that they will pay the fines of both parties if any prosecution is launched by vigilance committees for breaches of the Sarda Act. We have no doubt that this is being done but we very much doubt if it is being done in a large proportion of marriages.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

548

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 2

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, May 2 1936.

BOLSHEVISM AND NAZISM.

A Reuter's telegram says that a surprising feature of the French elections, is the number of Communist gains. The Communists polled about half a million more votes than in 1932 and they are the chief gainers especially in the Paris suburbs and in the northern industrial Departments. This gives fresh point to Herr Hitler's contention that the Franco-Russian Pact is a menace to Germany. France has offered to submit the Pact for adjudication to the Hague Tribunal as regards its consonance or dissonance with the Locarno Pact. Germany has not agreed to the offer. Her reason is that the danger to her interests arises not so much from the actual terms of the Franco-Russian Pact as from its certain implications and future possibilities. In his memorable, if verbose, speech in the Reichstag on the day on which German troops marched into the demilitarised Rhineland, Herr Hitler pointed out that he had not objected to the French Pacts with Poland and Czechoslovakia because these nations were primarily interested in promoting their own national interests. He went on to say: "Soviet Russia, however, is the official organised exponent of a philosophy of world revolution. The goal of its State lies in the acknowledgment of its faith in world revolution. It cannot be determined whether in France this philosophy will not be successful tomorrow or a day after. Should this happen—and as a German statesman I must also consider this eventuality—then it is certain that this new Bolshevik State will be a part of the Bolshevik International, i. e., the decision over an attack or otherwise will not be reached by two different States according to their own objective considerations, but will be directed from one central place. This place, in case of such a development, would not be in Paris but in Moscow."

Herr Hitler believes that Bolshevism is an Asiatic poison threatening the vitals of European civilisation. He regards European nations as one family, sometimes quarrelsome, but spiritually, culturally and economically intimately related and, therefore, not to be separated from one another even in imagination. He shivers to think of what might happen to this European family through the onrush of this destructive and revolutionary Asiatic philosophy, if the chaos of Bolshevik revolution should succeed first in France, and later in other countries of the old thickly populated European Continent. Herr Hitler seems to have forgotten for the moment that the founder of the Bolshevik philosophy was a German. He was no doubt of Jewish descent but he had renounced the faith of his forefathers and was wholly and solely a product of his European and German environment. The German Chancellor was on surer ground when he expressed his incredulity in France and Russia entering into a Pact for mutual security without one of them—France—being influenced by the other in her ideas governing social and economic life. "I do not see the possibility," he said, "of making it clear to the German labourer the great danger and misfortune of a Bolshevik chaos in Germany as I see it, if I myself, as the Leader of the Nation, should enter into intimate relations with this very danger. Here also I will, as a statesman and leader of the people, do only that which I expect and demand from every one of my countrymen. I do not believe that a philosophy, an intimate relation with which would ruin a people, could be of use to a statesman." Herr Hitler assumes that when Bolshevism and European culture come in contact, the latter must inevitably go to the wall. Why should it? That this happened twice in Germany, may only show that the German variety of European culture was itself in a state of unstable equilibrium. French culture may not only be able to withstand Bolshevik influence but it may even be able to turn the tables on it. It is this possible objection to Herr Hitler's assumption that is weakened by the gains of Communists in the French elections.

We have remarked above that Bolshevism is not an Asiatic but is specifically a German product. Herr Hitler's description of it seems to us, Asiatics, to be highly distorted. "Not only the social human, economic or political conceptions collapse together and bury with them their hitherto existing representatives, parties, organisations and States," he told the Reichstag. "No, the world of supernatural ideas is demolished, God dethroned, the religions and churches out-rooted, the great Beyond destroyed, and a miserable existence here is being proclaimed as the only reality." Identical allegations are made of Nazism, though the Chancellor does not seem to know. What is more strange is that he attributed the political upheavals, economic nationalism and the militarisation of European countries to the Bolsheviks, while his own activities have materially contributed to these developments within the last two years. To the Asiatic there seems to be little difference in essentials between Bolshevism and Nazism, and what little there is, is certainly not to the credit of Nazism. One sure test of the worth and value of a civilisation is the regard which it pays to women and children, to the sick, the old and the infirm. Another is the importance it attaches to cultural freedom. A third is its attitude to races and creeds other than its own. Tried by all three tests Bolshevism emerges easily ahead of Nazism. We do not say that Bolshevism must necessarily be superior to Nazism in these matters. It is quite conceivable that in other countries and under other leaders the two may interchange their positions in these respects. We do not see why Bolshevism may not develop a religious side to it consistently with its economic ideas. Nor do we see any necessary connection between the Nazi conception of a totali-

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

549

tarian State and belief in God and immortality.

Our position, as repeatedly stated, is that each nation is entitled to find its own solution of its problems. The Russians have accepted Sovietism. No one has the right to pass judgment on their choice. Even so, Germans have rallied to Herr Hitler; and it is not for outsiders to criticise or condemn them for so doing. Likewise, we claim that the people of India have the right to evolve their own kind of State in consonance with their genius and traditions. We strongly object to any attempt to impose on India by its own or by foreign propagandists a system which has no root in the soil, which has merely been borrowed from abroad. The Nazi State is a military state; the Soviet State is an economic State. Far above both is the ethical State such as Asoka built up in India. It is to this ideal that Indian statesmen look for inspiration. It is our national ideal.

THE LUCKNOW CONGRESS AND AFTER.

Looking back on the three-day session of the Indian National Congress at Lucknow, one cannot escape the conclusion that it was primarily a Socialist gain though only a temporary one. It is true that the small band of Congress Socialists made little impression on the vast crowds gathered at the open session. But Pandit Jawaharlal's presidential address was an impassioned appeal for a Socialist programme and Pandit Jawaharlal's Working Committee contains three Socialist members—Acharya Narendra Deo, Buddhist and Marxist scholar, Mr. Jai Prakash Narain, Secretary of the Socialist Party, and Mr. Achyut Patwardhan. The next session of the Congress meets this December at Poona and it is believed that Mr. C. Rajagopalachari will preside over it. There are just nine months, therefore, for the Socialists to prove their mettle, for they can never hope for such representation under any other President—least of all, Mr. Rajagopalachari. Will they succeed in evolving a programme which will appeal to the country without alienating important interests? Their colleagues on the Working Committee will provide valuable ballast. Will they also hinder Socialist work? The answer to these questions lies in the proceedings of the Lucknow Congress. From the outset it was obvious to the observer that Pandit Jawaharlal was in no mood to dilute his Socialism even for unity. The President was unhappy in his isolation. A conservative Working Committee which sought to act as insulator to the Pandit, bore the brunt of his displeasure but even the Subjects Committee suffered from his impatience. Both orthodox Congressmen and Socialist dissenters welcomed his presidentship—for different reasons. The first because, as President, Pandit Jawaharlal would be compelled to show greater restraint than as a member of the Congress; the latter because his guiding a vast organisation would lend weight to their own group. "We do not want Pandit Jawaharlal to join our party," said one Socialist leader, "because it would mean his giving up leadership of a bigger political body." "Besides," he added significantly, "our discipline is more rigid." The discussion on the constitution was revealing. Pandit Jawaharlal had twice expressed his opposition to office acceptance. The Working Committee had demanded a postponement of the issue to a later date, and this was supported by leaders, like Mr. Satyamurthi, who favoured office acceptance. The Socialists, on the other hand, were anxious for an immediate decision against ministerships. Speaker after speaker put the Socialist case. Mr. Satyamurthi in a feeling speech appealed to his fellow-delegates to look at office acceptance not as a bid for power but as an opportunity for greater service. "I may not," he said, "be worthy to work as a minister for the Congress but surely our President is." Others, notably Acharya Kripalani advised against a hasty decision. It was certainly surprising to listen to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya pleading for non-acceptance of office and Babu Rajendra Prasad urging that ministerships were not necessarily against the country's interests. The adoption of the Working Committee resolution was, in the words of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, the "only means of preserving unity and it was passed on the second day by an overwhelming majority. If the inclusion of three Socialists in the new Working Committee brings about a change in the uncompromising attitude of that party, the future lies with the Congress Socialist group. Men, like Babu Rajendra Prasad who has a unique experience of village life and work, Seth Jammalal Bajaj, Dr. Khan Saheb and Mr. Jairamdas Doulatram have considerable sympathy with Socialist ideals as regards the masses. They feel, however, that the programme of that party is theoretical. Can the Socialists convince these Working Committee members of the possibility of their evolving a programme for the country? The best man to bridge the gulf between the orthodox Congress leaders and his group is Acharya Narendra Deo, respected by his older colleagues, looked up to by his younger comrades. Will he rise superior to the theory of Western Socialism? The working out of a constructive programme will do more than bring unity to Congress ranks. "It was possible," writes Romanoff in 'The New Commandment', "to rouse the young generation at any time for heroic exploits. But in everyday life which required stubborn matter-of-fact energy directed towards the distant goal of the creation of a new state, it revealed itself as being lazy, inefficient, lacking self-discipline, lacking completely any creative instinct. Everyone was prepared to obey orders. But when no orders were forthcoming and individuals were left to themselves, all activity either stopped or manifested itself only in destructive forms. Besides that, many gave proof of

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

550
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 2

a depressed mood for it seemed to them that, after tremendous tension, there was nothing for them to do. Their inner enthusiasm clashed with their complete helplessness and inability to begin life under peaceful conditions." The Indian problem today could not be better described. More important than the question of office acceptance which, after all, can affect only a hundred leaders—and what can even Congress ministers do in provinces on the verge of bankruptcy?—is the difficulty in conserving the confidence of the people in themselves. Will our leaders allow academic differences to cloud the issues? The Working Committee has just finished its meeting at Wardha. Its decisions have been kept secret and the public is only told that there was a crisis in its deliberations, which was narrowly averted by the intervention of Gandhiji.

WAYSIDE REFLECTIONS.

Replying to an address presented to him by the Navayug Youth Sanstha at Agra where he had been to attend the Hindu Conference, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya gave much wholesome advice to the youth of the country. He exhorted them to cultivate reverence for all religions, to admit antyajnas freely to wells, temples, schools, meetings, roads and burning ghats, and to make themselves physically strong. "Learn wrestling," he said. "Even, if there be no school there must be a gymnasium. I am of the opinion that if a boy can not wrestle he should not be married." What about girls? We are sure Panditjee would wish them also to learn wrestling. He told his hearers to consume a lot of milk and to keep cows. The milk of a cow, he added, is better than that of a buffalo. Perhaps, it is. But we doubt if he was right in his dictum that the use of buffalo's milk makes one's intelligence like that of a buffalo. In Bombay buffalo's milk is practically the only milk available. Cow's milk costs more and is often only diluted buffalo's milk. In the United Provinces, on the other hand, cows' milk is largely consumed. Can it be said that the average Bombay man approximates more to buffalo-intelligence than the average Agrawalla? Ass's milk is said to resemble closely mother's milk in its composition and nutritive value for children. Does it make them assinine? Some people prefer goat's milk as it is said to be free from tuberculous germs. Do such people become goatish? An observant doctor friend told us some years ago that in certain restaurants which start business in the small hours of the morning, canine milk was served with tea and that bitches were kept on the premises for that purpose. Are those who take their early tea at these shops, more faithful than those who take their tea with or without bovine milk?

There are very few Islamic newspapers conducted in English. One of these is the Islam, organ of the Anjuman-i Khuddam-ud-Din, of Lahore. In the issue of April 22, there is an article, headed "Islam in Poland," by Abdul Hamid Hourmovitch, evidently a Muslim Pole himself. Mr. Hourmovitch begins by saying that, after the Great War, in the independent Republic of Poland as reconstituted by the great chief, Marshal Pilduski, there did not exist any lay or religious organisation that could gather together the Mussulmans of that country. Immediately, he adds, that these Mussulmans numbering ten millions (in words) were dispersed all over the country, faithful to their adopted fatherland. Ten millions! The total population of Poland, one remembered, was less than 30 millions, and if ten millions were Muslims, they would be a formidable minority in the country, more even than in India especially, as according to Mr. Hourmovitch, they occupied high offices in the army, judiciary, banks, high schools and the medical and other departments, and the greater part were cultivators. One turned in perplexity to the Encyclopaedia Britannica. It does not give much information about the religious communities of Poland but it gives a general idea of how they are distributed. The Roman Catholic religion embraces 75% of the population, the Greek Orthodox Church, 3,100,000 the Lutheran and Calvinist Churches, have 1,019,000 worshippers, Jews number 2,800,000 and "the small Mohammedan community," less than half a million!

The Sunrise, the weekly English organ of the Qadian sect, published in Lahore, prints in its current issue an interesting account by Maulvi A. R. Dard Imam of the London Mosque, of his visit to Spain, where Islamic Imperialism achieved its greatest triumphs and also suffered its greatest reverse. The Maulvi gives a very depressing description of the Spaniards. Each and every village and town, he says has a public square where men, young and old and small girls seem to be always idling about practically the whole of the day. "They crowd round a car which happens to pass through the square, some of them look like 'crooks' and the majority of them are very shabbily dressed. In appearance they seem to be dirty and horrible." Nine out of ten, whom the Maulvi questioned, assured him that they were proud of their Moorish ancestors. A man who was a Jew from his father's side and a Moor from his mother's, told the Maulvi emphatically that if he were to change his religion he would become a Muslim. Maulvi Dard saw the Governor of Cordova and asked him what the attitude of the Spanish Government would be if a Muslim came to Cordova, bought a piece of land and built a mosque for the purpose of religious worship, telling him that there were mosques in London, Paris and Berlin. The Governor replied that Government would have no objection to it but added in a rather humorous manner, that "we should be prepared for the Jesuits." "Perhaps," comments Maulvi Dard "he meant to say that as the Christians drove out the Muslims before, they might do so again." The Governor also told him that the Spanish State had no religion, and the Maulvi gathered from the interpreter that the working class is Socialist and they do not care for the Roman Catholic religion, except on occasions of marriage and death.

Last week's Reformer reprinted an article from the Hindustan Times relating how Catholic Missionaries were working to proselytise drought-stricken villages in Salem district, Madras Presidency. The forerunners of these missionaries followed somewhat different methods. The Catholic Examiner in a leading article on "Fr. De Nobili and the Guru" gives an account of how this seventeenth century Jesuit converted "the Guru." De Nobili disowned with "the Guru" for twenty days, taking one topic for each day. The first day's debate is thus described by the Examiner:

The subject of the conversation was the multiplicity of gods and creation. The Hindu Doctor readily admitted the Christian Doctrine of the unity of God, after the exposition of the ordinary arguments drawn from the infinite perfection and absolute independence of the Divine Nature. To bring him to admit the Christian explanation of the creation was more difficult. The philosophers of the country, starting with the principle that out of nothing nothing can be made, admit three eternal elements: "padi" or God, "pasu"

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

551

or the substance out of which God produces souls, "pasam," or the matter out of which God forms bodies. To this theory the Father opposed the usual philosophical argument that if matter or the soul were not created, it would be God; and that if God could not create or make out of nothing, He was not Almighty and consequently not God, for his action like the action of secondary causes, was limited to the modification of existing matter. When this argument had been fully developed and illustrated by many comparisons, the Guru acknowledged that the Hindu theory was founded on a false notion of the Divine Nature.

The Saiva Siddhanta of which pathi, pasu and pasam are postulates, has a very elaborate philosophy behind it. The monistic philosophy of Shankaracharya was well-established and had its principal centres in the region where De Nobili worked. "The Guru" who was converted by the casuistry of the Jesuit as stated by the Examiner, was a bogus Guru. Anyhow the conversion of this man did not affect Hinduism in South India. There can be no better proof of the failure of De Nobili's method than that it has been abandoned by his successors.

MR. RAJAGOPALACHARYA ON THE GITA*.

On the morrow of the sweeping victories for the Congress Party in Madras Presidency, which were largely the result of his vigorous propaganda, at the last general elections to the Legislative Assembly, Mr. C. Rajagopala Charya took political India by surprise by announcing that he had decided to retire from politics. He gave no reasons that we remember. It seemed as if he was seized by a sudden revulsion like Arjuna and in somewhat analogous circumstances. For several months he was not heard of in the political world. A few weeks ago came the rumour that he contemplated re-entering the political arena and had, in fact, done so by agreeing to be elected to some local Congress Committee. He went as a delegate to the Lucknow Congress and is now a member of President Pandit Jawaharlal's Cabinet.

When he retired from politics, the only intimation which he vouchsafed to the world regarding his intentions, was that he proposed to devote himself to the study of the Bhagavad Gita. The unpretentious little book of a little over one hundred pages entitled, "The Bhagavad Gita, abridged and explained, setting forth the Hindu creed, discipline and ideals" which Mr. Rajagopala Charya has published for the Federation of International Faiths, may be taken primarily to indicate the sequences in the process, of the author's return to politics after his retirement from it, set up by his study and reflection of the Gita teachings. Perhaps, the stanza which had a decisive influence is that which he has translated as follows: "Impelled by the motion of your own nature, that which from ignorance you desire not to do, even that helplessly you will do." This couplet at a crisis turned the scale in a balance which seemed to be incapable of inclining on either side even by a feather's weight, in the experience of this writer.

Mr. Rajagopala Charya has summed up the teachings of the Gita by commenting on 227 out of the 700 slokas which comprise the text. These 227 slokas include every one which at one time or another impressed itself on this writer's mind in his many ramblings over the Gita. The sloka which Mr. Rajagopala Charya translates at page 100, had long remained undistinguished. Only recently did it dawn on this writer that it contained the whole teaching of the Gita in a nutshell. Mr. Rajagopala Charya translates it thus: "The performance of one's own duty is worship of Him from Whom have emanated all beings, and by Whom all this is pervaded, and thereby a man attains the goal." Work is worship. The stanza preceding this may be freely paraphrased to mean that every one by minding his own business will best further his own and also others' salvation. The Gita does not obviously think of 'duty' as that which arises from extraneous circumstances or has to be performed because one derives his livelihood from it. It is the "stern daughter of the voice of God" which a man must obey or spiritually perish. The duty which the Gita has in view is the duty imposed on a man by his own nature. That is what is svadharma death in which is preferable to success in another's dharma.

* Hindustan Times, Ltd., Delhi, Annas six.

Though the Gita thus leaves each man to realise what his dharma is, it also gives some hints as to what it is not. "Let no man who has attained knowledge unsettle the mind of ignorant people who are moved by attachment to the results of action; but himself following the rule of yoga let him render all action attractive." The only way of raising the masses countenanced by the Gita is setting a good example by men of light and leading. For example, if a man thinks socialism is good, he should first socialise himself. (First step in the process is to learn to suffer fools gladly.) Preaching socialism to the masses, and making them discontented with their lot, is not a method which the Gita would sanction. Mr. Rajagopala Charya's book is well written and there is no attempt at mystification, so common in books about the Gita.

THIRD CLASS TRAVEL.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The income per head is so absurdly low that the wonder is, not that the people do not travel great distances within the country but that they do travel even the short distance they do. Indeed, poverty is the root-cause of many ills in this land. It would be an uphill task for any reformer to raise the status of the masses. Perhaps a sustained propaganda, a persistent policy and a continuous programme may be able to turn the first sod in an extensive field which requires years of active negotiation. And what about the facilities for third class passengers?

The opening of the booking office half an hour before time, though the notice says it is open at all hours, the rush of passengers to the window, the risk of a physical injury or the loss of the little money that one has, the passengers being made to stand all in a disordered state, the forcing down through a narrow gate just before the arrival of the train or if it is at the arrival of the train, the jostling of the crowds getting down from the train, the haste and hurry to get into the nearest compartment which is often over-crowded, the generally crowded condition of almost every compartment, (I am speaking of the M. S. M. Ry., and the S. I. Ry.) the peculiarly narrow width of seats which makes lying down impossible and sitting uncomfortable even for a short journey, let alone, long distance journeys, the wretched condition of some ill-swept carriages and loose planks where bugs feed in large numbers, the absence of adequate facilities for visiting nature in the lavatories—all these can only suggest the picture of third class travel. And here we have not alluded to the treatment given to the third class passengers by the Railway servants.

It is a pity that while the bulk of the coaching receipts comes from the third class passengers, the comforts are not at all commensurate with them. It is unnecessary for any one to suggest that these

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

552
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 2

conditions not only hold out an alluring prospect for the men bent on deceiving the company but also compel even some well-meaning passengers to resort to ticketless travel under certain unavoidable circumstances. Anyway these numbers pale into insignificance beside the beggars who are the uninvited guests of the Railway Company. If they are obliged to get down at one station, it is only to get into the next train at the same station or the next station. If a committee were appointed by the Railway Member to investigate into the conditions of third class travel, he will light upon certain facts in the situation of which he would never have dreamt before. I am sure that the number of people who have practised ticketless travel as a fine art, must be so negligibly small that any legislation to check ticketless travel (III class travel at any rate) will be uneconomic, unprofitable, and, therefore, ill-advised. On the other hand, a careful study of the problem will convince any shrewd thinker of the need for better comforts for the third class passenger and for legislation on this account to safeguard his interests. Any one who means seriously to dispute my proposition will do well to travel third class on the S. I. Ry., and the M. S. M. Ry., I presume that the conditions of travel in North India cannot vary widely.

One or two other points deserve our attention. The principle governing Railway rates for goods is to "charge what the traffic will bear." The Railways being a business concern, the basis is reasonable. But the principle seems to operate prejudicially on indigenous industries. It is found that the rates for goods are so determined as to favour long-lead traffic to and from the ports at the expense of short-lead traffic. And the same principle might hold good in passenger traffic too. There is a feeling that the rates in India are lower than in other countries. It might be true, but the rates have to be examined in relation to the income per head, which is admittedly the lowest figure in the world. On this account any proposal to enhance either the rates or the fares might be fraught with undesirable consequences. This has to be kept in mind by the Government of India particularly so, because of the serious competition presented by buses in short-lead traffic both of men and goods.

Chittoor.

A. S. VENKATARAMAN.

HINDU MUSLIM RIOTS IN POONA.

The Director of Information, Bombay, has issued the following details regarding the riot in Poona on April 24th:

The Sonya Maruti Shrine formerly occupied a niche in the wall of a house in Rawivar Peth in Poona City. As a result of road widening, the house was set back and permission was given last year for the reconstruction of the Shrine on a small area of the public road. Prior to the change, the Hanuman Jayanti had ordinarily been celebrated at the Shrine with music.

When the reconstruction of the Shrine on the public way was sanctioned by the District Magistrate it was laid down that there should be no obstruction to the public and the Trustees agreed to give a written undertaking that music would not be played in front of the Shrine. This written undertaking was, however, not received and, when the time for celebrating the Hanuman Jayanti approached, the District Magistrate, on receipt of a request for permission to play music from the 6th April till the 23rd April, passed an order under Section 42 of the Bombay District Police Act prohibiting the playing of music at the Shrine or at any public place within 30 yards thereof.

Later, the Trustees of the Shrine approached the District Magistrate for permission to worship with music on the last day of the festival only, representing that the feelings of the Hindus had been seriously stirred by the prohibitory order. The District Magistrate invited prominent Muhammadans of the city to discuss the situation. They admitted that no objection had been offered by their co-religionists in the past, probably because the Shrine had not been in such a prominent position. After further discussion and careful consideration, the District Magistrate passed an order on April 23rd permitting worship with soft music on the 24th in front of the Shrine with restrictions as to times of play and on condition that no obstruction was caused to traffic.

On April 24th morning at 9 a. m. when the Hindus commenced worship, Muhammadans collected near the Shrine in increasing numbers but were kept moving by the police. Later, another crowd of Muhammadans came towards the Shrine shouting "Din, Din". On their being pushed back other Muhammadans arrived and commenced flinging stones and bricks at the shrine. More Hindus came on the scene and retaliated by throwing stones. The rival crowds were separated and pushed back by the police out of stone's throw. Members of both sides had lathis and several police were injured. Eventually the Hindus were prevailed upon to discontinue the worship and the crowds were advised to disperse.

At 12 noon the situation became more serious as Muhammadans began damaging the property of Hindus. At one spot a party of Muhammadans met a party of Sikhs armed with drawn swords. The Muhammadans were driven back by the Police after which they attacked a toddy shop. This was followed by an attack by Hindus on a Mosque which, with three adjoining shops, was almost entirely destroyed. Two Hindu shrines were also destroyed by Muhammadans. As the situation was deteriorating, the Military were called out and entered the City at two points at 4 p. m. Their presence was immediately effective and crowds dispersed. Though isolated cases of incendiarism were reported, the evening and night were quiet.

On the 25th extra Police arrived and the situation was almost normal until the late afternoon when the news of the death of a Muhammadan who had been injured the previous day spread through the Muhammadan quarter in Mithi Ganj. Excitement also broke out in the neighbourhood of the Tamboli Mosque when it was observed that a Muhammadan tomb on the Laxmi Road was damaged. Generally, however, conditions throughout the City were practically normal, shops being closed only in areas where excitement ran high. Troops were withdrawn from the City during the morning on the arrival of police reinforcements. Owing to the wide affected area and the fact that numerous injured were not taken to hospital, it has been difficult to ascertain accurately the total figure of casualties. The latest available figure is one hundred and fifty-nine including twenty-nine police. Among this total are many who are but slightly injured and only twenty-six have been detained in hospital. In addition to the death of the Muhammadan already referred to, the death of a Hindu was reported on Sunday morning. Neither the Military nor the Police resorted to firing at any stage. Saturday night was completely quiet and the situation is well under control.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

553

REMOVAL OF CASTE DISABILITIES.

MYSORE DRAFT BILL.

The Mysore Government have published the draft of a Bill to remove certain disabilities arising from change of religion or deprivation of caste, for general information. All persons interested in the matter have been invited to send their opinions to the Chief Secretary to Government within two months from this date.

The bill reads as follows :

Whereas it is expedient to remove certain disabilities arising from change of religion or deprivation of caste, it is hereby enacted as follows :

1. (I) This Regulation may be called the Regulation for the removal of religious and caste disabilities.

(II) It extends to the whole of Mysore.

(III) It shall come into force at once.

2. No person and no heir or representative of such person shall, merely by reason of his having renounced or being excluded from any religion or of his being deprived of caste,

(i) be divested of any vested interest to or in property;

(ii) be deprived of any right of inheritance or personal right;

provided that no person and no heir or representative of such person shall by reason of this enactment be entitled to retain or acquire any property or right, or to exercise any right peculiar or only appropriate to the religion which he has renounced or from which he has been excluded or peculiar or only appropriate to the caste of which he has been deprived.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

(a) A is a trustee for an endowment of his religion. Out of that endowment he is entitled to provide for his own residence and maintenance. On being converted to another religion, he will cease to retain his interest in the endowment.

(b) A, a Hindu with vested interest in joint family property, is converted to Christianity. He will, on conversion, retain his interest in that property, but without the incidents peculiar or only appropriate to members of a joint Hindu family.

(c) A, a Hindu, dies leaving him surviving a legitimate son B, a converted Christian. A, before his death, has disposed of his property by a valid will. A's property will follow the disposition of that will.

(d) A, a Mussalman, with four legally married wives, is converted to Christianity. A, after his conversion, will not be able to divorce them by ceremonies under the Mahomedan Law.

(e) A, a Hindu with Hindu sons, becomes a Mussalman. After conversion, he will not be able to exercise the right of a Hindu father to give one of his Hindu sons in adoption to a Hindu.

(f) A Hindu Brahmin voluntarily renounces his caste rules and becomes an ascetic. He will not be affected by this Regulation.

3. No person and no heir or representative of such person shall, by reason merely of another person having renounced or being excluded from any religion or being deprived of caste

(i) be divested or deprived of any property, right of inheritance or personal right which he would have held had such other person remained in that religion or caste;

(ii) be forced to any act or to suffer any act inconsistent with or not appropriate to his own religion or caste.

Explanation : The religion or caste of any person shall be presumed to be that in which he was born. A court shall, till the contrary is shown, presume that it is for the advantage of a minor to remain in the religion or caste in which he was born.

(a) A and B are Hindu full brothers and C, their half-brother. A becomes a Christian. B's right of inheritance to A will not be affected by C, becoming a Christian.

(b) A, a Hindu, having a share and a right to live in the joint family house, becomes a Christian. He cannot, contrary to the will of the Hindu members of the family, enforce his right to live himself in the joint family house.

(c) A, a Christian man, has a Christian wife B. A becomes a Mussalman and marries a second wife by ceremonies under the Mahomedan law. A will remain liable for the maintenance of B, and B will retain her right to divorce him, if she chooses according to the law applicable to Christians. But A cannot enforce against her any conjugal rights, nor divorce her, except, for reasons and in the manner allowed by the law applicable to Christians.

(d) A, a Christian man, with minor Christian children, becomes a Mussalman. He will remain liable for their maintenance. But he cannot enforce against them any right of guardianship inconsistent with their religion such as circumcising his minor sons or giving his minor daughters in marriage to Mussalmans with ceremonies which subject them to Mahomedan law.

(e) A, son of B, a Hindu, becomes a Christian, and is consequently deprived of caste. B will have the same right of adoption as he would have had if A had become an out-caste or disqualified son while remaining a Hindu; but the adoption, if made, will not operate to deprive A of property or rights to which A is entitled under Section 2 of this Regulation.

(f) A, son of B, a Hindu, becomes a Christian. After the conversion of A, another son C is born to B. C will have the same rights in respect of ancestral property as he would have had if A had remained a Hindu; but the birth of C will not otherwise affect the rights of A under Section 2 of this Regulation.

STUDY OF BUDDHISM.

Presiding over "the Buddhistic Section of the Indian Cultural Conference" held recently in Calcutta Dr. B. C. Law said:—

It is encouraging to find many people of Asia and Europe interested in the study of Buddhism and Buddhist thought. Buddhism spread almost all over the continent of India as well as far distant countries such as Central Asia, Ceylon, Burma, Siam, Cambodia, Java, Korea, Japan, Annam including ancient Champa, Nepal, Bhutan, Sikkim and Tibet. As a matter of fact Buddhist India is Greater India. Much has been said about its importance but here I shall confine myself to a few points regarding the sources for a proper study of Buddhism. The Theravada Buddhism is found in Pali texts and commentaries. The three Pitakas supply invaluable materials for this branch of Buddhism in all its aspects. They are very rich in materials for reconstructing a secular and religious history of India. They also throw a flood of light on the philosophical and cultural aspects of the period with which they deal. We must always remain grateful to the Pali Text Society of England and especially to the late T. W. Rhys Davids and his talented wife Mrs. C. A. F. Rhys Davids for the indefatigable

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

554

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 2

realpatidar.com

labours done by them for printing and publishing a major portion of the Pali texts and commentaries and making them accessible to the reading public. Besides, other Buddhist Societies of Europe, as for example, German Pali Text Society, Buddhist Society of Great Britain and Ireland, American Buddhist Society, Buddhist Society of Copenhagen, did much to further the study of Buddhism and some of them are still doing good works in this field of Buddhism. In this connection we should not forget the labours of Indian, Sinhalese, Burmese and Siamese scholars, some of whose publications may be taken as standard works of Hihayana Buddhism.

In order to arrive at a real significance of Buddhism we have to study carefully Mahayana Buddhist Sutras; and specially such Mahayana works as Vasuvandhu's Abhidarmakosa vyakhiya, Nagarguna's Madhyamikakarika, Lankavatara Sutra, Asanga's Sutralankara, Asvaghosa's Buddhacharita and Saundarananda Kavya, Santideva's Bodhicaryavatara and Sikkhasamuccaya, the Lalitavistara, Mahavastu and Livayavadana. We are greatly indebted to European, Indian and Japanese scholars for their invaluable services to Mahayana Buddhism, but we should not forget in this connection the labours of two Bengalee savants, Rajendra Lal Mitra and Haraprasad Sastri, who devoted their whole lives to the study of Mahayana Buddhism. Jaina Agamas help us greatly in the elucidation of many subtle problems of Buddhism.

Tibetan Buddhism can be well studied by referring to such works as (1) Tibetan Dulva which is not completely devoted to recording the rules and regulations of the Buddhist Order but it contains Jatakas, Avadanas, Vyakaranas, Sutras and Udanas. (2) So-sor-thar-pa or a code of Buddhist monastic laws which is nothing but the Tibetan version of Pratimoksa of the Mulasarvastivadin school. This text has been edited and translated by Mahamahopadhyaya Dr. Satish Chandra Vidyabhusana. It is well received in Tibet and is recited in every respectable monastery, and lastly (3) to the celebrated Tibetan collection known as Kangyur or Tanjur, a systematic treatment of this valuable collection is greatly desired. The Tibetan Dictionary compiled by the late Rai Bahadur Sarat Chandra Das is a stupendous and single-handed work. The late Rai Bahadur rendered a distinct service by founding a Buddhist Text Society for the publication of Buddhist works especially in Sanskrit and Tibetan. The late Dr. Vidyabhusana's Medieval Indian Logio is a valuable introduction to the study of the extensive field of Buddhist Nyaya literature.

As regards Chinese Buddhism, the monumental work by Bunyiu Nanjo known as the Catalogue of Chinese translation of the Buddhist Tripitaka should be in the hands of every student of Buddhism as it is the real guide in the bewildering contents of the Chinese three pitakas. The Japanese Buddhism owes much to India as in Japan Buddhism has been a great ethical, religious and artistic force. All important Japanese sects are Mahayanists. Japan is very much under the influence of Confucianism.

Coins, inscriptions, sculptures, monuments and architecture should not be left unconsidered for a better understanding of Buddha's doctrine. The literary remains of Khotan and Eastern Turkistan must not be neglected as they are of great importance in the cultural history of Buddhism. Traces of Buddhism are also found in Tantras and Mantras. Some subtle points of Buddhism are made clear by a careful study of the Upanishadas and the general philosophical literature of India.

A comparative study of Buddhism is essential and one source is a link to the other; therefore we cannot do justice to a proper study of Buddhism unless all the source are carefully considered before arriving at a real understanding of this world religion.

I must record here our indebtedness to the late lamented Sir Ashutosh Mookerjee, the greatest and the ablest Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University, who fostered and furthered the study of Pali and Buddhism. His encouragement was a source of inspiration to many students and scholars alike. His death is a great loss to the Buddhist studies in India.

CATHOLIC CONVERSION OF HARIJANS.

(From a Hindu CORRESPONDENT.)

As public interest is being roused with regard to the conversion affair in the Harijan Cheri of the Hemapalli village in Tiruchengode Taluk I visited the village this morning and the following are the details gathered:

The place is a deserted-looking unimpressive village. The very first man I met told me that he and the members of about 60 houses in that cheri had consented to join Catholicism and were attending the catechism classes, in the morning and evening. The classes to these Harijans are held about break of dawn for about one hour and in the dusk time. The rest of the day the Harijans spend in their homes or in the streets. For the time being, they do not go out in search of work nor even to attend to their fields, which many of them own. The man I referred to told me further that since the last two years rains had failed and that their fields lay uncultivated and that they were all in acute economic distress. All Harijans of both the sexes, above the age of seven, are given from annas 8 to annas 12 per head per week. For five weeks this has been done. They said they understood that Catholicism was a better religion, that there was but one God, that the Son of God had come back to life after death and that they wished to try their fate in that new religion, as their lot had not improved in the religion of their forefathers.

At the Board School in the cheri the teacher, Mr. R. Ramaswami, a Harijan, said that the priest of the cheri temple and a few persons besides had refused to change their faith. The temple was common property, he added and had been built at a cost of about Rs. 800. The school was also located in the chavadi. At the other end of the cheri was the tent of the Missionaries.

The temple was locked and it adjoined the school. In front of the two buildings a big pandal had been put up with cocoanut thatches and there it was that catechism classes are held. One of the Harijans said that if all the families there should join the Catholic faith, then it would be easy to sell away the temple to the Padres and to have it converted into a Church. But that was not possible until every family there embraced Christianity.

Out of about 80 families in that cheri, nearly 20 still are holding aloof. The rest are all being given instruction in the tenets of Catholicism. I asked one of the adults who attended the classes what he had learnt. He said that he was being taught "Vedalam."

I also learn that some high dignitary of the Church, from Salem, visited Hemapalli cheri yesterday in the company of the priests, Rev. Hoormant and Rev. Father Mathew Thakkedam of Namakal and that the Harijans were informed that the religious classes would be carried on for two more weeks before baptism would take place. The Ecclesiastical dignitary who came there was called by the Harijans "Andavar".

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

555

To the west of the cheri is the well dug by the Harijan Sevak Sangh last year at the cost of Rs. 150 and declared open by Babu Rajendra Prasad. The Harijans are grateful and they requested that arrangements be made to deepen it. It is the only source of water-supply to the cheri inhabitants.

The Harijans who had already become Christians were given about Rs. 5 to Rs. 10 for each family for cloth and feast expenses. In some cases lump sum payments of Rs. 25 to 50 had been made, as for instance in Meenamapalli, Elanagar, Paruthupalli, Koramangalam and Perunkurichy.

Hemapalli is not the only solitary place which is preparing to receive baptism. Two miles to the south there is the Eramangalam cheri, where about 25 families are being taught catechism and would in the course of a week or two be taken into Catholic fold. Three miles to the west of Hemapalli, there is another Harijan cheri at Kokarayampettai where nearly 80 families are being similarly prepared.

A few yards to the north of the Hemapalli cheri proper, are a few more Harijan huts. One of the men there said that he received Rs. 8-12-0 per week for his family and that he thought that the temporary help given by the Missionaries was a great way towards relieving them in their present plight. I asked him what he would do after the baptism and after the distribution of money stopped. He said that they should again look back to their old ways of life. When pressed to explain what he meant by this he said, they did not know really what would happen.

Three women who were going to Trichengode carrying fuel, just then, said that they belonged to the Hemapalli cheri and that they formed part of the score of huts which had not joined the rest in agreeing to embrace Catholicism. Their men had gone to the plantations on the hills as coolies. The women earned about 6 pies to one anna per day by collecting and selling fire-wood.

At the Kokarayampettai village, Rev. Father Mathew Thakkedam said to me that the Bishop of Salem had received many petitions from the Harijans of these three cheries to convert them to Catholicism. Then the priests were ordered to undertake the work. The usual way of converting others to Catholicism was by giving them an insight into the religion at the outset. A period of preparation was always gone through. It generally lasted from between 40 to 60 days according to the circumstances in each place. Religious classes had been held in these cheris for the last four weeks. The catechists were in charge of the classes and the priests supervised the work.

He denied that money was offered to the Harijans as a means of inducing them to embrace the Catholic faith. During the weeks of preparation, they all had to attend the catechism classes. They could not go to work, they had to be fed and, therefore, the Mission paid each person annas two per day. He had heard that this was alluded to as monetary inducement for conversion purposes. The Catholic Mission did not force any one to change his or her faith. Any one who joined the Catholic fold did so willingly after he had known the principles of the religion. The Mission was engaged only in the glorification of God and in preaching the truths of the religion of Jesus to those who cared to hear it.

The Mission was still receiving similar petitions from other places also. He agreed that the three villages were being prepared at the express request of the adults there. Most of them were no doubt illiterate, but they were taught orally and repeated what they learnt to the best of their ability. He wished that this affair should be cleared up so that there could be no misconstruing the distribution of the doles.

Mr. K. S. Marimuthu of Salem, Editor of the "Theendadhar Thuyaram" a Tamil bi-monthly paper said, he had himself been converted to Catholicism and had last year, at Kokale village, been taken back into the Hindu fold after 'Shudi' had been performed at the Harijan Conference, presided over by Dr. T. S. S. Rajan, M. L. A., Trichy. He said that he found that Harijan Catholics were treated as inferiors to Vellala or Brahmin Catholics and the evils of the caste system were perpetuated. He, therefore, left Catholicism and returned to Hinduism and he gave a signed statement about the conversion affair. He added he was pained to find that the Goundars of the Trichengode taluk were absolutely indifferent to what happened to the Harijans in their place. It was the harsh treatment of the Harijans by the Goundars and their utter indifference that had made the Harijans lose all hopes. They were in a terrible plight economically. If the state of affairs continued, Mr. Marimuthu thought that in another five years the entire Harijan cheries in Trichengode taluk would have entered the Catholic fold. He hoped that the caste Hindus would now at least realise the truth of the situation and try to retain the Harijans in the Hindu fold by organised action to alleviate their misery which was real.

BOMBING ON THE FRONTIER.

A Conference to consider Frontier problems and policy was held in London on Tuesday last, April 7, under the auspices of the National Peace Council—the representative organisation of the British Peace movement, writes the London Correspondent of the Amrita Bazar Patrika.

The Conference which was attended by members of a large number of peace and kindred organisations, discussed the use of the air weapon on the North-West Frontier of India and ways and means of advancing constructive and pacific methods as an alternative policy.

Mr. C. Roden Buxton presided and the speakers included Mr. F. G. Pratt, C. S. I., Air Commander J. A. Chamier (who spoke in defence of the use of the air weapon), Captain Phillip Mumford, Sir Francis Younghusband, Sir John Maynard, Lieut-Colonel Roland Hamilton, Professor Amiya Chakravarty, Miss Muriel Lester and Mr. V. K. Krishna Menon.

The Conference was a private one and no statement of policy was issued after the meeting, but it is understood that the Conference was to a large degree united in its repudiation of the bombing policy and in the conviction that the solution of the problems of the Frontier was to be found along the lines of economic and social amelioration. The Conference conveyed to the National Peace Council a recommendation that a special Committee should be set up to consider ways and means of following up the Conference and of giving effect to its conclusions.

No further information was available at the headquarters of the National Peace Council as to the speeches made at the Conference and the views taken up by different speakers. However, I am in a position to say that Mr. Pratt made a detailed statement on the Frontier position as the effect of the air bombing. Mrs. Edith Hunter, of the Friends of India Society, London, condemned, from a pacific point of view, any kind of bombing and the speech of Miss Muriel Lester was a sentimental effort in telling the audience how she loves India and the Indian people. She gave

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

556

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 2]

realpatidar.com

them impressions of India formed after her recent visit to that country.

The real die-hard speech came from Commander Chamier. While saying that he did not officially represent the Government of India (at the Conference) which has been responsible for the bombing, the Commander declared that he was responsible for the operations on the Frontier and that his brother was still on the Frontier. In the opinion of the Commander the Pathans on the Frontier liked being bombed and they did not care a scrap for anything else! Commander Chamier also said that the idea behind this policy of the Government was to make the life of a Pathan "uncomfortable."

The Commander boasted to his audience that formerly the aeroplanes could fly over the heads of the Pathans only for an hour but now the situation had changed. "Now we can," he added, "stay in the air for three days, continuously threatening the Pathans who have to hide for that period. That makes their life uncomfortable and we are all along on the top. Yes, we are on the top of these Pathans."

AN ADMISSION.

The Commander admitted that 'delayed action' bombs have been and are being used on the Frontier. He then spoke about the "uncivilised" tribes. In his opinion peace could be brought about on the Frontier only by force. "We are gradually subjugating the Pathans," he declared. He declared that when a Pathan's house was raided, the main beam was first removed and burnt so that the Pathan would not be able to build another house. "They can get mud to build huts, but they have to come down to town to fetch wooden beams to erect those mud huts," he said with a smile on his face.

The majority of those present at the Conference did not share the views of Commander Chamier. They preferred to ignore his bombast. But the Commander was well repudiated by another Army man, Captain Phillip Mumford. Captain Mumford had charge of bombing operations in Kurdistan and his speech in most part refuted the contention of Commander Chamier. Captain Mumford pointed out to the audience that there was danger in this form of bombing. Formerly, he said, whenever there was "trouble" on the Frontier, the civil authorities, if they summoned the Military to their aid, used to abdicate but they did not like that. Therefore, they now avoided calling the Military. What happened now, Captain Mumford continued, was that whenever there was trouble the Civil authorities telephoned for aeroplane bombers. "This is significant for European civilization" declared Captain Mumford.

The Captain admitted that it was quite true that the British authorities had never used poison gas on the Frontier. Yet, in the opinion of Captain Mumford the use of "delayed action" bombs was just as bad.

This pacifist speech of Captain Mumford was received with great warmth by the audience.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Bombay-Delhi Air Service:—The Tata aviation department are contemplating an air service between Delhi and Bombay. Negotiations are in full progress and the Company is meeting with splendid response. The route of service is being surveyed and will be finally fixed in a very short time. If the service is established, it will be a time would be tremendous, as Tata's hope to complete the Bombay-Delhi journey in six hours, while the train takes 24 hours. The Tata's present intentions seem to be to run a bi-weekly service, mainly carrying passengers, but incidentally carry foreign mail from intermediate stations to Bombay or Delhi just to catch the Bombay-Karachi or Delhi-Karachi air service. The Tatas, as is the practice with them, start cautiously and would expand the service as they gather public support, as in the case of the Madras-Bombay-Karachi Service, which is very popular now. Similarly, the Tatas will slowly develop their Bombay-Delhi service, under contemplation, from a bi-weekly passenger service, into a tri-weekly and ultimately, a daily mail service.

King Fuad of Egypt Dead:—King Fuad of Egypt died at 1 p. m. on April 28th. The news of the King's death was communicated to the Premier by telephone during a Cabinet meeting. The funeral takes place on Thursday. King Fuad will be buried in the Elrifai mosque, built by himself at the foot of the Mokattam hills facing the Nile valley and the Sahara. On hearing of the King's death the Premier proceeded to Koubbeh Palace to express the Nation's sympathy to the Queen. As a consequence of the news from Cairo, arrangements have been made for Prince Farouk, heir of King Fuad, and who is at present being educated in England, to return home, says a message from London. Prince Farouk being under age, King Fuad's death necessitates the appointment of a Regency Council. The names of the Regency, which it is understood the late King Fuad approved in 1922, are contained in a sealed document left to be opened after his death. It is understood that if one of the Regents mentioned in the document is unable to assume his duties the Egyptian Cabinet will have the right to appoint some one in his place.

University Hostel for Bombay Students:—The University of Bombay has made arrangements to provide hostel facilities for postgraduate students enrolled in the University School of Economics and Sociology and in the Department of Chemical Technology. Though these institutions have been in existence for some years, the University did not provide hostel facilities for those who took advantage of them. Mofussil students who came to Bombay to avail themselves of the opportunities for higher studies in these subjects have found it extremely difficult to find healthy and congenial lodgings in Bombay. The hostel is to be located in the Taraporewala Building, on Queen's Road, opposite Marine Lines Station. The whole building, except the ground floor, has been rented for the purpose, and is to be adequately fitted up for the hostel by June next when the new academic year begins. This building is situated in a healthy locality; it has an excellent view of the sea, and is at the same time not far from the University buildings. The terms on which the students are to be admitted are moderate, and the University will have to incur a net deficit to run the hostel. But the University has undertaken this venture deliberately as a necessary adjunct to its postgraduate activities. Though the hostel is primarily meant for the students of the University Departments, other postgraduate students reading for the M.A., M.Sc., and Ph.D. degrees may be admitted to the hostel if accommodation is available.

Motor Manufacture in India:—It is understood a meeting of the promoters of the Indian motor manufacturing industry scheme was held in Bombay on the 25th April at which Sir M. Visveswarayya submitted a memorandum setting forth the results of his recent tour in Europe and America and the research work there. It is stated Sir M. Visveswarayya reiterated his view that the time was ripe for India to start a motor manufacturing factory at Bombay with a capital of at least one and a half crores so that India might be able to produce annually 10,000 28-horse power cars and 5,000 trucks for use in India. Sir M. Visveswarayya is also stated to have emphasised the need for Government help and sympathy and maintained that the scheme would prove a success only in case Government at least maintained the present import duties on foreign manufactured motor cars and trucks. The financiers, who were interested in the scheme, after having heard Sir M. Visveswarayya decided to refer the matter to a small sub-committee which is expected to report shortly.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

557

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).

Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS
only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE
NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP " 20,00,000
RESERVE FUND " 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MIL Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsdas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Desabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhaillal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. L. (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock & Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION
COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,

Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin

Colombo and other coast ports

according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

558

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 3

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,

Sheik Memon St., Bombay.

BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,

3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,

(Corner of Picket Road.)

AHMEDABAD.

AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)

CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)

NAGPUR CITY.

POONA.

POONA CITY.

RAJKOT.

SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000

Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000

Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR

AND

TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL

CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE:—Apolo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)

Isampur (District Satara)

Karad (District Satara)

Tasgaon (District Satara)

Satara (District Satara)

Kirloskarwadi (District Satara)

Shirala (District Satara)

Koregaon (District Satara)

Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)

Shevgaon (District Ahmednagar)

Ahmednagar (District Ahmednagar)

Bhilwandi (District Thana)

Palghar (District Thana)

Kalyan (District Thana)

Akuij (District Sholapur)

Viramgam (District Ahmednagar)

Dhulla (District West)

Khandesh (District West)

Dondalcha (District West)

Nandurbar (District West)

Shirpur (District West)

Shahada (District West)

Sakri (District West)

Sindkheda (District West)

Malegaon (District West)

Satana (District West)

Kalwan (District West)

Dohad (District West)

Kalol (District West)

MAHARASHTRA

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chuni Lal V. Mehta, K.S.I.

Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.

Madhooji D. Thackersey, Esq.

R. G. Saraya, Esq.

G. P. Murchshwar, Esq.

S. N. Kashyap, Esq.

Prof. V. G. Kale,

B. N. Rajadnya, Esq.

A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.

D. W. Raut, Esq.

H. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.

O. M. Gandhi, Esq.

Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar

V. L. Mehta, Esq.

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,

Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

559

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

560
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 12]

A flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSCORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

The advertisement features a detailed illustration of a woman's face with a bindi, looking slightly to the side. To the left of the face is a box of 'Mysore Sandal Soap' with the text 'SUPERFINE Toilet Soap' and 'THE MYSORE GOVERNMENT SOAP FACTORY Bangalore'. The box also has a small illustration of a woman's face. The background is a simple, stylized landscape with a hill and a tree.

Printed by Jal B. Dabash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bomba

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 22.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MAY 9, 1936. No. 36

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

- | | |
|---------------------------------|------------------------------|
| Ethiopia. | Taboo in Literature. |
| The Deccan Education Society. | Wanted—A Synthesis of Bel- |
| Village Improvement. | gions and Cultures. |
| Proposed Civil Liberties Union. | The Congress and the Future. |
| Indian Christians and Scheduled | Inter-Caste Marriages Bill. |
| Castes. | Indian Genius in Politics. |
| Patuoda Propaganda. | A Plea for Better Sermons. |
| Women "Servants of India." | Johns Hopkins University. |
| The Bengal Whipping Act. | The Population Question in |
| A Chinese General on Christian | Sweden. |
| Missions. | Indian Women's Fellowship of |
| Ramkrishna Centenary. | Service. |
| Hindi, the National Language. | |

NOTES

Ethiopia:—After a heroic struggle against overwhelming odds, which, Major Lloyd Jones in the Times of India says, will be recognised by historians as an epic before which even Thermopylae pales into insignificance, the Emperor of Ethiopia, finding that it was hopeless to continue it, left his capital with the Empress and their family by train and arrived at Djibouti on the afternoon of Sunday the 3rd May. From there he embarked on a British warship. His immediate destination is Jerusalem. Before leaving Addis Ababa he threw open the doors of his palace and invited the people to enter and take away whatever they wished. The Italian General with his army entered the capital on the 6th. Signor Mussolini announced the event in his usual bombastic style as the victory of the sword. It is really the victory of poison gas against which the Ethiopians had no means of protecting themselves. An ancient Empire thus vanishes from history as the result of an unprovoked aggression of a nation which claims to be civilised. Italy's conduct in the Ethiopian affair has made western civilisation stink in the nostrils of every decent-minded person. The League of Nations' part in the affair can only be described as despicable. The League has proved a veritable deathtrap to Ethiopia. Relying on its highflown claims to provide collective security, Ethiopia had cast herself into this struggle only to find herself betrayed by the Powers whom she trusted. There is talk of reconstructing the League. But we trust that India will make it clear beyond the possibility of doubt that, whatever the Government of India may do in her name, her people are absolutely averse to having anything more to do with this imposture. Of the part of the British Government in this tragedy, no one has any reason to be proud. The President of the Indian National Congress has called on the country to express its sympathy with Ethiopia by holding public meetings today. We cordially support his appeal.

The Deccan Education Society:—This Society celebrated the completion of fifty years of its unique mission last year. The New English School, Poona, opened in a hired building with 35 students in 1880. Its success during the next five years was so remarkable as to encourage the young men, who had started it as a purely private enterprise, to think of raising it to the status of a College. They had plenty of enthusiasm. They believed as an article of faith that education was the master key to national progress. They were prepared to devote the best part of their lives to the work of spreading higher education in a missionary spirit. Their enthusiasm was infectious. Fifty years ago communalism was not in the air. Wealthy men of all communities and ruling princes contributed liberally to the scheme which took shape in the Fergusson College. Government, too, were then not so suspicious of education as they now seem to be. The Fergusson College was founded in the same year as the National Congress. They were indeed both manifestations of the same idea in closely allied spheres. The Deccan Education Society conducts today two first-grade Colleges, four High Schools and one model primary school with an attendance totalling 5,000 students in all the institutions. A feature of the Society's Report, is that the number of students in each of its institutions is shown with reference to their civil condition. A comparison of the figures given in the Reports for past years, will show how rapid has been the change in the social mind in the matter of early marriage. In the High School stage, practically there is not a single married out of some thousands of boys and in the College stage a very minute fraction only. All the institutions of the Society are co-educational. Maharashtra is solidly in favour of co-education.

Village Improvement:—The Director of Public Information, Bombay, has issued to the Press excerpts from the reports of District Officers on the progress made in the first three months since the Bombay Presidency received its share of the one crore of rupees grant made by the Government of India for village improvement. The Director thinks that the movement made a distinct advance. The Commissioner,

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

562 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

May 9

Northern Division, merely says, that the money spent by Government for welfare of the people will bear fruit in course of time—a safe prophesy. He adds that the people have begun to realise the importance of the moment and “of course, if left to their own initiative very little will be done.” This gives an opening to laud the officers of the Revenue Department “who have all devoted more time to this work than they can really spare, and rightly so.” To what exactly “rightly so” refers, is not clear. The only concrete thing done during the quarter was the introduction of a “Village Uplift Motor Van.” Follows immediately the following consequences: “The system of after death dinners is reported to be generally fading away in the selected villages and the villagers are now inclined to send monetary gifts to schools, dispensaries and other village institutions instead of squandering money on such customs.” The Uplift Lorry is a miracle-worker. Here is a gem from the Report from the Central Division: “In so far as this grant is being utilised for the improvement of the economic condition of the rayats, it will be useful in inverse proportion to the extent to which the rayats are a conduit pipe by which the profits of agriculture reach the money bags of the savkar.” The only thing clear in this sentence is that the writer must have a fling at the savkar who, of course, will not hit back. This Officer does not seem entirely to approve of the Government of India’s grant. He seems to think that it has only roused the cupidity of the rayat. Contrariwise, the Collector of Satara waxes ecstatic: “Words fail him when he attempts to describe the vast benefits conferred by the grant. The Commissioner of the Southern Division reports that “as a lesson of economy in social matters the village improvement committee of Kangrali got six marriages performed in the village under its guidance, each marriage costing only about Rs. 80. The usual lavish expenditure on caste dinners and drinks etc., was dispensed with. Practical demonstrations of this kind in the realm of economy is most valuable.” Are village committees authorised to spend the grant on marriages for demonstration purposes? If so, who were the six families that were selected for this demonstration in Kangrali? Like Ranibennur, Kangrali seems to be a favoured town in the Southern Division. The Live Stock Expert has selected it for a poultry improvement scheme.

Proposed Civil Liberties Union:—Pandit Jawharlal Nehru has published a letter explaining his proposal to start an Indian Civil Liberties Union “the sole function of which will be the protection of civil liberties in all departments of national activity” and which “should be open to all individuals who believe in this fundamental proposition and it should avoid any entanglement on any other political or economic issues.” He trusts it will be possible to build up a non-party and non-sectarian union. We welcome the proposal in so far as it shows that Pandit Jawharlal realises that the time is opportune to find a ground of co-operation between people and parties of different shades of political opinion. We should much wish, however, that this should be found within the Congress organisation itself. After the suspension of civil disobedience, the only points on which there is difference of opinion between Congressmen and others are the goal of Indian nationalism and the compulsory wear of khaddar by those who wish to take active part in Congress work. The former at the present time is largely an academic question while the latter is comparatively a minor matter on which there should be no difficulty in reaching an understanding. Civil liberties are the very essence of political life. There can be no settled government unless citizens are assured of the preservation inviolate of the elementary rights of persons and property. In the struggle for these rights originated politics and the Congress cannot shuffle off its responsibility in this matter without losing its political character. We are not quite sure that it will be possible to conduct a movement for the preservation of civil rights without reference to other political and economic issues. Is or is not the right to the peaceful enjoyment of one’s property, one of the civil liberties? The Magna Charta laid great stress on it, and the English as well as the American Revolution turned on this very point of the State’s power to tax subjects without parliamentary sanction. Freedom to write and speak without previous license from the State is another and, to our kind, an even more important right than the right to property. Thought cannot soar above commonplace levels unless there is complete freedom of expression. There is much confusion in the conception of civil liberties which should be clarified in order to prepare the ground for a frank consideration of the Pandit’s proposal.

Indian Christians and Scheduled Castes:—The Order in Council relating to the franchise of the scheduled castes, commonly known as the Depressed Classes, lays down that “no Indian Christian shall be deemed to be a member of a scheduled caste.” Notwithstanding this clear direction, the Government of Madras have decided that Indian Christians will be entitled to the special concessions as regards education grants, fees and so on provided for the depressed classes. We do not know if any other provincial Government has done this. The Indian Christian community on other occasions has advanced claims to preferential treatment on the ground that educationally and socially it is more advanced than other communities. It also apparently claims to be treated as a depressed community in order to have the special consideration shown to the scheduled castes extended to it. It is thus at the same time an advanced and a depressed community! The Order in Council says that no Indian Christian shall be deemed to be a member of a scheduled caste. In view of recent developments, it is pertinent to enquire whether a convert to Sikhism or Islam with be

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

563 entitled to the special franchise and educational concessions allowed to the scheduled castes? When Dr. Ambedkar carries out his declared intention to quit Hinduism, would he be entitled to stand for the seats reserved for the scheduled castes? If that event takes place after he is elected to one of them, will he continue to hold it after his conversion?

Fatuous Propaganda:—It is high time that responsible journalists put their foot down on a certain type of news which has been too much in evidence recently. First, we had the canard about the Halifax correspondence with Gandhiji. Then came the story characterised by Pandit Jawaharlal as fantastic about the King having invited him when he was in London for an interview which he declined. More recently, it was announced that Pandit Jawaharlal's book had been held up by the Customs authorities. The authorities have categorically denied having seen a copy of the book, and they aver that the question of banning it has not, therefore, arisen. Advance copies, moreover, have been received by newspapers here. The latest and the most outrageous exploit in this direction is that published, as from the United Press, of an alleged message received by a spiritualist in Jullunder from the spirit of a universally respected lady, whose recent death cast a gloom over the country, about what will happen six years hence. This seems to be the limit. Can we not have the decency to leave the dead alone? Must we drag them down for purposes of political propaganda? If such things are the outcome of a well-meant desire to serve the national cause, they should be deplored as being utterly misconceived. If, as we suspect, they are intended to bring Indian politics and politicians into ridicule, nationalist journals and news agencies cannot be too careful about giving currency to them.

Women "Servants of India":—The institution of Life Members introduced by the Deccan Education Society was later adopted in the Servants of India Society by Gokhale who was himself one of the Life Members of the former. Life Members are pledged to serve the Society in a missionary spirit, that is to say, on a fixed minimum remuneration, for at least twenty years. They charge themselves with the duty and responsibility of organizing, teaching, collecting funds, and general management. Neither the Deccan Education Society nor the Servants of India Society admit women to their Life Membership. To supply this omission, a new Society has been started in Poona exclusively for women who desire to devote themselves to public service. The prospectus of the Society is reprinted in another column.

The Bengal Whipping Act:—When the Whipping Act providing for physical chastisement for persons found guilty of brutal offences against women, was debated in the Bengal Legislative Council, it was fiercely opposed as being a communal measure directed against Muslims. The first case under the Act was recently tried at Rajshahi and the accused who was sentenced to be flogged was a Hindu. A 17 year old Hindu youth was charged with committing a criminal assault on a girl of 8. The girl identified the accused in court. The Jury returned a unanimous verdict of guilty and the Judge, Mr. A. F. Rahman, sentenced the accused to 20 stripes and a fine of Rs. 200, in default rigorous imprisonment for a year. The monopoly of these crimes does not rest with Muslims as the opponents of the Act unwittingly proclaimed.

A Chinese General on Christian Missions:—Professor Jerome Davis of Yale University contributes to the Unity an interesting account of an interview which he recently had with Marshal Fung, the famous Chinese Christian General, who lives in retirement in Taishan, in the Province of Shantung, owing to political differences with General Chiang Kai-shek, the head of the Chinese National Government. Dr. Davis in the course of his interview asked the General what he thought of the foreign missionaries and their work. He was thoughtful for a moment and then said: "In the old days the missionaries did a great deal of good. They helped in freeing the peasants from many superstitions such as feet-binding and they also aided in bringing education and medical help to the people. But today their chief emphasis is still preaching, reading the Bible and prayer. These may be important but if they do not respond to their present opportunity they will be missing a great chance. Chinese Christians now often go abroad and then come back and support the tactics of a man like General Chiang Kai-shek, who is really doing harm to the country. The fundamental task of Christianity today should be to educate the people as to the realities of the actual government they are living under, the kind of economic system they are being exploited by, and the necessity of securing social justice." Will Indian missionaries please note?

Ramakrishna Centenary:—The Sri Ramakrishna Centenary celebrations, which have been in progress for the last two months, had their appropriate culmination in the magnificent gathering which assembled in the Cowasji Jehangir Hall on Thursday evening to inaugurate the three days Parliament of Religions arranged by the Bombay Centenary Committee. Sir S. Radhakrishnan, who is leaving India today to take up the Professorship of Eastern Philosophy and Ethics at Oxford University to which he was recently called, presided. Mr. M. R. Jayakar, Chairman of the Centenary Committee, in his introductory speech, said that this was the most remarkable gathering which he had seen in that Hall in his experience of many years. He declared that it was a striking proof of the fact that underlying the materialistic activities of Bombay by which superficial observers were often misled, there was a deep appreciation of spiritual values. Sir Sarvapalli Radhakrishnan's address was heard with rapt attention by the immense audience which comprised men and women of all races and creeds.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

564
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 9

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, May 9, 1936.

HINDI, THE NATIONAL LANGUAGE.

The address which Babu Rajendra Prasad delivered at the All-India Hindi Sahitya Sammelan over which he presided at Nagpur, is a model of what such addresses should be. Although he believes that Hindi possesses the requisites of a common language for India, he clearly sets forth in his address the difficulties in the way of its attaining the position. Foremost of these is that Hindi itself is merely the generic name for many dialects. Bihar is taken to be a Hindi-speaking province. But, as the President pointed out, about eighteen different dialects are spoken in the province, only one of which has a script or a written literature. All these dialects are different from the Hindi used in books at the present day. Those among the users of the dialects who are not educated, cannot fully understand literary or book Hindi, judged only by the number of people who understand the Hindi of the books, some of the other provincial languages are more important. It may be pointed out here that it is this book Hindi which is propagated by the Hindi Pracharak Sabha on the ground, among others, that it is the most widely spoken and widely understood language. Babu Rajendra Prasad's observations suggest that before Hindi can lay claim to be an All-India language it should qualify itself for the high role. How can this be done? The distinctive identity of a language is established not by its vocabulary but by its grammatical structure. One can hear every day people speaking in the vernaculars, plentifully interspersing their talk with English words. But we know that they are speaking not English but a vernacular by the linking words, that is to say, the prepositions and conjunctions and interjections which they use. All living languages, as the President said, go on regularly increasing their vocabulary, and their writers and poets use foreign words in their composition. This is true but the foreign words first gain currency in the colloquial, spoken language and it takes a long time before they receive literary recognition, if at all. Greek and Latin in Europe and Sanskrit in India are not foreign languages but the fountain head from which European and Indian culture and civilisation inherited their most important thought-forms. Even in the South, as Babu Rajendra Prasad said, Sanskrit is a medium by which other provincials can make themselves understood because of the depth to which its religious and philosophical thought has permeated. When the late Sir Narayan Chandavarkar was travelling in Malabar several years ago, he espied at a distance from the road the cowering figure of a Nayadi, the lowest of untouchables of Malabar. With great difficulty he persuaded the man to come to the main road and entered into conversation with him.

Sir Narayan was astonished to hear the man speak of "vairagya" and allied concepts of Hindu religious philosophy. That there was a language which was understood all over the country in ancient times cannot be doubted. The inscriptions of Asoka were addressed to the common people from Afghanistan to Mysore. Referring to them, Mr. Radhakumud Mukherji in his interesting article on Asoka in the current New Review, observes: "The royal proclamations on rock and pillar which were evenly distributed through the different provinces of his empire, and located at the chief centres of population along the principal trade routes and courses of pilgrimage, of commerce and of culture, must have been read and understood by the masses of Asokan India. They disclose a common language underlying its local peculiarities and provincialisms in respect of the forms of vocabulary and grammar. For the Frontier peoples the language had to be written in their indigenous kharoshti script; but the script did not alter the language, which is found to be even more Sanskrit than the versions at Kalsi or Dhauli."

Babu Rajendra Prasad showed that the problem of developing Hindi into a national language presented two different and to some extent conflicting aspects. If, in order to make the language accessible to the people of South India, Sanskritisation is resorted to on a large scale, it becomes more difficult than it is to make it the common language of Hindus and Muslims in Northern India. Muslims in Northern India, however, if the reasons officially given for compulsory Urdu in the girls' schools of the North West Frontier Province represent their views, are bent upon making Urdu, script and grammar and vocabulary, the national language of the country. For the time being at least, it would be best to suspend the attempt to make them accept Hindi or Hindustani as a substitute and to concentrate on evolving a standard literary language for the Hindus of Northern India. In the course of such evolution it may be possible to establish contact with the South Indian vernaculars through the common underlying ideology furnished by Sanskrit culture. We have come across copies of a magazine conducted by Mr. K. M. Munshi in every issue of which some articles in South Indian vernaculars are printed in the Nagari script. It would be more useful as a means of promoting a colloquial knowledge of Hindi to get some leading Tamil and Telugu newspapers to print occasionally in their vernacular scripts short papers in Hindi on topics of current interest. Incidentally, they will give a fair idea of what Hindi will sound like when it is currently spoken in the South. There will be much "phonetic decay" which, Max Muller held, is a necessary process in the growth of a language. The greatest difficulty in the way of Hindi attaining the position of India's common language is the competition of the English language. Hindi against English in the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

565 sphere of language, suffers from the same handicaps as khadi against mill-made cloth among textiles and hand pounded rice against the machine ground stuff in the dietary sphere. Then, there is the claim of the vernaculars themselves. Bengali, Tamil, Marathi and other vernaculars have great literatures of their own and cherished traditions. The average man has no need to know two languages. Babu Rajendra Prasad estimated that the average Hindi speaker will use between 2000 and 2500 words. This is a high estimate. 500 words will amply suffice to express the ideas of the average Indian, villager or townsman. The important point often lost sight of is that words have associations and that much of their significance arises from their power to awaken in the minds of the speaker and hearer a body of common associations which stamp them as belonging to a single cultural group. Borrowed words have no associations and are, therefore, for a long time likely to remain a dead weight on a living language. If it is really wished that Hindi should become a spoken language in the South, the readiest way is annually to import two or three hundred boys and girls into Allahabad and Benares and educate them there through the medium of Hindi. Children learn a new language more easily than their elders. Hindi Pracharak Societies may try this experiment along with those they are already trying.

TABOO IN LITERATURE.

Gandhiji in the course of his speech at the Bharatiya Sahitya Parishad held at Nagpur on the 24th April, is reported to have referred to the plethora of highly objectionable erotic literature in evidence in every province. He declared that if he had the power, he would taboo this thing from literature. In the same manner, he would taboo all literature calculated to promote communalism, fanaticism, and ill-will and hatred between individuals, classes and races. The comment of the Catholic Examiner on Gandhiji's declaration is as follows: "Catholics will note Mr. Gandhi's approval of the principle on which the Catholic Church acts in forbidding dangerous books to its members. The common law of the Church forbids 'books which expressly attack good morals' and 'books which of set purpose treat of, relate or inculcate lascivious and obscene things.' All such books are forbidden in general. In addition many writers have been placed on the Index on account of their erotic writings." (Fabulae amatoriae) The Examiner indeed, thinks that Gandhiji goes much further than H. H. the Pope. It continues: "But Mr. Gandhi, who is inclined to severity in these matters, would apparently banish all amatory literature from his Republic, which goes much further than the Catholic law. Would he include the novels of Sir Walter Scott or Miss Austin in his condemnation? In fact, writers of last century could not conceive of a novel or a play without a 'love-interest,' and the flood of amatory fiction finally brought a reaction in the vogue of the detective story. Surely, it is not the subject so much as the way it is treated, that matters. Incessant reading of inferior literature, whether amatory or of any other type, has a debilitating effect on the mind and character. We should all force ourselves to read something better than what merely helps to pass time."

Gandhiji's dictum is also on all fours with the defence of the Press sections of the Criminal Law Amendment Act by Sir Henry Craik in recent session of the Registative Assembly. The Home Member of the Government of India wanted to put down writings calculated to encourage terrorism, communalism and communism. He wished to penalise not only these writings but also obscene and vulgar writings. The Home Member would warmly agree to include erotic writings in the same category. Obviously, freedom of the Press has as little meaning for Gandhiji as to Sir Henry Craik. Nevertheless, it is a very important factor of progress and suppression of it is fraught with greater dangers to the community than all the erotic writings in all the provinces. Much of the world's best literature would have to be taboo'd under the Gandhian regime. Not only Walter Scott and Jane Austin,—the Examiner is surely biased against them—but parts of the Bible, Shakespeare, the Vedas and the Upanishads will have to be banned. In the Brihadaranyaka the great philosopher, seer, lawgiver, Yagnavalkya, employs an erotic parallel as the most appropriate to illustrate the union of the individual with the Supreme soul. "As a man, fully embraced by his beloved wife, does not know anything at all, either external or internal, so does this infinite being (self) fully embraced by the Supreme self, not know anything at all, external or internal."

The attraction of sex, call it lust or love, is inherent in the biological process. In animals it lasts only sufficiently long to fulfil its biological purpose. Man, endowed with imagination, idealises it. This is the origin of erotic literature. Over one hundred newspapers from all parts of India are received in this office. There is not much proof in them of Gandhiji's complaint that eroticism pervades the literary atmosphere in every province. He was speaking at a Hindi Conference and probably he was referring to the Hindi provinces and Hindi publications. Even then, there should be some outcrop of it in the books, pamphlets and newspapers written in the English language, unless those who write in English are a totally different class from those who write in Hindi, which is not the case.

The effect of reading erotic (or for that matter communist or communal) literature is often misconceived. Boccaccio's Decameron has long enjoyed the reputation of being one of the world's most erotic books. Most probably it occupies a prominent place in the Papal Index. It should, because Boccaccio made the clergy the special butt of his stories. A copy of this book was in College Library. The Librarian was instructed not to issue the book to any student without the express permission of the Principal. This sort of restriction was itself a challenge to one imbued with the protestant instinct and I applied for it in my early College days. The Principal, an Englishman, was a scholar with the scholar's hatred of censorship. He sanctioned the application and the book was delivered to me. When I was about to leave the College I went to see him. He remembered the incident and asked me what I thought of the Decameron. I told him I was bored by it. He smiled. Take Byron's Don Juan. I doubt if the reading of it made a single convert to Don Juanism.

I procured from a local library for a young relative at his request, the seventeen volumes of Burton's unexpurgated English Translation of the Arabian Nights. He read the book through and found that the most interesting parts of it were the footnotes containing curious information about the habits and customs of Oriental nations of which Burton had made an extensive study. I have always advised

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

566
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 9]

young people to read every bit of writing they lay hands on. I have myself done so. All knowledge is inter-related and to discover this, is the great joy of uncensored reading. A Tamil sage has advised: "Even thieving learn and—forget."

K. N.

WANTED—A SYNTHESIS OF RELIGIONS AND CULTURES.

(By S. K. GEORGE, M. A. B. I., TRIVANDRUM.)

The threat of the Ambedkars and *Kunjuramans of India to leave the fold of Hinduism, within which they have been loosely held for ages, and to migrate en masse to other religious folds for the sake of social amelioration and political enfranchisement, directs the attention of even the irreligious in the land to the question of the relations between religions and the function, if any, of Religion in the modern world. It is said that any group or community within a recognised religion, these days, should be forced to forsake it, because within it elementary rights of citizenship are denied them. Such a religion will have short shrift in a world that is awakening to a sense of social justice and equality for all mankind. The fate of the Russian Church is a warning to all such reactionary bodies. It is true that Hinduism has in the past been responsible for the submersion of no less than a sixth of her population and that there are elements within it that still want to uphold that injustice in the name of ancient traditions. But it is also true that in these days the axe has been laid to the root of that injustice and that its eradication is only a matter of time. As someone has said the future historian will record the victory over this evil as having been won in this present decade, though its fruits may ripen only in those to come. As such the submerged sixth have but to stand their ground and bide their time to see their disabilities removed and feel themselves free within their own ancient settings. It is up to them to stand by and strengthen those who are fighting for the removal of this age-old evil and claim their share of the victory. If it does not mean victory they can be assured of the comradeship of the virile elements in the old faith in a joint effort to give the much deserved quietus that the old lady will deserve, if she persists in maintaining her ancient prejudices in this modern days. That is the solemn pledge that Gandhiji and his valiant supporters in this cause, have taken to their less fortunate brethren in the common faith. And they are no freaks within that religion; rather do they stand in the line of succession to a noble band of reformers, who have seen the need and laboured for the removal of this blot on Hinduism. That is how the situation strikes a sympathetic outsider and it seems that the wisest thing for the Ezhava and the Harijan to do is to trust these friends and press on to a joint victory.

I said it is sad for a group or community in these days to have to forsake one's ancestral religion for the sake of elementary justice, which ought to be common lot of man, irrespective of religions; but it is sadder to see other religious bodies willing or eager to take in such adventurers into their folds. But that is the attitude that Christian and other missionary faiths in the land have taken towards vagrants from Hinduism. There is a comity among certain Christian missions, at least, in India, by which they agree not to infringe on each other's rights or to take in converts from each other without mutual reference and consent. That is because after years of mutual suspicion and futile efforts to oust or swallow one another they have come to agree on a few fundamentals and to agree to differ on non-essentials. I submit that the time is come when such a mutual recognition and agreement is clearly indicated and highly necessary between the different religions working in the land. India is pre-eminently the battle ground between the chief higher religions of the world and she ought to be the scene of their reconciliation in a higher synthesis. I said it is clearly indicated, for India has a genius for comprehension and synthesis. What all elements have already gone into the fusion of her peoples and her culture! But a greater and a newer type of synthesis yet awaits realization. For there have come to us from outside two sturdy strands of human culture, each claiming sovereign independence and refusing to intertwine with each other or with the Central Indian Strand. But yet at times the fusion of the one or the other with India's culture seemed within sight. Such great moments in India's spiritual history were the appearances of a Kabir or a Nanak. But differences between the Islamic and the Hindu cultures, which these prophets attempted to unite, are so formidable and so deep rooted that no mere goodnatured overlooking of them or no linking up of emotional elements in the two could permanently reconcile them. The same is true of the Christian culture, itself a partially effected synthesis of the Jewish, the Greek and the Roman cultures and in these days highly coloured by the scientific outlook of the west.

* Mr. C. V. Kunjuraman, veteran journalist and reputed author in Malayalam, is a leader of the Ezhava community, who in Travancore alone number about 9 lakhs. With their kindred in the Cochin State and the Thiyyas of Malabar they form one of the major communities within Hinduism in S. India. They are still regarded as out-castes, though in recent years they have made rapid strides towards progress and enlightenment. They figured prominently in a recent political agitation in Travancore for equal rights with Caste-Hindus. One of their leaders is undergoing imprisonment in connection with that. Political discontent and wounded self-respect at their continued denial of human rights within the Hindu fold are making the Ezhavas think of mass conversion to other religions. The Christians, the Muslims, the Buddhists, and even the Sikhs are making a bid for the winning of this community en masse.

These different elements in the religions that have thus met on Indian soil have to be coldly analysed, as well as emotionally apprehended, and a synthesis arrived at, which will conserve their distinctiveness while making them converge their light on the forward path of humanity. The prophet of this larger and lasting synthesis has also appeared, as is fitting, on Indian soil. Rajah Ram Mohan Roy, not only delved deep into the doctrines of the different religions, mastering for that purpose the languages of their original scriptures, thereby incidentally laying the foundations of the great science of Comparative Religion, but he combined in his personal religion the fundamental Hindu, Christian and Islamic experiences. He was in fact a multiple personality, the prophet and precursor of coming humanity, nurtured and disciplined by the concurrent streams of diverse cultures. And the society he founded was to be a centre of universal convergence, not a cheap eclecticism that spreads a veneer of emotion over fundamental differences, not a foggy inter-religionism that seeks to copy unreal federal ideas from worldly diplomacy. He recognised and appreciated the different ways of approach to God in the different historic religions and the differences of their emphasis in apprehending and interpreting reality. The Brahmo Samaj is thus a fellowship of the worshippers of the One, Universal God, of the Christian, the Hindu or the Mussalman, each in his own way. Nor was it confined in the idea of its founder to those who accept the strict Theistic position. It was meant to include even those who like the Buddhist and the Jain or the modern Humanist would acknowledge some Principle in the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

567

Universe and would accept the love and service of man as the guiding principle in the conduct of life. But such a free association or partnership demands that the co-operating religions would shed their exclusiveness as sole systems of salvation. The Rajah fought the claims of each of these religions to such exclusiveness on its own authority and held that in their basic, essential idea they are not exclusive but universal. In this conviction and this effort to remove the germ of intolerance from the great historic religions he yet remains a prophet and a pioneer. It is in this that we in these latter days have got to accept his lead and fulfil his mission. The exponents of the different religions in India are yet at the stage of flying at each other's throats, contending with one another as to who shall hold the field, as if the world is too constricted for more than one faith and as if any one of them has a monopoly of truth. The existence of such contending religions is at the root of most of our communal troubles. Further, they are discrediting Religion itself and depriving it of its power to transform the world.

This last is its true function and only justification. And it is because I believe in this function and in the capacity of Religion to fulfil it, to work out an order of human society where peace and ordered progress will hold sway that I would appeal even to the irreligious in the land, who have no use for the concepts of Religion, to use this present opportunity to root out religious intolerance from among us, and to stand behind those in each religion who are standing for liberty, tolerance and the disinterested service of man. There are those who would advocate the working out of a common religious faith for all mankind. I believe that, with our diverse temperaments and traditions, such uniformity of outlook and expression is far distant, if it is ever attainable. What is possible, what is immediately desirable, is that liberal elements in all religions should declare themselves and should draw together in a common stand against intolerance and, what is more, in a common pursuit of the good life for all.

THE CONGRESS AND THE FUTURE.

Unless the Congress decision to postpone the issue of acceptance of office is to be considered a tactical move, it is likely to fall flat on the ears of the masses. There is a section of opinion which favours the Irish parallel. Whether it will hold good is a postulate which to become true requires a De Valera and an Irish national spirit. The national organizations were so closely parallel that a transference of authority, when it came, was easy. Whether that will come to pass in our country, in the immediate future, as things are constituted at present is more than one can vouchsafe for. Centuries of struggle in Ireland hardened the Irish feeling, stiffened their attitude against the English and strengthened the national spirit which it had brought about. What cannot be achieved by strength may be achieved by sacrifice but the pace is extraordinarily slow.

A wave of socialism has come over the Congress but it is difficult to foresee if much can be hoped for. Whether it will not give rise to another classwar or an acute sacrifice between capital and labour are problems to be deeply pondered over with concern and anxiety. There are some thinkers who see in the Russian experiment a bright vista for the future of our country and there are alarmists who see in it anything but bright or good or hopeful. Institutions cannot be directly transplanted to another soil nor can experiments bear the same results everywhere.

On the other hand the attitude of the Congress Nationalists is not very encouraging. They mean to establish contacts with other parties, the Liberals and other parties mean to fulfil themselves in different ways. Under different names in different provinces they will seek election and support. The difficulty, however, is that they have less in common with other parties than with the Congress.

The acquittal of the Congress party in the local board elections is noteworthy. Apart from those who have stood by that organization through thick and thin, some of the latest additions to the ranks have to be reckoned among the dark horses for other parties. The volte face of several members defies all calculations of human ingenuity and skill.

The more does one go into the question, the more is one convinced that the Congress has attempted or is attempting a difficult, if not an impossible, task. Its unity is confined to an opposition to an alien rule, and is so far only negative in character. The positive side is an edifice whose foundations have yet to be laid. This may be a painful reminder of our weaknesses but it is good to be self-critical sometimes.

The huge organization is not without its virtues. Its ideals are ennobling and elevating. Nobility, purity, sacrifice and service are ideals which are any day admirable, and if the banner had not been in the hands of tried workers, it must have long ago kissed the dust. But the really selfless and self-sacrificing are fewer in numbers than one should wish for.

Indeed, there are two or three things to which it is as well that the Congress should turn its attention. It is a melancholy spectacle that our villagers are being drawn into the vortex of poverty in their desire to provide their children with Government jobs. What happens is, the lands, the homes are sold or mortgaged. There is no minding the fact that the assets are being liquidated, and the dividend can be declared only in terms of bits of knowledge and bookishness, and they are really coins uncurrent, if not counterfeit. This is a tragedy which has beset many a rural home. The glitter of school and college education, the glamour of the university degree, the polished manners, the hankering after a small pittance with the concomitant evils, the devitalization of youth and the demoralization of society are the only things that can be set down to the balance of advantages. It would be a useful line of activity for the Congress to send out workers into village homes, many educated young men who would pledge themselves not only to preach but also practise the virtues of simplicity, sacrifice and service.

JANUS.

INTER-CASTE MARRIAGES BILL.

The following is the text of the brief speech delivered by Dr. Bhagavan Das (Cities of the United Provinces Non-Muhammadan Urban) when moving the circulation of his Bill:—

I move that the Bill to validate marriages between different castes of Hindus be circulated for the purpose of eliciting opinion thereon by the 15th July 1936.

In the very short time at my disposal I will not be able to place before the House my reasons at length in support of this measure. I will therefore content myself to-day—hoping that I will have a more favourable opportunity at a later date of explaining the reasons fully—with saying that the measure is a purely permissive one. It does not compel any one to marry out of his caste against his will. Also, it does not compel any one to maintain social relations against his will with any person who has contracted such a marriage out of his caste. But I do hope that if the Bill is passed by this House it will have the effect of saving persons who have contracted such a marriage

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

568

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 9

realpatidar.com

from being hounded out of caste by any other person proclaiming that he has lost caste. I hope that if this Bill is passed it will have the effect of preventing all such public proclamation on pain of the proclaimer being held guilty of defamation. There are a few scientific principles which underlie what is now known as the caste system. I hope to be able to place them before the House in detail later on. To-day, I will only mention briefly that one of the main principles which underlie the real original vocational-class system, which has been converted into a caricature and is now called the caste-system, is that inter-dining and inter-marriage should be entered into very discriminately. I believe that all such of my learned colleagues in this House as are practising the beneficent profession of medicine will support me when I say that 90 per cent of the disease of mankind are due to mistakes in diet and mistakes in sex relations. The current superstition against inter-dining and inter-marriage between different castes is simply a perversion and misunderstanding of this fact of hygienic and eugenic science. Attention to purity in diet ensures individual health, and attention to parity of temperament in respect of marriage ensures racial health. The perversion and misunderstanding of these two scientific laws has resulted in the ridiculous caricature which is looked at with astonishment and contempt by every outside observer of Hinduism. Hinduism to-day has degenerated into an amorphous mass of nearly three thousand castes and subcastes which are mutually untouchables in respect of dining and marriage. This is due simply to a misunderstanding of the scientific laws which underlie the old ideal of avoiding indiscriminate dining and indiscriminate marriage. The word "indiscriminate" needs to be emphasised greatly. The real meaning of 'a-sa-varana Vivah' is not marriage outside the caste, or between different so-called castes, but marriage between persons of disparity of temperament; 'sa-varna' means parity of temperament and sameness or similarity of occupational and intellectual and emotional interests and tastes, and compatibility of dispositions. This has been perverted into the mere nominal observance of identity of caste-name. I am glad to be able to say that public meetings have been held in various parts of the country which, I understand from the papers, have been passing resolutions in favour of this Bill. At the same time I have received some friendly suggestions and criticisms from persons as deeply desirous as myself of the regeneration of Hinduism and Hindu society out of their present degeneration, to the effect that some provisions should be added to ensure monogamy and the possibility of judicial separation or of divorce in case disparity of temperament develops later on. I will have to place before the House some views on these two matters when the Bill comes up for consideration. In the meanwhile, if the Bill is circulated for eliciting public opinion, different views on the subject will develop themselves and the House will be in a position to consider them all later on. I, therefore, move that the Bill be circulated for eliciting opinion by the 15th July, 1936.

The Bill is as below:—

A Bill to validate marriages between different castes of Hindus.

Whereas it is expedient to validate marriages between Hindus of different castes for the purpose hereinafter appearing: It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. This Act may be called the Hindu Marriage Validity Act 19...

2. No marriage among Hindus shall be invalid by reason that the parties thereto do not belong to the same caste, any custom or any interpretation of Hindu Law to the contrary notwithstanding.

INDIAN GENIUS IN POLITICS.*

BY SRI AUROBINDO

The Indian thinkers on society, economics and politics, Dharma Shastra and Artha Shastra, made it their business not to construct ideals and systems of society and government in the abstract intelligence, but to understand and regulate by the practical reason the institutions and ways of communal living already developed by the communal mind and life. New development was fixed and harmonized without breaking the original elements. Whatever new element or idea was needed was added or introduced as a superstructure or a modifying but not a revolutionary and destructive principle. It was in this way that the transition from the earlier stages to the fully developed monarchical polity was managed; it proceeded by an incorporation of the existing institutions under the supreme control of the king or the emperor. The character and status of many of them was modified by the pressure of the monarchical or imperial system, but, as far as possible, they did not pass out of existence. As a result we do not find in India the element of intellectually idealistic political progress or revolutionary experiment which has been so marked a feature of ancient and modern Europe. A profound respect for the creations of the past as the natural expression of the Indian mind and life, the sound manifestation of its Dharma or right law of being, was the strongest element in the mental attitude and this preservative instinct was not disturbed but rather yet more firmly settled and fixed by the great millennium of high intellectual culture. A slow evolution of custom and institution conservative of the principle of settled order, of social and political precedent, of established framework and structure, was the one way of progress possible or admissible. On the other hand, Indian polity never arrived at that unwholesome substitution of the mechanical for the natural order of the life of the people which has been the disease of Europe civilization now culminating in the monstrous artificial organization of the bureaucratic and industrial State. The advantages of the idealizing intellect were absent, but so also were the disadvantages of the mechanizing rational intelligence.

The right order of human life as of the universe is preserved according to the ancient Indian idea by each individual being following faithfully his swadharma, the true law and form of his nature and the nature of his kind, and by the group being, the organic collective life, doing likewise. The main function of the political sovereign, the king and council and the other ruling members of the body politic, was therefore to serve and assist the maintenance of the sound law of life of the society; the sovereign was the guardian and administrator of the Dharma. The function of society itself included the right satisfaction of the vital economic and other needs of the human being and of his hedonistic claim to pleasure and enjoyment; but this was to be done according to their right law and measure of satisfaction subject and subordinated to the ethical and social and religious Dharma. All the members and groups of the socio-political body had their Dharma determined for them by their nature, their position, their relation to the whole body and must be assured and maintained in the free and right exercise of it; they must be left to their own natural and self-determined functioning within their own bounds, but at the same time restrained from any transgression, encroachment or deviation from their right working and true limits. That was the office of the supreme political authority, the sovereign in his Council aided by the public

* The Modern Review, May 1936.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

569

assemblies. It was not the business of the state authority to interfere with or encroach upon the free functioning of the caste, religious community, guild, village, township or the organic custom of the region or province or to abrogate their rights, for these were inherent because necessary to the sound exercise of the social Dharma. All that it was called upon to do was to co-ordinate, to exercise a general and supreme control, to defend the life of the community against external attack or internal disruption, to repress crimes and disorders, to assist, promote and regulate in its larger lines the economic and industrial welfare, to see to the provision of facilities, and to use for these purposes the powers that passed beyond the scope of the others.

Thus in effect the Indian polity was the system of a very complex communal freedom and self-determination; each group unit of the community had its own natural existence and administered its own proper life and business, set off from the rest by a natural demarcation of its field and limits, but connected with the whole by well understood relations. Each group was a co-partner with the others in the powers and duties of the communal existence; each executed its own laws and rules, administered within its own proper limits, but joined with the others in the discussion and the regulation of matters of a mutual or common interest and was represented in some way and to the degree of its importance in the general assemblies of the kingdom or empire. The State, sovereign or supreme political authority was an instrument of co-ordination and of a general control and efficiency and exercised a supreme but not an absolute authority, for in all its rights and powers it was limited by the law and by the will of the people and in all its internal functions only a co-partner with the other members of the socio-political body.

This was the theory and principle and the actual constitution of the Indian polity, a complex of communal freedom and self-determination. The supreme co-ordinating authority, a sovereign person and body was armed with efficient powers, position and prestige, but limited to its proper rights and functions, at once controlling and controlled by the rest, admitting them as its active co-partners in all branches, sharing the regulation and administration of the communal existence. The sovereign, the people and all its constituent communities were bound to the maintenance and restrained by the yoke of the Dharma. Moreover, the economic and political aspects of the Communal life were only a part of the Dharma and a part not at all separate but inextricably united with all the rest, the religious, the ethical, the higher cultural aim of the social existence. The ethical law coloured the political and economic and was imposed on every action of the king and his ministers, the councils and assemblies, the individual, the constituent groups of the society; ethical and cultural considerations counted in the use of the vote and the qualifications for minister, official and councillor. A high character and training was expected from all who held authority in the affairs of the Aryan people. The religious spirit and the reminders of religion were the head and the background of the whole life of king and people. The life of the society was regarded not so much as an aim in itself in spite of the necessary specialization of parts of its system, but in all parts and the whole as a great framework and training ground for the education of the human mind and soul and its development through the natural to the spiritual existence.

A PLEA FOR BETTER SERMONS*

JOSEPH ERNEST McAFEE.

Consistently adopted, Jesus' method would challenge, in the light of modern insights upon truth, the now ancient teachings of Jesus himself, just as he was moved to challenge the ancient scriptures of his day; his teachings are now among the sayings of those "of old." Those today who ascribe finality to his sayings, maintaining that they are the last word upon any subject which he touched upon, and that nothing can ever be taken from them or added to them, will not, of course, presume to apply his method of preaching to Jesus' own teachings. But others may see in the method's application a way of highly honoring him and his message. They may construe his use of the method as its commendation to those who carry forward the light which he transmitted.

And, as a matter of fact, a frank and open application of this method in the recent controversy between fundamentalists and modernists would have greatly clarified the situation, and have saved the listeners a deal of bewilderment. These listeners have heard ardent fundamentalists and apparently outspoken modernists preaching opposing doctrines from the same scriptures. The naive hearer knows that both cannot be correct, and he has been inclined, therefore, to discount both, if not to desert all preaching.

The forced ingenuity of modernist preachers in giving old texts a new twist, to derive a new meaning more comfortably or rationally applicable to modern situations, has not proved a source of strength. It is quite possible that the people would have heard them more gladly if they had frankly declared that scriptural teachings, including some of Jesus' own statements, are inadequate and misleading if applied to modern social and personal problems, and had dared to interpret truth for today on the authority of new and enlightened spiritual insights.

The point might be almost endlessly illustrated. It would seem to many hearers much more effective when a preacher is discoursing upon the text "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and to God the things that are God's", if he would state that on the occasion when these words were uttered Jesus was matching wits with a quibbler. He was refusing to touch an exceedingly hot potato which a heckler was trying to hand him.

For some reason Jesus made no attempt to define the obligations of a citizen; he consistently evaded political issues. When he could no longer escape the tax-collector he sent Simon Peter angling for a fish in the mouth of which reposed a coin of sufficient value to pay off both his and Peter's debt. This procedure can scarcely be commended as a universal solution of the taxpayer's problem today. Jesus left the student of his teachings in confusion even in the profoundest concerns of social organization and social obligation. While many moderns are deriving inspiration for their "social gospel" from repeated references to the kingdom of God and the kingdom of heaven on earth, yet the extreme millennialism of the closing chapters of Matthew's gospel are to be reckoned with. It is impossible rationally to reconcile these two concepts. Only scribes' jugglery can successfully resolve their incongruity, and it is no wonder that the modernist preacher is often driven into a corner by the fundamentalist when the modernist, too, protests his devotion to literalism.

However that matter may stand, it is clear that no such clean-cut demarcation between political *Unity Chicago.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

570
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 9

and religious obligations in a democratic community can be drawn, as that indicated in Jesus' countering upon his heckler. Nor can the preacher in a modern free society be permitted to evade a clear issue after this fashion. What immeasurable embarrassment and confusion the American preacher of today would be saved if he would boldly adopt Jesus' own homiletical method, and assert the palpable inadequacy of Jesus' teachings in politics, in economics, in social organization, and in countless relations in which the citizen of a modern democracy finds himself! The insights required to guide through the ethical maze thus created must come from a different source, and by a method much more direct and imperious than can be the nice attempts of the scribe to formulate injunctions from ancient scriptures. Jesus did not live in our kind of society, and he could not contemplate the relationships and social obligations involved in a democratic community.

For reasons which may be accepted as sufficient, Jesus personally adopted a mode of life which one of his great admirers, Dr. Frank Crane, was accustomed to declare to be that of "a common, ordinary tramp." I shall never forget the sniff, almost the snort, which came from my much-beloved mother-in-law, when I read one morning in our family circle, the scriptural injunction to "consider the lilies of the field...take no thought for the morrow." She was an eminently devout woman, but she had given birth to ten children, and had been left a widow when half of them were still dependent. She had struggled through the ordeal of providing food and shelter and respectable clothing for her brood in a frontier community. For anybody to tell her to take no thought for the morrow was tantamount to inviting her to join the society of the slovenly tenant farmer's slattern wife who rode about from farm to farm in a ramshackle covered wagon swarming with her rag-tag progeny.

And, as the people's guides in the superlatively important matter of shaping these imperious convictions, we have scribes feebly repeating from countless pulpits the formulas of ancient scriptures! Few of them seem to understand how wearied the average layman is of being assured that our society needs to "get back to God"; of being told that in the teachings of Jesus, stereotyped in the first century, there is to be found the all-sufficient and all-comprehending guide through the mazes of twentieth century problems; of hearing that in their ancient scriptures, signed, sealed and closed to all addition and subtraction centuries ago, are bound up the moral energies designed to serve all generations for all time.

How we do need inspired preachers! Preachers who will know what they are talking about and will say what drives forthright into the living issues of human weal today. Preachers who care less what Matthew, Mark, Luke and John said or did not say in the first century, and who care more what Tom, Dick, Harry and the Hon. John Doe think and say and do in their struggle for the good society of our own time. Preachers who will not exhaust their ingenuity in extracting new and bizarre renderings from ancient scriptures, in the feeble attempt to make them mean something to their hearers in our American churches, but will reserve some of their resources for direct attack upon the social problems with which their hearers are immediately concerned. Preachers who will derive their spiritual insights from first-hand knowledge acquired in fields where technicians stand bewildered before moral problems transcending their technique, and who will help to equip the American public for confident attack upon these problems for which our whole social creation waits with groanings now so loudly uttered that even scribes ought to be able to hear.

JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY.*

The history of Johns Hopkins is a history of great men. Its first was that God-fearing, champagne-loving money grabber, Johns Hopkins. His namesake University would give much this week to find another like him. Son of a Maryland tobacco planter whose quaker precepts made him free his slaves and put his sons to work, Johns Hopkins got no schooling after he was 12. He started his fortune by exchanging groceries and farm products for raw Maryland whiskey, selling the whiskey as "Hopkins' Best." He increased it by shrewd business ventures and hardfisted money lending. Because his only love was a first cousin he never married. He became president of a bank, a leader in insurance, shipping and warehousing, the largest individual stockholder of Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. But to the end of his life he never wore an overcoat, walked whenever he could save money by it, thought long before replacing a threadbare carpet in his home. When he died at the end of 1873, he left some $7,000,000, nearly his whole fortune, half to found a university and half for a hospital which would be free to all of Baltimore's poor.

In the years after he took his Yale degree in 1852 Daniel Coit Gilman seemed to his friends a young man of great promise who was floundering lamentably in his choice of a lifework. He was building better than they knew. All the time he was wandering over Europe, planning Yale's Sheffield Scientific School, teaching geography there, serving on New Haven's Board of education, he was observing and thinking about education. When he was called from a brief term as president of the University of California to create Johns Hopkins, his ideas were ripe.

The U. S. then had no first-rate graduate. Would be scholars had to prepare themselves at Oxford, Heidelberg or the Sorbonne. Bent on establishing a native centre of scholarship, Daniel Gilman decided that the first essential of a university is not buildings, sites or apparatus but men. For twelve months he scoured Europe and the U. S. for the ablest available scholars, caring not whether they had yet made their reputations. The results were historic. Before he died every one of those first faculty men Remsen the chemist, Rowland the physicist, Sylvester the mathematician, Martin the biologist, Gildersleeve the classicist—had made his own name great, that of Johns Hopkins greater. They and their colleagues founded the first U. S. learned journals in mathematics, chemistry, philology. Famed for their own researches, they attracted and trained such students as Woodrow Wilson, Josiah Royce, Walter Hines Page. With President Gilman always in the van, they set the pattern for U. S. Graduate education, created a tradition of free and fruitful scholarship which remains unsurpassed. Wrote Philosopher Royce: "The beginning of the Johns Hopkins University was a dawn wherein 'twas bliss to be alive."

Hopkins' first financial setback occurred in the 1890's when the bottom dropped out of B. & O. stock. It emerged from that disaster with its original endowment cut almost in half. Never greatly interested in its undergraduate college, and sending its graduates out to seek knowledge instead of money, it failed to accumulate rich patron-alumni. In 1926 an endowment campaign raised some $6,000,000, but most of it went by its donors' direction to the School of Medicine. When depression set in, small annual deficits in the academic division became big ones.

* The Times, March 23, 1936.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

571

Prospects for money-raising were still far from bright, but trustees realised that it was soon or never. First, however, with old President Joseph Sweetman Ames nearing retirement, they faced the difficult job of finding in one person an executive who could raise the money to give Hopkins' tradition life and a scholar who could maintain that tradition to give the money purpose. Once again, as Hopkins' trustees had done in its crisis of birth, they turned to a Yale-trained geographer.

The University whose headship, Geographer Bowman assumed was not the unique institution it had been when Geographer Gilman was leading it into unexplored fields of knowledge. Other universities, bigger, richer and older than Hopkins had invaded its realm of higher scholarship, edged it off its throne by sheer weight of numbers. But something more than the enormous prestige of its past still kept Hopkins in the rank of the world's topflight universities. Its graduate departments, though outweighed in numbers by those of other institutions, were topnotch functioning vigorously. And in one notable respect Hopkins could still lay reasonable claim to its once unchallenged supremacy.

In a Baltimore Sun article ominously titled "We Who Are About to Die," brilliant outspoken Philosophy Professor George Boas last month discussed what the disappearance of Hopkins would mean to the world. "If the whole matter were to be summed up in a word," wrote he, "it would be the word 'freedom'." The Johns Hopkins University is not a perfect university, but in it there is maximum of liberty. I have worked as student and as teacher at five important universities (Brown, Harvard, Columbia, University of California, Hopkins) and this is the only one I know where a teacher pursues his own way without snooping or criticism or a large burden of committee work, and where the students are judged not by conformity to a set of rules but by their individual attainments."

Faculty freedom at Hopkins means not only freedom of opinion (a Hopkins professor ran as Socialist candidate for Governor of Maryland in 1932) but also freedom from heavy teaching schedules and freedom to rove wherever scholarly curiosity may lead. The average Ph. D. is said to spend his time learning more and more about less and less until finally he knows everything about nothing. Hopkins professors think a scholar who stays in his own backyard a mental cripple. David Moore Robinson started out as a professor of Greek, drifted from eye-work to spadework, won lasting fame by uncovering the buried City of Olynthus. Gilbert Chinard, professor of French, has done outstanding work in U. S. history (Honest John Adams, Jefferson, The Apostle of Americanism). Hopkins second-in-command, blunt, bushy-browed Provost and Dean of the College Edward Wilber Berry, famed for his lack of an academic degree, began as a Hopkins professor of geology, invaded botany's province on the trail of fossil leaves, is now a foremost palaeontologist.

Thiyya Converts at Patiala.—The Thiyya converts reached Patiala on the 29th April morning and were given a rousing reception at the station by the public and officials. They were taken round the important places and His Highness though indisposed granted an interview to them and promised his full sympathy to the Sikh mission. He gave five 'Khilats' to the Thiyya converts. S. Jal Singh thanked His Highness the Maharaja for his kind hospitality and warm sympathy and also the educational facilities promised by His Highness for Thiyya youths.

THE POPULATION QUESTION IN SWEDEN*

BY DR. M. BJORKQUIST, SIGTUNA.

The population question imposes upon the whole of Christendom today an immense responsibility. Whereas in the past a series of burning questions emerged in connection with the continually rising birth rate, today we are faced with its catastrophic fall, especially in those countries where technical developments have made the greatest strides. This development is not least being felt in the regions inhabited by the Germanic peoples. Of the northern countries, Sweden and Norway show the lowest birth rates. In Sweden, the problem of the population has in fact become a vital one for the whole nation, and one which is being attacked in all parts of the country. In this conflict the Swedish Churches are to a large extent taking part and are making vigorous efforts to solve the problem.

The origins of this population crisis do not lie so much in the biological sphere as in the tendency to improve the general living conditions for the individual and for the whole community, and to make the economic future sure. From that viewpoint, the large family is regarded as a heavy burden and perhaps even as a definite obstacle. The unrest on the political and economic field, the spread of unemployment, the desire to give children the best possible education, all these are factors to be taken into account. Nor must the practical eudemonism connected with a certain rational line of thought which is extending into every sphere of life be overlooked. Technical developments have revealed new possibilities of subordinating even the procreation of children to a deliberate, rationally calculated plan. The effects of the new Malthusian propaganda, which was originally directed to quite different aspects of the population question, are also making themselves felt, especially among the working classes. It is no longer "modern" to have children, or, at any rate, to have many children.

In such circumstances it is not surprising that the Swedish nation is embarking upon energetic measures to bring about improvement wherever possible, especially as the standard of living is relatively high in Sweden and could without doubt facilitate an increase in the population. On May 17, 1935, the Government appointed a Commission to study the population problem, to examine this whole complex of questions and to submit suitable proposals. This Commission is examining the following questions: 1. Increased maternity support, increased protection of mother and child, the improvement of nursing at confinements. 2. Taxation relief for married couples and further taxation allowances on account of children. 3. Loans and extra allowances to those about to marry. 4. Maternity protection for wage-earners. At all these points special attention must be given to the population question from the view point of social ethics.

With regard to the first two questions, comprehensive proposals have already been worked out and large grants made for the construction of houses and dwellings for people with big families. The basic starting point has thus been that it is to the interest of the whole community that, with every new child, the family should not suffer an all too apparent depreciation in its standard of living, in the same way as it is vitally necessary for the whole nation that the rising generation should be given the best possible start in life. The support offered should be put into effect in a way that is best for the child.

* International Christian Press and Information Service, Geneva.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

572

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

May 9

realpatidar.com

In this whole situation, the Church and Christian ethics are faced with vast problems. And the Church must courageously think those problems out anew, discarding all prejudice, but also refusing to yield to the fashionable tendencies of the day. Christian ethics has here, among other problems, to wrestle with an "erotic individualism" which threatens to break up marriage and family life and that at a time when the social sense of responsibility and social thinking is reaching in other spheres a definite climax. The problem of the population is deeply rooted in the question of the family which, on account of industrial development (where work to a great extent takes place away from the family), has once more come very critically to a head. The women's movement, too, has helped to intensify the population crisis, through the claim of woman and, to some extent, of the married woman, to earn her own living and to occupy an independent position in the home. This whole situation urgently demands a serious re-thinking of the entire problem of marriage and the family, a re-thinking which will be free from all false individualism and liberalism, and which will lay stronger emphasis on the rights of the child. The patriarchal family must give place to a type of family in which husband and wife, with mutual respect for each other's personal ways of life, are united in honouring the estate of marriage and all that it stands for. The question of the right of the married woman to earn her own living outside the family must be answered by considering the special needs of each individual case. At the same time, the woman's work in the home must receive a higher, generally recognised value, in particular in the light of its economic effects.

The child has the right to claim the unseparated home life of his parents, and to have brothers and sisters. The whole training of children must be directed towards an inner strengthening of the sense of family fellowship. The more emphasis is laid upon the equality of status between husband and wife, the more necessary does a scrupulous fostering of the fellowship outlook become. In the training of the rising generation this task must receive consideration. Viewing the matter, therefore, as a whole, it becomes a question of a new, healthy social ethics. Since the birth rate crisis has its deepest roots in the whole spiritual crisis of our day, it is a religious renewal, working itself out in the sphere of social ethics, that must bring the help required.

INDIAN WOMEN'S FELLOWSHIP OF SERVICE.

A feminine counter-part for the Servants of India Society has been started in Bombay known as "The Indian Women's Fellowship of Service (The Women's Servants of India Society)". In the preamble Miss Godavari Gokhale and Miss Shanta Bhalerao, the organizers say:—Many influences have contributed to the great awakening, which, during the last few years, has taken place amongst the women of India, stirring them to a new consciousness of their place in the nation's life and welfare. Not least of these influences has been the example and sacrifice of great national leaders, who have set forth the spirit of service and devotion, and who have inspired in women a sense of eagerness and responsibility to share in the tasks and opportunities before the Indian people to-day. Believing that the enthusiasm which has accompanied the growth of the women's movement is to find its abiding expression in trained and disciplined work, and being desirous of dedicating our own powers to a life of service, we are conscious of the need for a fellowship where singleness of purpose, a high sense of discipline in work, and a real willingness to sacrifice would find inspiration and sustaining power.

The justification for forming a new society of women workers, lies, we believe, in the need for women to unite in creating a standard of disciplined service which shall be worthy of the high ideals and deep devotion of Indian womanhood. It is expected that women who come forward for membership will carry out their purpose in a religious spirit, and it is our hope, that we, and those who join us, may be enabled to fulfil our obligations and responsibilities thus.

Of recent years, the field of women's service has greatly widened, and to-day the service of women is called for in nearly every sphere. While the new Society will, therefore, find its richness and its usefulness in the diversity of gifts and the variety of experience of its individual members, we would stress the essential unity of our service. For this reason the cultivation of a corporate life and spirit amongst individual members, will be an important aspect of the new Society's life.

In practice, our purpose is to form a women's fellowship of service on the lines of the Servants of India Society. The constitution and organization of the Women's Society must inevitably have its own distinguishing features, though it is evident that these two bodies would have many opportunities of working together in a spirit of mutual helpfulness and co-operation. The first opportunity for such helpfulness arises while as yet few women are available for full membership under the rules and tests which we propose in the constitution of the new Society. Until women are eligible for membership, and are able to assume the responsibility of senior members the Council of the Servants of India Society is willing to give the newly growing women's Society, the necessary control, oversight and guidance. The period and extent of this control shall be determined according to the needs of the situation, by the Council of Servants of India Society in consultation with the first two members of the Women's Fellowship of Service.

In the commencement therefore, those applicants of whom the Council of the Servants of India Society approves, will enter upon a period of probationship and training for five years. During that period they may continue in some type of responsible work, which, in the opinion of the Council, constitutes a sufficiently valuable experience, and a satisfactory test of their ability, sincerity and dependableness. At the same time, the senior authority for the time being (i.e. the Council of the Servants of India Society) will supplement the probationer's and trainer's experience by directed study and other valuable guidance. This actual period of probationer-ship will last for two years. At the end of this period, those candidates who have satisfied the present senior authority as to their fitness, will become members under training, and as such will be in a position to share in the working of the constitution of the new Society, with whatever continued co-operation and control from the Servants of India Society seems feasible and desirable.

Temple for All Hindus:—Malaviyaji opened a temple at Daltonganj, last week, for the worship of all the Hindus including the Harijans, who expressed great satisfaction. The ceremony was performed in the presence of a large gathering of Hindus including orthodox Pandits. Malaviyaji returned to Benares. He proposes to pay a visit to Ajodhya shortly in connection with religious work.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

573

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS
only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase-the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE
NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:-BARODA.

Branches:-Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohsana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Haril (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED ... Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP ... " 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND ... " 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Desabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhaillal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrocks Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Reserved for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION
COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to:-

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

574

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 9

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.
HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches:—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch,
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.

RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

THE

Central Bank of India, Ltd.

SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,

Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulia (District Wardha)
Karad (" ")	Khandesh (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Satara (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Sindkheda (" ")
Shevgaon (" ")	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Ahmednagar (" ")	Satana (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Kaiwan (" ")
Palghar (" ")	Dohad (District Panhala)
Kalyan (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Bajajaya, Esq.,
Madhowjee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Bant, Esq.,
E. G. Sarlaya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	C. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,90,000

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malaviya Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malaviya Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies, Apply to:—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

575

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON THE STRENGTH OF

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore
DRESS and SARI
Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and soap. And, because they are essentially Indian, they cost far less than silks of foreign manufacture.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents :—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—

1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bomba

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :- KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 28.

Editor :- K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MAY 16, 1936. No. 37

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Late Dr. M. A. Ansari.	The Teachings of Jesus.
Italy in Ethiopia.	The Wahabee Movement.
India and the League of Nations.	Life in Nazi Germany.
The Pope's Pean.	The Late Dr. Ansari.
Imperial Preference.	Women's Fellowship of Service.
The Bolshevik Red-Flag.	Ethiopia and the League of Nations.
Civil Liberties.	Mysore Hindu Widows Re-marriage Bill.
Sikhism and Untouchability.
Social Confusion.
A Religious Symposium.

NOTES

The late Dr. M. A. Ansari :— The sudden death of Dr. M. A. Ansari in the train while travelling from Dehra Dun to Delhi, removes from Indian public life a Muslim leader of broad views and large outlook. He seems to have been aware that his end may come at any moment owing to heart weakness and had a medicine in his trunk to ward off attacks. Unfortunately, his fellow traveller whom he requested to take it out of the box, did not quite catch what the Doctor said and the latter was too faint to explain. He knew and said he was dying and wanted to be left in peace. A sad end to a bright career of public usefulness! Dr. Ansari with Dr. B. C. Roy of Calcutta and Mr. Bhulabhai Desai of Bombay was mainly instrumental in inducing the National Congress to raise the ban on entering the Legislatures. Soon after the last general elections to the Legislative Assembly, Dr. Ansari withdrew from active participation in politics. He was a staunch nationalist and had been imprisoned more than once for taking part in the civil disobedience movement. At the same time, he was a powerful check on extremist elements. As a trained physician he distrusted quack remedies and, moreover, his contacts with all classes of people, princes and peasants, showed him that at the bottom they are much of a piece. There were good princes and bad peasants as often as there were good peasants and bad princes. He would have been an ideal head of the Congress delegation to the Second Round Table Conference, if one had been sent. A sketch of his life is reprinted on another page.

Italy in Ethiopia :—A few days after the entry of Italians into Addis Ababa, the King of Italy was proclaimed Emperor of Abyssinia and a decree announcing the annexation outright of the country is expected to issue shortly. This is a sibility for the government good or bad, of the conquered territory instead of leaving it to a puppet nominee while the real power is reserved by the conqueror. The League of Nations has not agreed to the Italian demand to drop the Ethiopian representative on the ground that there is no Ethiopian Government and that Italy is in possession of the country. But evidently attempts are being made to come to an arrangements with Signor Mussolini to secure the safety of European countries. The Italian Dictator is said to have promised not to enlist coloured troops in his new Empire. He will keep this engagement only as long as it suits him and not a day longer; and, indeed, there is no reason why if Britain and France can raise coloured troops Italy should not do the same. The discussions throughout have disclosed the fact that the League is more concerned with keeping the European nations together than with what happens to non-European nations who, it is tacitly assumed, exist only to be exploited by the former under the guise of civilisation. Italy, great as her offence is in destroying the independence of an inoffensive people, deserves some credit for tearing the veil of hypocritical pretensions from Colonialism although she herself has not been above using them. Her action has demonstrated that western civilisation is three-fourths window-dressing and that at heart western nations can be as brutal as savage people without the excuse, in the case of the latter, that they know no better. In the proclamation announcing the assumption of the Imperial title, it was mentioned that, following the precedent of ancient Rome, modern Italy will mingle with her new citizens effacing thereby the distinction between conqueror and conquered. Contact with the White races has often spelt extermination of primitive tribes. It remains to be seen, how, it will be with the Ethiopian people who in part have inherited the toughness and vitality of the Hebrew race. By the way, Ethiopia may offer an asylum for some thousands of the Jews who are not wanted in Germany.

India and the League of Nations :—Emphatic expression has been given in the Indian Press during the week to the feeling that India should leave the League as it has proved itself incapable of serving the purpose for which it was primarily intended, namely, to prevent aggression by its member states on one another. A member of the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and soap. And, because they are essentially Indian, they cost far less than silks of foreign manufacture.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents :—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.
Leading Stockists:—

1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

realpatidar.com

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by
Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer," Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bomba

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :— KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor :— K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MAY 16, 1936. No. 37

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice : I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The Late Dr. M. A. Ansari.
Italy in Ethiopia.
India and the League of Nations.
The Pope's Pean.
Imperial Preference.
The Bolsheviki Red-Bag.
Civil Liberties.
Bikidism and Untouchability.
Social Confusion.
A Religious Symposium.

The Teachings of Jesus.
The Wahabee Movement.
Life in Nazi Germany.
The Late Dr. Ansari.
Women's Fellowship of Service.
Ethiopia and the League of Nations.
Mysore Hindu Widows Remarriage Bill.

NOTES

The late Dr. M. A. Ansari :— The sudden death of Dr. M. A. Ansari in the train while travelling from Dehra Dun to Delhi, removes from Indian public life a Muslim leader of broad views and large outlook. He seems to have been aware that his end may come at any moment owing to heart weakness and had a medicine in his trunk to ward off attacks. Unfortunately, his fellow traveller whom he requested to take it out of the box, did not quite catch what the Doctor said and the latter was too faint to explain. He knew and said he was dying and wanted to be left in peace. A sad end to a bright career of public usefulness! Dr. Ansari with Dr. B. C. Roy of Calcutta and Mr. Bhulabhai Desai of Bombay was mainly instrumental in inducing the National Congress to raise the ban on entering the Legislatures. Soon after the last general elections to the Legislative Assembly, Dr. Ansari withdrew from active participation in politics. He was a staunch nationalist and had been imprisoned more than once for taking part in the civil disobedience movement. At the same time, he was a powerful check on extremist elements. As a trained physician he distrusted quack remedies and, moreover, his contacts with all classes of people, princes and peasants, showed him that at the bottom they are much of a piece. There were good princes and bad peasants as often as there were good peasants and bad princes. He would have been an ideal head of the Congress delegation to the Second Round Table Conference, if one had been sent. A sketch of his life is reprinted on another page.

Italy in Ethiopia :— A few days after the entry of Italians into Addis Ababa, the King of Italy was proclaimed Emperor of Abyssinia and a decree announcing the annexation outright of the country is expected to issue shortly. This is a straightforward course which assumes responsibility for the government good or bad, of the conquered territory instead of leaving it to a puppet nominee while the real power is reserved by the conqueror. The League of Nations has not agreed to the Italian demand to drop the Ethiopian representative on the ground that there is no Ethiopian Government and that Italy is in possession of the country. But evidently attempts are being made to come to an arrangement with Signor Mussolini to secure the safety of European countries. The Italian Dictator is said to have promised not to enlist coloured troops in his new Empire. He will keep this engagement only as long as it suits him and not a day longer; and, indeed, there is no reason why if Britain and France can raise coloured troops Italy should not do the same. The discussions throughout have disclosed the fact that the League is more concerned with keeping the European nations together than with what happens to non-European nations who, it is tacitly assumed, exist only to be exploited by the former under the guise of civilisation. Italy, great as her offence is in destroying the independence of an inoffensive people, deserves some credit for tearing the veil of hypocritical pretensions from Colonialism although she herself has not been above using them. Her action has demonstrated that western civilisation is three-fourths window-dressing and that at heart western nations can be as brutal as savage people without the excuse, in the case of the latter, that they know no better. In the proclamation announcing the assumption of the Imperial title, it was mentioned that, following the precedent of ancient Rome, modern Italy will mingle with her new citizens effacing thereby the distinction between conqueror and conquered. Contact with the White races has often spelt extermination of primitive tribes. It remains to be seen how it will be with the Ethiopian people who in part have inherited the toughness and vitality of the Hebrew race. By the way, Ethiopia may offer an asylum for some thousands of the Jews who are not wanted in Germany.

India and the League of Nations :— Emphatic expression has been given in the Indian Press during the week to the feeling that India should leave the League as it has proved itself incapable of serving the purpose for which it was primarily intended, namely, to prevent aggression by its member states on one another. A member of the Legislative Assembly, Mr. M. A. Iyengar, has

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

578
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

given notice of a resolution to be moved at the next session, recommending the withdrawal of India from the League of Nations. The only voice raised on behalf of the League is that of Sir Cowasji Jehangir, President of the League Union in Bombay. It must be regretfully admitted, he says in a statement issued to the Press, that the League has failed in one of its most important duties in this instance. But he thinks that it is needed to express international opinion in an authoritative way. What good does an expression of opinion do, if those who express it are not prepared to do anything to give effect to their opinion? Sir Cowasji also points out that the League has other functions. It is, he says, the institutional manifestation of a world need for the co-ordination of national activities in the field of health, social amelioration, labour &c. It acts as a clearing house for information in economic matters and, generally, as a focus for internationalism. But surely it can better fulfil these purposes if it is relieved of its political functions which it has notoriously failed in, not only in the Italo-Ethiopian trouble but in all such cases. Let a new League be started after this one is abolished for purely humanitarian work. It need not be so expensive and it need not consist only of representatives selected by Governments.

The Pope's Peace:—Unholy is the voice of loud thanksgiving over slaughtered men, sang the poet. But, if the report be correct, the Pope's message of peace in opening the world exhibition of Catholic newspapers links God with Mussolini's campaign of violence and poison gas in Ethiopia. He said that God had visibly blessed the Exhibition by causing it to coincide with the triumphal joy of a great and good people at having secured peace, which, it was hoped, would be a prelude to true European and world peace of which the Exhibition aimed at being a symbol. He denounced Communism which, he said, threatened the security of civilised life and above all, religion. It is unfortunate that His Holiness did not stop to explain what he regarded as true peace or why Ethiopians should regard the attack of Fascist Catholic forces with less dismay than he himself regards Communism. We cannot help feeling that, if His Holiness could not have said something more appropriate to the occasion, he might at least have spared the world this homily which will jar on every sensible mind.

Imperial Preference:—When the Legislative Assembly rejected the Ottawa Pact and called for its withdrawal, the decision was condemned in certain quarters as likely to antagonise British opinion. The Government of India's action in accepting the verdict of the Assembly was also cited as an instance of their responsiveness to public opinion. But two articles in the current number of The Round Table encourage the view that, before the six months of notice of termination given by India elapse, the Ottawa Agreement might be abandoned by Great Britain herself in the interests of peace in Europe. "If the world could be divided into watertight economic compartments, some of which are able to maintain a much higher standard of living than others, two results are inevitable," remarks one writer; "a continuing series of crises leading to the formation of a military alliance system embracing all Europe, Asia and Africa and ending in another world war, and greater interference by governments in the internal life of their countries, ending in dictatorship or revolution." Another article repeats Sir Arthur Salter's criticism of the Ottawa Pact that it sacrificed the interests of colonies to compensate for concessions to Dominions. "The attitude of mind that regards the colonies as 'our markets' is incompatible with the acceptance of trusteeship. It is equally incompatible with a sincere attempt to strike at the roots of international conflict by removing the just grievances of the discontented Powers. Imperial preference between the self-governing members of the British Commonwealth, each of whom can be relied upon to look after its own long-term interests, is an entirely different matter. As far as subject territories are concerned, there is only one policy consistent with equal access to colonial raw materials and that is the colonial Open Door." Even though both writers seem to look upon colonies as sources of raw materials alone—we see no reason why colonies should not convert their raw materials into manufactured products instead of selling their advantage to foreign exploiters—their views conflict with the ideals of British imperialism, which might consider the grant of Dominionhood preferable to the colonial Open Door. However that may be, the British Government could not very well insist on thrusting the Ottawa Pact on India at a time when its own abandonment of imperial preference is under serious consideration.

The Bolshevik Red Rag:—If Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru had developed his views on the future of Indian politics without referring to the Bolshevik example, there would have been more chances of his ideas being considered on their merits by a large section of educated Indians. His reference to Soviet Russia has drawn upon him much criticism which might have been avoided. The essence of his scheme as we understand it, is, that the Indian constitution should be built up from the village community. This is a very ancient institution and there is nothing specifically Bolshevik about it. The Commonwealth of India Bill drafted by the late Mrs. Besant was based on the village community. The British Government had an excellent opportunity of giving India a stable constitution with adult suffrage and indirect election through the village community. It would have been a simple straightforward scheme easily understood by every man and woman in the country and would have obviated the complex provisions for communal electorates and weightages. It would have had in it the potentiality in full measure of natural growth. The resemblance to the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

579

Bolshevik system would have been superficial. In actual reality such a constitution would prove the strongest bulwark against Marxian ideas. It is not fair to take advantage of Pandit Jawaharlal's allusion to Soviet practice to discredit his ideas out of hand even before he has had the opportunity of embodying them in a coherent scheme. This, we are afraid, is what Sir Sivaswami Aiyar does in his article in the Indian Review. "The Pandit is an admirer of the Bolshevik regime of the U. S. S. R.," he writes, and jumps at once to the conclusion that it implies the abolition of private property and the dictatorship of the proletariat. For this and many of the other inferences of Sir Sivaswami, we have not been able to find any justification in the reports that we have read of the Presidential address at the Lucknow Congress.

Civil Liberties :—Mr. K. F. Nariman, President of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee, has called an informal conference on Sunday to discuss Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's proposals to form a league for the protection of civil liberties independent of political parties. The following passage from an article in the New Republic last year on the subject is helpful as conveying an idea of what exactly civil liberty is : "Liberty is not an absolute, but a relative quantity. In no regime and under no circumstances, is liberty complete. Every society forbids the doing of certain things. What it forbids depends on the nature and aims of the society. Liberty to own private capital and seek profit, for instance, is incompatible with socialism, and no one who favours socialism could believe in it. Civil liberties involve chiefly the freedom of persons in relation to the government that forbids. If people can oppose the government freely, can even advocate with impunity basic changes in its character, and if they are safeguarded, when they become involved with governmental police power, by such things as the presumption of innocence until guilt is proved and all the other appurtenances of what is known as a "fair trial," then civil liberties exist as completely as is humanly possible. Now liberty of this magnitude is rare and always has been. It does not exist a free gift or as divine right, but is won and preserved, if at all, only at a great sacrifice. And it is not a condition precedent but the product of certain other conditions. It can result only from a highly stable regime that is not seriously involved with foreign enemies and in which internal opposition does not threaten the existing order. The moment a government is threatened by civil conflict or war, civil liberties are restricted. This is historically as true of the United States as of other nations."

Social Confusion :—Two recent tragic occurrences in Bombay bring out vividly the social unrest resulting from the varying impact of new ideas at the same level. A young Hindu wife shot herself with her husband's revolver when she came to know that he had married a second time. This was about three weeks ago. This week the husband and his second wife killed themselves by the same means as they wished to meet and live in the company of the deceased first wife in the other world. The first wife felt that after her husband married a second time there was no joy left for her in this life. The husband, it is obvious, honestly thought that he was not in any way wounding the feelings of his first wife by marrying a second in her lifetime. The second wife, in a letter which she left behind her, declared that she regarded the first wife as her sister and was killing herself in order to meet her. Both of them, she added, would serve their husband with devotion in the next world. These were not illiterate peasants but educated middle class people. Noteworthy is their implicit belief that death does not end, it only interrupts, relations contracted in this life and also opens the door to their resumption in another world.

Sikhism and Untouchability :—The conversion at the Golden Temple at Amritsar of some Thiyya gentlemen from Malabar to Sikhism has been, on the whole, well received by Hindus. One of the Shankaracharyas has actually conveyed his benedictions to the converts and the leaders of the Sikh brotherhood. Conversion to Sikhism does not impinge on the doctrinal background of Hinduism. Practically, it causes very little dislocation of its socio-economic structure. Sikhism as propounded by Guru Nanak is a religion of peace and goodwill towards all. Dire necessity forced the sword into its hands in pure self-defence and the peaceful sect was transformed almost overnight into an efficient fighting force. The Puritan uprising in England and the Covenanters in Scotland are the nearest historical parallels to Sikhism. The adoption of Sikhism by Hindus has as little of the elements of proselytism in it as their conversion from Saivism to Vaishnavism. Our only doubt is—this is a point on which we should like more definite information—whether untouchability has been altogether wiped out of Sikhism as practised in the Punjab. Lingayatism in its social features was uncompromisingly hostile to caste but it has now come to be itself a caste. Even if in the past Sikhism has not been able to shake off the prejudice against sweepers and other menial castes, it may under the inspiration of the movement for the removal of untouchability do so now. If it does, it will be a result, as happy as it was unforeseen, of the awakening social consciousness among Hindus. We are glad to read that the converts to Sikhism were permitted to pass through certain streets in Malabar which were closed to them before conversion and are still closed to their kith and kin. Hinduism has become a rigid system into which direct admission is difficult. But it has always had side-doors through which from ancient times a vast process of assimilation has been successfully effected.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

580
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 16

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, May 16, 1936.

A RELIGIOUS SYMPOSIUM.

It was a happy idea of the Bombay Committee of the Sri Ramakrishna Centenary celebrations to devote three days last week to a public exposition of the ideals of their respective faiths by representatives of the principal religious communities of India. The function was termed a Parliament of Religions after the great gathering at Chicago at which Swami Vivekananda, the famous disciple of Sri Ramakrishna, laid the foundation of the widespread Mission of religious teaching and social service, which has now branches in several countries. The Chicago Parliament of Religions of 1893, however, was outstripped by the Fellowship of Faiths inaugurated in the same city three years ago, in that, while in the earlier assemblage Christianity was the host and the other religions, guests, so to speak, in the Fellowship of Faiths all religions met on an equal footing. Still, in the Fellowship as in the Parliament, representatives of different religions were chiefly concerned with exhibiting their respective Faiths to the best advantage by dwelling on their ideals. There was no attempt at stating their difficulties and taking counsel from their colleagues, as to the best way of overcoming them; That is the purpose of a Parliament, whereas most of the speakers in the previous as in the Bombay Parliament seemed to be more intent on warding off criticisms, clearing misunderstandings, and demonstrating that the practice of those who professed a religion too often fell far short of and was in complete contrast to its ideals. No religion is so conspicuous for the gulf between its philosophy and social life as Hinduism. Hindu metaphysics lays the greatest stress on the immanence of God not only in human society but throughout the Universe. God is everywhere, in all things and outside all things. In fact, he is the only Reality. All else is unreal. In the words of Professor Deussen, the Vedanta is morals and metaphysics combined. In it we have the key to the solution of all the problems which oppress humanity. But the Hindus, who are very proud of the Vedanta, are in their social life the worst sinners in contravening its cardinal tenet. The many castes and sub-castes, the custom of untouchability, child marriage, enforced widowhood, animal sacrifices in some temples, dedication of women in some others, an ignorant and venal priesthood, are some of the blank negations of the Vedanta which Hindus tolerate in their midst and even resent any attempt to reform. The caste and custom-ridden system most of them cling to, is as far from the Vedanta as Heaven from Hell. Dr. Manshardt, whose excellent address we are privileged to print in this issue, and Mr. J. C. Kumarappa by their outspoken criticism did much to enhance the great reverence in which Jesus has always been held by Indian religious reformers.

Principal M. B. Rehman's discourse on Islam was one of the best delivered at the Parliament. He showed that the Prophet of Arabia acknowledged the prophets of all religions and that his own teachings were entirely free from any trace of bigotry or intolerance. Dastur Noshervan Kaikobad's presentation of Zoroastrianism bore the strong impress of the high ecclesiastical position which he holds in that Church. The sacerdotal in every religion is apt to make light of its philosophical basis and one felt that the Dastur's exposition did not do adequate justice to the spiritual side of the ancient religion of Zoroaster. Every religious Teacher primarily addresses himself to improve the religious environment in which his lot is cast; and his warnings and precepts, therefore, should be understood as having been directed to the task immediately in front of him. Zoroaster, like Buddha who was his contemporary, found that religion in his time tended to degenerate into insuane self-torture and he like Buddha emphasised in his teaching that revolting ascetic practices were deviations from the true light of spirituality. Bahaism found an eloquent exponent in Mrs. S. Fozdar and Theosophy in Madame Sophia Wadia who is at the present time the most attractive speaker on non-political subjects in Bombay.

Sikhism could not be included in the programme owing to there being no competent representative easily available. This was regrettable as Sikhism like Islam grew into a political power starting from a religious impulse. There is a tendency nowadays to regard religion as an effete influence making for the enslavement of the spirit of man. Islam and Sikhism give a direct contradiction to this belief. Puritanism in Great Britain was just such a power. It gave not only constitutional Government to Britain but was the foundation of the United States of America. Another notable omission in the agenda of the Bombay Parliament of Religions, was that of the Brahmo Samaj which anticipated and paved the way to the Ramakrishna revival. The Founder of the Samaj, Raja Ram Mohan Roy, drew his inspiration from Hinduism as well as from Islam and Christianity. He was thus in himself the embodiment of the three main religious cultures of the world. In fact, it was in his mind that the idea first originated of Comparative Religion. The Chairman of the Centenary Committee in Bombay, Mr. M. R. Jayakar, in opening and closing the proceedings, made brief speeches much appreciated by the audience which on all three days filled the Cowasji Jehangir Hall (and the University Convocation Hall to which the Conference shifted on the last day) and overflowed into the verandahs. We have reserved to the last reference to Sir, S. Radhakrishnan, whose presiding at the Parliament, at considerable inconvenience as he was leaving for Europe immediately, was certainly the principal cause of the wonderful success which attended it.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

581

THE TEACHINGS OF JESUS.*

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT)

One of my major reasons for coming to India was the desire to study at first hand the religions of India. In America I had studied comparative religions from books, but I was anxious to check the religion of the books with religion as it is actually lived by its followers. And during my eleven years in India I have not been disappointed, for India is a veritable laboratory of religions. In my quest for religious truth I have been open-minded. I have read widely; I have conversed freely; and have attended conferences of varying religious faiths. I have appropriated much for the enrichment of my own life. But at the same time, removed from an atmosphere where the teachings of Jesus are repeated so often as to seem almost trite, I have been thrown back to a new appreciation of the depth and importance of much of Jesus' teaching.

I am not an orthodox Christian in the accepted use of the term, but I yield nothing to the orthodox Christian in my admiration for and appreciation of the humanitarian teachings of Jesus. And though I regard goods as plural, I am nevertheless glad to share with my friends who profess other religions, those principles of Jesus which seem to me to be of universal value. At the same time, I make no fetish of the teachings of Jesus, feeling as free to reject that which appears contrary to reason as to accept that which gives promise of making life richer.

It is apparent to even the most careless observer that the West has invaded the East. Eleven years ago when I went into a little Indian village for language study, that village was practically cut off from the outside world. Our mail was brought from the nearest railway centre, twenty-five miles away, by a runner. Then came the motor bus, bringing cheap and rapid communication not only to that village, but to thousands of other villages in all parts of India. Villagers, unaccustomed to travel, began to move about. They saw the glamour of the cities, the way city people dressed, and the things they had in their houses. They stood open-eyed in the city bazar and they went back to their villages changed people, with a desire for strange new things.

In a city such as Bombay, the impact of the West meets one at every turn. Speeding motors, tram cars, electric sign boards, lavish window displays, well-stocked shops, sewing machines, bicycles, radios, moving picture theatres, and so on and so on. The East is becoming interested in things—in the pursuit of material possessions.

Jesus, as an Oriental, knew that the happiness of man is not dependent upon things. When Mr. Gandhi declares that the test of civilization is not the way it increases wants, but the manner in which it encourages their voluntary reduction, he is simply emphasizing again the message of Jesus that a man's life cannot be measured by his possessions. A man may be poor in the midst of wealth, for life is more than food and the body is more than clothing. The man himself must both be fed and nourished.

Religion in India is to a considerable degree, a matter of ceremonies. In all the religions, my own included, it is the orthodox formalist who is accounted good. But Jesus had another idea of goodness. It was neither the priest nor the Levite who helped the man in distress—it was the Samaritan. In other words, it is not the meticulous ceremonialist of any religion who is per se to be accounted good. Goodness is found in the most unexpected quarters. The good man is not necessarily the man who makes the loudest professions or who scrupulously conforms. The good man is the man who demonstrates his goodness by his deeds. Just as a tree is known by its fruit, so a man's life speaks louder than his words.

For Jesus, religion was not a refuge. In India today, religion is interpreted almost entirely in personal terms. A few years ago I attended another All Faiths Conference. For three days we listened to no less than twenty speakers representing all the major religions of India. In that whole conference there were but two papers which made any attempt to interpret religion in other than personal terms. Some said this, and some said that, but nothing was said concerning the relation of religion to India's economic and social problems. Jesus believed that the man who attempted to save his life would lose it. For him, religion was an adventure, a call to action, a whole-hearted giving of one's self for the furtherance of good causes.

Jesus assured his followers that they were the salt of the earth. Any one who was present in India during the stirring days of 1930, could not fail to realize the importance of salt. Salt had become a national political issue. There were salt marches, salt meetings, salt raids and salt arrests—until the people from one end of the country to the other became salt conscious. In a tropical country like India, everyone understands the use of salt. It is not only that which gives taste to food, but it is also an important preservative. The religious man, therefore, to be the salt of the earth must not only give an essential flavour to society, he must also be a preservative against social decay.

The humanitarian religionist has a real crusade on his hands as he endeavours to establish a connection between religion and social change. The orthodox of all religions stand ready to invoke religion as the preserver of the status quo. But I do not believe that it is this kind of preservation that Jesus was talking about. I believe he had a keener insight. Jesus knew that a society left to itself tends to become corrupt. Its morality might have been adequate for another generation, but a new generation calls for new morality. "You have heard that it was said to them of old time," said Jesus, "but I say unto you." And this, "I say unto you," must be repeated by each succeeding generation. Unless religion is to exist simply as an outworn curiosity it must hold up a higher standard, give a peculiar flavour to society, and protect society from inner decay.

Just as the morality of religion must be a higher morality, so the life of the religious man must be a richer life. Jesus was not interested in the religious man who could not be distinguished from the rest of the crowd. He was not interested in a religion that was simply an average religion. "You claim to be religious," he said, "What are you doing? What do ye more than other people?" It is but natural that religions which place the supreme emphasis upon rites and ceremonies should produce a considerable number of average people. For unless there is ethical challenge in religion, there is little stimulus for a man to rise above the common level. "What am I doing?" "I go to the temple, mosque, or church. I say my prayers; I am ceremonially clean, or a communicant in good standing. What more do you desire?" Jesus' reply would be, "What about your ethical insight? Do you see evils where other men do not see them? Have you a conscience that is attuned to social wrong? Are you content to be simply an average man? There are plenty of good men in the world, but the religious man should

* Paper on "Some Universal Elements in the Teachings of Jesus" read by Dr. Manshardt at the Parliament of Religions, Bombay, May 1.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

582
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

May 16

be better. What worthwhile things are you doing that other men are not doing? What do ye more than others?"

To hold up high ideals is often costly, but Jesus believed that the process is worth everything that it costs. The man who sold his lesser pearls in order to buy the pearl of great price was entirely satisfied. The religious reformer has a difficult task before him. He not only has to overcome the inertia of the illiterate but also the active opposition of the orthodox. He needs this word of encouragement: "Persist, faint not; the pearl is worth all that it costs."

Some time ago I paid a visit to a famous Hindu pilgrimage centre. Pilgrims were present from all parts of India, bathing in the sacred pools and worshipping in the temples of their favourite deities. A considerable number of those who came to this centre might be classed as sight-seers, but the majority of the pilgrims were seeking after righteousness. "Happy are those people who hunger and thirst after righteousness," said Jesus, "for they shall be satisfied."

It is my conviction that many religious seekers in India have become satisfied. They have attained an inner personal harmony and face the world with a supreme calm. But I cannot help wondering whether the majority of these people really knows what it means to face intense hunger and thirst. I cannot help contrasting those who claim to have found personal peace with Mr. Gandhi, fasting for 21 long days, not for himself, but for the sake of others. Here was a man who underwent a severe ordeal of inner purification, in order to make himself worthy to lead a great movement of social uplift. That is the kind of thing that I think Jesus was talking about. "Happy are they who hunger and thirst after a purified society, a just social order; for if their hunger and thirst become intense enough, they will be compelled to do something about it."

The beauty of this message of Jesus is that it is a message of growth and progress. Through partaking of food, hunger is temporarily appeased. It is satisfied for the present, but it is only a short time until the body hungers again. And so it is with the quest for a purified society. Each achievement may give temporary satisfaction, but it has within it a leading on quality which compels one to undertake new ventures. As long as we continue to live in an unrighteous world the hunger and thirst will be upon us, and happy are they who seek to satisfy it.

The whole world is now acquainted with the principle of passive resistance as it was applied by the Indian Nationalists. "It was the New Testament," said Mr. Gandhi, "which really awakened me to the rightness and value of passive resistance. When I read in the Sermon on the Mount such passages as 'resist not him that is evil; but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also,' and 'Love your enemies; pray for them that persecute you, that ye may be the sons of your Father which is in heaven' I was simply overjoyed... The Bhagavadgita deepened the impression, and Tolstoy's The Kingdom of God is Within You gave it a permanent form."

The "Love your enemies" which Mr. Gandhi felt was speaking to his own soul, is speaking to others. Though few in India as in the West have heard the voice, the message remains. Here is a way out of both internal and international difficulties. "Let your love be so inclusive that it knows no barriers of caste, creed, or nation. Expand your capacity for friendship until it includes all men, even those who are working against you. Love overcomes all divisions.

Put your trust in love." More and more thinking men the world over are coming to accept this position. Their courage will inspire others. Confidence will breed confidence. The way of love will triumph.

Jesus had a passion that every man should be living up to his possibilities. The lost coin should be put back into circulation. The lost boy should be restored to his father. The man who is living at a lower level than his best is not performing his proper function in life. This statement of Jesus is in direct contrast to the widespread fatalism of much of India. Fatalism says, "This is my lot. It is ordained of God, I can do nothing about it." One of the major hindrances to our national progress is just here. Too many of our fellow citizens are content to remain on a level lower than their capabilities might entitle them to attain. The malignant spirit of fatalism cannot be exorcised by a word or by a sentence, but when religion consistently entreats men to come up higher, to live out the fullness of their being, it is certain to have a wholesome influence upon those who hear. The lost coin may still be placed in circulation.

Jesus thought that every man should make the full use of his talents, but the corollary to this teaching is that society should at least provide men with a reasonable opportunity for the exercise of their abilities—and that, as we all know, is a pretty difficult proposition. But religion dare not shy from this task. It must talk social justice in season and out of season, until men actually begin to apply intelligence to the solution of economic problems. This is not a message for India alone. It is a universal message, and India will do well to heed it.

Finally, Jesus recognized his mission as a constructive one. He did not come to destroy Judaism, but to fulfil it. And that same spirit must be the keynote of modern religion. If we see defects in other religions, others see equally glaring faults in our own. He who criticises, should criticise to strengthen. He who observes weaknesses in the religions of others, should also stand ready to correct the shortcomings of his own religion. It is futile to close one's eyes and to say, "Here is all truth." It is futile to engage in sterile conflict with other religions. Faced by the tremendous forces of irreligion in modern life, there is but one reasonable course for men of idealism to pursue. Let each religion strengthen the other. Let each religion purify the other. And let all religions in whole-hearted co-operation, face the world, meet the world, and change the world.

THE WAHABEE MOVEMENT*

(BY ABDUL QAYUM MALIK, B. A., BAR-AT-LAW)

The decadence of Islam as a world system, not only in the realm of politics, but in that of economics, intellect and in all those pursuits which only can render national existence honourable, had become more than apparent in the beginning of the Eighteenth Century. The continuance of Muslim rule in India, in Turkey, and in the vast domain of African continent was not the result of the ability and competence of the Muslims themselves to hold their own against the newborn forces of European advancement, but to the mutual rivalries of the latter and want of co-ordinated plans among them to bring about a fair and mutually satisfactory division of their Oriental spoils. Careful observers of the situation in the East, as well as in the West, had become convinced that the complete disruption of Al-Islam as a world system was merely a matter of days. Whatever the causes

* In the Islam, Lahore.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

583

of this unfortunate state of affairs, it is safe to contend that there was nothing in the teaching of Islam itself that might have helped to produce these results. It was therefore, wrong to assert, as some European critics of Islam are wont to do, that the gradual weakening of the foundations of Islamic polity was the result of defects inherent in Muslim's Faith. Those who gave expression to such views either forgot or refused to believe that it was due to the inspiration of Islam, and to that alone, that the Arabs of Arabia and other communities of the Muslim East who had embraced the most democratic, the most natural and simplest of creeds, were rid of the superstitions under which they had laboured for the past centuries and were started on the highway of their political intellectual and moral regeneration.

The causes of the failure of Mussalmans to continue to achieve results, which adorn the pages of Muslim history were not religious but those which were the most direct anti-thesis of religion. It is undoubted that the entire host of Muslim reformers, to whose passionate evangel much of the Mussalman's present situation is due, were men, who found it extremely difficult to reconcile the pure and simple tenets of their faith with the serious departure from old principles and practices indulged in by ignorant masses and by apathetic rulers, selfish statesmen, and insubordinate generals who dominated Islam's political destiny in later days. As with the motive of the inception and growth of Sufi orders of Islam, which were intended to furnish a sobering influence on Muslim attitude of mind and ambitions in their halcyon days, so with the revivalist movements, which were prompted to awaken them from the lethargy of their latter days' decay.

Consequently, the first man who denounced unsparingly political opportunism and intolerance of progress by religious classes was Shaikh Mohammad Ibn Abdul Wahab, the founder of the body called Wahabees, after his name. Born in 1700, in Arabia, Shaikh Mohammad Ibn Abdul Wahab made many pilgrimages to Mecca, and came away disgusted at the unrighteous practices prevalent under the shadow of the walls of the Sanctum Sanctorum of Muslim Faith. Being of a vigorous and restless bent of mind, the Shaikh could hardly rest at ease in the face of these grave abuses and started an active crusade against the authors of innovations which bore no relation to the original Islam. He travelled extensively in Nejd, his native province, and so effective was his fiery eloquence and the truth and simplicity of his arguments, that within the course of the first ten years of his mission, the whole of Central Arabia, became a throbbing centre of an active reformist movement. Shaikh Muhammad Ibn Abdul Wahab achieved his greatest triumph by winning the adherence of Muhammad Ibn-i-Saud to his principles. The missionaries of Wahabee movement penetrated remote corners of the Muslim world and infused new hopes, new aspirations and new ambitions into a numerous body of those whose own misgivings of the misguided and misdirected tendencies of the degenerate Muslims had made them, warm partisans of the new movement. Scores of thousands of men now flocked to the banner of Shaikh Muhammad Ibn Abdul Wahab, and when he died in 1787, he left behind a huge following, whose representatives in Northern and Eastern India and those in Egypt and Algeria became ardent exponents of the revival of Islam as a symbol of absolute equality and austere simplicity, which had been such distinguished features of Islam's earlier days.

It is a well known fact that the birth of every new movement is always accompanied by a violent enthusiasm which, while making it an agency of potential good, renders some of its characteristics a source of mixed blessing. While the Wahabee movement led to abiding results in the domain of religious reform, its political tendencies showed it most clearly to be the means of disruption in the field of politics. That the restless Wahabee representatives should be dissatisfied with the want of cohesion, of solidarity and with the lack of sentiments of brotherhood of all Mussalmans irrespective of the privileges of rank and birth, one can easily understand. But what is absolutely incomprehensible was the Wahabee enthusiasm to right all political abuses in one movement. It was good both for the Muslim world and the Wahabee themselves that their Arabian campaigns against the Egyptian forces of Ibrahim Pasha, son of Muhammed Ali, the first Khedive of Egypt, proved abortive and thenceforth rulers of Nejd, which had now become a Theocracy, devoted themselves entirely to the betterment of their spiritual condition.

If unsuccessful in Arabia, Wahabee ambitions to have a say in the amelioration of the political lot of the Mussalmans in other parts, however, did not die a natural death. The expedition led by Maulvi Ismail Shahid of Delhi against the Sikh rulers of the Peshawar province in aid of the Pathans in the beginning of the last century was the last bid of the Reformers to give a practical expression to their political profession. Ever since the Wahabee movement has tended more and more to become purely a religious movement, giving rise to two important schools of religious reform. The Deoband School, which embodies a considerable effort in the conservation of Islamic spiritual learning and research, is the most brilliant example of what religious reform, directed on right lines, can achieve, and no movement could justly be characterised poor, which has produced such men as Maulvi Nazir Hussain, the celebrated Delhi jurist, Maulvi Rashid Ahmad of Gangoh, Maulana Muhammad Quasim, Maulana Anwar Shah, and the eminent divine the late Maulana Mahmud-ul-Hasan of Deoband. The works of Maulana Kifayatullah, Maulana Abdul Kalam Azad and Mufti Zia-ud-Din of Russia, an alumnus of the Deoband Dar-ul-Uloom, bear the stamp of the Nejd revival. Those who have studied the writings of the late Sir Sayed Ahmad and those of the Mirza Ghulam Ahmad of Qadian will discover in them a marked affinity with the principles of the Wahabee revival. Wahabeeism, as such, has ceased to be—but who can dispute the fact that much of the reformed and intelligent interpretation of Islam as an ideal spiritual and social morality, that is now apparent throughout Al-Islam, is for the most part due to the so-called Wahabeeism? By far the largest contribution that the Nejd moment has made to the purification of religious thought in our times and to popular awakening to the need for spiritual and social well-being, is its inspiration for half a dozen other movements in different parts of the Muslim world.

All Burma Industrial Exhibition:—An All Burma Industrial Exhibition will be held at Bassein during the last week of November 1936 under the auspices of Industry & Commerce Society of Burma. The Exhibitions which were held under the above Society in Rangoon, Yenengyaung and Moulmein were very successful. Special facilities will be given to the Indian and Foreign exhibitors from overseas. Usual concessions of passage and freight from transport companies will be obtained. Interested exhibitors are requested to inquire particulars from the Exhibition Secretary, All Burma Industrial Exhibition, No. 282-284 Barr Street, Rangoon.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

584
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 16

LIFE IN NAZI GERMANY.

"Foreign Affairs", New York, publishes three articles on various aspects of life in Nazi Germany from which we take the three extracts published below. The first is on Culture by Dorothy Thompson (Mrs. Sinclair Lewis); the second on Labour by Norman Thomas, Socialist Leader in the U. S. A.; the last on Education by Charles A. Beard. The three articles are valuable estimates of present day tendencies in Germany:—

CULTURE.

The control of every conceivable branch of German culture is complete. It begins, not by censoring what actually appears, but by determining who shall be the creators and transmitters of culture. No publication, no concert platform, no publishing house, no theatre, no gallery, is open to any writer, artist, or musician, who has not first of all run the gauntlet of the Propaganda Ministry.

Now the first result of this, of course, is that a man's degree of mendacity decides whether he lives or dies, produces or starves. In the main, the newspapers and periodicals today are still written by the same men who wrote them prior to March 1933. A vast insincerity, then, lies over the whole of German culture. A shamefaced compromise, an agonized inner cleavage rends the German artist. Day by day he is forced to ask himself; "Shall I compromise or shall I perish?" This, rather than the enforced emigration of those artists who either could not or would not compromise, is the greatest tragedy of German culture. The "alien and disruptive" spirits have departed. The artists are assembled, each in his proper compartment, each properly certified as to ancestry and breeding, competency and ideology, each holding from the proper authority his license to create. No Jewish taint corrupts them; no breath of non-Germanic internationalism, of bourgeois peculiarity, of Catholic obscurantism perverts them.

It appears that the creative process is something quite different. The Spirit of the Times is elusive. Yesterday, in the midst of chaos, one caught a glimpse of her garment. But today she is ordered to appear; her devotees are assembled; and she doesn't show up. In her place comes a marionette. It is properly labelled "Spirit of the Times" or "Life Feeling." The face is her face, but the voice is the voice of Dr. Goebbels. This is not to say that words, plays, pictures, and sculptures are not being produced in Germany today. They are. But they neither speak a language intelligible to the rest of the western world, nor do they passionately incarnate a new German spirit. For the most part they are hack stuff.

It would, however, be presenting a false picture to give the impression that no criticism at all breaks through the crust of licensing and censorship. In the intellectual periodicals, in some German books and verses brave voices speak. They frame their words carefully, they use, where they can, the prevailing idiom, but through them breathes a whisper of an old wind, the wind of Freedom.

Many forces propelled National Socialism into power. But what was that spirit, the spirit which revolted both against communism and against the stuffiness of bourgeois conceptions, which groped for a happier social order, modern, yet rooted in the whole German past? The rebellion against sterile intellectualism, against the mechanistic conception of man a Nietzschean avowal of the heroic as opposed to the secure and rational existence; the desire for the self-disciplined community of free men, rather than the congeries of anarchic atoms of the capitalist-bourgeois state, or the society of regimented masses of the Marxian order; the longing for a re-established contact with nature and with wonder—all these things are in the German soul, and have found expression in German literature and German art, and in some vague and formless way dominated the Youth Movement both before and after the War. The conception of society not as a machine but as an orchestra, communal yet individual, co-operative yet voluntary, united but not uniform, was breathing through German society years before the Nazis came to power, hindered by organized forms, parties, and system of thought. It was the longing expressed by Thomas Mann in the phrase "the truth for us lies somewhere between Athens and Moscow." And this spirit attracted to National Socialism—and also to the ranks of those who lined up against it—some of the most idealistic youth of Germany. But the National Socialist machine is no less sterile a mechanism because it regiments men under the banners of the will to Bread and Freedom, and the liberation of the Folk-Soul. Allegedly fighting the spirit of Bolshevism, National Socialism has adopted its entire technique. A people which wished to be free has forged its own chains.

LABOUR.

Why did German labour accept, why does it still endure, the Nazi rule? For no reason primarily inherent in German character. And given certain conditions, unless we learn from European experience, the same sort of thing might easily befall Labour in the United States. The German labour movement under the Weimar Republic, though far stronger than the American now is, was not as strong as might appear from the figures. It was beset by many difficulties, among them these:—

1. It was divided, and for the bitterness of that division the Russian controlled policy of the communists was largely though not wholly responsible.

2. It had failed to win the "little men," especially the farmers and agricultural workers. Nothing is clearer today than that an urban proletariat, no matter how well organized, cannot of itself win a revolution so long as the owning class can make an alliance with the middle class followers of a Fascist demagogue or recruit loyal armies from the peasantry.

3. Extensive unemployment, which grew as the world depression deepened, made it hard for the German unions to contemplate a general strike such as they once had made effective against the Kapp Putsch. They were unable to find a way to do anything for the young unemployed; and these Hitler won.

4. But the outstanding lesson of the collapse of the German labour movement was that labour cannot rest on its oars; it must push forward to retain the social reforms already won. Labour can not declare a moratorium, as did the German Social Democrats and trade unionists, on the old socialist idealism and programme without losing the militant loyalty of the masses in the face of Fascism's false but vigorous idealism and its appeal to outraged nationalism. Neither can a communist philosophy be successful if its application, as in the case of Germany, be subordinated to Russian ideals and to Russian national needs rather than to the demands of the local situation.

The mass of workers, in certain circumstances and under intelligent and courageous leadership, can carry on a war or a strike with desperate heroism. But masses as masses will never on their own initiative carry through a revolution under such circumstances as those now existing in Germany. Not while Hitler holds the loyalty of the army, and is able to supply more jobs than could his immediate predecessors.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

585

Fascism is not, as some writers and speakers have maintained, a conspiracy of capitalists. It is a phase of capitalism, accepted by big industrialists and Junkers as preferable to communism or socialism. It upholds the rights of private property, the class division of income and the institution of profit. But individual capitalists are not the real power behind the dictator. Herr Thyssen aided Hitler; but he does not run Hitler; indeed he travels much "for his health." The employer ("the leader") has his own troubles in a totalitarian state which compels banks and insurance companies to take government paper, imposes "voluntary" special taxes upon business, reserves the right to remove "the leader" of an enterprise, and compels all employers under certain conditions to keep their workers and to contribute to social services for them.

EDUCATION.

"The object of our education," declared Hitler, is to produce "the political soldier." The system of education directed to creating the political soldier "should include all Germans, whoever they are and whatever may be their functions.....Whoever has passed through this system of education is a political soldier. The military man in a strict sense is only distinguished from this soldier by the special instruction which he has received." Any other values that may be cherished are subordinate to this superlative value, and must not weaken or conflict with it. Intellectualism, urbanity aesthetics, femininity, are decadent, says Baumbler; the new Germany represents the virile and dominating principle of life. The Army is the perfect embodiment of this principle. As an inescapable corollary to the exaltation of force and the Army, is the condemnation of everything associated with the advancement of women in civilization and the advancement of civilization through feminine interests and activities.

Women are the servants of men; men are the soldiers of the State; and Adolf Hitler is the State. This doctrine controls the formulation of curricula for the schools. Coupled with the exaltation of force and the Army and the restriction of women to biological functions, is the doctrine of "race." According to this doctrine there is such a thing as a pure German or Aryan race. To this element of race Germany owes her greatness and will owe still greater achievements to come.

Perfect regimentation characterizes all student life. The way to the university and careers is not open to talents on the basis of intellectual powers and attainments. No student can advance in learning without receiving the approval of Youth Leaders and Nazi party officials.

What will come out of education in the Third Reich? The answer to that question is bound up, of course, in the fate of all German economy and foreign policy, and few will be bold enough to declare that fate now. Yet there is no doubt about the tendencies of education in Hitler's State. For faith in independent research, frank consideration of conflicting views, open discussion, judicial temper, the things which mark liberal education, the Nazi system substitutes contempt for all these values. It scorns independent research, save in some branches of natural science. It suppresses conflicting views. It despises open discussion as effete, the judicial temper as a sign of weakness. Its purpose is to turn out a generation of youth drilled in party doctrines and objectives, ignorant of all other considerations, contemptuous of other races and peoples, equipped with powerful bodies and narrow minds for the work of the State—especially its supreme work, war.

As the years pass this iron discipline gains in effect. There has been some resistance from children and parents belonging to certain political and religious groups to the system of regimentation. But as this generation passes resistance may be expected to diminish. If the Hitler regime continues for several years, the German people will be a people almost totally ignorant of the outside world and indifferent to all ideas and interests not contained in the Nazi creed. It is difficult to see how opposing ideas can make any headway in Germany against this system, unless there is an economic crash or a disrupting war. In fact the scheme of education, coupled with other propaganda, is designed to prepare the German people for hunger and misery and to glorify privation in the interest of Hitler's State. The whole case is summed up in the formula: "We can do without butter, but we cannot do without cannon."

Besides bringing up a generation predisposed to war and prepared to serve the military State when it is ready to strike, Nazi education shuts Germany off from intellectual intercourse with other nations. With independence of research and thought destroyed in German universities, students who once flocked there by the hundreds turn elsewhere. Except for branches specifically physical and mathematical, German science sinks toward the level of partisan charlatany. German learned publications which once circulated throughout the world have dropped in quality and lost respect that they formerly commanded. Nor do German students, apart from the exiles, expect to find a friendly reception in other countries or to derive advantages from study abroad. Turned upon themselves, nourishing deep resentments, and lashed to fury by a militant system of education, the German people are conditioned for that day when Hitler, his technicians, and the army, are ready and are reasonably sure of the prospects of success in a sudden and devastating attack, East or West. To cherish any other conception of Hitler's State or of the aims of German education is to cherish a delusion.

THE LATE DR. ANSARI.*

Doctor Mukhtar Ahmad Ansari, B.A., M.D., M.S., M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., was born at Yousufpur, district Ghazipur, U.P., on December 25, 1880, in an ancient family of divines, qazis, warriors and administrators, famous throughout Northern India. Their skill in medicine begins with Dr. Ansari's brothers. As a child, he was educated in the local Muktab and then in 1887 he joined the Queen's Collegiate School at Benares and passed his middle school examination there in 1893. In the same year he went over to Allahabad and passed in 1895 his matriculation from the Government High School. Thereafter he entered the Muir Central College for Intermediate Science which he passed in 1897. The following year he went to Hyderabad (Deccan) and joined the Nizam's College affiliated to the University of Madras. He took his degree in 1900 with the sciences for his subjects. While in Hyderabad he was a member of the Y. M. C. A. and was always popular with his fellow collegians and hostel mates.

His keen intellect and bright career at the College won for him the Nizam's scholarship for post-graduate studies abroad. He proceeded to England and joined the University of Edinburgh as a medical student. In 1905 he obtained the degree of M. B., Ch. B., came to London and joined the Charing Cross Hospital as a post-graduate student, being demonstrator in the same hospital. He passed the primary F. R. C. S. also. He did not appear for the

* The Hindustan Times, Delhi.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

586

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 16

realpatidar.com

final. He passed his M. R. C. S. (Eng.) and L. R. C. P., (Edin.) examinations in 1906 as also the examination for the degree of M. D., of the Edinburgh University.

His merits achieved recognition in the distinction, then unique for any non-Englishman, of being House Surgeon of the Charing Cross Hospital in 1907.

In 1908 he was made Resident Medical Officer of the London Lock Hospital and in the same year he obtained the degree of Master of Surgery, of the University of Edinburgh. In 1909 he was appointed House Surgeon of the Lock Hospital for Women and Children, Harrow Road, London.

About the end of 1909 he returned to India and began consulting practice in Delhi from January 1910. But hardly had he settled down when, during the Turko-Balkan War of 1911-12 he organized and led to Turkey as Director the famous All-India Medical Mission. The Mission's splendid work in the service of the sick and wounded and Dr. Ansari's name are still gratefully remembered in Turkey. The Sultan of Turkey in recognition of his services to the sick and wounded decorated him with the highest order given in Turkey to any foreigner, the First Class Order of Medjidia.

In 1916-17 he plunged into active Indian politics and joined Tilak's Home Rule League. He took a prominent part in the Delhi Congress of 1918 and was appointed one of the Joint Secretaries of the All-India Congress Committee, which post he held almost continuously till 1927. He was Chairman of the Reception Committee of the All-India Muslim League which also held its annual session at Delhi in 1918. His address delivered in that capacity and subsequently confiscated by the Government, marks the beginning of the Khilafat movement which was to exercise later a deep influence not only on the fortunes of Turks but also on Indian politics in so far as it brought Muslims as a body into the Congress fold. He joined the Satyagraha movement started by the Mahatma Gandhi and, needless to say, was one of the first who responded to Gandhiji's call for non-co-operation. In December 1920 he presided over the annual session of the All-India Muslim League which was held at Nagpur along with the Indian National Congress.

He was Congress Secretary in charge of and a member of the Civil Disobedience Enquiry Committee which toured India in 1922 and issued a divided report, Dr. Ansari advocating the no-change policy. The same year he presided at the All-India Khilafat Conference at Gaya.

He was Chairman of the Special Session of the Indian National Congress which was called at Delhi in September 1923 and helped substantially in bringing about a compromise between the no-change and pro change parties of the Congress.

December 1927 brought him the crowning achievement of his career. The nation signaled its appreciation of his services by bestowing upon him the greatest honour in its gift. He was elected President of the Indian National Congress, Madras, and presided over a session that was remarkable in many respects. He presided over the All-Parties Conference held at Delhi in 1928 whose work was later taken up by a smaller committee that produced the famous document called after the late Pandit Motilal Nehru. He was also president of the two national conventions of Lucknow and Calcutta in 1929.

His passion for Nationalism and inter-communal unity led him to found the Nationalist Muslim Party which, under his leadership, has tendered invaluable service to the cause of Nationalism. His unflinching efforts to achieve inter-communal unity as also among the various sections of the Muslim community are too well known to require re-iteration here.

In August 1930 he, as Acting President of the Congress and his famous working Committee were arrested at his house at Daryaganj, Delhi, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. During the Gandhi-Irwin negotiations he played an important part in the achievement of an honourable settlement between the Congress and the Government. He would have been a prominent member of the Second Round Table Conference. But it is a tribute to his patriotism and determined hostility to communalism that the Government were unwilling to invite him and the Muslim delegation of communalists was implacably opposed to his inclusion as a member of the conference.

On Gandhiji's return from London, developments took place with astounding rapidity. What happened is recent history. Dr. Ansari, succeeded Babu Rajendra Prasad as Acting President of the Congress and was arrested and imprisoned for six months. His health had become very poor during the six months in jail necessitating a visit to Europe immediately after release. On the urgent and peremptory advice of a famous heart specialist in Germany and Austria Dr. Ansari had to retire from active politics in 1933, until his heart became fit to bear the strain and excitement of public life.

EDUCATIONAL RECONSTRUCTION.

Ever since he entered public life Dr. Ansari has been deeply interested in the education of Mussalmans. From 1913 to 1920 he was a prominent and progressive trustee of the M. A. O. College of Aligarh in which capacity he rendered valuable service to the institution. In 1920 the non-co-operating Muslim leaders among whom Dr. Ansari was foremost founded the Jamia Millia, the National Muslim University, an institution run on strictly National lines and independent of Government aid and Government control.

The Jamia originally founded at Aligarh was in 1925 brought to Delhi by the efforts of Dr. Ansari and Hakim Ajmal Khan who was its Chancellor. On the death of Hakim Ajmal Khan in December 1927, Dr. Ansari succeeded to the Chancellorship of the University which post he occupied ever since.

PARLIAMENTARY BOARD PRESIDENT.

In May, 1934, Doctor Ansari was elected President of the Congress Parliamentary Board, and under his able leadership the Congress won the Assembly election throughout the country.

In 1935 Doctor Ansari resigned, because of ill-health, but he continued taking keen interest in the Congress. After a period of rest, he attended the Lucknow Congress, where his advice was sought on every important question.

He was expected to prove a great pillar of strength during the next elections, but his sad death came at a juncture, when he was most needed.

Dr. Ansari leaves behind him his widow Begum Ansari, his only son Harold Ansari, (who is now in England,) and his adopted daughter Zohra aged 18.

WOMEN'S FELLOWSHIP OF SERVICE.

We give below the constitution of the Indian Women's Fellowship of Service:

(1) The Society shall be called "The Indian Women's Fellowship of Service." (The Women's Servants of India Society).

(2) The object of the Society is to form a fellowship of women workers which shall guide and train women as national missionaries for the service of India; and which shall seek to promote by all constitutional means, the interests of the Indian people.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

587

(3) The Society will consist of a President, Vice-President, members and members under training. The President and Vice-President shall be elected by the members of the Society. They shall hold office for three years and shall be eligible for re-election.

(4) The affairs of the Society will be managed by a Council consisting of the President, Vice-President, and three members elected annually by members and members under training. The retiring members shall be eligible for re-election.

(5) Every applicant on admission shall undergo a period of probationership for two years. At the end of this period, she shall become a member under training, and continue so for a further period of three years. Every probationer, or member under training shall place herself under the guidance and control of the President or senior member as appointed and shall do such work and devote herself to such studies as the President or senior member as appointed may direct. No probationer shall be admitted to be a member under training unless she is recommended by three fourths of the existing members. The name of any probationer or member under training may be removed from the roll, on a recommendation to that effect being made by the President with the concurrence of not less than three-fourths of the members of the Council. The Council will not be bound to disclose the reasons for such removal.

(6) Marriage on the part of a probationer, member-under-training, or member, shall involve resignation. If marriage takes place before full membership has been entered upon, refund must be made to the Society of such proportion of the sum expended upon the person, in fees, allowances, etc., as shall be determined by the Council of the Society.

(7) Every member shall, at the time of admission undertake the following vows :—

(i) My life shall be a life of service and sacrifice dedicated to the common good of mankind and quickened by the faith that love shall permeate the Universe.

(ii) The highest good of my countrymen shall always be first in my thoughts, and I will give them the best that is in me, seeking no personal advantage for myself.

(iii) I would regard all Indians as my brothers, and work for the advancement of all without distinction of caste and creed.

(iv) I will be content with such provision for myself as the Society will be able to make. I will devote no part of my energies to earning money for myself.

(v) I will lead a pure, personal life.

(vi) I will engage in no personal quarrel with any one, and shall seek in all ways to promote the sense of fellowship amongst my fellow-members.

(vii) I will always keep in view the aims of the Society, and watch over its interests with the utmost zeal, doing all I can to advance its work and ideas. I will never do anything which is inconsistent with the objects of the Society.

BYE-LAWS.

(1) During the period of trial, a probationer shall receive an allowance of Rs. 40 with free quarters. During each of the three years following, she shall receive an allowance of Rs. 60 per month with free quarters. On admission to full membership, she shall be entitled to Rs. 80 per month with free quarters.

(2) Travelling allowances, secretarial and office expenses, also grants for special purposes where sanctioned by the Council, are to be made from the funds of the Society.

(3) Leave may be arranged for and granted by the Council. In the case of those probationers or members, employed under outside agencies, the leave arranged for by these agencies must be reported to the Council when sanctioned.

(4) Where free quarters are not available for probationers or members, rent allowance not exceeding Rs. 15 per month in Bombay or Rs. 10 elsewhere will be granted.

(5) The President and Council may grant in special circumstances special allowances to a member or probationer suitable to the requirements of her case.

(6) Provident Fund scheme to be arranged by the Council of the Servants of India Society.

ETHIOPIA AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The Hindu, May 6, 1936.

Simultaneously with the ceremonial entry of the Italian troops into the Ethiopian Capital, the Italian dictator was, as was to be expected, staging a Roman triumph in the Italian Capital. Barring a procession of the vanquished Emperor in chains, the celebrations can be said to have been in the grand old style. The Powers who had prided themselves on their championship of Liberty and suppression of aggression would fain forget the whole thing as a bad dream; but it is obvious that Sgr. Mussolini is determined to force it down their throats and make them swallow his fait accompli. Lest they should forget it, he declared that Ethiopia was Italian by right of conquest and "we are ready to defend our victory with the same determination with which we have won it." In these unequivocal terms the Duce has preached to the Powers the law of the jungle—the triumph of might over right.

The Leader, May 6, 1936.

Will Italy flourish after thus outraging the laws of God and humanity? Will the conquest of Abyssinia bring it peace and plenty? From all accounts its internal economic position is desperate. Where will it find the enormous sum of money needed to develop the country which is expected to become a part of the Roman Empire? Will Signor Mussolini, intoxicated by his success, embark, upon fresh adventures of conquest? Abyssinia's natural resources are reported to be poor and are not likely to satisfy the Duce. There is gold in Kenya and South Africa. The latter, as a result of Italian victories, has suddenly awakened to the necessity of strengthening its defences. There are the Sudan and Egypt, which may tempt Signor Mussolini's cupidity. He has been dreaming of a big empire in Africa.

Abyssinia occupies an important strategic position and it can be used by Italy as a base for further military exploits. Far-reaching issues are raised by the Italian victory, and Europe's peace has become still more precarious. This, however, is not so much our look-out. The feeling uppermost in our mind is one of unutterable disgust and of contempt for Europe's pretensions, combined with sympathy for fallen Abyssinia. Of all the nations of Europe, France most provokes our contempt after Italy itself. Europe, and through Europe the whole world, are in for a very bad time.

The Tribune, May 6, 1936.

And now the Kingdom of Ethiopia lies at the feet of Signor Mussolini. The Negus has lost his crown and sceptre. But what matters more is that his country has lost its freedom. The Reuter message which says that the Negus has left Djibouti on board a British warship for an unknown place, adds that "he will continue the fight for the independence of

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

538

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| May 16

realpatidar.com

his country through diplomatic channels." For decades the world has not been regaled with a more amusing piece of news. But it cannot tarry to enjoy it. For the situation created by the success of Italian aggression in Ethiopia is frightful. The League is dead and decomposed. The system of collective security has gone to pieces. Europe has reverted to pre-War militarism. New problems have arisen in Africa and in the Mediterranean. The atmosphere is filled with distrust, jealousy and rancour and with the rumbling of the approaching storm.

Sind Observer, Karachi.

The Italians and their Duce may rejoice at their victory but they cannot forget that they had used all inconceivable inhuman methods of warfare to conquer a primitive people, armed with very much less effective weapons than theirs, and thus have brought disgrace on Christian civilisation which they profess a wish to propagate. There is no Christianity in all this brutality but inhuman lust for power and expansion.

That is not all. The Negus before leaving his country pronounced the last and final curse on those who despoiled his country that by the same weapons they used against him they will fight and perish in Europe—and for which every country in that continent, America, and Japan are making feverish preparations.

With this terrible act of aggression on the part of an European Power, the League of Nations is as good as dead. It can serve no useful political purpose and the sooner the Geneva show is closed down the better. None can punish an aggressor; nobody has any trust in the League; and it can only live to further disgrace itself. England and France are at loggerheads, and there can be no unity of policy on any question in future at Geneva.

Japan, Germany, and Italy, three aggressive nations, have killed the League of Nations; and the selfishness of England and France slowly prepared its grave.

It only remains for Europe to form open alliances on the old model and when the hour of fatal maturity arrives to end its life.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, May 7, 1936.

Whether this betrayal of a weaker member of the League by the great European Powers will help them to prolong their predatory existence for a reasonable number of years still remains to be seen. Africa and a large slice of Asia have been already parcelled out among the Imperialist Powers; and the supply of weak nations on whom they can safely prey has by this time been fairly exhausted. And yet, Imperialist greed knows no satiety. Increasing rivalry between the Imperialist Powers makes ultimate conflict inevitable and the day perhaps is not far off when, for want of coloured victims, European nations will be compelled to tear each other to pieces. "The West will perish," said the Abyssinian Emperor as he left his native shores, more in sorrow than in anger; and we shall not be surprised if his ominous utterance turns out to be prophetic.

The fate of Abyssinia, however painful, is not without its lessons for those subject races who are at present groaning under Imperialist domination. To count on a change of heart in those who thrive on the exploitation of weaker peoples is worse than useless. It is madness to expect that they will let go their victims in a fit of repentance or compassion. To preach pacifism is only to strengthen the unscrupulous and the strong. Salvation, therefore, can come to the weaker races when they have not only developed the indomitable will to overcome all opposition, but joined hands with one another in forming a League of oppressed Nations bent on throwing off the Imperialist yoke.

Indian Witness, May 7, 1936.

Italy has prepared the way for taking over the whole of Abyssinia by giving out the report that this will be necessary in order to put an end to the tyranny which exists in that country. It is the same story over again. But it does not sound very well in 1936. There is no need to turn back the pages of history to find what other conquering nations have said under similar circumstances. We do not justify the present by the past. Italy stands condemned before the world today and nothing she can say or do will lighten this condemnation.

MYSORE HINDU WIDOWS' REMARRIAGE BILL.

Permission has been accorded by the Dewan-President of the Mysore Representative Assembly for the introduction of a private bill to remove all legal obstacles to the marriage of Hindu widows in the Mysore State, given notice of by Mr. K. T. Bashyam Iyengar and Brahmachari T. Ramachandra.

The general principles of the Bill will be placed before the Representative Assembly in June next.

In the statement of general principles of the Bill, the authors say:—

Mysore has not as yet a Regulation corresponding to Act IV of 1856 which legalises the re-marriage of Hindu widows and we are therefore certainly behind British India in this respect. The British Act of 1856 was the outcome of the efforts of the late Pandit Iswar Chander Vidyasagar, making it applicable to all Hindu widows who may be so-minded as to re-marry in spite of the traditional interpretation of the Hindu Law or customs to the contrary.

The Bill is purely a permissive measure and aims at removing legal obstacles to the remarriage of such Hindu widows as wish to remarry and at legitimising the children born of such wedlock. It endeavours to meet the growing consciousness of the educated Hindus who believe that the remarriage of Hindu widows is not opposed to the true interpretation of the precepts of Hindu religion but is also in consonance with the principles of justice and equity. It does not affect the right of a Hindu widow who is allowed to remarry by the custom of her community.

The rules of consanguinity and affinity under the Hindu Law are made applicable to the case of re-marriage and the widows' gothram is fixed as that of her father for purposes of her re-marriage. The customary marriage ceremonies generally observed in the case of the first marriage are made applicable to the re-marriages. In the case of a minor widow, the consent of her guardian in marriage is made obligatory except where her first marriage had been consummated.

The right of a widow in the estate of her deceased husband ceases on her marriage and she is divested of all rights inherited from him which then pass on to the next heir of her deceased husband. In the absence of such heir, the re-married widow continues to enjoy them as her absolute estate. The rights acquired by her under gift deed or will from her deceased husband are deemed to be her absolute estate unless there is a prohibition to re-marry in the deed of gift or the will.

A re-married widow continues to be the guardian of her children by the first husband until a civil court appoints another person in her place as guardian at the instance of some interested person.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

589

realpatidar.com

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,
THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase - the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT - BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:-BARODA.

Branches:-Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 20,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhaillal Dalibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. I., (Managing Agent, Alambic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to:-

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprout Road, Ballard Estate,

1-28 BOMBAY.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

590

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 16

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1908.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches :—

AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to :—

THE SECRETARY
CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Saramati (District Poona)	Virangam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West)
Karad (" ")	Khandesh
Tasgaon (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Satara (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Krisakawadi (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Siolkheda (" ")
Shirgaon (" ")	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Ahmednagar (" ")	Satana (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Kaiwan (" ")
Palghar (" ")	Dohad (District Panch)
Kalyan (" ")	Mahals
Akluj (District Sholapur)	Kalol (" ")

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chuntal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhavrao D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
R. G. Sarlasya, Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	C. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,98,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to :—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

591

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY

K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1592

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 16

realpatidar.com

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSCORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

Box text: SUPERFINE Toilet Soap, THE MYSORE GOVERNMENT SOAP FACTORY, Bangalore, THE MYSORE SOAP, LORE.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Saminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 10 Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bomba.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Registered No. B 343.

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :- KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 29.

Editor :- K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

VOL XLVI. BOMBAY-SATURDAY MAY 23, 1936. No. 38

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Businessmen's Manifesto.
Proscription Order Modified.
Closed to Christianity.
Sikhs and the Depressed Classes.
Indian Christians and the Scheduled Castes.
Catholic Comment on the Parliament of Religions.
A Useful Innovation.
Mangoes and Cholera.
An Indian F. R. S.
The Late Sir Mocherla Ramachandri Rao.

Socialism and Communism.
Government Publicity.
War and the Indian Philosophy of Life.
Man Versus the Machine.
The Tenets of Islam.
The Religion of Jesus.
Karl Marx on Indian Village Communities.
Bombay Businessmen's Manifesto.
Education and Unemployment in U. S. A.

NOTES

Businessmen's Manifesto :—The manifesto denouncing Pandit Jawaharlal's faith in Socialism expressed in his Congress presidential address, which certain businessmen of Bombay have felt called upon to issue, is calculated to inflame opinion against the existing system even more than the Pandit's fervent advocacy. To begin with, businessmen are part of society and their interests are, or should be, identical with those of the society of which they are a part. There is no word in this manifesto to show that the signatories realise that the present industrial system, with the profit motive as its central and inspiring principle, has come into universal discredit not only with economists and statesmen but also with moralists and religious thinkers. Leaving aside Soviet Russia, everywhere the State is assuming control over increasing spheres in industrial economics by way of eliminating the profit motive in them. The Conservative British Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, announced some time back that the important coal industry in Britain would be taken over by the State and operated as a national enterprise for the use and service of the people. In the United States, another great capitalist country, Government, in the interests of the nation, felt obliged to exceed the limits of the Constitution in extending control over industrial life. The Supreme Court decided that these measures were unconstitutional but the trend of opinion in America is that the Constitution should be changed early to meet present day conditions. Mere denunciation of Socialism will do no good in this country or elsewhere. We heard a rumour that the Government of the United Provinces wished to arrest the Pandit for his views on Socialism expressed in his address to the Lucknow Congress but it was over-ruled by higher authority. Without any hint of an alternative to the Pandit's Socialism, the Bombay manifesto might be mistaken for a demand for executive action to stop the Pandit from proclaiming his views. Mr. D. P. Khaitan of Calcutta, President of the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce, scents such a danger and has hastened to declare, with reference to the Bombay manifesto that no repressive legislation can cure the malady. He points out the true line of averting revolutionary propaganda when he adds: "Toying with the problem is fraught with grave danger; no time should be lost by the Governments, Central and Provincial, in launching a big drive against poverty and unemployment. Misery is not appeased by a tale of deficit budgets." The signatories to the manifesto must have realised by now that, so far from counteracting, their production has imparted fresh momentum to the Pandit's propaganda. For our own part we do not believe that the root of the evil today is primarily economic as the Aga Khan, Pandit Jawaharlal and the signatories to the manifesto agree in thinking. It is ethical. The nations of the world are dying of spiritual anæmia. Capitalism, Socialism and Bolshevism are symptoms. Economics, originally handmaid of Ethics, has usurped the domain of her mistress and has sought to flourish by defying her authority. The salvation of society lies in her returning to her natural allegiance. To do this of her own free will is the best and wisest method of avoiding revolution. We cannot help regretting the unfortunate resemblance of the language of the manifesto to the articles of the Whip circulated by the Publicity Department of the Government of India, to which we refer in a leading article.

Proscription Order Modified :—A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court have modified an Order of the Government of the United Provinces proscribing two books, being translations into Hindi of Lenin's "Imperialism, the highest stage of Capitalism" and of the Communist Party Manifesto prepared by Marx and Engels in 1843. The Criminal Procedure Code authorises a Provincial Government to proscribe books which are seditious or tend to create class hatred. The High Court found that neither of the publications can be said to be seditious as they were not directed towards the Government of India. Observed their lordships: "As the authors of both these books did not have His Majesty the King Emperor or the Government established by law in British India particularly in mind and were attempting to deal with certain supposed conditions prevailing in the entire world, it was very difficult to hold that these books brought or attempted to bring into hatred or contempt or excited or attempted to excite disaffection toward His Majesty or the Government established by law in British India. It was possible that such writings might have the remote effect of causing some disaffection but it could not be said that there was any such intention directly implied. Both these books seemed to be directed against supposed capitalists who exploited the working classes. Without unduly stretching the meaning of words, it was not possible to bring these publications within the scope of this section." The Judges also found that Lenin's "Imperialism" did not promote feelings of hatred between classes of His Majesty's subjects in India. They therefore disallowed the proscription of that book. As regards the 1843 manifesto, they held that it directly aimed at promoting class hatred and upheld the proscription. We reprint in another column, from Karl Marx's Capital his appreciation of the Indian village community. It does not seem likely that in the Manifesto which he drafted 90 years ago, he was thinking of present-day conditions in India. The document today is one mainly of antiquarian interest.

Closed to Christianity:—Commenting on the fact that ten countries of the world with a population of 190,000,000 are closed to Christianity, the Catholic Leader observes that "fear and prejudice are the chief causes of the ban in Asiatic countries. Fear lest Christianity should introduce the foreign element into the country eventually depriving it of freedom and independence; and prejudice that Christianity is an alien and denationalising faith which overthrows traditional and ancient institutions and customs." The Catholic Leader's assurance that Christianity is a supernatural religion, foreign to no country or race and equally at home in every land, will convince no one. Writes Pearl S. Buck in "Missionaries of Empire": "It is no idle accusation which Orientals make when they associate Christian missions with Western imperialism. It is true that the two are part of the same aggressive movement." Can Asiatic nations struggling hard to preserve their independence be condemned if they seek to exclude such missions from their lands? As for the denationalising nature of Christianity, the Catholic Leader seems to ignore history when it asserts that it is equally at home in all lands. The fact that Christian ritual is entirely alien to India was admitted by Father Heras when he drew up an elaborate scheme for an Indianised Church and Indianised methods of worship. And the mission school is no less devoted to the worship of Western culture. Mr. H. E. Allen in his Turkish Transformation tells us what Christian mission schools taught in Turkey and it is true of all mission lands. He quotes from an editorial in a Turkish journal: "These schools are institutions which by their lessons, by their training, turn Turkish youth away from the society to which they belong to another society and carry them forward toward a foreign ideal. The conversions which occasionally take place openly are the high points of the indirect influences which are at work every day and every hour upon Turkish students in these schools." The Catholic Leader significantly enough is silent on the anti-Christian policy of Republican Spain, once considered the citadel of Catholicism. Here, if anywhere, one might expect Catholics and nationalists to work together. But apparently because of their past experience, the republican leaders feel it necessary to put down the priests. If the workers in the Christian churches would give up political activities and intrigues against progressive forces in non-Christian lands, there would be little objection to their remaining for educational and social work. So long as they are not prepared to do this, the ban will remain.

Sikhs and the Depressed Classes:—Master Tara Singh, the Sikh leader, who is touring Malabar in connection with the movement among certain of the depressed castes to change over to Sikhism, has issued a statement containing his estimate of the situation. He concludes with the following words of warning: "We have been told many things about the leaders of the Depressed Classes. We have no reason to doubt their sincerity so far. It must be made known that the Sikhs are themselves a comparatively poor people in point of finances. They are not in a position to offer allurements of material benefits to the converts, nor would they do so even if they could. Such benefits degrade both the giver and the taker. We want only people who, after studying Sikhism and the world, feel the call and the urge. We would like people to stand on their own legs, nor do we want people who will come over simply out of hatred for or a negative attitude towards Hinduism or for the matter of that towards any religion. The people cannot rise by mere conversion. Sikh faith can certainly elevate the depressed as well as those oppressing but that only if the Sikh spirit of self-sacrifice is imbibed. The Sikhs are prepared to put at the disposal of Malabar the simple teachings of Guru Nanak and the spiritual alchemy of Guru Govind Singh which raises all to one height, decimates all differences and makes of them an organised body of servants of humanity."

Indian Christians and the Scheduled Castes:—The Guardian of Madras is a broad-minded Christian journal and it is not often that we find ourselves in serious disagreement with its judgment on public questions. But, in the matter of accepting the special concessions, made by the Madras Government to the depressed classes, for Indian Christians, it has not shown its usual perspicacity. The average Christian missionary's position is that Hinduism is responsible for the plight of the depressed classes and that conversion to Christianity

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

595

would transform their moral and material condition. By asking for the special concessions given to the "scheduled castes," it is admitted that conversion has failed and that education is the only solution of the untouchables' problem, whether Christian converts or Hindus. This is the fact. Still the missionaries are proceeding with mass conversions. The State grants in these cases although nominally for education are indistinguishable from subsidies for proselytising. The Guardian's plea that the express direction in the "Order in Council," that no Indian Christian shall be deemed to be a member of the "scheduled castes" applies only to the special franchise provided for these castes, is, of course, correct. But the principle underlying should apply equally to all other special concessions to the depressed classes. The Guardian drags in the Muslims and Sikhs quite gratuitously into this discussion. The "Order in Council" does not say that no Muslim and no Sikh shall be deemed to be a member of the scheduled castes, for the obvious reason that neither of them is likely to lay claim to be so regarded. We may add that Muslim and Sikh missions are not financed or controlled from abroad.

Catholic Comment on Parliament of Religions :—The Examiner in a gingerly reference to the Parliament of Religions recently held in Bombay, remarks that no Christian Church was represented in it. The Anglican Bishop of Bombay who was personally approached, frankly declined. The Catholic attitude is well-known and it would have been sheer waste of time to expect any representative of that denomination to join such a gathering. But these two bodies represent a small fraction of the Indian religious population and if they hold aloof from the main currents of religious thought, the loss is theirs only. As a fact, "the Religion of Jesus" had two representatives while most other religions had only one. The Examiner says one of them said he did not believe in Jesus. This is entirely incorrect. Both Dr. Manshardt and Mr. Kumarappa expressly declared that they were believers in Christ though not orthodox Christians. Christianity and the teachings of Jesus are not identical. We published Dr. Manshardt's paper last week. We print the first half of Mr. Kumarappa's paper, as also Dr. Rehman's on Islam, in this issue.

A Useful Innovation :—The telephone directory often serves a purpose which was not originally intended. As it contains the addresses of prominent residents and business firms in the city, it does duty as a directory. But in a country like India, there are many towns which are not covered by telephone directories. In order that residents in these small towns might not be left out by the direct advertiser, the Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department has prepared for each province a "guide" to the more important residents classified alphabetically according to professions. If the bigger commercial firms think it worth their while, the small townsman will be inundated through the post to buy their products. The innovation will have the direct effect of creating new markets.

Mangoes and Cholera :—A Press Note of the Bombay Government says: "In order to minimise the danger of an outbreak of cholera during the coming Ashadhi fair, the District Magistrate, Sholapur has forbidden the import and sale of mangoes and water melons within the Pandharpur Municipal limits from June 17 to July 7." Are mangoes carriers of cholera germ? How is it that though millions of mangoes are consumed in Bombay, no cholera cases have occurred?

An Indian F. R. S :—Dr. Birbal Sahni of Lucknow University, son of Prof. Ruchiram Sahni a well-known social and religious reformer of Lahore, has been elected Fellow of the Royal Society of England. He is the fourth Indian F. R. S., the other three being Sir Jagadish Bose, Sir C. V. Raman and Dr. Meghnath Saha of Allahabad University. The late Mr. Ramanujan was also a Fellow of the Royal Society.

The Late Sir Mocherla Ramachandra Rao :—Sir Mocherla Ramachandra Rao whose death took place in Bangalore on Saturday was one of the most respected publicists of our time. His instincts were all constructive. In the days before the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms when the Brahmin-non-Brahmin controversy in Madras had not blinded partisans to all merit, Sir Mocherla was a prominent figure in the Legislative Council and earned for himself the well deserved compliment of "Gokhale of Southern India." He was earmarked in the first diarchic administration for a Membership of the Executive Council but political considerations prevailed and he was left out. One who was his colleague in Madras politics and who rose to be a member of the Government of India told this writer that Ramachandra Rao was the only Liberal leader who did not get his reward under the Montagu scheme. For a time Ramachandra Rao remained in the background. But his public spirit would not allow him long to brood over his disappointment. He joined the Co-operative Movement and rendered valuable service to it. Workers in that movement very soon find that the greatest obstacle to its expansion is the liquor policy of the Government. Ramachandra Rao was no exception. He became the first President of the Indian Prohibition League. Another movement in which he played an important part was the Indian States Peoples' agitation for constitutional rights. He was instrumental in enlisting the sympathy of some liberal-minded Chiefs to a moderate programme in this direction. But he could not and would not go all the way with the more ardent leaders of the movement. Towards the end of his life, his services met with tardy recognition in his nomination as a Director of the Reserve Bank of India. His death leaves a gap in the ranks of India's elder statesmen.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

596
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| May 23

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, May 23, 1936.

SOCIALISM AND COMMUNISM.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's presidential address to the Lucknow Session of the Indian National Congress has given fresh life to the interest in Soviet Russia in this country. It is, therefore, necessary to know what exactly has been achieved in Soviet Russia. The best authority on the subject is, of course, Mr. Joseph V. Stalin, Dictator of Soviet Russia. He told an American journalist two months ago that Communism has not been achieved in the Soviet Union so far. "It is not easy," he went on to say: "But your term 'state socialism' is not exact. Many people refer to a condition as state socialism when a considerable amount of national wealth passes to government ownership, sometimes for military advantage, even though the majority of wealth remain in private hands." In this sense, state socialism already exists to a large extent in India where the land is owned by the State. Not only land but railways, irrigation works, telegraphs and now the wireless are all state-owned. Mr. Stalin pointed out that the social order which they have built up so far in Russia cannot be termed state socialism in this sense. "The Soviet system is fundamentally socialistic because there is no private ownership of factories, land, banks, railways, mines, etc." he observed, "Our system, which has not yet been quite completed, is socialistic because the foundation of society is common state ownership, ownership by the people or ownership by co-operatives and collective farms." He went on to explain clearly the difference between Socialism and Communism. "Under Socialism certain inequality concerning property remains, but there is no more unemployment, exploitation or oppression of one nationality by another (in Russia). Everybody is obliged to work and is compensated not according to his needs but according to the quantity and quality of the work. That is why wages have not been equalized. Only that Society can be called Communistic in which people are compensated, not on the basis of the quantity or quality of the work produced, but on the basis of their needs."

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru in his presidential address, every word in which he would have carefully considered, as also in his more casual speeches on subsequent occasions, has not spoken of Communism but only of Socialism as the key to the solution of India's social and economic problems. He has referred to Soviet Russia as an example, not to be blindly followed, but as affording glimpses of what might be done. This is consistent with Mr. Stalin's opinion quoted above that they have so far not achieved the Communistic State of providing for every one, not according to the quantity and quality of his work but according to his needs. We reproduce from Karl Marx's Capital a remarkable appreciation of the old Indian village community based on this principle which is also the principle enunciated in Jesus Christ's parable which has become the text of Christian Socialism. According to Mr. Stalin, Soviet Russia is still only in the socialistic stage of paying each one according to the quantity and quality of his work, and, therefore, there are in it inequalities of wages as under the capitalist system. That socialism does not have for a basic principle even economic equality, is made clear by Viscount Snowden's emphatic statement in his biography. "I have never regarded," he writes, "socialism as a cut and dried scheme of social organisation to be applied indiscriminately to the country's industrial and economic life. Socialism to me has been a principle, the principle of co-operation as opposed to competition. The form which socialism will take must be determined, and is being determined, by considerations of expediency. The old idea that socialism meant that the Government will undertake the management of all industry and the regimentation of all the people has been abandoned, if it were ever held. Socialism will take various forms according to the nature of the undertakings to which its co-operative principle will be applied." Again, "A socialism which standardised everybody and everything would have no attractions for me." Here is a very important confession of Lord Snowden's creed: "The material aims of socialism have never appeared to me to be an end in themselves, but only a necessary and inevitable means towards the liberation of human beings from grinding toil, from poverty and insecurity, that they might have leisure and opportunity for the higher end of the development of their intellectual and spiritual life." Lord Snowden's Socialism is obviously different from Mr. Stalin's. To the latter it is a step to Communism. To the former it is essentially a step towards the attainment of individual perfection.

From Pandit Jawaharlal's frequent and appreciative references to Soviet Russia, it might seem that his Socialism is rather of the Stalin than of the Snowden type. But in several of his more recent speeches, he has frequently used language in explaining his position, which can not be made to fit in with Soviet Socialism. There is no need, therefore, to take fright from the mere mention of Socialism. It covers a wide range of ideas. That its central idea namely, the substitution of co-operation for competition, is the key to human progress will be accepted by individualist and socialist, by communist and capitalist. That was the principle on which the ancient institutions of India, village community, caste and joint family, were based. These institutions have themselves been affected by the competitive principle and have, therefore, ceased to serve their original purposes and have even become obstacles to progress. Efforts of Indian reformers should be directed to reform and adapt these institutions to our present-day needs.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

597

GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY.

What are the functions of a Government publicity department? Too often in the past in India, the Director of Public Information has felt it his duty to furnish newspapers with propaganda for the administration. The material has, and this is specially true of the past few years, been more of an editorial than a news nature. It was natural, therefore, that such material was welcomed by, and later perhaps sent only to, pro-government papers. Lord Linlithgow, however, assured the country in his first broadcast address that he would give the press such assistance as properly he might. In defining that assistance he clearly laid down that "such help as my officers may find it possible to give to the press will be confined to facts, that these will be presented in a fashion entirely objective, and that the material available will be at the disposal of the press as a whole without distinction or discrimination." The first two of these "directions" to the Publicity Department related to the internal work of the department, the last to the method of distribution of material. Many Indians felt it to be a condemnation, however mild, of existing methods. Mr. M. I. Stephens, Director of Public Information, on the other hand, seems to have accepted Lord Linlithgow's criticism as regards distribution but not so far as the material itself is concerned. "India and Communism" (reprinted from a Bengal Weekly, the Whip) which he has sent us in pursuance apparently of the new policy of impartiality to the press, is not confined to facts, is not objective in the least, and, as propaganda against Communism, is worse even than any original work by the department could have been in the past. The Whip articles are so crude in their attack on Communism that any thinking man will be nauseated by them. They are in fact better propaganda for Communism than anything emanating from Moscow.

Why then did Mr. Stephens select these articles for translation into four vernacular languages and circulation throughout India? Even if the Government has not subsidised the reprint, the Public Information Department has undertaken its distribution. A cursory glance at the articles will show that their intrinsic quality has nothing to do with Mr. Stephens's selection. Propaganda against Communism is not wrong in itself for a capitalist state, even though there is much more important work to be done in India than to prove that Russia has not fulfilled what she set out to do. But need it be the Whip's method of refuting Communism? The journalist responsible for these articles knows nothing of Communism, little of India. He seems to be theoretically Communist but doubtful of the practicability of this creed: "For that which in theory is represented to be a creed of universal brotherhood and economic equality is, in practice, no more and no less than a scheme to favour a handful of its adherents. On the face of it Communism spells the greatest good of the greatest number but the theory and practice of Communism are as far apart as the two poles." He writes that the villages are self-sufficient economically and culturally but yet believes that they will be drawn to Communism by "wandering men and pedlars" who pass through them. We have only to transpose two complete sentences in the pamphlet to get the following absurdity on religion in India and Communism: "In no country in the world does religion play a greater part in the daily lives of the people than it does in the Brightest Jewel in the Crown. The atheistic part of the Communists' doctrine is perhaps its most dangerous in so far as it affects India." He seems, strangely for a protege of Government publicity, to indite the Government by admitting India to be a fertile field for agitation. And here is the conclusion, typical of the whole reprint: "Communism spells destruction, despair, death. Communism means the rooting out of all religion. Communism entails the complete elimination of culture. Communism robs the people of their land, their jewellery, their money and all their earthly possessions. Communism turns boys into thieves and murderers; it makes prostitutes of the nation's girlhood. The Great Moghul caused to be inscribed on a marble tablet in his Dewan-i-Khas: 'If there is a Paradise on earth, it is here, it is here.' Of very truth may it be written of Communism that:—'If there be a hell on earth, it is here, it is here.'" Obviously regarding attack as the best means of defence, the writer asserts that few if any countries enjoy greater freedom than India today. "The Nazi regime in Germany, the practice of Fascism in Italy, the Dictatorship in Spain, the control of all activities by a small band of financiers in France, the N. R. A. of America, the conscription for military service of Japan, as well as of almost every other country,—from all of these India is free." We are surprised that freedom from having to make up her mind on important national questions has not been added to these.

This kind of rubbish, the introduction to the propaganda leaflet informs us, was turned out by a journalist who had made a special study of Communism, particularly in its relation to Indian conditions. Did Mr. Stephens decide on circulating this reprint through Government's publicity department after reading the introduction alone? Or did he feel obliged to do so because of the official patronage it enjoys? For the Whip, although practically unknown and little valued in its own country, enjoys the support of "His Excellency Lord Willingdon, Viceroy and Governor-General": His Excellency Sir John Anderson, Governor of Bengal; the Marquess of Zetland, Secretary of State for India; and many ex-Governors of Indian provinces, ex-Viceroy, and Sir Samuel Hoare; it has won the good opinion of the London Times, the Statesman, the Review of India (of the European Association), the Star of India, and the Planters' Journal; it was once referred to by a member in the House of Commons; its editor, Mr. R. S. Sarma is nominated member in the Legislative Assembly, representing Indian journalists though he speaks and votes in support of press laws. This information from the introduction is valuable both in dating the pamphlet as well as in defining the niche which the Whip occupies in Indian journalism. It also indicates the difficulties which Lord Linlithgow will have to contend with in developing his ideas on publicity work. Impartial treatment of the press and an objective presentation of facts mean nothing short of a revolution not only in Mr. Stephen's department but in the minds of higher officials as well.

WAR AND THE INDIAN PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE.

A few days ago the world has witnessed the most tragic drama enacted in human history. A backward race—may be backward only in material equipment and power of organization—has been mercilessly butchered by a power intoxicated, aggressive, defiant, an arrogant nation of the West—flouting the conscience and the reasonable judgment of the whole world in its march of systematic and methodical madness. The funniest part of this tragic drama has been that after this most inhuman and barbarous act of destruction has been carried on defiantly by poisonous gas and hundreds of innocent people been killed, His Holiness the Pope has spoken in praise of "Peace." But alas! the pious eulogy of His Holiness on "Peace" comes only after thousands have been sacrificed at the altar of greed and unmitigated ambition of domination.

The Indian leaders of public opinion have in one voice condemned this act of brutality and have pointed out that such philosophy of aggressiveness is a standing menace to humanity especially so when such atrocities are done in the name of carrying civilisation to backward races. Even a baby can understand the absurdity of such utterances. Of course Europe has the distinction of fighting nine wars out of ten in the world's history. And it is futile to expect Europe to give up this creed of militarism and aggression so long as the basis of her civilisation and the philosophy of her life remain what they are. It is in the very nature or svabhava as we say in India, of Western civilisation. And unless there is a root and branch reform and a change in the outlook of life no one can expect the possibility of such occurrences minimised to the lowest degree. Now can war be fully eradicated from human life and civilization? What have the philosophers and thinkers in the East and the West thought about it?

Of course both in the East and the West the philosophers have recognised War as a fact of human life and history which can not be totally eradicated. But there are differences in concepts. This is again due to fundamental differences in the concept of man and his philosophy of life and the world.

The West in spite of her creative genius is fundamentally physical and realistic in outlook. It is true Jesus, the Prince of Peace, preached a basic spiritual philosophy but it is no better to call Europe Christian than call a red linen white.

As such, western civilisation has always idealised war and physical heroism and has found satisfaction in developing the titanic nature of man. Nietzsche preached the gospel of war and the creed of old teutonic hardness. Ruskin tells us that war is the foundation of all arts and high virtues and faculties of man. And Count Moltke said 'Without war the world would stagnate and lose itself in materialism.' We also know from the contemporary political philosophies which have developed in Europe today as a reaction to democratic ideals of the last century that they are fundamentally based on a philosophy of manhood which distinctly avows the creed of a "warrior man." With these guiding philosophies of life it is moonshine to think Europe will keep in rest and maintain peace as an ideal of civilization though hundreds of peace pacts may be signed. In the Bhagavat Gita Sri Krishna has said "Prakritim yanti Bhutani"—Man is impelled to action by his inner nature. Only through higher nature of man can be changed the outer chaos of war and aggression minimised. Does modern Europe value this spiritual growth of man or will future Europe pay any serious attention to this aspect of human progress and evolution? On the answer of this question depends the prospect of peace and war. Because what is within man, must sooner or later find expression. It may be asked "Were there no wars in India?" It is true the Indian thinkers are not fanatically pacifists and are not blind to the forces that are working in "Nature."

The world, as Indian philosophy says, is the play of three gunas—i. e. Sattva, Rajas and Tamas. The world, as it is constituted, cannot entirely be made free of war—an act of Rajasic force. But with the growth of Sattva or the spiritual factor—the second constituent factor in man and the world can be brought under control. This is the central problem for man and the world. The Indian civilization emphasising the ideals of simplicity and plain living and high thinking and allocating the duty of protection to a group of limited persons—the kshatriyas—has proved that man after all is not born for strife only with his fellow brethren. He has greater philosophies and purposes in life. And it is for this spiritual idealism the Indian civilization is great. But modern Europe believes very little in the spiritual value of life and the individual and collective efforts of Europe are therefore all directed towards self-assertiveness, grabbing of power and madness of conquest. Will Western civilization after the bitter experience of the last war outgrow the vandalism of war and accept Ahimsa as a creed and philosophy of life? Therein, only, lies the future not only of Europe but of all humanity.

AN INDIAN.

MAN VERSUS THE MACHINE.

To see "Charlie" Chaplin again after five long years is in itself an event*. It recalls all the happy memories of the early days of the cinema when films were "silent" and "Charlie's" face and walk and antics amused and delighted us. But though the technique of film production has been completely revolutionised during the last ten years, "Charlie" refuses to change and accept the altered scheme of things. It is as well. For, although evolutionists say that on the material plane, the species which refuses to adapt itself to its environment dies, "Charlie" is on a sphere and has a personality which can defy circumstances and face bravely a mad new world. "Charlie" is still loyal to the original conception and purpose of the "pictures": he still believes that the language of the film is not that of words but of movement and gesture and dumb action. And of the art and philosophy of this medium, he is unquestionably the supreme exponent. Since he is the story-writer,

* Modern Times featuring Charlie Chaplin.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real1936.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

599

producer, director and actor all rolled in one, he is at once a Charles Dickens and a character out of a work of Dickens. Looking at him one feels as though a character of Dickens has come to life. He has that extraordinary mixture of humour and pathos, that realisation of the truth that there is a tear behind every laugh which makes us both weep and smile with Mr. Micawber and Sam Weller and a host of other men and women in the world of Dickens; no one perhaps on the stage or the screen expresses so vividly the deep significance of Shelley's profound observation that our sincerest laughter with some pain is fraught. Like Falstaff or Don Quixote or Mr. Pickwick, this "Charlie" has truly become a legend.

The new Charlie Chaplin film is more purposeful than his previous productions and yet not less funny. That in itself is a remarkable achievement. "Charlie" has, indeed, always been the embodiment of the free human spirit battling against the rigid "systems" with their vain powers and dull routines; he has rebelled against petty tyrannies, outwitted the myrmidons of society, baffled his overbearing opponents and still, in the end, he is never fully triumphant in the conventional sense. Always is he left stranded, alone and single-handed, in a world of mighty forces—defeated yet indomitable.

But Modern Times is no mere sentimental picture depicting the fight of a hero with villains. It is the protest of an individual against the mechanical civilisation which has overwhelmed and threatens finally to destroy us. He is a mere cog in a vast machine: the slave of a system which wants more and yet more production regardless of the cost, human or aesthetic; the victim of a soulless "law and order"; in brief a creature of the modern times. This system does not and cannot care for the feelings and troubles of the humble and the meek. The anarchic and wilder sides of life are incompatible with the precision and regularity demanded by machine. Indeed, there could hardly be a more biting and yet hilarious parody of this "machine-age" than the episode in which the midday lunch in the factory is sought to be "mechanised" through "Charlie" being automatically fed by machinery in order to save time as a worker and enable his employer to make more money. Witnessing this subtle, moving and yet strangely enough, extremely amusing and almost boisterous satire on the machine menace, one cannot wonder at the hostility of men to machines. I remembered the words of Ned Lud in Ernst Toller's "The Machine Wreckers" where he indignantly observes, "They would put us in irons and chain us to a monster. A spindle driven by steam that clutches men and whirls them round and slings them into hell!" For, men who live differently react differently. We tend to become automatons: those who cannot have to pay the unflinching penalty. And "Charlie" pays it. Because "Charlie" is individual and even erratic, he becomes a "misfit" in this scheme of things and is thrown on the scrap-heap again and again; because he is humble and poor, he has to come back in search of bread again and again. For such a one, even the prison is a better place to live in than the so-called "freedom" of civilised society which has little to offer to the mass of people save hunger and penury and strife with fellow-men. He tries and fails; but his failures, one feels, are more heroic than the petty successes of social climbers and the worldly triumphs of the big and the great. At last, cast away and rejected by the social order, he trudges along a lonely road, turning his back to all of us who laugh and weep with him and disappears in the dark unknown from whither he comes and whither he again fades away: but this time accompanied by a companion who is equally poor, and equally in want. It is the unsolved dilemma of the under-dog, the poignant riddle of the have-not. "Charlie" does not provide an answer: it is not his business. Like an artist, he has again put a question-mark. It is for the social philosophers and reformers and the "leaders" of mankind to answer this challenge thrown out with such admirable mirth and such tender pathos.

GAGANVIHARI MEHTA.

THE TENETS OF ISLAM.*

(BY DR. M. B. REHMAN.)

As you are aware, we are celebrating the centenary of the great sage, Ramakrishna, and in view of his teachings and doctrines, one could congratulate the organisers on setting up this Parliament of Religions. The great sage preached that "Truth is one" and it is really interesting to study the different faiths in the light of this doctrine. I propose to put before you the fundamentals of Islam which has over 300 millions of followers in the world and, in establishing its tenets, I will mainly depend upon the Quran.

Before I tell you what Islam is, I will invite your attention to one aspect of the career of its great preacher—Mohammad. He always emphasised the fact that he was a mere human being like any one of us. As a matter of fact, it is a part of the creed of his followers that Mohammad is not only God's messenger but also His servant. The human element and ideal of service are the key-notes in the concept of Islam.

Mohammad regarded religion as a straight natural law wherein lies no perplexity or ambiguity. Perhaps he was the first person to discover that "Truth was one and sages call it by different names." He believed that all the children of men would follow the same straight way were it not for the corrupting influences of the environments which set unnatural examples for them to follow. According to him, religion is the natural bent of a free and unbiased mind, that the principles that he preached stand forth free of all mysteries and dubious articles of faith. To Mohammad, the religion of the former prophets was not a creed-bound dogma but a life of earnest and faithful work; in an endless succession, they were the propagators of the Divine message of wisdom and truth.

With convictions of this nature, Mohammad could preach no new religion and he claims that his work lies only in restoring the primitive faith of the prophets and preachers of the by-gone ages to their original purity and simplicity. It is not for the Moslem to ignore any of the great teachers who have long since done their work and retired from the world. He dare not utter a word of disrespect towards them. Speaking of the prophets of the house of Ishmael, the Quran says—

"Say ye, we believe in God and what has been revealed to us and what was revealed to Abraham and Ishmael and Isaac and Jacob and the tribes, and what was given to Moses and Jesus and what was given to other prophets from their Lord; we make no distinction between any of them and to Him we submit."

And it is not to Moses, Jesus and Mohammed that a Moslem owes allegiance but to all the prophets of all the nations who have appeared in the different ages of the history of mankind. Thus along with a thousand others, Rama, Krishna and Buddha of

* Address delivered to the Parliament of Religions, Bombay, May 7, 1936, by Dr. M. B. Rehman, Principal of Ismail College, Andheri

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

600
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 23

India, Zarthushtira of Persia and Confucius of China, have alike a place in the hearts of the followers of Islam. This belief links the Moslem with the whole humanity, and leads him to treat his Lord's creation as one vast brotherhood. Islam has thus destroyed all barriers, racial or otherwise, and divisions on grounds of religion are not recognised.

To the Moslem, this wide world presents a vast field for co-operation in the struggle of life. His religion leads him to seek the welfare of humanity in the co-operative spirit as it were rather than in the competitive. He may with a quiet conscience eat and even intermarry with any class of human beings. Mohammad, himself strictly opposed as he was to the religion of idolators, gave three of his daughters, Zainab, Rauqayya and Umm Kulthum, in marriage to them and this principle he established in spite of the fact that in the early stormy days of Islam, the experiment proved disastrous. Such is the practical brotherhood of man that knows no colour and no creed and which bade men to meet on the common platform of humanity and humanity alone.

The claim of Mohammad to be a servant of God has made Islam a religion of service. The service of men and seeking the good of humanity constitute pre-eminently the service and worship of God. In this connection I will quote the following two verses:—

"All the creation is the family of God and of all creation, the most beloved of God is one who does good to his family."

"God will not be merciful to one who is not merciful to men."

A selfless life of love is the life of a Moslem and in these words the Quran appeals to humanity to sink the petty differences.

"For every people God has appointed rites and ceremonies which they observe; let them not, therefore, dispute with thee in the matter." The great brotherhood which is the ideal of Islam cannot be achieved without utmost toleration and this is thus preached by the Quran:—

"Say thou—O ye who believe; I worship not what you worship and ye worship not what I worship, nor will ye worship what I worship, Ye have your religion and I have my religion."

This liberal attitude and the broad-mindedness, nay, the respect for the views and beliefs of others, accounts for the best of relations that the Moslems have always had with their neighbours. They have an open mind to learn and imbibe from all those with whom they may be in contact. The establishment of the academy of sciences (Bait-ul-Hitmat) at Baghdad in the days of Al-Mamun bears witness to this fact. The followers of Islam proved themselves excellent pupils and it was something far above toleration that made them not only the inheritors of the wisdom of the world but also its propagators. Not only their arts and sciences bear a strong and deep impression of the foreign influences, even their religious beliefs accepted such truths as were preached by others. To illustrate my point in the very short span of time allowed, I would direct your attention to the creed of the Sufis. In Sufism, which at one time became the accepted creed of the Islamic people, can be traced the influences of the Vedantic thought of India, the Neo-Platonic philosophy of Greece, the occult sciences of Egypt, the mysticism of Syria and the trism of Persia. Such were the principles of not only "live and let live" but also of "give and take" that Mohammad preached and these alone are responsible for the immense following that Islam has even today. I resume my seat with the hope and wish that the followers of this great religion keep up the spirit which Mohammad rose to inculcate.

THE RELIGION OF JESUS.*

(By J. C. KUMARAPPA.)

Before we consider our special topic for this evening you will bear with me if I state clearly what aspect of religion I propose to discuss. The word religion is often used to connote many social systems and organisations working towards different set goals.

In the early stages of evolution of Society, crude superstitions were bound together with inhibitions and prohibitions to regulate the primitive man and his dealings; his failings were thought to be visited with punishment from on high and his obedience with reward. Fear deterred him in his selfish ventures and avarice and desire for pleasure made him consider the welfare of others.

Later on, we find national codes of laws bound between social sanctions with a religious colouring. In the case of martial peoples, we find God exercising a tribal patronage and authority. Here too, man was kept to the "right path" by an external power invested with a jealous spirit to guard its rights and with vengeance to visit the iniquity of the fathers to the third and fourth generations of them that hate it and doing good to thousands of them that fear it. In this stage there is a definite desire on the part of the people to try to increase the numbers owing allegiance to it. Such efforts are expected to be rewarded.

In addition to these man uses religion in an organised form to preserve, propagate and consolidate a culture evolved by him.

With the advance of civilisation religion has become a respectable code of behaviour, with recognised customs and manners. People are expected to follow certain rituals and thus retain respectability in society.

These four forms may be grouped as organised or institutional religions. Most ancient religions have gone through some or all these stages, and bear the marks to some extent of each of them. None of this interest us at the present time. The Christianity of the Western people partakes of the nature of many of these forms.

As the authoritarian religion, God in Christianity is depicted as a strict Accountant, keeping a record of all we do in a book of faith and visiting our lapses with uncompromising justice. Fear of God is said to be the beginning of wisdom. If you behave you go to Heaven, if not you go to Hell.

Since the day Peter sought comfort and warmth by fraternising with the servants of the great ones of earth, and was thus led into denying the Lord, the militant churches of various denominations have followed the example of their foundation stone and have been sycophants in the courts, courtyards and lobbies of the Rulers. We find them still there today. They are seeking their own warmth and comfort and are led into a continual denial of the Lord, not merely before the cock crows, but all the time. The churches are being used by the States as a convenient form of holding the people down. We find in the course of history this leads to bitterness. We see Russia estranged from all spiritual values because of the part the Church had played in keeping the people enslaved. Such Churches are necessary adjuncts to Imperialism. We need not stray as far as Russia. Christian missions in our land and all other "Heathen" lands fall in this group naturally. It is painful to see adherents of Christianity rushing to interview disgruntled members of other religions to recruit them into their fold. They

* First part of address delivered to the Parliament of Religions, Bombay, May 9, 1933.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

601

—sing a song of civilising the savage and end up by slapping his blood, by exploiting his labour and annexing his territory, as in Abyssinia today.

During the dark ages in Europe we saw Christianity functioning as an ethnical religion marshalling its forces on a crusade against the Saracenic and pagan world. The desire to bring light and learning to those who sit in darkness arises out of the ethnical forms of religion with an admixture of the imperialistic militant spirit.

Today we need no evidence of Christianity functioning as a social religion. If you want to get into the upper circle of Society, membership in a Church of England chapel goes a long way. It is a sign of respectability. Even a Jew as a Viceroy had to be respectable by attending the Church of England services on State functions.

We are not going to consider Christianity in this light. Our purpose is not sociological or political. Although I do not deny that these forms of religion have served and are serving a very useful purpose in a world peopled by individuals in different stages of evolution, yet I find no evidence of Jesus having founded a religion which will fall under any of the above groups. If modern Christianity finds a place amongst them it is a sign that Jesus had nothing to do with it in the form in which we find it today. Jesus says "My doctrine is not mine but his that sent me." If those principles are from the one God then the religion of Jesus is as universal as that God himself.

My object in touching on these primary functions of religion is to show how far Christianity has fulfilled these. In addition to these there are also a few denominations like the Society of Friends and particular individuals who practise the principles of Jesus in an unorganised way. As we shall proceed to examine presently these principles, we shall notice that such pure interpretations of the Life of Jesus are merely the exception in the religion as developed in the west.

In another and true sense religion is the relation that governs a man's personal attitude to God, his ideals, his fellowman, to society and to the world. What I want to consider today is Jesus' religion in this sense. That is to say, the personal relationship of Jesus to these. When He walked on this earth, (1) What was His religion? (2) What was His attitude to God? (3) What was His conception of Himself? (4) What was His relationship to His parents and elders? (5) His contemporaries, His brothers and sisters? (6) to society and to the State? (7) to material possessions? (8) to human values and (9) to other religions?

In this form of a personal spiritual union with God and the world, the religion of Jesus forms the culmination of the evolution we find in Judaism. This is pure religion with no sociology or politics mixed with it. Some years ago Dr. J. N. Farquhar published a book, "The Crown of Hinduism" where he sought to establish Christianity as the ultimate attainment of Hinduism. He tried to separate the pure religion of Jesus from its parent sociological root Judaism—and to graft it on to the sociological past of Hinduism forgetting that all pure religions are personal. For the sake of convenience we may group common experiences under a common category, but individual religion knows no label. The personal religion of Dr. Radhakrishnan, that of Pandit Madan Malaviya and that of Gandhiji may be grouped as Hinduism for convenience, but in reality they are three different religions, with the impress of the personality of each with God. Like a pebble thrown on the bosom of the ocean causes ripples on the mighty expanse of water, a man, however small he may be, causes his impressions to be set on the Infinite.

As long as we grant that an individual has a personality of his own, his intimate relations with everyone else will be stamped with his individuality. It is futile to expect millions to follow one type of relationship with everybody. Can the friendship between any two humans be the same as the friendship of any other two? Each relationship stands on its own. They may all be called friendships for convenience, but each friendship between two personalities entering into a particular friendship provides the attributes that make that friendship. If you remove any one of them the relationship ceases to be the same. There can be no converts to a religion in this sense. If Dr. Radhakrishnan and I are friends we cannot convert any others into that friendship. Similar friendship may exist, but identical ones cannot. It is from this point of view that we wish to study the religion of Jesus.

In the accepted meaning of the term the religion of Jesus was no religion at all as no two persons' religion can be identical. No man-made rule can bind him down against his convictions. Man was not made for Sabbath. He condemned institutional religion when it was made a means of exploitation, and in no uncertain terms he denounced the stalwarts of institutional religion. Yet, in another way, we may say that the religion of Jesus was universal in as much as all religions have God as a common factor and each person as a variant. Here it is that all religions meet, and Sri Ramakrishna might well say, "All religions are one." To the frog in the well, its well is the only chosen well in which the sun, moon and stars are reflected, its atmosphere encircled by the walls of religious ritual is peculiarly its own, and is different from the other wells, and a zealous frog will try to recruit more companions. But to an eagle soaring the sky, all atmosphere is one, and there is room in it for all and sundry, and it realises there is only one sky with the same sun, moon and stars for everybody.

In regard to Jesus' relation to God, we find scattered throughout the Gospels, evidence of the religion of Jesus being a very personal religion. "When thou prayest enter into thy closet and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret." We see that Jesus had no ideas of exclusive worship. "Ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Fatherthe true worshipper shall worship the Father in Spirit and in truth."...God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in Spirit and in Truth.

Those who set high values on ritual to be followed by everybody deny the religion of Jesus. Spirit knows no ritual. It is a personal contact with God. What form it should take remains with the devotee. What suits one person will not help another. It is futile to lay down set forms and ceremonies. At the same time we have to recognise that the experiences of others are helpful to us and there are several spirits quite close in their make up to be able to fall into convenient groups. Such groups may get together for common worship, for mutual aid and help, but such common forms are definitely sinful when they assume an exclusive aspect. No church or religion has any religious sanctions from Jesus to say, "Unless you do as I do, you will not be saved." "He that is not against us is for us" is the broad principle laid down by Jesus.

God is a Father, and all men are brethren. This was Jesus' ruling relationship to his fellowmen. He did not regard any as an outsider. His was a

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

602

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 23.

realpatidar.com

universal religion. Every child born of woman, immediately attained fraternal relationship with Jesus by the very fact of its belonging to the human family. He had not to wait till the child was baptised to receive it into any group. Will any church dare deny entry to one whom Jesus claims as His brother? Where then is the foundation for conversion or closing the doors of any church against non-Christians? The so-called Christian churches that claim exclusive rights have drifted far from the religion of Jesus. "All that the Father giveth me, shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I shall in no wise cast out." In the Christian churches even today we find distinction of colour and race made among its own members. Even after death the body of one who was a member in his lifetime of a church but who had a dark skin, cannot be buried alongside the body of another member of the same church but who had a white skin. Is it not blasphemy to call such churches Christian? Such may be "white clubs" but not churches of God.

If we wish to trace the origin of the missionary spirit in what is called Christianity we will find it goes to St. Paul, the child of Imperial Rome and not to Jesus the Nazarene. When Jesus sent out His disciples His charge to them was "Go not into the way of the Gentiles; and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not but; go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." If we paraphrase it today it would read, "go not to the distant parts of the world to those professing other religions, but go rather to your own neighbours and teach them the right path." Our missionaries conveniently turn literalists when it suits them and leave out passages for a generous interpretation when it goes against them. If literal interpretations there must be, I submit, the injunctions to the disciples should be followed by preference, "Provide neither gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purse, neither scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes nor yet staves, for the workman is worthy of his meat." I would commend the missions accepting this as a test to see how near to the religion of Jesus they approximate.

How shall we know whether our relationship with God is of the right sort if each individual lays down his own standard and attitude? "By their fruits ye shall know them" not by their professions nor their formal following of ceremonies. "Let your light so shine before men that seeing your good works they may glorify your Father in Heaven."

Jesus considered himself a tool in the hands of God. "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me and to finish his work" and again He says "I must work the work of Him that sent me." We find what He conceives to be the will of the Father in the instructions He gives to His disciples while sending them out. "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils." That is Jesus' idea of our mission in life—service of our fellowmen in need. This was not merely a precept. His short life was one of intense active service. He wished to be known, not as the Son of David, but by the service He was rendering. When John the Baptist sent enquiring who Jesus was, the answer was "Go your way and tell John what things ye have seen and heard, how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the gospel is preached." Here is a testimony of a man's religion. When we are asked what religion we follow can we Christians say, "Look at my Western clothes, look at my cropped head, look at my western manners, my table is laden with beef and pork, and my house is decorated with things gathered from the four corners of the earth. I go to church on Sundays and have a pew in front, our names are drawn from the saints in the Bible. I wear a cross round my neck and read the Bible morning, evening and night, and pray to God that the hungry may be fed." Will not Jesus say, "I know ye not, not everyone that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, but He that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." In regard to his mission he says, "To this end was I born and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth."

KARL MARX ON INDIAN VILLAGE COMMUNITIES.

The small and extremely ancient Indian communities, which still exist to some extent, are based upon the communal ownership of the land, upon a direct linking up of agriculture and handicraft and upon a fixed form of the division of labour which is adopted as a out-and-dried scheme whenever new communities are founded. They constitute self-sufficient productive entities, the area of land upon which production is carried on ranging from a hundred to several thousand acres. The greater part of the products is produced for the satisfaction of the immediate needs of the community, not as commodities; and production itself is therefore independent of the division of labour which the exchange of commodities has brought about in Indian society as a whole. Only the superfluity of products undergoes transformation into commodities, this being in part a primary result of the activities of the State, to which since immemorial days a definite proportion of the produce has gone in the form of rent in kind. In different regions of India, we find different forms of such communities. In the simplest form, the land is communally tilled and its produce is divided among the members of the community, while every family carries on spinning, weaving, etc., as an accessory domestic occupation. Side by side with the masses who are thus employed one and all in the same avocations, we have the following persons; the headman, who is judge, policeman, and tax gatherer rolled into one; the book-keeper, who keeps the farming accounts and registers everything relating thereto; a third official whose business it is to prosecute criminals, to protect travellers from afar, and to escort them to the next village; the ranger, who keeps the bounds between his own community and neighbouring ones; the overseer of the waters, who distributes to the tillers the water that has been stored in the communal reservoirs; the Brahmin, who conducts the religious services; the schoolmaster, who, on the sand, teaches children to read and write; the calendar-Brahmin, who functions as astrologer, determining the times appropriate for sowing and harvesting, and making known which are lucky and unlucky days for various agricultural operations; a smith and a carpenter, who make and repair agricultural implements; a potter, who fashions all the earthenware utensils needed by the village community; a barber; a laundryman; a silversmith; occasionally a poet, who in some communities replaces the silversmith, in others the schoolmaster. This dozen or so of persons is maintained at the cost of the community at large. If the population increases, a new community is established upon virgin soil, after the model of the old one. The mechanism of the community is one characterised by the purposive division of labour; but a manufacturing division of labour is impossible, seeing that the market for the work of the smith, the carpenter, etc., remains fixed; and seeing that at most, if the village be a very large one, there may be two or even three smiths, potters,

* Marx : Capital. Allen and Unwin pp. 377 ff.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

603 etc., instead of one. The law that regulates the division of the labour of the community operates here with the inviolable authority of a law of nature. Each of the handicraftsmen, such as the smith, etc., works in accordance with traditional custom, but independently, and without being subject to any sort of authority, performing in his own workplace, on his own initiative, all the manipulations proper to his speciality. The simplicity of the productive organism in these self-sufficient communities—which continually reproduce their kind, and, if destroyed by changes, reconstruct themselves in the same locality and under the same name—this simplicity unlocks for us the mystery of the unchangeableness of Asiatic society, which contrasts so strongly with the perpetual dissolutions and reconstructions of Asiatic States, and with unceasing changes of dynasties. The structure of economic elements of society remains unaffected by the storms in the political weather.

BOMBAY BUSINESSMEN'S MANIFESTO.

A joint manifesto by 21 leading business men of Bombay, states:—

Pandit Jawaharlal in his presidential speech at the Lucknow Congress said:

"I see no way of ending the poverty, the vast unemployment, the degradation and subjection of the Indian people except through Socialism. That involves vast and revolutionary changes in our political and social structure, the ending of vested interests in land and industry, as well as the feudal and autocratic Indian States system. That means the ending of private property except in a restricted sense, and the replacement of the present profit-system by a higher ideal of co-operative service."

This has been described as a new civilization, and illustrated by what is happening in Soviet Russia to-day.

We have no hesitation in declaring that we are unequivocally opposed to ideas of this kind being propagated, as, in the present condition of widespread economic misery in the country, they are likely to find ready, though unthinking, reception. We are convinced that there is grave risk of the masses of the country being misled by such doctrines into believing that all that is required for the improvement of their well being is a total destruction of the existing social and economic structure. The inculcation of any such ideas into the minds of unthinking millions of this country would lead to a situation in which not only the institution of private property, but the peaceful observance of religion, and even personal safety are likely to be jeopardised.

The business community and the propertied classes of this country have played not a small part in the furtherance of the National movement for the achievement of political freedom, and have supported all practical measures for the amelioration of the lot of the toiling masses of this country, and for the correction of inequalities of wealth by taxation of the basis of ability to pay. Whenever the larger interests of the country have demanded alterations in the existing laws, they have co-operated with other sections of the community in bringing about the necessary changes in consonance with the need of the times. But reforms, in order to remove known evils are quite different from a destructive and subversive programme which declares to every man with a stake in the country, whether small or large, that it is wrongful for him to own business or other property, and that he is rendering no service to the community which would justify him in the expectation of legitimate protection of his interests by the State.

We also consider it necessary to declare it as our firm opinion that such an ideal, apart from creating disorders in course of time, cannot but result in causing further divisions in this country, and impeding the achievement of the common purpose of all patriotic Indians, namely self-government for India.

The following are the signatories:—

Sir Nowroji Saklatwala; Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas; Sir Chimanlal Setalvad; Sir Phiroze Sethna; Sir Cawasji Jehangir; Mr. V. N. Chandavarkar; Sir Shapoorjee Billimoria; Messrs. Walchand Hirachand; Mathradas Vissanji; A. R. Dalal; Rahimtoola Chinoy; Chunilal B. Mehta; K. R. P. Shroff; Ratanjee Hirji Govindji; Ranchhoddas Jethabhai; Khimji Vishram; Haridas Madhavdas; Dharamsey Mulraj Khatau; Ishwardas Lakhmidas; Sir H. P. Mody; and Mr. A. D. Shroff.

EDUCATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT IN U. S. A.

The estimate of Aubrey Williams, director of the National Youth Administration, that over 5,000,000 young people from 16 to 25 years of age are neither working nor attending school, that almost 3,000,000 young people are on relief, that 700,000 young people had to quit high school last year because they could not afford to go on, and that hundreds of thousands graduated from high school and college into a labour market greatly surfeited indicates that this "is a cold and unwelcome world,.....our young people are entering."

When President Roosevelt officially recognized the inauguration of the National Youth Administration in June, 1933, he declared that something must be done "for the nation's unemployed youth because we can ill afford to lose the skill and energy of these young men and women. They must have their chance in school, their turn as apprentices, and their opportunity for jobs—a chance to earn for themselves." Those who understand the youth problem, regard the appropriation of $ 50,000,000 to help the large number of young people needing it, as a mere gesture toward carrying out the lofty purpose expressed by the President. In fact the President himself declared "that the final solution of the whole problem of unemployed will not be attained until there is a resumption of normal business activities and opportunities for private employment on a wide scale." Furthermore, one of the most serious questions facing the country is how many of those now unemployed, but employable, will still remain idle if business reaches the levels of 1929 and previous years.

The inadequacy of the $ 50,000,000 appropriation, the small scale of payments to young people, and dissatisfaction with the administration of the National Youth Administration has aroused many organizations representing American youth to action. These organizations are affiliated with the American Youth Congress and they are demanding legislation which offers some hope of coping with the youth problem. Their programme has been incorporated in a bill which was introduced in Congress January 14, 1936, by Congressman Amlie.

The bill would authorize and require the Secretary of Labour and the Commissioner of Education to establish a system of vocational training and employment on public enterprises for the purpose of providing regular wages for young people between the ages of 16 and 25. Wages must be equal to prevailing wages established by recognized labour organizations in each community and in no case less than $15 per week plus $3 per week for each dependent.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

604

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 23

realpatidar.com

For needy students in high schools and vocational schools the wage is the average of their weekly living expenses plus fees and it must not be less than $15 per month exclusive of all fees. The wage would become effective when they enter school and would be paid "throughout the entire year" (calendar year rather than academic year).

The Secretary of Labour and the Commissioner of Education must also establish a system of regular employment on college projects for needy undergraduate and graduate students. The projects must be of "academic nature in accordance with the educational purposes of the institutions of higher learning." Regular wages must be paid equal to prevailing wages in the community as established by local labour organizations or by local youth commissions described below. In no case must the wage be less than $ 25 per month, paid throughout the year.

The minimum wage named in the bill for all three classes of workers must increase in conformity with the rise in the cost of living.

If the bill becomes a law it would be "administered by and controlled" by youth commissions, not less than one third of the membership of which would be composed of elected representatives of youth organizations, not less than one third would be representatives of organized labour, and the remainder would consist of representatives of local social service, educational and consumers' organizations. These commissions would determine eligibility for benefits under the act and adjust minimum compensation and conditions of work.

The works projects authorized must be "beneficial to the community" and they must not be "directly or indirectly of a military character or designed to subsidize any profit-making enterprise."

WANTED candidates for Telegraph and Station Master Class. Allowance Rs. 28/-, Uniform, quarter and passage free. Service essential. Rules and Entrance form on anuas eight.

Director, Royal Telegraph and Rly.
Duties College, Bombay No. 14.

TRADE FOLLOWS THE MAIL

Successful business largely depends upon advertisement. Mail your communications, catalogues, price lists, etc., to your prospective clients PERSONALLY BY NAME. The Indian Posts and Telegraphs Department has prepared up-to-date lists of prominent residents and firms, with their addresses, of a large number of the smaller towns and urban areas in the several provinces of India. These are generally not catered for in existing Telephone Directories or in those prepared by private firms. The lists will be supplied post-free to the intending purchasers on receipt of the requisite price which is payable by means of a crossed Indian Postal Order drawn in favour of the Postmaster-General of the province concerned. The lists are classified as under:—

1. Banks and Bankers.
2. Book-sellers and publishers.
3. Chemists and Druggists.
4. Doctors.
5. Lawyers.
6. Merchants and Commission Agents.
7. Rases and Zamindars.
8. Salary earners.
9. Stores and Stationers.
10. Motor Dealers.
11. Miscellaneous.

For price and other enquiries, write to—

The Postmaster-General of your province.
INDIAN POSTS & TELEGRAPHS DEPARTMENT.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 |
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

605

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to—

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS
only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY.

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE
NATIONAL BANK LTD.

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman),
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MEM)
Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co., Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharlal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallai Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M. S. G. I.,
(Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Marattai (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnarai Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,

Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin

Colombo and other coast ports

according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-36

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

806

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 23

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches :—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

* Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application. The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE
Central Bank of India, Ltd.
SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. FOCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Virangam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulia (District Western Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondajcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nasik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kalwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panhala)
Shirgaon (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Bant, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

607

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—
1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE

Registered No. B 348.

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office: KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY MAY 30, 1936. No. 39

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Democracy and Civil Liberties.
Milk for Babes.
Central Advisory Education Board.
A Concocted Murder Case.
Arab Revolt in Asia Minor.
Zanzibar Indians' Case.
Nazi Methods in India.
No More Imperial Conferences?
Notes on the Way.

The Religion of Jesus.
Harijans and Christians in Mysore.
Mary Chesley.
A Picture of Indigenous Education.
Pandit Nehru Replies to Business Manifesto.
Civil Liberties.

NOTES

Democracy and Civil Liberties :—Civil liberty is no more safe under a democracy than under an autocracy or bureaucracy. In fact, when a democracy feels itself threatened it is capable of more arbitrary interference with liberty than the autocrat who is never altogether free from the fear of a popular rising or the bureaucrat whose main preoccupation is to keep things going smoothly. It is curious that civil liberties in India have been more exposed to restrictions since the introduction of popular Legislatures than before. We have ourselves more than once remonstrated against the attempts of popular leaders to dictate to the Press. When Pilate asked the Jerusalem mob whom it would like him to release on the eve of the Passover, Jesus or Barrabas, the mob shouted Barrabas who, by the way was the leader of a nationalist revolt though he is designated a robber, just as Chinese who resist foreign exploitation are branded as bandits or Ethiopians who persist in fighting the Italian invader even after the Emperor has left the country, are shot down as brigands. Last month, three small school children of ages ranging between six and nine, in Massachusetts, were committed to the Reformatory for refusing to salute the American flag in pursuance of the order of their father, a member of a sect known as Jehovah's Witnesses, which holds that such salutations are contrary to true religion. The New Republic pertinently asks: "Does Judge Mason, or any one else, believe that a child of six deserves to go to the reform school for obeying his father on a question of deeply-felt religious principle? Is patriotism worth having when it is enforced by measures of this kind? Does not love of country imply a reciprocal obligation that the country shall treat the individual in such a way as to make love and respect possible?" Distinguished educationists like President Hutchins of Chicago University, President Graham of North Carolina University and Professor Charles H. Judd, have been the target of attack because they refused to submit to interference from outside interests in their educational work. Genuine regard for liberty is always the result of deep reflection by minds trained to look beyond immediate results. It is always, therefore, the possession of the few. It is fortunate for a nation when its destinies are in the hands of some of these few.

Milk for Babes :—The Simla Municipality has started as an experiment free supply of milk to 120 school children—one pound of milk each a day. The experiment is to be continued for a period of three months in order to observe its effects on the physique of the children. They are to be selected from those whose parents cannot afford to procure milk at their own cost. His Excellency the Viceroy personally attended at one of the distribution centres and praised the action of the Municipality and laid stress on the maintenance of correct records of the results of the experiment. With great respect for the earnestness of Lord Linlithgow's observations, we fail to see that there is any need to demonstrate the good effects of feeding children with milk. The experimental method has been the means of advancing knowledge in many directions but there are many things which are self-evident and need not be proved by experiment. Indian children do not get enough milk not because their parents are unaware of its value as child-food but because milk is dear and they are poor. Pure, cheap milk such as can be had in many European countries and in the United States, is a rarity in large parts of this country. The Simla experiment may lead to the rise of the price of milk in Simla and thus make it less accessible to children who are not among the one hundred and twenty selected ones. Apart from the difficulty of selecting children according to their parents' earnings, the pound of milk, unless consumed on the premises and in the presence of an official, is sure to be shared with the brothers and sisters of the selected, who are probably more under-nourished. We may add that the Simla experiment has been long part of the routine of maternity and child welfare work in many cities. The provision of an adequate supply of pure milk for the children of India is primarily a question of providing adequate pasture. Lord Linlithgow has initiated a movement for improving the quality of milch cattle. His Excellency presented three stud

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

610
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 30

bulls to Delhi soon after his arrival. His example has been followed by a few others in different parts of the country, including, we note with interest, the Times of India whose Delhi correspondent was inclined to be facetious in his account of the Viceroy's presentation. Better cattle would require better and more fodder. The deterioration of Indian cattle is mainly due to want of adequate grazing. It is to be hoped that Lord Linlithgow will not allow his attention to be distracted by local needs from the larger problem as it affects the whole of India.

Central Advisory Education Board:—The Provinces of British India were granted autonomy, among other subjects, in Education under the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. The Central Government, however, was loth to take its finger from the pie and devised various indirect means of retaining, in part at least, its right of interference in educational administration. An Educational Commissioner with the Government of India, was appointed. He, without any responsibility for administration, felt himself free to offer advice and criticism to Provincial Ministers which, more often than not, had as much effect on them as water on a duck's back. He conceived the idea of a Central Advisory Board of Education. It has met with a cold reception in the country. The Simla correspondent of the Times of India reports that many of the Provinces have not even replied to the Commissioner's offer to let loose on the country a number of experts from England at the expense of the Government of India, though they were all represented at the Conference held some months ago at Delhi. Lord Willingdon gave the suggestion a parting benediction in the ambiguous style of Delphic oracles. Meanwhile four eminent educationists, including the Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry, have been added to the Board. After the scurvy treatment meted out to him in connection with the Round Table Conference, it is an act of truly Brahmanical self effacement on Mr. Sastry's part to lend the prestige of his name to save the Advisory Board from collapse. A Central Advisory Board was started soon after the introduction of the Montagu Reforms but was abolished after about a couple of years on the ground that the money expended on it might be spent more usefully. This argument will gain and not lose weight by the statutory autonomy into which the Provinces will enter in about twelve months' time. There is already another institution, known as the Inter-University Board which, judging from its last annual report, has to display much ingenuity in making work for itself. Many of its advisory resolutions are recorded without comment by member Universities. The Bombay University seems to make a point of not taking any notice of them, not even to the extent of saying that they will receive careful consideration. In respect of only one recommendation of the Board, that there should an inter-borrowing of books between different University Libraries, did the Bombay University care to reply and it was a blunt statement to the effect that the proposal was unworkable. The Calcutta University also turned it down as impractical. Madras did not reply. The newer Universities, whose libraries are yet in the making, approved of the suggestion. The Dacca University did so on condition that "no library request the loan of any fiction book or any book or journal which is not rare or out of print." The Inter-University Board, so far as we can see, serves no useful purpose. It may be left to the Universities to convene a Conference to consider specific questions as they arise.

A Concocted Murder Case:—The Punjab High Court in acquitting Sharfn and Nikka of murder of which they were found guilty by the Sessions Judge of Lyallpur and for which they were sentenced to death, expressed surprise that neither the committing Magistrate nor the Sessions Judge noticed that the post mortem report of the Civil Surgeon on the body submitted to him as that of the murdered person, completely contradicted the statement of the approver on which the accused were convicted. The approver who alleged that he was one of the participants in the crime, had stated that the body was dismembered. The Civil Surgeon's report, which he personally explained before the High Court, found the body intact. "One of the amazing facts of this case," observed the Chief Justice and Justice Munroe who constituted the Appellate Bench, "is that this complete contradiction was not noticed in the lower courts either by counsel or by the learned Magistrate or Judge, or by Counsel in this Court. It sometimes appears to us that Judges in the lower Courts look upon themselves as mere recording machines and fail to take an intelligent interest in the cases before them or to ask necessary questions to clear up doubtful points." The whole case was fabricated. "There is a clue in the Police diary of the investigation which tends to show how this invention arose," observe the Judges. "It is stated therein that the Chaukidar came to the police and reported that "a cut up body" had been found. No one except the Civil Surgeon noted the truth and the Civil Surgeon's post mortem report was not understood by the police. We are forced to the conclusion that the approver's evidence and the police diary have been fabricated to correspond with this initial fatal error. Those who dug this gallows pit have fallen into it." The case recalls another recorded by Sir Bampfylde Fuller in his reminiscences, which he had to try as a young Magistrate somewhere in the Central Provinces. The Police produced a skeleton as that of a woman said to have been murdered. When Fuller was inspecting the place where the murder was said to have been committed the woman whose "corpse" had been exhibited, to the consternation of the Police, turned up and identified herself. It turned out that the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com
1933 J

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

611

Police had "assembled" the skeleton from a charnel pit into which several dead bodies had been thrown during a famine several years previously. But this was half a century ago and one would have thought that such a thing was impossible now. Incidentally, it may be worth the while of the Home Member of the Government of India to know that Police reports on which people are detained in custody without trial, are not always as reliable as he takes them to be.

Arab Revolt in Asia Minor:—In the beginning of this year the French Mandatory in Syria had great trouble in dealing with a rising of the Arab population, Nationalist rioting in Damascus, Aleppo, Beirut, Homs, Hama and other places, writes Mr. Robert L. Baker in the Current History, resulted in a total of twenty-six dead, hundreds wounded and injured, hundreds thrown into prisons and considerable damage to property. A general strike, which reached its forty-second day on February 29, kept business at a standstill. The effort of the French Mandatory to crush the uprising by force, says the same writer, failed utterly. A few days later, the policy of force was openly abandoned, and a Nationalist Ministry was appointed. The new Cabinet was informed that France was ready to negotiate a Treaty with Syria, similar to that by which Great Britain recognised Iraq's independence, and to propose Syria for membership of the League of Nations. Meanwhile the trouble has spread to Palestine where the position is complicated by the Balfour Declaration to provide a National Home for Jews in the land which they deserted two thousand years ago. Since the advent of Herr Hitler to power in Germany, and owing to his strong anti-Jewish policy, the number of European Jews who have to find a home in other parts of the world, has increased. The German Government does not allow Jews to take their capital out of Germany. They can take only goods made in Germany and dispose of them elsewhere. This, of course, would be assisting the German Dictator, which Jewry is in no mood to do. At a Conference in New York attended by Sir Herbert Samuel and two other leading British Jews, it was decided to collect 15 million dollars to expatriate 100,000 young Jews from Germany. As, owing to the depression and other causes, many countries would refuse to accommodate the emigrants, it was planned to settle 50,000 of the young German Jews in Palestine. This would require the British Government to raise the quota considerably and it seems to have been assumed that this could be done. Apart from that, the Zionist Organization has been complaining of British backwardness in giving effect to the Balfour Declaration. The Arab population has evidently been alarmed by the prospect of an increasing influx of European Jews with serious consequences to its religious, social and economic future. Sympathy in India is with the Arabs. Many Englishmen also feel that the Balfour Declaration has committed their country to an unjust and impossible policy. The Jews have a widespread organisation and means of propaganda, and, what is more, they control finance in many countries. On the other hand, behind the Palestine Arabs, is the sympathy of three hundred million Muslims of all nations and behind it is the sympathy of Asia and Africa. Between the two, Britain has a difficult choice to make.

Zanzibar Indians' Case:—After an unconscionable delay, the Government of India have acted on the suggestion of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association to send out an officer of standing to help the Indians in Zanzibar to place their case against the Clove and other anti-Indian decrees before the British representative who has been deputed to enquire into the economic position of the administration. Mr. G. S. Bozman, Deputy Secretary in the Education Department, left for Zanzibar on Wednesday. He is an able officer and may be relied upon to do full justice to the task which has been entrusted to him. But we are afraid that, before he reaches Zanzibar, the British delegate would have nearly finished his work and formulated his decisions. We have, of course, the right to appeal to the British Government before any decision is finally made. If, as has been surmised, Mr. Ormsby-Gore becomes Secretary of State for the Colonies in place of Mr. Thomas, India may expect from him fair dealing. He is well acquainted with the Indians' difficulties in Africa and has before this shown himself to be above racial bias. But the task of the Secretary of State would have been facilitated if the Indian case had been placed before the enquiry at the earliest moment. In this case, the Government of India have not shown their accustomed alacrity in dealing with the grievances of Indians Overseas. Now that the National Congress has opened a department for Overseas Indians, Government will have to meet a type of criticism very different from that hitherto offered by the Imperial Citizenship Association, which has regarded co-operation with Government a cardinal principle of its policy and methods.

Nazi Methods in India:—"We learn with dismay," writes the New Statesman, "the news that Mr. Subhas Bose, lately Mayor of Calcutta, has been rearrested as a detenu, without charge or trial, on his return to India after absence in Europe. These are Nazi methods." The New Statesman is unfair to the Nazis. This particular method has been in use in India long before Nazism was thought of. The Regulation under which Mr. Subhas Bose is detained is more than a century old. By the way, Mr. Subhas Bose who was confined in Yerravda prison has been interned in his brother's home at Kurseong, a hill-station near Darjeeling. He was removed there early this week. It is a brilliant idea to make one's brother one's keeper.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

612

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| May 30

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, May 30, 1936.

NO MORE IMPERIAL CONFERENCES?

The Indian Legislature passed a resolution on March 30 this year recommending the termination of the Ottawa Agreement to be followed by a Government survey of India's trade with various important countries. The Assembly contemplated the negotiation of bilateral treaties "whenever and wherever possible to bring about the expansion of India's export trade." This resolution, and even more Government's decision to abide by their previous promise to be guided by the Assembly's decision on this issue, was regarded by national parties as a triumph for Indian opinion. Mr. Satyamurthi addressing the open session of the Lucknow Congress pointed proudly to the Ottawa Resolution as an achievement of the Congress majority in the Assembly and asked whether anyone would question the advisability of Council entry after that. It must have been a shock to many, therefore, to see the Dominions Secretary using almost the very language of the Assembly Resolution in explaining Britain's future economic policy within the Empire. The United Kingdom, said Mr. Malcolm MacDonald in reply to a question in the House of Commons, did not propose to call a Conference to consider the Ottawa Agreements. Each Agreement would remain in force unless after February next year six months' notice of denunciation was given by any party to it. Mr. MacDonald thought that it would be most appropriate to deal with individual Governments as occasion offered. What has led British statesmen to look upon the Ottawa Conference as an experiment not to be repeated? The explanation is obvious. The self-governing Dominions taken together are too difficult to negotiate economic pacts with. Ottawa was entered on as an emergency measure; it was utilised by the Dominions as an opportunity for pressing their demands on Britain; and the British delegates submitted to Dominion exactions because they dared not let the Conference fail. As compensation the colonies were to provide Britain with markets and raw materials—a policy which later roused the envy and hostility of less fortunate European powers. Imperial Conferences, therefore, are less advantageous to Britain than negotiations with individual governments. That has been the bitter lesson of Ottawa.

For the Ottawa Agreements have, generally speaking, brought no advantage to Britain. Canada, as Lord Snowden remarked in the Lords' debate on Ottawa in 1932, raised duties on certain articles to eighty and ninety per cent before the Conference and then offered to take off ten per cent for British goods. More than this, the Canadian Premier decided after Ottawa to levy a duty of twenty per cent on British goods which had entered free before the Pact, on the ground that the relevant part of the Ottawa Agreements related only to existing duties and not to fresh ones! Canada has done well for herself. She has sold more to Britain in the Ottawa period, thus compensating for the chaos then prevailing in the United States. Now that the U. S. A. markets are more stable, Canada has negotiated an agreement with the United States which must react on her inter-imperial trade relations. The Australian Government has maintained throughout a high duty on cotton goods; in 1934 acting with New Zealand it threatened to default on Dominion loans held in Britain if their farmers were denied free markets in the United Kingdom. It is significant that the one country where the Ottawa arrangement was 'really beneficial to Britain, was India. The period before Ottawa was one in which the boycott of British goods was intensely practised. During and after the boycott period, the Indian consumer, when he had to use non-Indian products, rarely bought British. That British products should have found a good market after Ottawa in spite of this feeling indicates the importance of the preference enjoyed by them over other foreign articles. Even if foreign countries did not retaliate, India sold less to them because she bought less from them. "The basis of Imperial preferences from the point of view of the colonies," writes the Round Table, "is that the more they take of British goods the more they will be able to sell in Great Britain; the converse, taking colonial trade as a whole, is equally true—the less they take of foreign goods the less they will be able to sell in foreign countries."

The diversion of trade from foreign countries to Britain is not necessarily bad. But in India's case it is so, because her loss has been greater than her increased trade in the Empire. "The only true criterion of success," wrote Sir Arthur Salter in the Political Quarterly in 1931, "is whether or not Ottawa results in an increase in the total volume of trade, imperial, internal and external together, in the total mass of profitable inter-changes. To change the direction, without increasing the total, of our trade, is no success. To increase one section at the expense of greater loss, direct or indirect, elsewhere, would be failure." Judged by this standard the Ottawa Agreement has failed in India and the popular demand for its denunciation was a sound one. But it was opposed by the Government because officials here did not sufficiently appreciate the fact that Britain too had not, as a whole, gained from the Agreements, whatever she might have obtained out of India. The Government resolution to refer the question to a committee was, as one member shrewdly suggested, an attempt to eke out the life of the Indian Agreement to the full period of the Dominion ones. However one might condemn this method of evading direct action, there would have been some point in it if the various units of the Empire were to have met at the end of the period. It becomes meaningless in view of the Dominions Secretary's declaration of Britain's loss of faith in Empire Conferences as a means of solving economic problems.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

613

NOTES ON THE WAY.

Scapegoat Thomas: The case of Mr. J. H. Thomas has our sincere sympathy. He has fallen a victim to the prejudice of the governing classes of Britain against the intrusion of outsiders into their preserves. Joseph Chamberlain had to meet the accusation that he had a pecuniary interest in some firms which had contracts with the British Government during the Boer War. But he was a strong man and, besides, he had the chivalrous Arthur Balfour for his chief. Balfour threatened that he would resign if Chamberlain left the Government. Lloyd George had to answer for the Marconi scandal. He too was a dynamic personality and he too had for chief, Lord Oxford, a statesman of great courage and loyalty to his colleagues. Ramsay Macdonald when he became Prime Minister in the first Labour Government was attacked for accepting the present of a motor car. The Opposition leaders in Parliament, however, declined to associate themselves with the intrigue and there the matter ended. Mr. Thomas' position has been greatly weakened by his defection from his old Party which would have stood by him. He was a Minister of State by sufferance. Mr. Baldwin, unlike his predecessors, has a habit of saving his Government by sacrificing his colleagues. He threw Sir Samuel Hoare overboard some months ago and he has accepted Mr. Thomas' resignation with the consoling remark that he would himself have done the same in a similar position. What is that position? Mr. Thomas maintains that he did not breathe a word about the Budget proposals to anybody. He has been Cabinet Minister for several years and there is no reason to think that he had on this occasion forgotten the obligations of that position. That certain persons took out insurances against increase of taxation does not necessarily show that they did so on information improperly furnished to them. The alternatives before a Finance Minister, faced with a situation like that before the British Finance Minister, are always extremely limited. Any intelligent man who keeps touch with political and economic trends can easily guess them. Merely because people talked in the City of one particular Minister, it does not follow that they were right. Neither is the connection of the Minister's son with some of the transactions, indubitable proof that the father had a hand in them. If the Prime Minister had stood by his colleague as Lords Balfour and Oxford did by their colleagues, Mr. Thomas ought not to have had to resign. Mr. Baldwin's authority in his Party, however, has been steadily on the wane for over a year. But sacrificing a colleague on such flimsy grounds as in this case will not raise his prestige.

Which Socialism? Sir Chimanlal Setalvad was one of the signatories to the Bombay Businessmen's Manifesto published in the Reformer last week. He seems to have quickly realised that the omission to offer an alternative scheme was a vital defect and he hastened to supply it in the shape of a statement to the Press issued on the day after the publication of the manifesto. In it he says: "I am sure most people will welcome Socialism as it is understood and practised in some of the countries in Western Europe. If Socialism means the more equitable distribution of profits between Labour and Capital, the securing of a reasonable minimum standard of living for all and, even under certain circumstances and conditions, the nationalisation of some key industries, many of those who are denouncing the Pandit's propaganda will be for Socialism." If this passage had been inserted in the Businessmen's Manifesto, of which Sir Chimanlal was a signatory, it would have added much to its weight. The fact that it was not inserted and that Sir Chimanlal had to issue a separate statement embodying it the day after the publication of the Manifesto, shows that he was unable to obtain the assent of his co-signatories even to the mild type of Socialism which he favours. Pandit Jawaharlal is wrong in saying (in the Chronicle interview which we reprint this week) that Socialism and Communism both accept the general philosophy of Marxism in regard to the interpretation of history and current events. Lord Snowden, who believes as fervently as the Pandit that the organisation of the State and Society on Socialistic principles offers the best hope for the future of humanity, writes in his autobiography: "I may make a confession which most Socialists would make if they had the courage to do so. I have never read Karl Marx...Neither Keir Hardie nor William Morris derived their Socialism from Karl Marx." The early Socialist movement in Great Britain, he says, derived its inspiration far more from the Sermon on the Mount than from the teachings of the economists. But whether derived from Karl Marx or the Sermon on the Mount, Socialism postulates much more than would be acceptable to Sir Chimanlal. The Sermon on the Mount Socialist, who can not be accused of undermining religion, is often a fiercer advocate than the Marxist. Asked at a Glasgow meeting whether he accepted Marx's theory of value, William Morris said: "To speak frankly, I do not know what Marx's theory of value is, and I'm damned if I want to know. I am, I hope a Socialist none the less...What we Socialists have got to do is to work together for the establishment of a system of co-operation where there shall be no masters or slaves, but where every one will work jollily together as neighbours and comrades for the equal (not equitable) good of all." The Pandit and his opponents forget that Bolshevism is the logical corollary to Tsarism and wherever and to whatever extent Tsarism prevails, Bolshevism is sure to follow.

Christian Communism-or-Capitalism:—In this connection the following plan of a Christian Communism and a Christian Capitalism drawn up by the Catholic Worker of New York of working peacefully together, is interest both as showing a way of reconciling seemingly opposite principles and as illustrating that the conflict is not confined to the political or economic sphere and that religion claims to have the deciding voice.

With this the fourth anniversary number of the Catholic Worker, writes that journal, it is proper again to state our stand and our opposition to the industrial system, to military preparedness, to inter-racial injustice.

We are writing as Catholics and as Americans. We do not believe that the two positions are incompatible.

We are accused by false conservatives who do not know what they want to conserve, of being Communists. And we are accused by Communists of being Fascists.

So we restate our position and the positions of both communist and the fascist-minded opponents.

Communists believe in State Socialism as a step to Communism.

We believe in widespread private property, the de-proletarianizing of our American people. We believe in the individual owning the means of production, the land and his tools. We are opposed to the "finance capitalism" so justly criticized and condemned by Karl Marx, but we believe there can be a

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

614
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 30

Christian capitalism as there can be a Christian Communism.

The Communist believes in the necessity of achieving State Socialism by class war. "How are you going to convert the wicked capitalist, the speculator, the banker?" he says. And his answer is "by liquidating them."

We believe in using the following means: Indoctrination by using all the propaganda means at our disposal: by the individual practice of the works of mercy: by farming communes which will provide work for the unemployed and leadership for those who are anxious to undertake the job of building up a new social order.

The Communist is Atheist. "Atheism is an integral part of Marxism," Lenin says.

We believe that we are all members or potential members of the mystical Body of Christ, and that we must show that faith by translating the spiritual into the material. All men are our brothers, Jew or Gentile, white or black, since God created us all and since His Son died to atone for the sins of all men. Since Christ is our Brother, all men are our brothers—the communist, fascist, the red baiter and the "capitalist."

We oppose the "finance capitalism" of the American industrial system because it is as truly materialistic and hence atheistic as Marxism. And we believe that only Fascism which denies all human liberty can keep it alive.

We are opposed to "social planning" because it will lead to servitude, and because we believe that "Society is a spiritual organism and not an economic machine."

We believe that all the hundreds of thousands of workers marching throughout the industrial centres to-day are justly criticizing the present social order as debasing and degrading.

We believe that they are braver and more honest men and women than those large masses of indifferent and comfortable materialists who close their eyes to the misery and degradation of the American people, or those others, the rabid red-baiters who, in opposing the communist solution, uphold the present materialist system.

We do not believe that sharing the wealth, a reformed monetary system alone, old age pensions and epic plans are practical or fundamental. We do not believe that legislation is going to bring us out of the morass we are floundering in.

We do believe that the problem before us of working for a social order in which the way of life will enable man to save his soul, is a moral one which must engage the minds and energies of all Catholics.

All Americans indeed should wake to reality, and in recalling what Thomas Jefferson stood for in the minds of his countrymen, look around them and contemplate the state we are in today.

Inasmuch as we do not concern ourselves with such conditions, we are responsible for them.

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of them ye have done it unto Me," Christ said.

Third International Conference of Social Work:—The Third International Conference on Social Work is to be held in London from the 11th to the 18th July. The topic for this year's conference is "Social Work and the Community." Any interested persons who are to be in London at this time will be welcome at the Conference. Complete information may be obtained from Mr. Clifford Manshardt, the Indian representative of the Conference, care the Nagpada Neighbourhood House, Byculla, Bombay.

THE RELIGION OF JESUS.*

(By J. C. KUMARAPPA.)

If we look upon religion as a close form of "Friendship" between God and man, the seniormost place is given to God, to whom man owes unconditional obedience, and every other relationship has to be subordinated to this. This subordinating does not lead to any conflict, but is a natural outcome of it. If I am in close friendship with a personality like Gandhiji, that friendship is of no value unless it is reflected in all my other relations. This cannot be helped. In the same way if we are in close communion with God, all our activities will bear the hall mark, and our faces will be transfigured. If God claims the first place, all others come afterwards. The child Jesus can say with no disrespect to his parents: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business;" and the young man, Jesus, can say to his mother, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" Jesus never followed customs just because of their age-old authority. We frequently hear, "It was said by them of old time...but I say unto you." If the God relationship is a living one no other authority can supersede that; no human being, father or mother, old or young, can stand between us and the realisation of our ideals. "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me."

There is a converse to this: Those who are in a senior position should know that it is not their due to obtain servile obedience from their juniors. The personality of each individual is sacred and has to have its own development. There can be no human authority which can claim unquestioning obedience: Churches that profess to be the conscience-keepers of its devotees will find no support in Jesus, who seeks to establish direct individual touch with the Divine.

We have to find God in the service of our brethren. We cannot play the role of interceders and raise holy hands in prayer, and ask God to relieve the suffering of others. "Simon, lovest thou me feed my sheep." We have to render neighbourly service. "For I was an hungered and ye gave me meat, I was thirsty and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger and ye took me in; naked and ye clothed me; I was in prison and ye came unto me." This does not stop with mere supply of needs. We have to be careful of our action that we do not lead others into the wrong by them. "It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and be cast into the sea, than that he should offend one of these little ones."

I am afraid, Christian churches have not been mindful of these instructions. In their great hurry to make the world worship as they do, they have disregarded all other religions where they have not actively persecuted them. Jesus would have them consider all legitimate prejudices of our neighbours. Some of the rituals now practised by the churches are revolting to the fine sentiments of the people amongst whom we live. Is it so essential to the propagating of the religion of Jesus, that amongst a vegetarian people who refrain from eating even roots that grow below the surface of the land, as such roots have more life, to practice a ritual in which the blood of the founder is symbolically drunk and his flesh is ceremonially eaten, nay, in some, they claim, to consume the actual blood and flesh? These gruesome practices would have no weight in the religion of Jesus.

Jesus the compassionate, who says to the woman taken in her sin, "Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more", will not condemn those who are earnestly seeking to walk with God. The religion

* The second and concluding part of the address delivered to the Parliament of Religions, May 9, 1936, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

615

of Jesus is not a measuring rod for the "Pagan" but a helpful ladder at the disposal of everyone who wishes to use it. Wherever there was hope Jesus would encourage the struggle regardless of man-made labels. "A bruised reed shall he not break, and a smoking flax shall he not quench."

From the time the church entered into an unholy alliance with the State and became its handmaiden, it has enjoined unquestioning loyalty to it. As far as we can see this was not Jesus' attitude and is not in keeping with the highly personal religion he practised. As we have seen, Jesus gave the first place to his ideals. If the State or Society went against it, then the ideals had to prevail nevertheless. The blood of martyrs through the ages will bear witness to this. He repeatedly taught those around him that man's needs were above all institutions. He openly challenged the Pharisees in regard to adherence to customs and tradition irrespective of the claims of those around. In so far as the State was working for the welfare of the people, and the people co-operated with it, it was the duty of the citizen to do his share. The State has to perform certain functions and the citizen has to find the means for it. "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's." When the power of State or society becomes tyrannical Jesus revolted against it. When Herod misused his power and position Jesus called him "That fox" and condemned the "devouring of widows' houses" in the name of religion. He has always given the first place to the needs of the people, and in so far as the State served them he extended his co-operation as when He asked Simon to pay the tribute money "for me and thee."

Men have tried again and again to formulate definite forms of Government from Jesus' words, but have made gross blunders, as Jesus only laid down principles and expected everyone to decide his course of action for himself. We cannot excuse ourselves from taking part in politics. As we have already seen if our relationship with God is vital, it will make itself felt in all our relations. As long as we are members of a gregarious society we must be related politically to those among whom we have our being. To say that any religious man can promise to keep out of politics is to make a plaything of religion. Can a trained bacteriologist say he will promise to have nothing to do with the sanitation and hygiene of the village in which he lives? What use then will be his knowledge? If you are in close communion with a just God, will it not be impossible for you to shut your eyes to injustice to your fellow-men? Conscience cannot be locked up in steel cases at our convenience.

A missionary friend told me that if any of them protested against any political wrongs they will be sent back by the next boat, and asked me what will become of their work. Is the God we serve impotent without us? "God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." If his work is worth doing He will see to it. All that we are asked to do is to do the will of the Father in Heaven. The consequences need not deter us.

Although Jesus Himself did not formulate any political theories etc., it is simple to apply his religion to modern requirements of Statecraft.

He lent co-operation to authority in so far as it lay along his principle and he did not hesitate to cut across all regulations when they were inimical to human interests. "Sabbath was made for man" will be the motto of civil disobedience. Where the situation called for it the religion of Jesus enjoins direct action against man-made codes of Law. "Laying aside the commandments of God, ye hold the tradition of men—making the word of God of none effect through your tradition." After warning his disciples of the leaven of the Pharisees he says, "Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do."

When the means becomes the end there is a danger of the goal never being reached. Jesus valued material possessions only as a means of achieving his ideals. He found the money to pay tribute, "lest we should offend them." The moment we set our hearts on the means—property becomes an evil. It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. When property makes us lose all sense of proportion it becomes a danger. For one who has to work for the kingdom, property is a hindrance and one has to relieve oneself from it just as a swimmer casts off all unnecessary garments. The casting off of the garment itself is no virtue, but lightens our burden on the way. We earn no merit by asceticism itself. He reminded those who sought him for worldly benefits that "foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath nowhere to lay his head." This ought to be the answer to any who wish to embrace Christianity for worldly considerations. The one danger of material possessions is the feeling of satisfaction one seeks in it and the way its acquisition absorbs all thought and action. "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul. We are so built that it is not possible to divide our attention equally to worldly matters and to spiritual claims. We cannot serve God and mammon.

When we talk of religion we often lose sight of our physical side. The religion of Jesus is quite alive to the needs of the man. In dealing with the soul the body is not forgotten. Jesus does not deal with men in bulk but applies his general principles in relation to each individual. The principles of themselves possess no virtues but assume importance only in relation to particular human beings. We see Jesus watching the gifts cast into the temple treasury. He values the two mites of the poor widow more than all the others. He goes by the relative values or as an economist will put it by the marginal utility. Our gifts and services are valued by the purity of their motives. In the parable of the talents the same principle of valuation is shown. Every man is judged and dealt according to his several ability. While this may be a consolation to some, to others it is a grave situation, for "unto whomsoever much is given, of him much shall be required." This principle cuts at the root of uniform religious observances and emphasises the personal aspect of religion. The religion of Jesus is not an impersonal set form of conduct, but adjusts itself to the ability of the individual to see God. Therefore, none of us can have any grounds to condemn anyone else. It is impossible for us to judge who will go to heaven and who to hell from merely the conduct of the individual. There are no absolute standards to go by. Rules and regulations which are intended for the conduct of the people, are subordinated to the needs of the individual. In the observing of the letter of the law we ought not to cause offence to any of our brethren. The main thing is the fulfilment of the spirit in relation to the needs of the people. The right of way is to human needs. Life is more than meat, and the body more than raiment.

In the religion of Jesus there is no intolerance of other forms of religion. He was very impatient of over-zealous Jews, because of their narrow religious

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 30

outlook. He himself sent his disciples to the lost sheep of the house of Israel and not to the Gentiles. He denounced the scribes and Pharisees "for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte and when he is made ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves."

The religion of Jesus was not exclusive, "I say unto you, that many will come from the East and from the West, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out."

In the parable of the Good Samaritan, Jesus gives the place of honour and esteem to one who is not a Jew but the Harijan of the day. It indicates Jesus' desire to bring forward such despised people.

What weighs with Jesus is not the allegiance of any individual to any particular religion but the individual's attitude to his fellowmen.

In the earlier part of the address I had referred to Dr. Farquhar's "Crown of Hinduism." Now that we have analysed the Religion of Jesus we can understand why Dr. Farquhar was looking for a head to place the crown on. Although we said that Christianity may be looked upon as the Crown of Judaism yet we cannot accept the personal religion of Jesus such as the one we have formulated here, as the crown of Christianity. Christianity has developed into a smug, comfortable, selfish and individualistic religion seeking for its own gain. While the religion of Jesus requires for its growth a background of a collective social order such as we find Hinduism has developed in India. To cite one instance, take even the joint family system where the fit and the unfit, the rich and the poor, the gifted and the incapable, all live together and share a common purse. This system has its weakness but it is distinctly an attempt towards loving thy neighbour as thyself. Again amongst the Musalmans there is neither black, white or brown, Prince, peasant or pauper, they all practice a democracy which puts to shame the race for the high places in Christianity. We can see Dr. Farquhar was conscious that there was need for a head fitted to receive the Religion of Jesus and found it not in Christianity but in the social order evolved by Hinduism. Of course the pure personal religion of Jesus needs a sociological order suited to it to take root. As we have noticed except in cases such as that of the Society of Friends it does not find a congenial well-prepared ground to germinate in western forms of modern Christianity.

We have looked at the religion of Jesus from various aspects. When we study the pure form, we notice in every feature of it a similarity to the culture of India. On the other hand, Christianity, as we see around us, is totally foreign to our culture. The gorgeous ceremonies, the dependence on the priesthood, the aggressive proselytising spirit and the obeisance the church pays to the state are not found in our land. Amongst us, individual or family worship, with simple forms and rites, performed by the devotee himself, without the intervention of a priest, commonly in the home itself, is the general form of worship. Westerners have centralised even their religion. In every walk of life our ways are decentralised, so was that of Jesus. The religion of Jesus was highly individualistic, while the Christian churches are masterpieces of centralised organisation and administration. Many of the prelates spend their time not in prayer and meditation but in care of administration. They have turned Marthas; Marys will flourish only in the religion of Jesus. Even for the worker the way prescribed by Jesus is much the same as is practised today in India. "Into whatsoever city or town ye shall enter, enquire who in it is worthy, and there abide till ye go thence." To this day our social workers depend on such hospitality. Can the churches afford to follow Jesus literally here? In India it is nothing strange. Poverty prescribed by Jesus is honoured in our land. The churches cannot carry on their work on that basis. All these variations prove how far from the religion of Jesus the churches have drifted. In the Indian culture the fields are ready unto harvest for the pure religion of Jesus, but there is no room for modern Christianity.

Thus we find that Jesus practised and preached a personal religion which derived its characteristics from his attitude to God, and his conception of his mission. The greatest had to be the servant of all. No human need was to be sacrificed to rule and order. We act as trustees with regard to material possessions committed to our charge. If the greed for worldly goods and acquisition could be neutralised we can do away with war and all the attendant evils. The personality of an individual counts above all tradition and custom.

Will it be too much to expect that the religions represented here will extend towards each other the same spirit of mutual respect and tolerance that Jesus evinced towards those of other religions, and thereby help us to usher in the enunciation to the shepherds, "Glory to God in the Highest, on earth Peace and Goodwill towards men."

HARIJANS AND CHRISTIANS IN MYSORE. (FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

I have been much interested in reading the communications that have appeared lately in some of the vernacular newspapers regarding a well in a village of Mysore District of the State. For years the Hindu Adi-karnatikas (Panchamas) and their Christian relatives in the village have been using the well in common, and there has not been the slightest trouble. But of late the Hindu Adi-karnatikas, stirred up apparently by outsiders, have been objecting to their Christian neighbours drawing water from the well, for the construction of which the Government or the District Board made grants, and to which the Christians have a longstanding right.

Without discussing the details of the case I may say that the Taluq Magistrate has now ordered the Christians not to draw water from the well. Thus by a stroke of the pen this officer of the Government has taken away the rights of the Christians who for years have had a free access to the well, both before becoming Christians and after receiving baptism.

It seems to me a very serious matter thus to deprive a minority community of rights which the Government should specially guard and protect against the unjust demands of a majority. It is also entirely contrary to orders, which are before me as I write, previously issued by the Government, in similar cases, in which it is emphatically laid down that a change of religion cannot deprive a man of a right he previously possessed. The order then passed is perfectly clear. It runs as follows:

"It is repugnant to the policy of any enlightened Government that change of religions should involve the forfeiture of any civil right previously enjoyed." Also:

"The Government has no hesitation whatever in giving the assurance that Christians who before baptism had the right to use a public well will after baptism have the same right and be entitled to exercise it to the fullest extent possible."

After such an explicit statement of its policy one would have thought there could be no doubt as

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

617 to what attitude a Government official should take up in such cases.

The order now passed by the Amildar Magistrate has been based on the report supplied by the police, that there was a danger of a breach of the public peace. The idea that a handful of law-abiding Christians would take any action that would lead to a breach of the peace is absurd. Such officials need to be reminded of a significant paragraph in the order passed by the Government in a similar case some years ago. It runs as follows:

"The Deputy Commissioner has too readily accepted the Police Inspector's statements as to the probability of a breach of the public peace. There is no ground for apprehending a breach of the public peace and the decision in the case cannot be based upon any such ground."

There has been similar trouble about wells and tanks in different parts of the State of Mysore during the last few years. I believe that invariably the trouble has been stirred up by outsiders who interfere for reason best known to themselves, and who seek to destroy the harmony that has hitherto prevailed among the different classes and which the Government is so anxious to promote. Why should not the Government once for all put a stop to all such trouble by passing an order that when they dig a well, or give a grant towards the construction of a well, all classes of the people should have the right to use the well if they care to do so?

The case in question throws a rather interesting light on recent movements. The Adi-karnatikas are everywhere demanding the recognition of what they consider to be their rights. They are insisting that Brahmans and other caste people should admit them to Temples, although it is acknowledged by all that they have never had the right to enter them. Moreover, from various motives their supporters, are doing their utmost to get the Temples thrown open to them. Yet when a village well is concerned these people are refusing to others, a minority community, the right they claim for themselves and their supporters, who cry out for right of temple-entry, are helping them in their most unworthy and selfish policy of excluding others from the wells.

To a large extent I, with others, have been in sympathy with the Untouchables, in their aspirations and desires, but if this is the spirit they intend to manifest to others our sympathy with them must necessarily lessen. However that be, having regard to the well difficulty that has caused trouble in several parts of the State it seems to me that the Government will be advised if they pass an order making their wells as they have already made their schools, free to all classes of the people, thus settling the matter once for all. Also they should see that their orders are carried out impartially by all their officers so that the rights of minority communities may be adequately protected, according to the Government's definite orders.

India and the League of Nations:—The following is the resolution which Mr. Aiyangar proposes to move in the Simla Session of the Legislative Assembly to which we referred in an editorial note recently:—

"Whereas the League of Nations has failed to prevent the destruction of Abyssinia one of the members of the League by taking proper action in due time, but has on the other hand, done positive disservice to Abyssinia by feeding it continually on false hopes of help and as it (the League) does not promise to be of any use to save weaker nations from the aggression of the stronger ones, even in the future but has only become a costly show, this Assembly recommends to the Governor-General in Council to take early steps to withdraw the membership of this country from the League and to discontinue the payment of the annual contribution thereto."

MARY CHESLEY.

Miss Mary Chesley, an English woman, came to India in 1934 when the Congress was in session in Bombay. As soon as she landed she came to my hut in the Congress Camp and told me she knew Mirabeau and had expected to come with her but somehow or other she had preceded her by a week or thereabout. Her desire was to serve India through her villages. She did not prepossess me by her talk and I thought she would not stay in India many months. But I was wholly mistaken. She had come to know of Miss Mary Barr who had already commenced village work in Khedi, a village a few miles from Betul (C. P.). Miss Chesley found her way to Mary Barr. Mary Barr brought Mary Chesley to Wardha and we were together for a few days. Miss Chesley showed a determination that surprised me. She began work with Mary Barr in Khedi, adopted the Indian costume and changed her name to Tarabehn and toiled at Khedi in a manner that alarmed poor Mary Barr. She would dig, carry baskets full of earth on her head. She simplified her food as much as to put her health in danger. She had her own handsome income from Canada from which she kept only a paltry sum of about Rs. 10 for herself and gave the rest to the A. I. V. I. A., or to Indians with whom she came in contact and who seemed to her to give promise of being good village workers and who needed some pecuniary help. I came in closest touch with her. Her charity was boundless, she had great faith in the goodness of human nature. She was forgiving to a fault. She was a devout Christian. She belonged to a Quaker family. But she had no narrowness about her. She did not believe in converting others to her own faith. She was a graduate of the London School of Economics and a good teacher, having conducted together with a companion a school in London for several years. She realised at once that she must learn Hindi and was regularly studying it. For being able to pick up conversational Hindi she lived for a few months in the Wardha Mahila Ashram and there with two members formed a plan of going to Badrikeder during summer. I had warned her against the adventure. But it was difficult to turn her from such adventures when once her mind was made up. So only the other day she started with her friends on her perilous pilgrimage. And I got a brief message on the 15th from Kankhal saying, "Tarabehn expired". In her love for India's villages she was not to be excelled by anybody. Her passion for India's Independence was equal to that of the best among us. She was impatient of the inferiority complex wherever she noticed it. She mixed with poor women and children with the greatest freedom. There was nothing of the patron about her. She would take service from none, but would serve anybody with the greatest zeal. She was a self-effacing mute worker whose left hand did not know what the right had done. May her soul rest in peace.

M. K. GANDHI (in the Harijan.)

Rashtra Bhasha Prachar Examination:—With a view to diffuse the knowledge of Hindi in non-Hindi speaking areas, particularly in Orissa, Bengal, Assam, Sindh, Bombay, Barar and Marathi C. P., the Hindi Vishwa Vidyalaya of Allahabad, established by All-India Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, conducts a Rashtra Bhasha Prachar Examination every year at different Centres. The Rashtra Bhasha Prachar Examination will commence on 24th September 1936 this year. The last date for sending the application form for admission to this examination is 1st August 1936. A new centre for this examination in non-Hindi speaking areas can be opened at any recognised school if at least five candidates are available.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

618

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 30

realpatidar.com

A PICTURE OF INDIGENOUS EDUCATION.*

(BY KSHITIMOHAN SEN).

India has always been animated by an eager desire for wisdom, and in the Upanishads and other ancient records we find ample evidence of the keenness with which knowledge was sought in those days. We also come to know of a succession of renowned teachers; with different systems of philosophy living in the several forest hermitages, where women also had free access. At that time, moreover, we get glimpses of the rise of Kashi, Videha, Panchala and other places as centres of popular culture—fit seats for the future universities.

And, in fact, Jain and Buddhist monastic universities later came to take the place of the forest hermitages. Both in the previous age, with its characteristic quest for Brahma, and in the succeeding secular age of Buddhism, the educational methods were alike based on spiritual rapport between teachers and pupils of whose livelihood the entire burden was borne by the people at large; knowledge not being looked upon as a commodity to be bought and sold by individuals but as an achievement of common endeavour.

With the decline of Buddhism in India these Buddhist universities also decayed. Thereupon the work of the teaching was carried on, much in the same way, by teachers belonging to the Shaiva, Shakta, Vaishnava and other sects, in their respective seats. Eventually the culture, handed on, found refuge in institutions known as Chatuspathis, wherein the torch of our ancient lore has been kept alight during the last few centuries.

The imparting of knowledge continued to be looked upon as one of the most important of religious observances and so, as in the case of centres for the distribution of food to the hungry and water to the thirsty, the foundation of a Chatuspathi for the maintenance of a teacher as well as a free teaching establishment, was accounted a meritorious act by the wealthy. Life in these Chatuspathis was mellowed by the reverence of the pupils for the teachers, and love for the pupils of the teachers and their wives; it was outwardly meagre, but full of an abundant vitality within. Of this life how few of us know anything at all to-day?

Somewhere about 1800 A. C. an Englishman named W. Ward wrote a book entitled History, Literature and Mythology of the Hindus. Though the author appears to have had but scant sympathy with Hindu culture, he nevertheless refers with respect to these Chatuspathis as colleges, and enumerates eighty-three of them in Kashi, and over a hundred in Navadwip, Calcutta and its neighbourhood, omitting East Bengal and Mithila of which he seems to have had no knowledge. He has naturally described only their external features, it not having been possible for him to have any acquaintance with their internal affairs.

When in the middle ages, the pristine light of wisdom that had illuminated Kashi became dim, attempts were made, chiefly by two remarkable widowed queens, Ahalya Bai of Southern India, and Rani Bhabani of Bengal, to revive its lustre by founding new Chatuspathis. And, as a result, 360 teachers' houses, with lands sufficient for their upkeep, came to be endowed by each one of them, thus procuring for Kashi the services of so many excellent Pandits, whereby it was able to gain new life, besides a number of free dormitories for the pupils. The deeply learned successors of these pandits have, to this day, kept alive the spiritual inheritance of

*The Vivasa-Bharati, May 1936.

India. In what extreme poverty these devoted teachers live and work, very few have any idea; in such contrast is it with the flourishing temple priests—the Pandas and others—who fatten on the gifts of blind present-day religiosity, dragging down the devotees on whom they thrive to the depths of their own degradation.

Any how, even today there are any number of Chatuspathis in Kashi, situated in it several sections, each section being under or affiliated to a particular temple, as its antargriha. The old rule was that the Pandits belonging to the different antargrihas should meet together from time to time, in order to apportion the times and subjects of teaching between themselves, so as to bring about a co-ordination of their work; and the pupils were thus enabled to take up the subject in which they were interested by attending in turn the lessons given by different specialists; each period being indicated by the ringing of the bell of the temple concerned.

In spite of the poverty in externals, the heart-felt relations between the teachers and pupils, and the numerous festivals that punctuate the course of the year in Kashi, keep its academic life from becoming dry. True, subjects like formal logic and grammar have but little interest for others than the students proper, but lessons from the Puranas and other devotional shastras are also daily given in an appealing manner, suited to outsiders as well, so that the principles inculcated may be reverentially accepted and assimilated in their lives by a wider audience. A living connection is thus kept up, quite naturally, between the learned and the laity. It would be well worth our while, even in these modern days, to study the working of such indigenous educational institutions in Kashi and other places of pilgrimage. In Bengal the teacher's own dwelling house used to serve as a Chatuspathi, in which the students also lived during the period of their studies. The master was a father to his pupils, and his wife was as a mother. The peaceful life of the village that went on around them kept their minds and hearts full of human interest. Though teachers and pupils were alike poor in material resources, the store of love and wisdom in their little households was full to overflowing. So attached did the pupils become to what was for them a veritable alma mater, that when the time came for their return to the homes of their parents, they were moved to tears.

The master would sit at meals with his pupils as well as his own children, and his wife would make no difference in the helpings she served to them. The pupils would rather freely pester her with all kinds of affectionate importunities, like as petted children do in their own homes. If any newcomers hesitated to do likewise she would remark: "They still look on us as strangers!" As a consequence, the feeling of belonging to the master's own family, and the spiritual and intellectual lineage thus established endured through generations. Among the various touching stories of village life that have become traditional, these relations occupy a large place. It is a great pity that such stories are all but forgotten now-a-days.

I still remember the wife of such a teacher of Bikrampur, who came of a well-to-do family, and being unused to such strenuous housekeeping, at first felt put out by the goings on of her husband's pupils. When the Pandit's mother saw this, she admonished her thus: "Look here, my daughter, these children have left their own fathers and mothers to come to us. This is now their home. Let them look on themselves as children of the house, and bother you with their demands; it

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

619

will help them to forget that they are away from their own homes." This good lady herself, in her old age, told me this story of her youthful impatience by way of deploring her own shortcomings.

In Kashi there was a teacher named Keshava Shastri, a Maharashtra Pandit. He was a childless widower, and his sister, who kept house for him, was called Aunt by his pupils. He was a pandit of great renown, and presents of sweetmeats and other dainties used to be constantly coming in from all quarters, with which his larder was always full. If we ever neglected to do our part in looting these stores, our "Aunt" used to complain: "What are the children coming to these days?—and they can't make themselves at home. In the old days my pots never could be kept full so long!"

This was the kind of feeling that prevailed in all the teachers' households. After my return home from Kashi a report got abroad that I had died. When the news reached Kashi that this was not true, one of my old teachers wrote asking me to pay them a visit. And I can never forget the unaffected joy that my arrival occasioned—how all the old venerable teachers flocked round me, like fond mothers stroking my head and body, blessing and caressing me as a long lost son.

The love in the hearts of these worthy pandits was only equalled by the depth of their learning and their devotion to duty. Young Dhundaraj, son of the world-famous Gangadhar Shastri, was a great friend of all the pandits' pupils. The poor boy suddenly died after a short illness, without our knowing of it at the time. But our Pandit took his class as usual, though we noticed that he looked aged and worn. After lessons we went about calling for Dhundaraj, whereupon his father remarked: "He has gone where your voices will not reach him." The pandit said this so quietly that at first we could not understand. When at length his meaning dawned on us, one of us exclaimed: "But why, Sir, did you not stop our lesson?" "How could I, my son?" replied he. "So many of you have come from far-off places. I have no right to waste your time. My sorrow is my own affair. But this search for knowledge belongs to all of us, and it would be wrong of me to impede its progress." His simple steadfastness staggered us.

PANDIT NEHRU REPLIES TO BUSINESS MANIFESTO.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru in a special interview told the Bombay Chronicle representative:

I am afraid that owing to a very busy time in Bombay I have been unable to read fully the various statements that have appeared in the Press regarding my advocacy of Socialism. I should like to examine them in some detail, but I cannot do so at present during the few minutes at my disposal before I leave Bombay. I should like to make it clear, however, that I stand by every word of what I said in my Presidential Address at Lucknow. Criticisms of it are based largely on an astounding ignorance of Socialism and Communism. They are also based, so far as "Big Business" is concerned, in this city as elsewhere, on the instinctive desire of the big vested interests to prevent any change, however beneficial it might be for the country, if it affects them. The Irish Poet Yeats once said: "There is nothing so passionate as Vested Interest disguised as an intellectual conviction."

We have seen some of this passion and prejudice amongst big captains of industry in Bombay, though the understanding of the problems is singularly lacking. Some signatories of the Twenty-one explained Socialism to me in language which would have astonished any person who possessed a glimmering of economic knowledge. This manifesto itself shows where passion leads one to. They talk of religion being in danger. I did not know that the Twenty-one were the High Priests or the Arch Exponents of Religion in the city.

To talk in this way is to display to the world that they have no valid argument to advance. There is no question of religion when we discuss economic doctrines. Religion should have the fullest freedom provided it does not take the form of vested interest and does not exploit others under this guise. The bringing in of religion in this manifesto shows once again how the vested interests have exploited it to their advantage.

The second argument is an equally surprising one. We are told, that the personal safety of the Twenty-one is in danger. All the world knows that those whose personal safety is in danger in this country are the advocates of Independence and Socialism—not those who champion valiantly the cause of Vested Interest or British Imperialism.

Socialism and Communism, so far as ideals and objectives are concerned, are identical or almost so. The differences come in regard to the various methods of approach to the problem. Both accept the general philosophy of Marxism in regard to the interpretation of history and current events.

I accept the general philosophy, though I do not accept every Communist dogma in relation to it. I want to apply the philosophy in India, to understand what is happening here and to fit it in with the peculiar conditions and the historical outlook of the Indian people. I want to fit the methods to that outlook. I want to avoid violence. I should like to convert a great majority of Indian people by peaceful persuasion to this doctrine of Socialism.

The Manifesto objects not only to the doctrines, as it has every right to do, but also to the propagation of ideas in regard to it. That is a very serious matter, for it infringes the most elementary rights of Civil Liberty. The coming of Socialism will inevitably be a lengthy process and it will involve many factors including the education of people to that end. It cannot obviously come to India so long as the British Empire has possession of India. Therefore, our first problem is one of political freedom. After that the people of India will have to decide what form of economic and social organisation they desire in this country.

The Manifesto as well as Sir Chimanlal's statement refers to the intolerance of the Congress and I shall be happy to know in what this intolerance consists apart from our criticism of their policies and activities which we consider to have been eminently injurious to the national cause. They have every right to criticise us as aggressively as they like. We stand for freedom on both sides to spread our ideas and to criticise.

But when some people actually go to the length of giving their support to the Ordinances and otherwise side with British Imperialism, when vast numbers of their countrymen are fighting a life and death struggle, it is a matter of far graver import. If it is a question of intolerance, I should like to ask if the Manifesto shows tolerance when it talks of the suppression of certain views which it does not like and goes to the length of inviting the Government to suppress them. It comes to this that, in the final analysis, these gentlemen stand with British Imperialism and are opposed even to democratic freedom or Civil Liberty. Nothing could be

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

May 30

clearer and more explicit than Sir P. S. Sivaswamy Iyer's statement on this issue. He has told us that in his opinion there has not been any progressive suppression of Civil Liberties in India and, so far as he is concerned, he stands shoulder to shoulder, as apparently the Twenty-one do, with British Imperialism. The question thus is a much wider one than one of Socialism which is not an immediate issue.

It is one of our national political freedom itself. People may differ about methods, but if such differences mean the continuous support of British Imperialism in and out of season, inevitable inferences from this would have to be drawn.

How far I am justified as Congress President in 'airing' my views on Socialism is a matter for my Comrades of the Congress to consider; it is an impertinence for those who are outside the Congress and oppose it, to talk about it.

I take my orders from the Congress and from no other authority.

CIVIL LIBERTIES.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

You have done a distinct service to those that think about Pt. Jawaharlal's contemplated Civil Liberties Union, by quoting from the New Republic what exactly civil liberty means. The sponsor of this proposal, Panditji, has not defined it still, and naturally, as he is still feeling his way to forming it. But the air is thick with hasty suspicions about how he will be feeling, and it is no unexpected thing to see that the Liberals, one by one, are proclaiming their disbelief in a union with men of Panditji's belief or the Congress, in running the proposed Union. Some of them have gone as far actually as to blame the Congress for the very existence of a problem about Civil Liberties in India under the British rule of law.

Now I feel, Sir, it is the party axe that they are grinding when they say this. Because it amounts to saying that the Congress created troubles by resorting to civil disobedience. I know they believe so. But I think, it is irrelevant talk when a non-party union is proposed and the hand of Co-operation on that basis is proffered. I shall let alone the queer logic contained in that remark which, will ultimately go to justify that escape from a problem is the best solution thereof, as it raises no situations; our one business is to escape or ostrich-like hide one's face underground. My point is this: The Congress thought to take a particular line of action, for securing a purpose, however partially or in a special manner, which all of us love to serve. Naturally, those against the purpose retaliated. No one may say anything against it. One may even keep calm over it and over the Liberals saying that the Government had a right to do so, though it becomes quite a different matter to side with the Government. The question is not that. And it is here that our Liberal friends discreetly evade the issue.

The question is this: What are the laws or limitations of such relation? As we have international laws of civilised violent warfare, can there be similar laws of civil liberties or limitations to state retaliation of civil opposition? In other words, how far and in what manner can a state suppress a peaceful (i.e., which is not aimed at the person of anybody, which is not hate, which bases its claim on justice, equity and a sense of common weal) opposition even against itself, from its own people for whose service it stands? Or taking it out from that special limitation and generalizing it, what are the minimum essentials of civil liberties a citizen is entitled to have in a modern state? And I think, if at all a non-party C. L. Union is possible, it can be so only on this line of thought.

And why should the Liberals themselves not take up its formation, if they like it? It seems they fight shy of the very Congress. It is as if the inferiority complex that they are labouring under in Indian politics is taking away the very best of them. Why do they allow themselves to be put in a wrong box? Why should they not come forth with their own view of such a union and frankly state their own apprehensions as also be prepared to hear them from other quarters, told by Congressmen? Is not a rapprochement on these lines worth attempting? The other day there was a talk of united action for the Congress and the Liberals. Is this not an attempt on however mild a scale, in that direction? The Liberal bug-bears of Khadi, etc., are not here. Under such circumstances, the Liberals' 'no' to join the attempt for the establishment of a Union, is tantamount to showing that their talk of joint action was mere make-believe. Anyway, they are putting themselves in the wrong before the thinking public.

One more thing and I have done. The New Republic quotation has in view only the liberty against the encroachment of the state. And generally it is right. But we have the misfortune of seeing in India the encroachment from sections of the people themselves on the Civil Liberties of some other sections. The Harijan problem is a notable instance in point. Here the Government even sneaks away—at least it looks so—under the cover of the so-called religious neutrality. Here, I think, Pt. Jawaharlal also shirks the question by his socialist aversion for whatever comes under a religious head. A direct question is possible to arise, What will the C. L. Union do regarding this? So often we hear tales of Sawarna tyranny against our Harijan citizens, let alone many that do not reach the public ear. Why should not that be one of the chief spheres of the proposed Union's watchful vigilance? Pt. Jawaharlal would have been more right if he had said that the Harijan problem was a problem of Civil Liberties, rather than as he wrongly did in his presidential address at Lucknow, that it was a problem in landless proletarianism, which it is not, being not exclusive to Harijans. It was rather an a priori deduction of the Pandit, not true to facts, from his socialist inclinations against religion.

I think, Sir, that in proposing to form the C. L. Union, Panditji has made a helpful move in our present conditions. But that will be so, only if an attempt at meeting half way, on the lines similar to those discussed above is really made by all classes, communities, and not merely political parties. But it seems the Liberals as a body are feeling shy at that, and negative replies to Panditji are almost daily to be found in the daily press. Can you not help by clearing the issues still more?

Yours etc.,
M. P.

Apropos of this letter, we may mention that one of the speakers at the informal conference convened by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru a few days ago in Bombay, urged that instead of starting a separate body to deal with Civil Liberties the Congress itself should give more prominence to the maintenance of Civil Liberties in its programme. It is almost an axiom that civil liberties flourish best where the stability of Government is most assured. Those who work for the maintenance of Civil Liberties are directly concerned to maintain the stability of the Government. Civil Disobedience does nothing to ensure the stability of the State. Congress, if it had to deal with both subjects, will have to decide how far at a given moment the claims of Civil Liberties should be subordinated to those of Civil Disobedience. If two must ride a horse, one must ride behind. Social disabilities are in a different category, and acquire a different technique.—Ed. I.S.R.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933 1
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

621

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

WANTED candidates for Telegraph and Station Master Class. Allowance Rs. 28/-. Uniform, quarter and passage free. Service essential. Rules and Entrance form on annas eight.

Director, Royal Telegraph and Rly. Duties College, Bombay No. 14.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karian, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadvanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MNL Agent, Ahmedabad.)
Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co., Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhailel Dalibhai Amin, B.A., M. S. G. I., (Managing Agent, Alambic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Maratli (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Krishnarai Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,
Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

622

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[May 30

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

Branches :—
BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed	Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up	" 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund	" 1,04,00,000

London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to :—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES.

Baramati (District Poona).	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad).
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulia (District West Khandesh).
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nasik).
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panhala).
Palghar (" ")	Kaloi (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhows D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
B. G. Saraya, Esq.,	F. B. Lakshmeshwar, Esq.,
G. F. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	G. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur E. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL :—

(Fully Paid) — — — Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to :—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 |
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

623

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

624

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

May 30

realpatidar.com

A flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JUNE 6, 1936. No. 40

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Community or Class.
Depressed Classes and Conversion.
Babu Bhagwandas on his Inter-Caste Marriage Bill.
Abandoned Wives.
A Cabinet Minister's Fall.
Congress President's Position.
Hiv'sal's Conversion.
Islam and Ahmadiism.
India, a Buddhist Nation.

The Hindu Inter-Caste Marriages Validity Bill.
The Privy Council on Inter-Caste Marriages.
Property Rights of Hindu Women.
Cochin Thiya's Decision.
Sarnath Frescoes.
Muslims and Reforms.
A Lesson from the Bull.
The Vithalbhai Patel Trust.

NOTES

Community or Class:—Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru has been obliged, to avoid physical collapse, to cancel several engagements in the Punjab and to return to his home at Allahabad. He had enthusiastic receptions everywhere and thousands of people gathered from the countryside to get a sight of him and to hear him. At all the meetings which he addressed, he delivered his message of Socialism as the true remedy for the country's ailments. Among other things, he told them that communalism will be ended by adopting Socialism which would give an economic motive for their quarrels in place of a religious one. The caste war is to be ended by starting a class war. The Pandit is not the first or only leader of note to suggest this. Is class war less bitter or less detrimental to the peace of the country than communal conflicts? On the contrary, experience shows that class war is always one of extermination whereas communal conflict is never sustained, it is always sporadic, and often subsides as rapidly as it breaks out. All religions enjoin good relations with neighbours; and outbursts of fanaticisms represent a temporary aberration from right conduct inculcated by every Prophet. The fanatic knows this and he is always ashamed to think of his madness when he has time for reflection. The antagonists in a class war, on the other hand, are implacable. They regard classes other than their own as robbers who stand in their way of living in ease and comfort. Nothing short of the extinction of all classes except one can end a class war. To embark on a class war as a means of avoiding communal conflicts, is to fly from the frying pan into the fire. In one of the last speeches which Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru made in the Punjab, he felt obliged to warn his admirers not to think of imitating the methods of the Soviet leaders in introducing Socialism. They should devise their own methods in conformity with Indian conditions. This is a counsel of perfection. Having placed before them the example of Soviet Russia as one worthy of their acceptance, the Pandit will have considerable difficulty in preventing them from regarding its methods also in the same light. That the end justifies the means is not the peculiar creed of Jesuits, if it is theirs at all. The Soviet leaders never intended all that they found themselves obliged to do. They never intended to massacre the Tsar and his family in cold blood in an underground room in a two-storied house in Ekaterinberg. In fact, the deed was done in defiance of the orders of Moscow by the local Soviet. The worst about Revolution is that the situation rapidly passes out of the control of the leaders. The mob takes control, but it cannot keep it and hands it over to a Dictator who inevitably appears on the scene. The Reformer—Reformist, if you please—is always careful to keep his advocacy within the bounds of reason. He never appeals to passions and prejudices. He recognises the good that there is in the old and seeks only to change where change is absolutely needed in order to preserve it and to remove obstacle to progress. The Pandit, we are sure, will in course of time come to recognise that Reform is always superior to Revolution, though less spectacular. Reform is to Revolution as light to lightning.

Depressed Classes and Conversion:—At a Conference held in Bombay early this week, of Mahars, one of the depressed Hindu castes, Dr. Ambedkar explained that he intended to take the sense of each of the castes in this category before arranging the preliminaries of conversion. To call them all together would frustrate his purpose as antyaja castes do not readily fraternise with each other. They being poor and uneducated, he said, had to acquire strength by allying themselves with some stronger community which was in a position to help them. "They must become kith and kin with some community so that the resources of that community may be available in the struggle." This, in Dr. Ambedkar's opinion, was simply another name for conversion. Nothing can be clearer and proselytising creeds need be at no loss as to how to draw the Ambedkar groups to their folds. Dr. Ambedkar further said that these castes were forced to live in Hinduism and that they never voluntarily did so. This would seem to be irreconcilable with the strenuous claim of the Nasik castes to draw the temple car! Dr. Ambedkar further said that he had no belief in the reformers as they did not fight the Hindu castes "in the same way as the Northerners

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

626

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

1 June 6

realpatidar.com

with the Southerners for the emancipation of the Negroes in U. S. A." We are astonished that Dr. Ambedkar should entertain this mistaken opinion. The North fought the South to prevent it from seceding from the Union. President Lincoln was quite explicit on the point. He wrote to Greeley: "My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and it is not either to save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some of the slaves and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I would do about slavery and the coloured race, I do because I believe it will help to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it will help to save the Union." There is no analogy between Negro slavery and the position of the depressed classes. But, as Dr. Ambedkar has referred to the American struggle, we may tell him that the object of the Hindu reformer who works to free Hindu society of untouchability, is exactly that of Lincoln in regard to the Union. It is to save Hindu society from disintegration. Dr. Ambedkar is naturally concerned with his own grievances. But the Hindu reformer is concerned with them because their continuance is fraught with danger to the integrity of Hindu society. Dr. Ambedkar said that he did not believe in those caste Hindus who wished to live in and marry and die in caste. Whether Dr. Ambedkar believes in them or not, is his own affair. What they do, they do, not to please him but in the discharge of what they conceive to be their imperative duty. The Conference, after hearing Dr. Ambedkar, resolved that it would, as a preliminary step, give up worshipping Hindu deities, observance of Hindu festivals and visiting Hindu holy places. The festivals and deities and holy places are not the essence of Hinduism. The distinctive teaching of Hinduism is the identity of the Universal with the Individual Atman, in the progressive realisation of which in national and social life lies the salvation of the human race.

Babu Bhagwandas on his Inter-Caste Marriage Bill:—We publish in this issue a summary of three articles which Babu Bhagwandas has written for the Leader of Allahabad in order to enlist the support of the Hindu community for his Inter-Caste Marriage Bill which was introduced in the Legislative Assembly and is being circulated for opinion. The learned sponsor of the Bill, which is a word for word reproduction of one introduced by the late Mr. Vithalbhai Patel some years ago, begins by showing that Hindu social customs were not intended, like the laws of Medes and Persians, to be unchangeable for all time and under all circumstances; that they were expressly declared to be variable from time to time to suit changing conditions; and that his Bill, therefore, does not infringe the ancient precepts. We do not think that there will be any difference of opinion on this aspect of the proposed legislation. Babu Bhagwandas next deals with the restrictions of marriage to individuals of the same caste and sub-caste. The present position is that marriages between members of sub-castes of the same main caste, are recognised by the courts all over the country as valid. The judgment of the Privy Council in a recent case which we reprint elsewhere from the Pioneer, is explicit on the point. As regards the main castes themselves, the Bombay and Madras High Courts have held that marriages between men of higher castes with women of lower castes, are valid in law. There has been no reference of the point to the Privy Council, and the longer this is postponed the less will be the possibility of the decisions being over-ruled as every marriage which is celebrated under their protection will be annulled by a contrary decision of the Privy Council, in which case the Legislature will be forced to pass a validating Act with retrospective effect. Babu Bhagwandas's Bill, therefore, concerns practically pratiloma marriages, that is, marriages of lower caste men with women of a higher caste. Such marriages may be performed now under Gour's Civil Marriage Act. This Act makes partition of a joint family a necessary incident of marriages contracted under it. But this is no hardship to a couple who marry out of their castes as they can not, in the ordinary course, wish or expect to continue to be members of their respective joint families. Babu Bhagwandas's Bill enables such couples to insist on remaining in their families. But the main objection to the Bill is that it is not monogamous and that if it becomes law a Hindu will be entitled to have four wives each of a different caste, which is repugnant to the spirit of the time. Babu Bhagwandas has not met this point in the three articles.

Abandoned Wives:—The Privy Council judgment, referred to in another note, is also important for the fact that it records and sanctions the existence of a custom, among a certain sect of Vaisyas of the United Provinces, permitting a wife abandoned by her husband to marry another man, presumably of the same caste, in the first husband's life time. The problem of the abandoned Hindu wife is a very serious one. The Vaisyas of the United Provinces have solved it by instituting a custom permitting their remarriage. It is difficult to establish a new custom which would be recognised by Courts nowadays and legislation is the only remedy. But the custom noted by the Privy Council shows that, even among twice-born castes, the written law has been varied in vital particulars, by consent of the members, to allow a certain latitude in matters strictly prohibited by the shastras.

A Cabinet Minister's Fall:—So far as we can recall there is no precedent to the finding of the Judicial Tribunal, appointed to investigate the leakage of British Budget proposals, that Mr. J. H. Thomas, Secretary of State for the Colonies was responsible for the lapse. The

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

627

Tribunal finds no shred of evidence to suggest that any member connected with the Civil Service was ever in communication with any of those who effected the insurances against increases in taxation, and no leakage from that source was even suggested. All the Cabinet Members are likewise exonerated, except Mr. Thomas. Referring to the visit of a racing tipster to the Colonial Secretary at his office on the morning of Budget day, the Tribunal observes: "Mr. Thomas had told the court that only some mention of a Derby winner was made. According to Sir Alfred he gave Mr. Thomas 'Quashed' as a tip for that day's racing, and Mr. Thomas was a heavy winner by backing 'Quashed' that day. It seems improbable in the circumstances that he should have forgotten the whole incident." This is as much as to say that a Cabinet Minister told a lie and, since witnesses before the Tribunal were sworn to tell the truth, that he perjured himself. Mr. Leslie Thomas who resented his father's question "What have you done?" when the latter met him, when the matter began to be talked about, is completely exonerated by the Tribunal. Mr. Thomas when he heard of the verdict said that it was a cruel one and that his conscience was clear. It may well be that he did not tell anybody in so many words what the Budget proposals were, but he ought to have known that gamblers on the race course and elsewhere are not the most suitable associates for a Cabinet Minister at any time. It is strange that the salary of five thousand pounds which he earned as Secretary of State should not have seemed sufficient to this Socialist leader who began life at a very humble level!

Congress President's Position:—Replying to the question why a woman did not find a place in the President's Cabinet, Pandit Jawaharlal is reported to have said at a Women's Meeting in Bombay that the position at Patna was such that another man would have resigned the job but that he resolved to do his best. He has accordingly been carrying on his propaganda for Socialism regardless of his colleagues. The Searchlight of Patna grumbled in an editorial that Congress work is at a standstill while Socialism was being preached. Babu Rajendra Prasad a day or two later regretted that the greatest need of the hour, unity, was being endangered seriously by Socialistic propaganda. "We have," he said, "many difficulties and problems which baffle solution. The country has not yet found out a solution for the Hindu-Muslim problem, in spite of our greatest efforts. Is it practical politics to say that all our communal, inter-communal and inter-provincial differences will vanish in no time, if we can concentrate our attention on the economic problems and solve it along the Socialist lines?" Babu Rajendra Prasad observed that there might come a time when the poor and oppressed people of one community might make common cause with their comrades of the other communities against their common enemy but he felt that such a future was still far off. This was said on the 31st May at Chapra in Behar. In a statement issued to the Press on the 2nd June at Lahore, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru referred to the Communal Award as undemocratic and anti-national and added: "The only way is to divert the attention of the masses to the national and economic problems which affect them much more and thus enable them to see the communal question in its true perspective." The President has an observant eye and we are surprised that the fact which stares every one in the Punjab in the face, should have escaped his notice. The economic problem has not diverted attention from the communal problem but has associated itself with it and the two together have solidified into an amalgam of extraordinary tenacity. A pain in the region of the heart is not cured by a good meal. The man loses his appetite and puts aside your best dishes. While we are afraid that the problem of the poor is not so far off as Babu Rajendra Prasad thinks and while we also think that a patched up unity is worse than open disunity, we do not think that Pandit Jawaharlal can, by calling the attention of the masses to their poverty, wean them from their communal obsessions. Mr. Satyamurthi in Madras has been carrying on open war against Socialism, lock, stock and barrel. Other Congress leaders are known to be equally opposed to the Pandit's programme. His position as President of the Congress bears some resemblance to that of Lord Rosebery as Prime Minister. Lord Rosebery resigned in disgust and the Pandit may have to do the same.

Hiralal's Conversion:—But for his being the son of his illustrious father, the going over to Islam of Mr. Hiralal Gandhi is of little public interest. Mr. Hiralal, now Abdulla, has been offered a seat in the United Provinces Legislative Council by a zealous Muslim member who is prepared to resign his seat in favour of the new Muslim. That Mr. Abdulla has no domicile in Upper India and is not probably qualified to be a voter or a candidate for the Agra constituency, are details which do not detract from the significance of the gesture. Another enthusiast—an Association of some kind—has invited Gandhiji to follow Hiralal's example. In a statement to the Press Gandhiji says that this has hurt him. It has hurt many others besides, not because there is anything wrong in it, but because of its lack of decency, amounting almost to malignity.

Islam and Ahmadism:—We are requested to state that Sir Mahomed Iqbal's pamphlet on "Iqbal and Ahmadism, with a reply to questions raised by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru" may be had by sending an one anna stamp for postage from the office of the Anjuman-i-Khuddam-ud-din, Sherwanala Gate, Lahore. The essay was noticed in the Reformer of 1st February.

Mistake in Serial Number:—The last issue of the Reformer was by mistake numbered 9 of the XLVIth volume. It is number 39. Those who file the paper should note this correction.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

628

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 6]

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, June 6, 1936.

INDIA, A BUDDHIST NATION.

Mr. Yonezawa, Consul General in India for Japan, in unveiling the frescoes painted by the Japanese artist, Kosetsu Nasu, in the Mulagandh Vihara, the great Buddhist shrine at Sarnath, near Benares, which stands on the site where Gautama Buddha preached his first sermon, referred to Japan and India as the two great Buddhist nations of the world. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya who presided, endorsed the Consul General's phrase, pointing out that Buddha was regarded as one of the Avatars in Hinduism. Hinduism and Buddhism, he added, were common as they were two branches of the Aryan religion. In his scholarly introduction to his English translation of the Bhagavad Gita, Kashinath Trimbak Telang, drew a parallel between the relation in which Hinduism of the Gita stood to Buddhism and that in which the Brahmoism of Raja Ram Mohun Roy stood to the Brahmoism of Keshab Chandra Sen. "Suppose," he said "our ancestors to have been attached to the ceremonial law of the Vedas, as we are attached to a lifeless ritualism, the Upanishads and Gita might be, in a way, comparable to movements like that of the late Raja Ram Mohan Roy. Standing, as far as possible on the antique ways, they attempt, as Raja Ram Mohan attempted in these latter days, to bring into prominence and to elaborate the higher and nobler aspects of the old beliefs. Buddhism would be comparable to the further departure from old traditions which was led by Babu Keshab Chander Sen. The points of dissent in the olden times were pretty nearly the same as the points of dissent now. The ultimate motive power also was in both cases identical—a sense of dissatisfaction in its integrity with what had come down from old times encrusted with the corruption of years. In this view, the old system, the philosophy of the Upanishads and the Gita, and the philosophy of Buddha, constitute a regular intelligible progression." The parallel may be pursued further. The Buddhism which spread to China and Japan was the Mahayana Buddhism which was itself a protest against the earlier Hinayana and its rather neutral not to say negative ideology. The Mahayana conception of the Bodhisattva is not very different from the Gita ideal of the devotee of the Unmanifest, who is intent on the good of all beings. Mahayana Buddhism is analogous to the Vedanta of Swami Vivekananda with its stress on social service as the indispensable concomitant of religion. Vivekananda drew his inspiration from the Brahmo Samaj under Kesab Chander Sen but his Vedanta was also a reaction against Keshab's eclecticism. Just as Mahayana spread to several countries so the Vedanta of the Ramakrishna-Vivekananda school has spread all over the world as the recent celebrations of the Ramakrishna centenary witness.

Comparing Buddhism with the Gita religion, Telang observed: "The main points on which Buddha's protest against Brahmanism rests, seem to be the true authority of the Vedas and the true view of caste. On most points of doctrinal speculation Buddhism is still but one aspect of the older Brahminism. The various coincidences to which we have drawn attention show that, if there is need to show it. Well now, on both these points, the Gita, while it does not go the whole length which Buddha goes, itself embodies a protest against the views current about the time of its composition. The Gita, does not, like Buddhism, absolutely reject the Vedas, but it shelves them. The Gita does not totally root out caste. It places caste on a less untenable basis." As regards the Vedas, there has been practically no difference between the effects of their total rejection by Buddha and their rather supercilious shelving by the Gita. The Vedas ceased to be the foundation of Hinduism, and the Gita with the Upanishads and the Brahma Sutras took their place. As for caste, Buddhism did not quite reject it as Telang, in conformity with popular opinion, holds. Dr. Edward Thomas is more correct when he says: "The fact of caste was not denied. The Buddhists even formed a rival theory of its origin and placed the warrior caste, to which Buddha belonged, above the Brahmanical. It was only within the Order that the individual lost his 'name and clan.'" The Dhammapada concedes the superiority of the Brahmin but not on the ground of birth but on that of conduct and behaviour which the Gita also makes the criterion of caste. The Gita like Buddhism holds up Nirvana as the supreme goal though it prefers to call it Brahma Nirvana. The parallel goes deeper. The central teaching of the Gita is that each one should elevate his self by meditation on the Supreme Self which abides in him. If he is unable to do this outright, the Gita recommends four steps by which he could discipline himself to the requisite pitch. If he is not able even to adopt them, as a last resource he is advised to dedicate all his actions to Sri Krishna and he is assured that peace of mind will immediately follow. This is the germ of the doctrine of salvation by bhakti or faith which we should least expect to meet in the teachings of Buddha. But it is there. The Dhammapada in language almost identical with that of the Gita exhorts the Bhikkhu: "Rouse thyself by thy Self, examine thyself by thy Self.....Self is the Lord of self. Self is the goal of self." But Bhikkus whose spiritual pinions are not ample enough to sustain them in the rarefied regions of the highest philosophy, are offered the same last resource as that offered by Sri Krishna: "Those who have faith and love towards me are all destined to heaven." The method of the Gita is the method of

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

629

suggestion: that of the Buddha is also largely the same but, unlike the Gita, which was left without any agency for implementing it, Buddhism had a great organisation and the help of the State to aid its propagation. Turning from doctrines to practice, the Hindu revival which followed Buddhism, was in large part based on Buddhist teaching. Buddhism was not driven out of India. It has remained in the country of its birth under the parental roof, and with the parental name. The Consul-General was, therefore, right in naming India a Buddhist country. She is that in relation to Japan and other Buddhist countries. Nothing better can happen than that the ancient cultural solidarity of India, China and Japan should be revived. San Goku, the ancient collective name for the three countries, united by their reverence for the Sakyamuni, will be the strongest agency for promoting peace and goodwill among the nations of the earth.

THE HINDU INTER-CASTE MARRIAGE VALIDITY BILL.

BABU BHAGAVAN DAS.

The Hindu community is aware that a Bill to validate Inter-caste marriages was introduced in the Legislative Assembly in September 1935, and in April, 1936, was directed by the Assembly to be circulated for the eliciting of opinion thereon by the 15th July, 1936. The text of the Bill has been already repeatedly published in the papers, but is reproduced below again for ready reference.

'Whereas it is expedient to validate marriages between Hindus of different castes for the purpose hereinafter appearing, it is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. This Act may be called the Hindu Marriage Validity Act.

2. No marriage among Hindus shall be invalid by reason that the parties thereto do not belong to the same caste, any custom or any interpretation of Hindu law to the contrary notwithstanding.'

This is, word for word, the Bill which was introduced by the late Shri. V. J. Patel in 1918, but never came to the vote.

The principle of living legislation, elasticity, adaptability, change, accommodation, reconciliation, compromise, synthesis is amply recognized and given full operation in Hindu Dharma-Shastra. The oldest living law-book of the human world, the Institutes of Manu, expressly declares that Dharmas i. e., laws, change with the Ages of the Human Race.

The Sanskrit Scriptures say, 'Laws and customs have to change with times, places and circumstances. There is no course of human action which benefits all equally and produces only good results. Therefore, when the evil consequences of any particular law begin to preponderate over its good results, then it has to be changed for another law. This new law, in turn, begins to fail, similarly, with the lapse of time and change of conditions, and has to be changed again. Hence we see that there is no uniformity, no finality, no permanent fixity, in law anywhere, but a great variety of changing customs and practices.'

But the Indian customs also, though they were originally based on scientific principles of right social organization, have gradually resulted, through excessive emphasis on some aspects and ignoring of others, in the current caste-system. The excessive rigidities of this system are the main cause of the obvious decay of Hinduism and of the Hindu portion of the Indian people and, therefore, indirectly, of the other portions also, for, as conditions are today, all must fall or rise together. This opinion may be contested by one who sees only the surface-fact that some other communities are increasing greatly in numbers. It will not be contested by one who realises that they are not prospering any more in general welfare, but are becoming more dependent on artificial patronage instead.

These rigidities are utterly frustrating the very purpose for which the so-called caste-system, which should properly be called 'the vocational class system', was instituted by the elders of the race in the far past. That purpose was to promote the formation of a close-knit society, with mutually subservient parts, a true Social Organism, like a living individual body, with head, arms, trunk and legs. But instead of this, we see, today, divisions and dissensions, jealousies, even bitter hatreds between the components. From a cohesive, centripetal force, the caste-system has become changed into a disruptive and centrifugal one. Instead of reconciling all, it antagonises everyone.

To make the nature and purpose of this Bill clear, it is necessary to say a few words about the real nature and purpose of what is now known as the 'caste-system'. Then it will appear that the current rigidity of caste or sub-caste endogamy is not justified by that system at all. In its origin it was a complete Scheme of Social Organisation which consisted of four interlinked organisations, viz., an educational organisation consisting of the learned or Brahmana class and the student or Brahmachari order; a defensive organization consisting of the chivalrous or Kshatriya class and, generally speaking, the Vanaprastha or 'suburban' order; an economic organization consisting of the commercial or Vaishya class and the Grihastha or householder order; and an Industrial or Labour organization consisting of the Shudra or workman class as physical servant and the Sanyasi or anchorite order as spiritual servant. This fourfold social organization was based on a few fundamental, wide reaching, principles of many sciences, biological, psychological, economic, sociological, educational, dietetic and sexological, hygienic and eugenic. It was devised by the elders of the Aryan Race in far past times, as a great broad mould into which could be poured and thereby Aryanised, i. e., civilized, more or less, all the multitudinous tribes, not only of India, but of all the Human Race everywhere, which might happen to come within its sphere of influence, with all their innumerable occupations, hobbies, pursuits, creeds, local customs taboos, etc.

Desha-dharman, Jati-dharman, kula-dharmanshcha-shashvatan, pashanda-gana-dharmansh-cha, shastresminn-uktavan Manuh (Manu).

Such was the original Varna-Ashrama Dharma or Varna Ashrama Vyavastha. Into it were unceasingly absorbed, and thereby organized and civilized, the hundreds of tribes of India, in past ages. It could, and did in the earlier centuries of the history of India include, absorb, assimilate, persons of any race, nation, country, creed, without disturbing their creed or nationality or mother-tongue. Even today, as a patent fact, we have Punjabi, Marwari, Awadhi, Madhyadeshi, Bengali, Madras, Maratha, Gujrati and Balinese (in the Bali Island) Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas, Shudras; and each of these groups includes persons who belong to the Vaishnava or the Shakta or the Shaiva or any one of scores of other faiths and sects, and speaking all sorts of languages.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

630
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 6

In the fundamental principles of the original system, there is to be found no reason against, and every reason for, classifying each of the many peoples of the earth, Chinese, Japanese, Irani, Arabian, French, German, British, and whether Christian or Muslim or Jew or other, into the same four vocational groups or professions. And in fact, every civilized people actually does possess these four main broad castes or classes or professions, though they are not so deliberately recognized and so systematically organized, with careful partitioning of functions and remunerations, as seems to have been done in ancient India.

Even the Russian Soviet has instinctively named itself the Peasants', Soldiers', and Workers' i. e., Intellectual Workers' and Manual Workers' Soviet Republic. Even in Britain the four estates of the realm are the Clergy, the Nobility, the Commons, the Labourites. Even the Quran speaks of the men of Ilm, the men of Amr, and the Zurra, with the fourth type of Masdur understood.

It has been remarked by outside observers that it is impossible to say what exactly Hinduism is. Indeed, there is not one single belief, and not one single practice or sacrament, which can be said to be the invariable, distinctive, differentiating characteristic of Hinduism and the Hindu. No doubt, Hinduism includes the Essentials of Universal Religion in common with all the other great religions of man; but, beside these, almost every one of all the customs and practices, the beliefs and philosophies, lowest to highest, crudest to most refined, that can be found in any part of the world, will be found prevailing in some section or another of the Hindus. Christianity has hundreds of sects, but the belief in Christ is indispensable to all. Islam has scores of sects, but the belief in Muhammad is necessary for all. For the Hindu, belief in no one such person and no one form or name of Deity is so absolutely necessary. But the recognition, conscious or unconscious, implicit or explicit, vague or clear, of being included, however lightly or loosely, within the pale of the Varn-Ashrama Scheme of Social Organization may be regarded, if anything can be, as the characteristic of the Hindu. Indeed the word Hinju is not to be found in the old books at all. The Dharmashastra words are Manushya, Manava, Nara, which all mean simply 'man'.

Such a view of the caste-system reconciles and illuminates all the five or six views, tribal, religious, occupational, etc., which have been propounded so far, as to the origin of the system, and gives to it a great scientific and practical value, by distinguishing between psychological, vocational varnas and biological jatis, and by grouping individuals, whatever their jati, into varnas, according to their vocational temperament and actual occupation.

After this brief sketch of the nature, the purpose, and the fundamental principles of the so-called caste-system, I hope that what more I have to say, with regard to this Bill, may not be so obscure as it may otherwise have been.

THE PARTITIONING OF THE MEANS OF LIVELIHOOD.

The partitioning of the means of livelihood, deserves special notice. As every individual was assigned to one or another of the four great guilds of Educators, Protectors, Tradesmen, Workmen, so every individual was expected to earn his living by only those means of livelihood which were assigned to his class; he was not allowed to make money by the ways and means set apart for any other class. Equitable distribution of wealth was secured in this way, as well as scope for play of individual tastes, by the old Social Organization. In all other respects also, under the constant guidance of the few vital fundamental principles stated before, it made the best possible reconciliation between the egoistic and the altruistic tendencies of the human-being, the wisest compromises between the rival claims of individualism and socialism, the most practical solutions of all the problems that perennially, indeed, perpetually, beset Humanity.

Further exposition of this large subject is not possible here. But this, all too insufficient outline of it was unavoidable. It is the neglect of the fundamental principles underlying Varna-Vyavastha, the distortion and misinterpretation of them, the excessive exaggeration of parts, the grabbing of all rights and shirking of all duties by the strong and the cunning, which has brought about the degeneration of the vocational class-system into the current caricature of it, and, among many other evils, has given rise to those difficulties regarding marriage, which force us to feel the necessity for new legislation, in the form of this Bill.

The Bill is a purely premissive measure, based on the sound and simple maxim, "Live and let live." If passed into law, it will stop the internal corruptive and disruptive decay that has set in, in the Hindu community. It will soften that spirit of hard internal and external exclusiveness which is the most prominent and most dangerous disease-symptom of that community, today. It will promote friendly relations with sister-communities also, by softening the whole spirit of Hinduism. It will make unnecessary, and thereby prevent a not inconsiderable amount of hypocrisy and fraud in marriage negotiations, and kidnapping and sale of marriageable girls and women which, as is well-known, is being practised in several parts of the country, for the purpose of supplying wives to various sub-castes which are short of women for various reasons. One of these reasons has been, in the recent past, the well-known infanticide of girl babies, among some sub-castes. This infanticide has diminished, apparently; but, from the nature of the crime and the ease with which it may be committed without detection, it is by no means possible to say that it has been extinguished. The present Bill will indirectly help to make such crime unnecessary also. It will help to shift marriage-conventions from the basis, on which they now stand, of superstition, which is belief without reason (dharm-abhasa mithya-dharma, murha-graba, in this case, belief in the potency of the mere hereditary caste-name), to the basis of science, which is belief with reason (veda-dharma, in this case, psychophysical eugenic science). Hetubhir dharmam-anvichchen na lokam virasam charet. (Mbh) Yas tarken anusandhatte sa dharmam veda netarah (Manu).

It will compel no one to contract a marriage outside his caste or sub-caste, but it will save any one who may make such a marriage from being hounded out of caste publicly. It will bind no one against his or her will to enter into or keep up any social relations with any one who has contracted such a marriage, but it will prevent any one, on pain of being held guilty of defamation, from making any public proclamation that such a person has lost caste and is not worthy to be associated with because he or she has contracted such a marriage.

Some other important advantages that would accrue, are, (a) that the method of co-education, which is growing steadily in the country under the pressure of the new conditions, would lead to many happy marriages instead of acts of error and shame, and soiling of mind and body, and, now and then, lifelong nervous disorders; (b) that the suicides of girls, and other evils, now often caused by the growing practice of demanding very

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

631

large cash-dowries—a practice born of economic distress, on the one hand, and, on the other, of the mammonist spirit fostered by the new civilization—such evils would also be checked by the growth of free choice of each other by educated youth and maid, without irrational limitation to the same caste-name.

Finally, I am profoundly convinced, far from infringing any essential principle of Dharma and any fundamental commandments of Dharma Shastra, it will help greatly to restore to what is now called "Hindu Society," but should be called "Manava Samaj" or "Human Society," those most valuable principles of social life and organization, which that society has gradually forgotten and lost in the course of the centuries.

For those who attach great value to the word of the Dharma Shastra and so do I most reverently, provided the writing be genuinely ancient, belonging to the times when the Indians were a self-governing people, and provided its word be rightly interpreted in accordance with the rules of that Science of Exegesis which is an essential part of the Dharma Shastra—for such persons, sufficient support can be found even in those scriptures, especially the Puranas, for such intercaste marriages. For those who rely more on reason and common sense, scarcely any argument is needed.

It should be noted particularly that the Bill does not force any person to enter into such a marriage. It only preserves intact to those who may enter into it, all their former social status and religious and legal rights and duties as Hindus, saves them from being more or less completely cut off from such of their kith and kin as may be desirous of keeping up social relations with them, and retains for the community their services, which may, in some cases, be very valuable.

It should also be borne in mind that, in any case, there would not be many such marriages. In far the large majority of cases persons and families would continue to seek alliances within their respective familiar and accustomed groups. The intercaste marriages, to be validated by this Bill, would only be, comparatively, the exceptions which prove the rule—but very useful and desirable exceptions they would be.

In bringing forward this Bill, I am, indeed, not suggesting any new-fangled innovation, but am proposing what I sincerely believe to have been the custom and practice in the ancient, happier, more lifeful, and more vigorous, days of the Indian people, before the seventh century A. C.

Such return to the old is natural. It is what may be observed in every department of Nature, including Human Nature. The new ways, in which God fulfils Himself, are usually only the yet older ways, to which He returns on a higher level, in spiral cycles. There are two sides, and only two sides, to every question; and humanity is always swinging from the extreme of one to the extreme of the other, and back again, over and over, in such spirals. The new name in vogue, for this very old Duality is Ambivalence. 'Nature knows no mean', especially human nature, unfortunately. It is always returning from one excess to the opposite excess.

In our self-complacence, some of us may imagine that we are inventing and evolving something entirely original, are striking out quite new paths, doing what has never been done before. Others of us, in our too great conservatism, based also on a similar short view of history, cry out loudly against what they also regard as an innovation. Yet history shows that new generations, and new nations and races, mostly repeat the stages that have been gone through by the older, or the far older, with variations of outer form and language, no doubt, but with very much the same ambi-valent ideas, feelings, incentives, necessities, underneath.

THE PRIVY COUNCIL ON INTER-CASTE MARRIAGES.

An appeal from the decision of the Allahabad High Court before their Lordships of the Privy Council raised important questions relating to the law of marriage governing the Hindu community. The Bench which heard the appeal consisted of their Lordships Lord Blanesburgh, Sir Shadi Lal and Sir George Rankin. The judgment was delivered on April 28. The appellant was Gopi Krishna Kasudhan, and the respondent (who was unrepresented in the Privy Council) was Mst. Jaggo and another.

In the course of their judgment their Lordships of the Privy Council said that the appeal arose out of a dispute relating to the estate of Nikku Lal, a Vaish of Gorakhpur, who was governed by the Mitakshara Law of Hindus. Gopi Krishna the appellant, was admittedly the legitimate son of Nikku Lal and his right to a moiety of the estate was no longer in dispute. He, however, claimed that entire estate on the ground that the defendant Sri Krishna was not the legitimate son of Nikku Lal and therefore had no interest in the property left by Nikku Lal. It was not disputed that Sri Krishna was born of Jaggo. But the question was whether the woman was the lawfully wedded wife of Nikku Lal at that time.

It appeared that Jaggo was originally married to Bajinath, while she was a minor, and that after his death she married his younger brother, Sheo Nath. This marriage, however, did not prove to be a happy one, as he had another wife and the latter did not like the advent of another woman to live as her rival. Consequently, there were constant quarrels and the husband in order to put an end to this, abandoned his second wife. Jaggo, thus deserted, entered into a matrimonial alliance with Nikku Lal by performing the ceremony of Sagai.

Their Lordships said that Sagai was an informal ceremony of marriage and the courts in India had concurred in holding that she performed the ceremony of Sagai with Nikku Lal, and that it was recognised as valid ceremony in the case of a remarriage. This decision was not challenged before their Lordships but it was urged that the woman could not contract a valid marriage during the continuance of her marriage with Sheo Nath. It was obvious that she could not marry Nikku Lal if she was still Sheo Nath's wife.

The defendants invoked a custom which recognised and sanctioned the remarriage of a woman who had been abandoned by her husband. It had been found both by the Subordinate Judge and affirmed in appeal by the Allahabad High Court that she had been in fact abandoned by Sheo Nath before she married Nikku Lal and also that by a custom applicable to the parties such abandonment or desertion of a wife by her husband dissolved the marriage tie and set her free to contract another marriage.

Proceeding, their Lordships said that, if the existence of Sheo Nath did not invalidate the marriage of Jaggo with Nikku Lal, was it invalid on any other ground? It was contended before their Lordships that since the parties to the marriage belonged to two different sub-castes of Vaishyas, they could not under the Hindu Law enter into a lawful marriage with each other. Their Lordships were not aware of any rule of the Hindu Law, and

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

632

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 6

realpatidar.com

certainly none had been cited, which would prevent a marriage between persons belonging to two different divisions of the same caste. Indeed, there were several decided cases which upheld such marriages. Their Lordships then referred to two leading cases on the point in support of their views, and said that it was true that both these cases related to Sudra (depressed) castes and the argument advanced on behalf of the appellant was that they could not establish the validity of a marriage between persons belonging to two sub-castes of a twiceborn class such as Vaishyas. There could, however, be no doubt that the texts of the Hindu Law did not enunciate any rule prohibiting the union in marriage of persons belonging to different divisions of the same caste, and not a single case had been quoted in which such a marriage had been declared to be invalid.

Their Lordships thought that the matter did not require any elaborate discussion. Briefly the position was that the Sastras dealing with the Hindu Law of marriage did not contain any injunction forbidding marriages between persons belonging to different divisions of the same Varna, and neither any decided case nor any general principle could be invoked which would warrant such a prohibition.

It was said that the marriage between members of different sub-castes of the same caste did not ordinarily take place, but this did not imply that such a marriage was interdicted and would, if performed, be declared to be invalid. Indeed, there was at present a tendency to ignore such distinctions if they ever existed.

There existed, no doubt, a disinclination to marry outside the sub-caste, inspired probably by a social prejudice, but it could not be seriously maintained that there was any custom which had acquired the force of law. It was, however, unnecessary to pursue the subject, as in the courts below no such custom was set up or proved that would render the marriage invalid.

For these reasons their Lordships held the marriage of Jaggo with Nikku Lal valid and advised His Majesty to dismiss the appeal.

PROPERTY RIGHTS OF HINDU WOMEN.

Dr. Deshmukh has issued the following statement with regard to his Hindu Women's Right to Property Bill.

The Principle of the Bill is unchallenged. Every Hindu has seen the justice of a measure like this. The Indian National Congress, at the Karachi session, passed a resolution moved by Mr. Gandhi, affirming the equality of the rights of women and removing the disqualifications on account of sex. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the present President of the Congress, in his recent speech to the women of Bombay, reminded the public of the resolution.

"Mr. Gandhi, in a personal letter to me about this Bill, not only approves of the Bill, but thinks that the Bill does not go far enough. All other friends, while agreeing with the principle of the Bill, have expressed misgivings on one or two points.

"There is nothing in the Bill which is against the ancient school of thought of the Hindus or against Hindu tradition or culture. Whatever the state of Hindu law at the present time as affected by decisions of the Courts and the Privy Councils, the old commentators of Hindu law have allowed the right of property to Hindu women in inheritance and partition. The right of women to own property absolutely is not unknown to Hindu law. As regards the shares at the time of partition, even now Hindu mothers get equal shares with the sons. The daughters received one-quarter share of the brothers, according to ancient law.

"I have suggested an equal share with the sons in the case of daughters, and introduced the claims of widowed daughters-in-law of predeceased sons. These are the only variations introduced to keep up with modern times, but Hindu family life has been sufficiently guarded by denying the wife and daughter to claim partition during the life time of a co-parcener.

"It will be seen therefore that the Bill is no innovation. It is strictly evolutionary. It may even be considered only restorative. I admit however, that the problem of property is a very complex problem; besides, India being an agricultural country, the question of immovable property is bound to be a very complicated one; and the solution as regards the quantum of shares and the nature of interest in the property may have to be found on some such lines as:—

"Varying the quantum in the case of sons, daughters, widowed daughter-in-law, etc.

"As regards the nature of interest absolute to a certain extent as provided in Baroda State or on the lines of the Administration of Estates Act (1925) under the English law.

"I am going to move for reference of this Bill to a Select Committee of the House as the next stage where the whole question could be thoroughly considered; and I would earnestly request all public bodies and persons to whom the Bill will be referred for the eliciting of public opinion to offer constructive suggestions to achieve the object of the Bill.

COCHIN THIYAS' DECISION.

That the Thiya should give up Hinduism and form themselves into an independent community as that was the only means of bringing about their social, political, spiritual and economic advancement was the decision arrived at a largely attended Conference of the Thiya of Cochin, writes the correspondent of the Hindu. The Conference was held under the auspices of the Cochin Thiya Mahajana Sabha and under the Presidentship of Mr. K. Aiyappan, M. L. C., Editor, Sahodaran.

Mr. C. K. Narayanan, Secretary, welcomed the gathering and said that the one important question that agitated them was whether they should give up Hinduism and if so what religion they should embrace in order that they might live as a self-respecting community. The organisers had taken care to exhaust the various proselytising faiths, and he hoped that the community would receive enlightenment and instruction from the speeches.

Mr. K. Aiyappan, in the course of his address, observed that it was a happy idea to invite representatives of various faiths to address them. He hoped that the speakers would see that the religious sentiments and susceptibilities of anyone were not wounded, and that due care would be taken to avoid harshness in criticising the tenets or doctrines of any faith. Religion was a province where sentiment reigned supreme, and they were not there to protect any religion, but to examine and see whether they should accept any religion at all or reject all idea of religion. Religion, according to him, had its origin in ignorance and superstition; but it was all the same a reality which they had to face. Thiya had somehow found themselves classified among Hindus and he thought that all the trouble arose, because the Thiya who did not belong to the Hindu fold somehow came to be classed as Hindus. They formed an exotic element, and as long as they

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

633

remained Hindus there would be unrest and ferment both among the Hindus and the Thiyaas. Their leader, Sri Narayana Guru, was not opposed to conversion, and he believed in the possibility of people of diverse faiths living in amity and friendliness under the same roof. He did not mind their getting themselves converted to any faith provided they could keep up their individuality as Thiyaas and consolidate themselves on a communal basis notwithstanding their conversion.

Swami Ananda Theertha, founder of the League for the Abolition of Caste, was the first speaker. He gave his religion as the religion of love, amity and brotherhood. Caste, he said, stood for negation of love, equality and freedom. The Thiyaas should form themselves into an independent casteless community. Inter-communal marriages should be popularised, and no sort of social exclusiveness should be encouraged or respected. Mr. A. C. Sankaranarayanan, founder of the Sri Narayana Volunteer Organization, explained the doctrines preached by the Swami. He gave a brief account of the origin and progress of the Volunteer Organization which had now a membership of 945. They were spreading the gospel of Sri Narayana Guru and their mission was to fight against all social barriers and gain for them civic and social independence.

Dr. K. P. Thayil spoke on "Islam" and advised the Thiyaas to embrace that faith. In Islam, there was no distinction between the rich and the poor, and it was a religion of universal brotherhood.

Sirdar Lal Singh, M. Sc., (London), of Lahore spoke on "Sikhism". The Sikhs were here, he said, not to convert them, but only to study their disabilities and if possible, to devise means of helping them. The educated people, he continued, could live without religion, but the masses wanted something cut and dry, in the form of religion. A whole community could not become agnostics and if they became atheists, all their traditions would be lost. Guru Nanak had preached almost like Sri Narayana Guru and Guru Govind Singh had lived for the untouchables. Sikhs had no caste and no militant priesthood. He invited them to study Sikhism and embrace that faith which would give them "a sound body and a true heart."

Mr. E. Madhavan said that the Thiyaas had no need for any religion which would forge all sorts of fetters on their freedom. Conversion would only be like jumping from the frying pan into the fire. Islam and Christianity had long been in existence, but they had not solved the problem of poverty among the masses. There was greater poverty and distress, today among the followers of these faiths. A community could exist without religion.

Mr. E. V. Ramaswami Naicker observed that he had no quarrel with the founders of the Hindu, the Christian and the Islamic religions who had done their best. The Thiyaas did not want moksha, but wanted their social disabilities to be removed. How could the 25 lakhs of Thiyaas get rid of untouchability and unapproachability? That was the question. There was no doubt that by forsaking Hinduism, they would give up these disabilities. He did not believe that religion was indispensable. If they were for conversion, Islam was the best of all religions for removing untouchability. He admitted that Muslims had great power and influence even in politics. Communism was, according to him, the ultimate goal. India was a capitalistic country and all kinds of social, economic and religious exploitation would cease only when Communism became the order of the day.

Bikshu Dharma Skandan, a Buddhist Missionary from Ceylon, explained the teachings of Lord Buddha.

Mr. C. V. Kunjuraman thought it best for the Thiyaas to embrace Christianity as the Christians in Travancore formed 16½ lakhs, while the Muslims numbered only 3½ lakhs.

Mr. M. C. Joseph, Vakil, Editor, "Yuktivadi," protested against Thiyaas embracing any other faith as they formed a community that had the leadership in the realm of Free Thought. All their social disabilities were fast dying. They did not want liberty by instalments, and Christians and Muslims would only exploit them for their own advantage as the Hindus were doing. As a Rationalist he was against all religions.

Mr. A. R. Raman then moved a resolution to the effect that the Thiyaas should leave Hinduism and form themselves into an independent, self-respecting community. This was seconded and passed unanimously.

Mr. K. Aiyappan, the President, in winding up the proceedings, congratulated the Sabha on passing the resolution unanimously. The resolution gave everyone the freedom to choose his own faith and at the same time made it clear that they should break off from Hinduism. He appealed to them not to estrange any one who got converted to any faith by the mere reason of such conversion. They were pioneers in the movement of Free Thought, and their decision would create a stir all over India. The Thiya community would attract others to it by its idealistic free thinking, than being attracted by other religions. The ultimate goal was the negation of all religion and the banishment of all forms of exploitation in the name of religion.

The Conference then terminated.

SARNATH FRESCOS.

Mr. Yonezawa, the Consul-General in India for Japan delivered the following speech, on the occasion of the inauguration of the beautiful frescoes in the Mulgandhakuti Vihar, Sarnath, Benares:—

It is with great pleasure and pride that I find myself among you here to attend this happy meeting today. I must, first of all, express my hearty congratulations to Mr. Nosu upon the successful completion of this great work of frescoes paintings. I am sure that the entire Japanese nation will join me in sending congratulations to the artist, as they have been following the progress of the work with keen interest. Newspapers which I have received recently from Japan report how the whole nation was excited when they learnt that the work had at last been completed. They are preparing a large scale reception to welcome back Mr. Nosu, their cultural ambassador to India.

No mention is necessary as to the difficulties and hardships which he, like so many great artists in history, had to encounter and overcome in proceeding with this great work. It is nothing but his firm determination and unflinching devotion to the work that has led him to the ultimate goal of completion, save the enlightenment and help from Lord Buddha himself. Everything worldly has been denied and forgotten by the artist in the last four years, not only his family and friends left behind in Japan, but also even his own existence and life. Thus by leading a saintly life devoid of worldly pleasures and sorrows he sought a needed guidance and inspiration from communion with Lord Buddha. The great work which will immortalise the artist's name has thus been completed.

I am sure millions and crores of Buddhists who will pay homage to this holy temple in the future will be greatly helped in getting into communion with the Lord by these vivid descriptions of the life

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 6

of Lord Buddha. Those frescoes are an eloquent demonstration of the time-honoured cultural and religious ties between India and Japan, the two great Buddhist nations in the world. You will see in these frescoes not only the genius of the artist himself but also that of countless Japanese artists who have preceded Mr. Nosu and who have handed down and improved what their ancestors learnt from India, China and Korea some 1,400 years ago. You will see in them an earnest appeal of Japanese artists, both living and dead, for your kindly appreciation of what they have accomplished during the last 14 centuries. You will see in them the heavy religious and cultural debts which Japan has owed to India and also a payment of these debts together with heavy interest in the form of improvement. These frescoes are significant in that they represent a first attempt to give tangible shape to the shapeless and abstract relation of the two nations in the domain of religion and culture, the highest part of human activity. India and Japan are bound tightly by a strong economic bond. Mr. Nosu's great work will add to this economic bond another less material but more spiritual one. The life of a man is short but that of an art is long. As long as the teachings of Lord Buddha remain the spiritual link between India and Japan and as long as this temple remains a holy sanctuary of Buddhist religion, Mr. Nosu will be remembered as a great artist who spanned a bridge of art between the two nations. It is my earnest hope that many such bridges will be built to tighten up the religious and cultural bond between us by means of an exchange of Buddhist priests and artists. Before I sit down I should like to express my profound gratitude for the Indian people who have brought Mr. Nosu, the Japanese artist, to India and who have given constant encouragement and support to him.

FAREWELL ADDRESS TO MR. NOSU.

The following farewell address was presented at the ceremony to Mr. Kosetsu Nosu, the world famous Japanese artist by Pandit Ramnarayan Misra on behalf of the citizens of Benares:—

DEAR SIR,—We, the citizens of Benares, wish to take this opportunity of your impending departure for Japan after the conclusion of your historic work of painting the frescoes of the Mulagandhakuti Vihara at Sarnath, to express our sense of gratitude and high appreciation of your selfless labours for the revival of Buddhist art in India.

We have watched with profound admiration the manner in which you have worked during the last three and half years to embellish the Vihara. Your calm dignity, earnestness, religious devotion, and high sense of duty, have filled us with admiration. In spite of the many inconveniences caused to you in the accomplishment of your task, you have succeeded in giving to this ancient city one of the finest works of art of which we can be proud. Your work will be a landmark in the history of fresco art in this country as it combines the grace and wealth of Ajanta with the high technique of your mother country. We have no doubt that all lovers of art and the larger public who will visit this Vihara in years to come will gratefully recognise your devoted endeavours and be inspired by the scenes of the Lord Buddha's life you have so beautifully painted.

As you are well aware, Buddhism reached Japan in the sixth century A. D. and along with it was introduced into Japan all that was best in the artistic and cultural life of our country. Scholars have recognized in the wonderful paintings of the Horyji Temple in Japan, the creative work of the Indian artist, and those paintings remain to this day not only as an inspiration to the Japanese Buddhists but also as an unbreakable bond of friendship between Japan and India. In executing the paintings of this Vihara, you have added one more link in this bond of friendship between our countries, and it is our earnest hope that this fresh bond will bring the two countries closer to each other. In creating this new bond, you have at the same time done a great service to the cause of establishing good-will between India and Japan, which is so much required in these days of national hatreds and misunderstandings.

Benares is the eternal city of India. It is sacred to both Hindus and Buddhist and in bidding farewell we do hope that you carry with you pleasant memories of your stay in this sacred city.

In conclusion we wish you a very pleasant voyage back to your motherland. We also wish you many years of health and happiness.

MUSLIMS AND REFORMS.

The following are extracts from the presidential address of Mr. Hosain Imam, a member of the Council of State, to the Kerala Muslim Conference:—

The idea of international unity and universal brotherhood had been the cherished goal of the would-thinkers ever since man discovered the first glimpse of civilisation. But it was reserved for the great teacher of the Arabian waste land to translate this article of faith into living reality and practical utility which has all the latent power within it to transform this world into a rose garden enviable as the garden of Eden. To us Morocco and Malaya mean no more than two apartments of a single edifice occupied by two brothers. Islam is as much a family as a faith. The time has come when all sectarian differences should be assigned to their proper places in the social and economic life of our society. That these differences are intellectual and technical can not be denied. My advice to my brethren is not to lose themselves in the mirage of impossible ideals. They should instead take stock of stern realities and take lesson from the fighting waves of the great sea of life which remain in constant conflict within the lap of the sea but die out to make it a one big span of water the basic force of life.

Secular education as a matter of fact is but a handmaiden of religious instruction and each is interdependent on the other. To read Quran and not to learn in your mother tongue the commandments and rules of life would not make a good Muslim of us. Having learnt to read your mother tongue, further education will only develop your mind to appreciate the hidden beauties of your religion and culture. The important part which a mother plays in shaping the character and developing the mentality of her child should not be lost sight of. The adage "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world" is but an exposition of a great truth. No stress on it would be too great. Our own prolific and instructive history bear me out that the fair sex, so early as in the first century of our era, were not debarred from secular education.

Propagation of the universal brotherhood of Islam is an ordained duty of its followers but as Quran has laid down it should be entrusted to a selected body of workers drawn from amongst us. The individual part that each member of the fraternity is called upon to play in this connection, lies in his proving himself a living embodiment of the great ethics and standard culture of Islam. Ours is not a religion which upholds priestly privileges. Every contributor to this faith is at once a follower and leader unto himself. My advice to my Malabar brothers would be to get in touch with the All-India Tabligh workers and get their expert advice on this

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

635

very important matter. The world has greatly changed and is rapidly changing daily. We can hardly succeed in our good intentions if we don't take stock of the new developments in the mental equipments of those among whom we have to work. New angles of visions and new ways of approaching a question, do call upon us to go about our business with due concern and care.

The new reforms have now become a suit accompli. The supplication of the reactionaries, the urging of the moderates and liberals, and the indignant protests of the Congress have all alike failed to move the British Government. The Government of India and His Majesty's Government were habituated to taunt us with the disunity of Indians whenever we asked for a more generous reform; but whenever we succeeded in composing our differences and presented a united front during the 4 years of parleys in England, we were given short shift and our demands were rejected without rhyme or reason. Witness the rejection by Secretary of State of India of Muslim quota in Statutory Railway Authority and the like rejection by the Parliament of the Joint Memorandum of the Indian Delegation. But all this is past history. Lamentation can not change facts. We have to look ahead and chalk out a line of action for future. The supreme duty to the land we live in and the community in which we were born demands concerted action and sustained efforts. Our religion banned pessimism so we should never say "die". We tried our best in the past to give a better shape to the Reforms, and thereby discharged the duty on our shoulders. I don't believe the human effort results in mathematical exactitude and sequences, therefore, the failure is not our responsibility. We should not lose heart but should keep the flag flying.

A Constitution is coming which is unacceptable to the vast majority of Indians and satisfactory to none. It was forged by Britain primarily in the interest of its own people and establishes their own hold through the strengthening of girders by the addition of the Indian princely order in the management of bound and gagged British India. The defects of the constitution are not likely to be cured and set right by refusal of good men from participating in it. Our entry into Legislature can not in any way weaken our case for its radical change, rather it will help us to lay here the illusory character of the so-called advances and if we worked with a team-spirit we can force the Whitehall gods to reconsider their reform at an early date. But we can not force the mighty British Government to accede to our demands unless we present a united front. It is the first duty of all communities to try and organise themselves and get affiliated to wider political organisation.

Under the new constitution the days of individual efforts are numbered and survival is dependent on corporate life. Therefore I appeal to you all to organise your electorate and to train them to vote on the basis of work and not to be influenced by personalities. In our weekly congregation at Juma prayer we have a splendid nucleus to organise our community. If we establish a federation of mosques, and carry on propaganda for moral, material and political uplift of our people, we can do wonders. Islam was a practical religion and uplift of humanity was the key-note of its teaching. The trouble is that we, Muslims, have become slaves of rituals and forsaken the ideas behind ceremonies and forms. It is like hugging the busk and throwing the grain. Islam's ascendancy was established by people whose actions, even the most trivial, were actuated with the spirit of service and resignation. Neither victory intoxicated nor defeat disheartened them. Live that life and we will be irresistible. This is an ideal worth following because success is assured. To a Muslim everything comes after his God and His Prophet; let us live that life, and get the best of this world as well as the other world.

Brethren, we are proud possessors of the best and the most human and the most rational systems of religion that the world has seen. If only we would live up to that standard we could morally conquer the entire universe.

A LESSON FROM THE BULL.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Marie Stopes on Birth Control (Reformer, March 21) played a good card against herself and for Mr. Gandhi when she took cows and bulls to illustrate natural sex relations. Here in Montana great herds of cattle graze the prairies, allowed absolutely to regulate their own affairs. Bulls are not shut up, fenced in, nor prodded about at the whim of man. They lived their lives calmly, quietly altogether according to what they, in their bovine minds, deem fitting and proper.

Since living here, owning a few cows—no bull—I have been struck with the great beauty and wisdom with which they regulate their sex life. As a cow feels her days of fertility approaching she makes known the fact to the bull of her choice. They withdraw from the herd and graze together in some quiet canyon, joining in sex union as they feel the need. At the close of the day of her fertility the bull goes about his business and the cow returns to her herd. Seventeen days later the same bull seeks the cow again and they graze together as before, having union if the cow was not impregnated at the previous union but not if she is already pregnant. This continues throughout the seasons or until it is certain that the cow is impregnated. The bull only approaches at the time of the cow's fertile period which is three days out of each seventeen and, more amazing yet, never fails to appear on the exact date, unless he is exceedingly ill, even though he may have to come a dozen miles or more to keep the appointment.

Again, bulls and cows do not enter into union between December and May as calves conceived during that period would likely be born in unsuitable and dangerous weather, so a cow that is not with calf by December will not become so before May.

From this it is very evident that, left to regulate their own sex life, cows and bulls have union only during the cow's days of fertility for the express purpose of producing progeny and not at all during a time when conception would be unfavourable to the life of the offspring. It is assuming a great deal to say that they have not the "very faintest desire for progeny" and do not know of the relation between coitus and birth. Instinctive knowledge is not less (but probably more) dependable than logic.

Birth control advocates will do well to keep away from animal life in their arguments, for a study of animal sex life, where it is unhampered by man's artificial restrictions, will certainly lead one to the conclusion that the small school-girl, in her essay, wrote far truer than she knew: "Of all the animals God made, man only is a perfect beast."

Being, myself, a respectable spinster, I have no subjective interest in birth control but my sense of humour lets me enjoy a clear-cut toss for the opposition like this. Yet all people think, even on

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 6

things that do not personally concern them. Deep in my soul there is a feeling that if four thousand years ago when we have (I believe) the first recorded account of an attempt at conception prevention, "the thing which he (Onan) did was evil in the sight of Jehovah: and he slew him," (Genesis 38:8-10) probably the thing is still evil in the sight of Jehovah and he may be expected to slay not only individuals but nations and races that flout his ordinances for their own enjoyment.

India's affection for little children and reverence for parenthood are among the world's rarest and most priceless gems. May she guard them with care and think well before she trades them for western tinsel.

Montana,
April 24, 1936. }

Yours etc.,
MABEL E. SIMPSON.

THE VITHALBHAI PATEL TRUST.

A Press message from Poona dated May 9 announced that Mr. K. F. Nariman had an interview with S. Subhas Chandra Bose at Yerwada Jail, Poona, on that date over the Patel Fund. As this has given rise to various speculations in the press, the "United Press" made enquiries and gathered the following information:—

On the 22nd October, 1933 Mr. Vithalbai J. Patel died at Gland in Switzerland. On the 2nd October 1933 he had made his last Will and Testament at Gland. He appointed Mr. Gordhanbhai I. Patel of 204, Hornby Road, Bombay and Dr. Purshottamdas T. Patel, M.D., (London) of Malabar Hill, Bombay, to be the executors of the Will. Amongst other provisions of the Will the following is the material clause:

"The balance of my assets after disposal of the abovementioned four gifts is to be handed over to Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose (son of Janaki Nath Bose) of 1, Woodburn Park, Calcutta, to be spent by the said Subhas Chandra Bose or by his nominee or nominees according to his instructions for the political uplift of India and preferably for publicity work on behalf of India's cause in other countries."

The next clause in the Will, though having no bearing on the point, is also of interest to the public and is as follows:—

"In the event of my death in Europe, I desire that Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose should take charge of my body and make the necessary arrangements for sending it to Bombay for cremation on the Choupaty Sands alongside the place where the late Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak's body was cremated."

Probate of the Will was obtained from the Bombay High Court by the executors through their Solicitors Messrs. Amin and Desai on the 21st September, 1934. The total assets of the testator's estate were ascertained to amount to Rs. 1,33,865-12-11. After disbursement on account of other gifts amounting to Rs. 18,859-6-0 the residuary bequest in favour of S. Subhas Chandra Bose came to Rs. 1,15,006-6-11.

When his father was lying seriously ill in Calcutta S. Subhas Chandra Bose came by air to Calcutta in the beginning of December 1934. At that time he instructed his Solicitors, Messrs. Mitra and Mitra of Calcutta to communicate in the matter and ascertain the exact state of affairs. In reply to enquiries made, the Solicitors for the executors were informed about the grant of Probate but, instead of offering the above mentioned residue to S. Bose, contended that a scheme had to be framed and trustees appointed to carry out the objects of the scheme. Messrs. Mitra and Mitra pointed out that S. Subhas Chandra Bose had been given absolute and unfettered discretion to carry out the testator's intentions and the payment of the residue to S. Bose should not be delayed and the question of the framing of the scheme should not stand in the way of making the payment to S. Subhas Chandra Bose. But the executors, it is reported, persisted in their contention that a scheme had to be framed and trustees appointed with the approval of the executors before payment could be made and further proposed that two trustees should be appointed out of the names suggested by them, namely, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Mr. Bhulabhai Desai, Mr. M. A. Jinnah, Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, Mr. Jinnadas Mehta, Dr. Ansari, Mr. K. M. Munshi, Mr. Satyamuathi, Mr. Jammalal Bajaj and Dr. Bidhan Chandra Roy; and that Mr. Subhas Chandra Bose should be the third trustee. The executors also stated that Mr. Bhulabhai J. Desai was their Counsel and his opinion will be taken as soon as he was in Bombay.

In this communication on behalf of the executors there was also a remark that the executors were entitled to see that the money was spent in carrying out the objects of the Will of the said deceased. This evoked a protest from the Solicitors of S. Subhas Chandra Bose who enquired whether the executors suggested that if the residue of the estate is placed in the hands of S. Subhas Chandra Bose the same would be utilised in any purpose other than those intended by the revered Mr. Patel. No reply was forthcoming on this point. It was repeatedly pointed out to the executors by the attorneys of S. Subhas Chandra Bose that the question of the framing of a scheme and the appointment of Trustees could not be made a condition precedent to the payment to S. Subhas Chandra Bose and it was the duty of the executors to make the payment without delay so that the wishes of the revered testator might be carried out.

In spite of this, the executors are stated to have persisted in withholding payment and ultimately in the end of August, 1935, the executors stated that they have been advised by Council that the object of the trust so created in the Will in favour of S. Subhas Chandra Bose was invalid and void and the residue may be claimed by the heirs of the testator and they wanted that the matter should be placed before the Court for decision. They also stated that they were communicating with Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and the other heirs of the testator about the opinion of Counsel. Subsequently the attorneys of the executors stated in the end of February last that as a result of conversation they had with Sardar Vallabhbhai without prejudice, they understood that he was willing that the intention of the testator should be carried into effect as mentioned in the Will. But he, too, desired that a scheme should be framed and proper number of Trustees should be appointed for the purpose. They desired S. Subhas Chandra Bose to meet Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel as representing the heirs of the deceased and try to come to some amicable arrangement and understanding.

It is here that matters now stand. After this S. Subhas Chandra Bose came to India but being arrested on his arrival, could not meet and discuss matters with Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel.

The Bombay Presidency Mahar Conference:—The Bombay Presidency Mahar Conference was on Saturday 30th & Sunday 31st May 1936, on the Maidan near the Fire Brigade, Vincent Road, Dadar-Bombay, under the presidentship of Mr. B. S. Venkatrao of Hyderabad (Deccan). The principal object of the conference was to take decision of the Mahar Community on the question of change of Religion. Also the Depressed Classes Political Conference was held on Monday the 1st June 1936, at the same place.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 J realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

637

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

WANTED candidates for Telegraph and Station Master Class. Allowance Rs. 28/-, Uniform, quarter and passage free. Service essential. Rules and Entrance form on annas eight.

Director, Royal Telegraph and Rly.
Duties College, Bombay No. 14.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohasana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karian, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadvanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mili Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co. Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallai Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S., G. L., (Managing Agent, Alomble Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratli (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 3 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 21, Sprott Road, Eclair Estate,
Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

638
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 6]

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000
London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT with us and earn interest on Daily balances SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Saramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondatcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nasik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwas (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Paanch Mahals)
Paighar (" ")	Kalo (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhowjee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Sariaiya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	C. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) — — — — — Rs. 12,90,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

639

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJANI BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJANI DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and
soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.
Leading Stockists:—
1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B-345

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office: KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JUNE 13, 1936. No. 41

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Abbas Tyabji.
Monogamy and Hindu Marriage.
Socialist Mysore.
A Question of Discrimination.
Indian Christian View of Mass
Conversions.
Palestine.
The Franchise Puzzles.
Religion and Economics.
A Chinese Guide to China
Today.

America Faces the East.
Sri Ramakrishna and the Modern World.
The Hindu Intercaste Marriage
Validity Bill.
Myore and the World Outlook.
"Marriage Hygiene" and Birth Control.
Socialism as a Panacea.

NOTES

Abbas Tyabji:—The phrase "Grand Old Man" completely fitted Abbas Tyabji whose death at the age of eighty-three at Mussoorie took place on Tuesday. He retired many years ago from the Chief Justiceship of the Baroda High Court, which he filled with distinction. Then he devoted himself to public service especially among the village people. Utterly devoid of any feeling of communalism though himself a devout follower of Islam, his benevolence and good will were extended to all classes and creeds. The hardships of the poor and the little that is being done for their relief, of which he learnt by his experience in village work, led him to sympathise with the social side of the Congress movement. He threw himself heart and soul into the campaign against the salt duty and was sentenced to a term of imprisonment which he underwent without abating a jot of his enthusiasm for the people's service. We do not think that he was particularly interested in politics as such. He seldom spoke at political meetings. In a paper read before the Bombay Prarthana Samaj several years ago, he described what true Islam was and what a Muslim should be. He lived in the light of his understanding of his religion. A remarkable feature of Abbas Tyabji's life was that his ideas influenced a large circle including his own family. He was recently invited to speak at the Ramakrishna Centenary celebrations in Bombay on Islam, but he was obliged to decline owing to his poor health. He was one of the finest types of men of our time and his death leaves a large gap in the affections of those who had the privilege of his acquaintance.

Monogamy and Hindu Marriage:—It is clear from the Hindu law books that while monogamy was the rule, a second wife was allowed to be taken under exceptional conditions and, even then, only with the consent of the first wife. In Islam, too, polygamy was allowed under strict conditions which, if observed, would practically prohibit second marriages to the large majority of men. But both among Hindus and Indian Muslims the conditions have gone by the board and husbands are given full license to take more than one wife. So long as the old customs are followed nothing can be done to remedy this evil. But when it is proposed to legislate in order to bring about a change, it has long been the view of Indian social reformers that it should always include the principle of monogamy. This has been done in all cases with the single and unfortunate exception of the Anand Marriage Act. The Reformer had suggested that the Bill which Babu Bhagwandas has introduced in the Legislative Assembly to legalise inter-caste marriages, should embody the monogamous principle. That is to say, no man who has a wife living should be competent to marry a second wife under the Bill. The reasons for this proposal are obvious. If the learned sponsor of the Bill devotes some trouble to enquire into the matter, he will find that first wives have been abandoned and second wives taken by educated men—some of them nationalist leaders—on the flimsiest grounds. When the second wife is of the same caste as the first, the situation is bad enough. If she is of a different caste, it will be greatly aggravated. In several cases the first wife has no alternative but to acquiesce in the introduction of a rival in the household. If she is of the conservative type, and the second wife is of the modern fashionable type, she will have either to mope or start a separate establishment of her own, if she can afford it. This is one of many possibilities which the Bill should not lose sight of. We are apt in our enthusiasm for nationalism to ignore the hardships caused to individuals. Babu Bhagwandas for some reason has given prominence to divorce in his last article in the Leader answering objections and dealing with suggestions. It is reprinted today. We have no liking for divorce, but the question is not one to be settled with reference to personal likes and dislikes. In a case such as the one we have stated above, to deny the first wife the right of releasing herself from the bonds which her husband had severed so far as he is concerned by his second marriage, will be an outrage. We trust that

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

642
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

1 June 13

Babu Bhagwandas will reconsider his position. If he does not, the Select Committee or the Legislative Assembly should insert a clause providing for monogamy before passing the Bill.

Socialist Mysore:—We reprint in another column the opening and closing passages of the address of the Dewan of Mysore to the Representative Assembly now in its Budget session. The quotations which he gave from a recent book favouring the construction of public works and the establishment of productive industries by the State in times of depression and unemployment, lend support, if it were needed, to the policy pursued by the Mysore State. The increase of 40 lakhs of revenue in the last ten years, without additional taxation, is the result of the expansion of the activities of the State in the industrial domain. The State industries include Electric Works, Railways, Iron and Steel Works, Sugar Factory, Soap and Silk Factories, Tobacco and Porcelain Factories and Cottage Industries. The most important are key industries which Sir Chimanlal Setalvad allowed may be taken over by the State. Some are not. The State also derives a large income from the Kolar Gold Mines in the shape of royalties and income-tax. The Mysore State, therefore, may be said to have set an example of successful State Socialism somewhat in advance of the Liberal leader's notion of it. Socialists may in fact point to Mysore as vindicating their theories. The revenue from taxation is shrinking while that from the State's industrial concerns is mounting. Said the Dewan: "Now, the increase in our revenue, as you are aware, has not been obtained by increasing the burdens of the people. On the other hand, the two main items of revenue, land revenue and excise, have shown a very serious fall, and there has been comparatively little increase under the other taxation heads. If the Government were a purely commercial concern, we should be able to say that we had increased our capital by Rs. 436 lakhs and had increased our profits by Rs. 40 lakhs. If we consider the matter again from the point of view of assets and liabilities, you will, I think, come to a similar conclusion." Talk of Communism and Bolshevism need not keep us awake of nights if the policy that is being pursued in Mysore—the Dewan, we note, intends to develop it further—is widely followed in British India and the other States.

A Question of Discrimination:—We published in the Reformer of May 30, a letter from a correspondent, a Christian missionary, who complained that antyajas in a Mysore village prevented their castemen who had gone over to Christianity, from enjoying some of the amenities which they had been enjoying before and for some time after baptism. The matter came to a head and the local Magistrate is said to have upheld the ban on the ground that a violation of it would lead to a breach of the peace. Such things have happened in British India. To prevent people from exercising their civil rights on the ground that such exercise would lead to a breach of the peace with those who are intolerant of such exercise, is a grave dereliction of duty. Our correspondent seemed to think that the unconverted antyajas had been set up by some outside agency to adopt this intransigent attitude. We do not, however, know of any such agency while it is well known that some are actually engaged in converting Hindu untouchables to Christianity. We regard this proselytising as a source of considerable danger to the public peace and the time is not far distant when Indian governments, like other national governments such as Turkey and even China, and for the same reasons, will have to prohibit proselytising propaganda, whether direct or indirect. We are satisfied that the Indian Christian community as a whole does not look with favour upon mass conversions which only add to the difficulties of their already difficult problems. As for the Mysore trouble, we are sure that the Dewan and His Highness the Maharaja will not allow injustice to be done to any community. At the same time, the antyajas who have remained in the faith of their forefathers, should not be punished for their loyalty. Conversion to Christianity opens the door to practices obnoxious to non-Christians especially in the matter of food and drink—the Christian may have preferences but has no exclusions—and it would be hard on the unconverted 'heathen' to fine, imprison or deny him facilities for the education of his children or medical relief to his ailing wife or child, for being blind to the advantages of apostasy.

Indian Christian View of Mass Conversions:—It is interesting to note the difference between the reactions to the movement among antyajas to quit Hinduism and either to remain without any religion or to be converted to one of the proselytising religions, of foreign missionaries and of Indian Christians. The Indian Witness may be taken to represent the former. The Witness has not yet given up all hope that the antyajas may elect to go over to Christianity. It commends Dr. Ambedkar's "new technique" of talking of quitting Hinduism without quitting it, as a wise move. It observes: "It has been the experience of Mass Movement workers that when individuals have been encouraged to break away from their social organizations, serious difficulties have arisen. When such individuals have remained in their caste and prepared large numbers of them for baptism, the results have been far better." The Guardian of Madras, representing progressive Indian Christian opinion, on the other hand, is alarmed at the prospect of the antyajas being added to the community in any considerable numbers. It writes: "In our legitimate desire to gather the untouchables into our Churches, we are sure to weaken the quality of the people. The percentage of illiteracy among Christians is about 83. The numerical progress of the community in the last decade was 56 per cent, while the progress of education

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

643

was somewhere about one per cent. It is terrible to contemplate what the community will be in a few decades, if, on these two matters, the same rates of progress are kept up. Unless necessary teaching is also provided for, along with mass conversions, and that in addition to the efforts now urgently needed to educate the masses of illiterates, at present Christian, the community will become more and more weak, more and more superstitious, and more and more contemptible in the eyes of the world. As it is, we have an Augean Stable to be cleansed and we have not produced a single Hercules." A foreign missionary's task is done when he has baptised a number of non-Christians. He has earned his pension and retires to spend the evening of his days in his native land, perhaps in one of the retired missionary homes of one of which a graphic description is to be found in Mrs. Parvatibai Athavle's book on her experiences in America. But the Indian Christian community has to shoulder the responsibility of looking after the education and economic uplift of the new accessions.

Palestine:—The Arabs' struggle to maintain their position in Palestine against the tide of Jewish immigration which threatens to overwhelm their culture and civilisation, deserves to be treated more sympathetically than the British Mandatory appears to be doing. Not a single Englishman with whom we have discussed this question has justified the policy of making Palestine the national home of the Jews under British authority. On the contrary. They admit that it is a mistake but they can see no way out of it as the Balfour declaration is incorporated in the mandate of the League of Nations under which the British rule Palestine. As for India, just as her outlook in Eastern Asia is that of a Buddhist nation, that on Western Asia is that of a Muslim nation. The pulse of the entire population beats in unison with that of the seventy millions of Indian Muslims. The Jews who have entered Palestine, we are told, have done much to develop the material resources of the country. But a country means its people and not merely its land and trees and minerals. No country can be said to be truly developed whose material resources are exploited by foreigners and not worked up by nationals. Perhaps Germans or Americans would be able to make more out of Britain's national resources than native Britons, but who would think of developing the country through foreign agency? Even if development through her own people may be slow and take a considerably longer time, it is the only kind of development which a wise and patriotic ruler would contemplate. The Jews are a power in international finance and they control important sections of the press in Europe and America and are thus able to exert pressure on the British Government. We are also inclined to think that they are pressing their claims under the Balfour agreement beyond the limits of reason and equity. Indian opinion favours the demands that Jewish immigration should not be allowed to exceed the limits it has already reached. The British Government will be obliged by force of circumstances to accept this demand sooner or later. They can not go on maintaining a large body of troops in Palestine to protect the Jews who do not seem to be over careful about not making themselves needlessly obnoxious to the Arabs. Most of the Jews who have found their way to Palestine are not British subjects. They are not even Jews from middle Europe where they have attained a high level of culture and social status. Palestine is not a fertile country and can not sustain any further addition to the population. If trouble should continue there, Indian opinion will not favour the despatch of troops from India to put down the Arabs. The Government of India should represent to His Majesty's Government that the course of affairs in Palestine is giving rise to much concern in this country.

The Franchise Puzzles:—The electoral rolls for the provincial legislatures are in course of preparation. Passing of the matriculation examination or any equivalent examination is a qualification for a voter to a Legislative Assembly. The authorities insist on the production of the matriculation certificate even by persons who have a degree in the University and who are prepared to produce their diplomas. No one could take a degree in an Indian University without passing the matriculation. To insist on a graduate producing his matriculation certificate, which probably he lost or destroyed long ago, is a great hardship. Certainly a degree may be regarded as equivalent to the matriculation and its diploma accepted for registration purposes. Registration of women voters has presented other difficulties. The special literacy test for women, namely, being able to read and write in a language of her own choice before a magistrate or other official, has practically broken down. Among the Parsee community whose women are mostly literate and freely move in public only six or seven hundred women out of a possible fifteen thousand have so far registered themselves. The production of land revenue and income-tax receipts of their deceased husbands, has caused great difficulty owing to the women not knowing where to look for such certificates where they were preserved. In the United Provinces difficulty seems to have been experienced in the registration of European women married to Indian husbands. The local Government has issued an order stating that European wives married to Mohammedan husbands should, if converted to Islam, be registered in the Mohammedan roll and that European women who have married Sikh and Indian Christian husbands should be entered in the European register! The order does not say what is to be done by a European woman who has married a Hindu husband.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

644

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

June 13

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, June 13, 1936.

RELIGION AND ECONOMICS.

There is a school of thought among us which holds that the salvation of the country would be assured if "the economic motive" were substituted in the people's minds for "the religious motive" by which they are supposed to be now dominated. This school has recently come to prominence owing to the President of the Indian National Congress, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, having, in some recent public utterances of his, expressed views which seemed to support its position. The supposition that the dominant sentiment in the Indian mass mind is religious, is true if and only so far as, it means, that where there is a conflict, real or apparent, between what is regarded as a religious duty and economic considerations, the masses will unhesitatingly sacrifice the latter to the former. This, however, is not peculiar to India. In most European countries, Patriotism has the same effect. Millions of young men in the flower of early manhood flung away their lives in the late War. If they had considered only the economic aspect of their conduct, they would have sat at home and refused to fight their neighbours with whom they had no personal quarrel. Even in the most primitive type of human societies, in which the day's meal has to be secured each day by hunting and fishing, there is always an occasion when the people will forego the day's hunting at the call of what they regard as a social or religious duty. The Darwinian theory of the struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest, failed to explain the maternal instinct and other phenomena the study of which showed that co-ordination and not struggle had the most survival value. Marx's philosophy which is an extension of the Darwinian theory to social relations, is even more open to the criticism that "the prevalent severity of industrial competition, and those phenomena of the struggle for existence which the light of contemporary economic theory has enabled us to discern, have come to be temporarily exalted into a complete explanation of organic progress." (Geddes)

The attempt to explain history as the expression of the economic urge breaks down at every point. De Quincey in his famous essay pictured the Kalmuk Tartars as fleeing from the natural forces which were turning their homelands into waterless deserts. Such things might have happened in prehistoric times. History does not record any similar phenomenon. The Hindu-Iranian parting was due to religious motives. The spread of Buddhism in Asia and of Christianity in Europe, was not actuated by economic motives. The Crusades and the expansion of Islam which followed, were the results of powerful religious impulses. It was not an economic motive that led the Pilgrim Fathers to found the United States. The economic motive is more prominent in the nineteenth century and it appears to be the main if not the only motive of human conduct in the twentieth. But, be it remembered, that, whatever might have been in the minds of statesmen, the slogans to which the masses responded in the last war were non-economic—the sanctity of treaties, the security of small nations, the war to end war, making the world safe for democracy. The sympathy for Ethiopia and the condemnation of Italy for her aggression, is universal and by no means confined to nations which may be supposed to be interested economically in the African Empire. The Italian plea that an expanding population needed standing room which it can not find in the mother country, is not regarded as conclusive by world opinion. Coming nearer home, what economic purpose is served by the annual Congress sessions and more frequent meetings of the All India Committee at distant centres? Or, by the Presidential processions, one of which is thus described in the Tribune of Lahore?

The Congress President was seated on a white charger followed by several hundred Akalis on ponies. Peasants with lathis shouting Inqilab Zindabad followed. The whole scene looked like a vast sea of human heads. Dust rose from the earth, covered the sky and one could not see a few yards ahead. Heat and dust made impossible further movement. The Congress President had to abandon the horse and sat in a car and got away.

The best work of humanity has been done by people working from non-economic motives. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru himself is a shining example. If he were actuated by economic motives he would be practising at the Bar for which he was trained and where his father before him had a distinguished career. Why should he expose himself to the many calls on his time and energy, of which he bitterly complains, instead of being free to spend his time in reading books and writing them? Speaking of the religious motive, it is not the Indian idea that any one who does not believe in God is an irreligious person. Religion in India means devotion to the disinterested pursuit of truth or the selfless service of humanity. It is in this sense that the Gita refers to the founder of the materialistic Sankhya as the greatest of sages and that Gautama Buddha finds a place among the avatars of Hinduism. That this idea is part of the common culture of the country and not the special possession of the intellectuals, is shown by the fact that, notwithstanding the Pandit's deprecatory tone about religion, he is received with honour at the Golden Temple at Amritsar and other Sikh shrines, at Arya Samaj Mandirs, and Hindu Ashrams. The Pandit in his latest statement has stated his views as regard religion in the following terms:

About religion I am quite convinced that there must be the most perfect freedom of faith and observance. People can worship God in any of the thousand ways they like. But I also claim that freedom not to worship God if I so choose, and I also claim freedom to draw people away from what I consider superstition and unsocial practice. But when religion comes in the garb of vested interest and exploits people, it is not religion and it must be countered.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

645

India has never denied the right of a man to believe and practice any religious creed, or none. Not only that but persons who devoted their years to reviling Deity have been accorded salvation on the ground that even reviling involved constant thought of the object reviled, God in this case, and, therefore entitled revilers to salvation. Shradda is the main thing: it matters not whether it is for or against God. If you cannot love God, hate Him heartily. Indifference is the deadly sin. The fact is that the Pandit's antagonism to religion does not rest on a true appreciation of Indian religious culture. A Russian Professor, adherent of the Soviet regime, admitted to this writer that the Soviet antagonism to religion did not apply to the Hindu point of view. Finally, the Pandit is entirely wrong in tracing the political and economic plight of India to religion. On the contrary it can be easily demonstrated that but for her religions, Indian civilization and culture would have suffered the same fate as those of the American Indians. It would be folly to deny the economic motive an important place in human endeavour. But it is not the dominant motive.

She is the second, not the first.
A higher hand must make her mild,
If all be not in vain; and guide
Her footsteps, moving side by side
With wisdom, like the younger child.

A CHINESE GUIDE TO CHINA TODAY.

What is left of China today? The Nanking Government recognised internationally as the Government of China, controls only five provinces, the remaining thirteen are governed by more or less independent administrations. Politically she is the prey of foreign imperialism, unconquered because the exploiters cannot agree on the division of the spoils; internationally of as much importance as a South American State. Yet China is more than this and Dr. Lin Yutang's striking study of China and the Chinese explains to the world why this is so. "My Country and My People" is an unusual book. It is to begin with written not for the Chinese patriot who might well regard it as too revealing, nor for the Western critic who might use Dr. Yutang's candid portrayal against China. It is written partly because it might help China to understand her difficulties and partly that her people might be better understood. Because Dr. Yutang is Chinese he has been able to write of his people as no one else could and because of that too he has been not without misgivings on the wisdom of releasing the book to the public. The Chinese have much in common with the Indians. Though Dr. Yutang repeatedly expresses his opinion that the Chinese are a unique people, his book is a striking illustration of the unity of Asia, with the possible exception of the industrially-minded Japanese. The Russian peasant, the Indian villager and the Chinese rustic are all conservative, patient to a fault and contented with little. And they have all suffered greatly for these traits. Their problems are common and, therefore, Dr. Yutang's book is of more than academic interest to us.

It is surprising how close a parallel exists between Chinese and Indian social life. The higher Chinese families observed the ban on widow marriage with the strictness of Hindu society. In fact it was only in 1917 that national protests succeeded in overthrowing the practice. Dr. Yutang's penetrating sketch of the Chinese joint family with its disadvantages and its utility is true of the Indian joint family as well. The difference is in the religious outlook, the Chinese sceptical, the Indian credulous. The religious adventurer has little scope in China. On the other hand it is difficult to think of an Indian, ancient or modern, believing with the Chinese artist that the upper part of the female form is very much like a potato, or with the Chinese doctor that the heart is on the right side of the body. In an interesting section on the position of Chinese women Dr. Yutang removes many Western misconceptions regarding their seclusion. He depicts Chinese society as conservative, defeating reform by laughing it out. Young men in such an atmosphere are quick to imbibe the spirit and they too reject innovations. Very few retain their early enthusiasms after thirty-five.

Dr. Yutang has an implicit faith in the rule of law. He sees no hope for China until "Face, Fate and Favour" make way for Justice. But he realises that such a change must come from a changed ideology among the people. It cannot be imposed from above since it cannot be permanent. Like the rule of law in India, it will suffer curtailment whenever emergencies arise. But is Dr. Yutang's demand for a national loyalty in place of the family loyalty the only way of changing the people? We do not think it is. The family is the centre of Chinese society and in the absence of caste it is the only group that is recognised. That China has no caste system is to her advantage in many ways. But she is not stronger in resistance to change because there is only the family to stand against it. The Chinese recognises, says Dr. Yutang, only the family. And there is evidence to show that opinion in China is stirring against this loyalty. From this loyalty have sprung, thinks Dr. Yutang, all the defects of China today. But from this too have arisen, as he admits, the qualities which make China different from the West and which have for centuries given stability, poise and permanence to the Chinese. If the family loyalty is dethroned from Chinese hearts, there might be nothing of the past retained. After all is family loyalty incompatible with national service? Rather we think will the future of China, as of India, lie in the extension of the family spirit to wider and wider groups. And it will mean less of a change in the East where one's family is more extensive than in the industrial West.

* My Country and My People. (Hainemann: 15s.).

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

646

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 13

realpatidar.com

AMERICA FACES THE EAST.*

(BY WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.)

FROM YELLOWSTONE PARK TO PORTLAND.

Yellowstone Park is an interesting illustration from the viewpoint of nature of what is happening in many sections of modern American life. In this Park we find constant motion and activity. To be sure most of the activity comes from the hot water and steam bubbling and boiling up from the interior of the earth's crust. At the same time one has but to live in modern America to realize that there are many forces rushing to the surface of human experience from the depths of human nature.

Anyone who wishes to understand modern America must take as his starting point the fact that many forms of life are active and many new activities are being begun in human relationships. Russia is not the only country in the world that is having new experiences. The change for the better in the thinking of millions of American citizens during the past five years is one of the very hopeful facts of the modern world. There has been more solid thought given to social, economic, political and religious problems in the United States during these years than in any similar period in our history.

As I stood and watched Old Faithful and the beauty of the pools of hot water with their various chemical compounds, I was impressed once more not only with the uniqueness of Yellowstone Park but also with the privilege that the United States has of being unique in its leadership among the great countries of the world. The force that is inherent in American character and resources needs to be expressed in a constructive creative way. Not that we, as Americans, should attempt to impose our ideas or programmes upon any other people but that we should have something so worthwhile in what we do that other people will come to see what it is that makes the United States an outstanding nation. Every American citizen should dedicate himself to that position.

Ever since 1925 I have been greatly interested in the American North-west. It is one of the great sections of the United States in size and in possibility. I believe that in the days to come it will be even greater than many other sections of the country have been in the past. One has only to travel across the State of Idaho over the Blue Mountains and along the Columbia River Highway to catch a sweep of vision that is not possible anywhere else.

To find one's way by great motor roads through the evergreens of the western Cascades to Portland, the city of roses, is a magnificent pilgrimage. My hope is that increasing millions of American citizens will not only travel that road but will begin to make their homes in the Pacific Northwest. Through the Northwest America faces the Orient in a very peculiar sense. For years it has been increasingly a trade centre not only between the United States and the Far East but also between Europe and the Far East.

RODEO, RIVER AND RETROSPECT.

As we sat in the great arena of the Pacific International Exposition in Portland watching the skilled ingenuity of the Canadian Mountain Police we caught something of what it means for individuals to train themselves for specific tasks. The symphony of movement which existed between the men and their horses as all the formations of the exhibition were put on to band music was something to be carried away in one's memory in a realisation of how careful planning and practice will evolve into perfection. We spent hours viewing the products located in the booths of the exposition—products of the soil and products of mill and factory. It was a splendid view of the resources of a vast section of the United States. It reinforces our conviction that we have the resources to provide every family in the country with comforts and luxuries beyond the imagination of any previous people. We cannot possibly fail to produce far more than we ever had nor can we continue to fail to distribute adequately what we shall produce.

* Earlier notes in this series appeared in the Reformer of January 18, February 15 and 22 and April 18.

Friends gathered with us on one of the great Portland piers, came on board the steamer and wished us bon voyage as we started on the Willamette River towards the Columbia which would take us shortly to the Pacific. Our river voyage lasted for six hours but it will take many years to have us fully appreciate what our many American friendships actually mean to us. Such friendships are not limited by the miles or hindered by separations of years. Rivers and oceans become only means by which we travel again to see old friends and to make new ones.

The spirit of the United States to advance along a hundred avenues or more is still evident to one who makes the trip across the continent. This probably means that Americans will make many mistakes in years to come and find their advances registered only as they learn from their mistakes.

We did not see the lights of Astoria fade out behind us as we proceeded into the Pacific with any feeling of sorrow on leaving the American shores but rather with a feeling that we were proceeding eastward to other lights, to other days, to other opportunities with which American citizens would be increasingly in touch in the future.

STORM OVER THE PACIFIC.

Americans who feel that the great events of the world are happening in and around Europe are missing one of the great facts of our day. There are more fascinating circumstances arising in the Far East from the point of view of future developments in civilization than anywhere else in the world.

It was significant to us as we passed near the Aleutian Islands to feel the full force of a great storm that was sweeping down across them and out on the broad reaches of the Pacific. Just as our steamer weathered that storm and found its way eventually to the port toward which it was heading, so human life meets its great opportunities and attempts its successes as it drives through the disturbances of everyday living.

Between Portland and Yokohama we saw only one day of sunlight. The sky was overcast and there were furies of cold rain. We saw a few gulls and occasionally dolphins played about us in the water. We were confined rather closely to our contacts on board ship without much of interest on the horizon.

It is always interesting on ship board to spend a good deal of time analyzing one's companions. Quite frequently one has a very diverse group of people to be interested in. To see such a group settle into certain inevitable divisions, though the members may have come from widely separated points is a study in human character to be envied by those who have not had the privilege. To watch people who have not accepted any responsibility for recognizing the rights of others actually take the responsibility, perhaps for the first time, is a good lesson in educational psychology.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

647

SRI RAMAKRISHNA AND THE MODERN WORLD.*

(By Sir S. RADHAKRISHNAN).

It is not necessary to speak of the great influence of Ramakrishna on modern thought. It has become a part of India's history, and there is no necessity to emphasize Ramakrishna's achievements. But it is out of a sense of self-respect that we are gathered to celebrate the centenary of that great saint who has given the message, "Truth is one, sages call it by various names." The holding of the Parliament of Religions is most significant. It was not unknown in ancient times.

In these days of communal differences, which are due not so much to religious motives as to economic and political causes, the Parliament of Religions is an important step to bring about a better understanding. The special contribution of Ramakrishna was that he put to the test the religious views by the logic of life, and established the equality of all religions by example and precept.

The idea of Parliament of Religions is consistent with the spirit of mutual appreciation and toleration which is associated with the great mystic traditions of Hindu religion.

The concept of religion is sought to be explained by various persons according to their views and experiences. Those who worship ignorance are described, in the Upanishad, as entering darkness and those who worship knowledge as entering greater darkness. There are people who are conceited in their ignorance just as there are persons who are conceited in their knowledge. At present, though people find satisfaction of their physical and psychological needs, though they have wealth, they have still a hunger within, which they cannot satisfy. The happenings in the world, the victory achieved by the sword, the great calamities that have visited mankind, must make men think seriously, whether beneath all these there is any fundamental spiritual assurance, whether there is anything Real behind the apparently transient.

So long as human beings are composed of the perishable and imperishable, they cannot but ask themselves the question whether the transient is the only reality, whether the temporary is the only permanent.

There are others conceited in their knowledge, claiming to provide a solution for all problems, claiming to dispel the great mystery, thinking that they possess omniscient knowledge. Neither group is capable of seeing reality. For there is something beyond ignorance and knowledge. After all their intellectual discoveries and rational explanations, men are at one time or other inescapably confronted with the question: "Is there not something beyond all these? Is there no other power or purpose behind these passing clouds?"

When such questions are raised, men cannot be satisfied with such explanations as that the relative is the absolute, the transient is the permanent and similar expressions. The wonder of existence is a puzzle that confronts man for ever.

The results of reason, have been great, but greater have been the failures of reason. We are today more enlightened. The barbarians of old received solace and consolation from the thought of the 'mystery of the divine'. Science has put an end to that. But our life has become dull and prosaic.

But a world perfectly understood is no world at all, a problem completely solved is no problem at all.

*Presidential address to the Parliament of Religions, Bombay, May 7, 1936. (Prabuddha Bhavati).

Likewise, a God that is fully understood is no God at all. The fundamental difference between the Eastern and Western outlook is that the East recognizes the mystery that is divine and admits man's inability to fathom that mystery. It has contented itself with efforts to explore that mystery. The West thinks it is possible to explore all realities but it is puzzled when certain realities do not offer a solution.

For a correct approach to reality, it is necessary to abandon the conceit of ignorance and the conceit of knowledge. The proper attitude is that of the mystical tradition of the East. One might grasp reality through revelation, through intuition, but not through the method of the intellect. It cannot be reached through a sharpening of the intellect by mere learning. Mere individual development can never take men to the heart of reality.

One of the speakers has referred to the affront to civilization that has been perpetrated in Africa. That is a question that has occurred to me many times. How is it that in spite of the great intellectual attainments and scientific advance made by men it has not been possible to translate their great aspirations and higher ideals into actuality? The answer to that question lies in the mistaking of true religion for dogma.

When I ponder over this question I have always been reminded of the statue of Rodin—a physical and intellectual giant, perfect in every respect, but bending down his head in a thoughtful mood. What was wrong with that colossal man? It spoke of the utter impotence of man, because of his split personality. Man still has in him the germs of stupidity and selfishness. The world needs eradication of these germs. So long as they exist, wars are inevitable. There is division in the world, because there is division in the soul of man. He is still some kind of uncontrollable animal, a clever animal, but nothing more than that. The intellectual progress has not yet touched the fundamental weaknesses of mankind. He has not the courage to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan!"

People care for the hygiene of the bodies. They seem to care little about the hygiene of the soul.

So long as these germs are there wars are inevitable. Wars take place in the world, because, there is war in the soul of man himself. There is dissension in the inner self. The split-self continues to exist. Mankind remains no more than a horde of clever animals.

Ramakrishna's conception of religion was practice of the presence of God. It is this mystical tradition with which ancient religion was associated. There are the religious scriptures. They are to be understood. Their meaning and comprehension is an experience in itself. The Divine Music of these scriptures cannot be translated into words, which will express the inexhaustibleness of truth. The silent worship which one is in communion with God is an experience which provides a negative explanation of the existence of the Supreme Power. But man being human, must find a logical embodiment of that supreme truth. This truth is transcendental and refuses to be defined by formulas and categories. To this extent, the existence of God is proved,—only in a negative way.

Critics again may say that mere non-being is nothing. That only proves the intellectual inefficiency of such critics. Simply because one does not find an empirical embodiment for the Fundamental Reality, it appears altogether non-existent to the feeble-minded.

Then the critics might attempt to translate the Reality in the highest terms of human intelligence. Life can understand life. Spiritual matters can be

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

648

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| June 13

realpatidar.com

comprehended by Spirituality. Every one has the divine spark in him. If he cannot comprehend the Supreme Truth, he can at least apprehend it. If man's highest category is 'Purusha' (Person), then the Supreme Reality can be described as the 'Uttama Purusha' (Supreme Person). This Uttama Purusha supplements the characteristics of the human being.

Thus, though the Reality cannot be conveyed through the medium of language, these may be considered the means of doing that; First there is the austerity of silence. Then there is the method of negative description, and finally the apprehension of God through the divine in one's self.

All these are ways of expressing one and the same truth. All the religions of the world take their stand on the supreme truth. But this kind of toleration is not to be mistaken for a dislike of dogma. It is not a revolt against conservatism. It is to be regarded as a positive course of nature, a spiritual development which recognizes the rootedness of religions in one and the same fundamental truth.

It would be untrue to say that God revealed himself exclusively to any one person or sect. The greatness of the teaching of Ramakrishna lies in the fact that he was able to appreciate and recognize the essential background and unity in all the different faiths and religions.

As regards the present-day conditions of India the question arises, why in spite of our pretensions to spirituality, we are in such conditions as obtain all over the country?

Upto the age of Renaissance and Reformation in the West, the East kept pace with the West on the path of progress. Thereafter the East lagged behind while the West continued on its march. This is due to the resistance to change, offered by the East, and the readiness to change which characterizes the West. This has resulted in the progress of the West and the stagnation of the East. The difference between the East and the West is the same as the difference between the old Egyptian and the young Greek of ancient times. The Greek kept an open mind, without shutting out ideas, whereas the Egyptian priest represented orthodoxy, represented a long memory of the past pressing down on him.

At present in the name of orthodoxy the Indians close their minds, shut out new ideas which have contributed towards progress. When religion in the country was progressive, the Indians possessed mental resilience, and flexibility and elasticity of temper.

In every age there were reformers who were repudiated by orthodoxy; the great Rishis and teachers of the past who had contributed towards progress, were denounced by others. Sankaracharya, who is today claimed to represent orthodoxy, was in his days, denounced as heretic by Mandanamishra. That very heretic at present has become the champion of orthodoxy.

If today the Indians find themselves in a condition of stagnation, it is because they have given up that attitude of instinctive challenge to authority, a sort of rebellion against things repugnant to reason. Such an outlook would have carried them forward on their march.

Today, some people believe that a "parliament of no religion" would solve the problems of the world, because religions have failed to solve them. But such a solution, is impossible. No doubt the organized religions are the outcome of the efforts of priests who have no real insight at truth. The religion as organized by the priests is not the same religion as founded by the prophets.

But the absence of religion will not solve the problems. People cannot be mere contented cattle, even if all their worldly needs were satisfied. In every human being there is the dream of a higher life, and if this dream, is not operative, man cannot call himself a human being. So long as higher aspirations exist in man, so long as there exists a perpetual endeavour, a ceaseless striving for something higher, nobler and better, man cannot but be a religious being.

God never addresses congregations. It is a private communion which each individual has to establish with God, in his own way. Beneath all different variations and details, Religion has one authentic Voice calling for universal compassion. Great religious teachers never said that if a man did not accept their respective teachings, he would be doomed. The basic truth was laid down in every religion that the performance of good to humanity constituted a true religious life.

True religion must establish Universal Brotherhood. The greatest prayer is:

"May all cross the difficult places of life,
"May all see the face of happiness,
"May all attain the Wisdom,
"May all rejoice everywhere."

THE HINDU INTERCASTE MARRIAGE VALIDITY BILL.

(BY DR. BHAGAVAN DAS.)

A few public meetings in the country have already passed resolutions in support of this Bill, and some influential journals have supported it. Some friendly criticisms have also appeared, and references have been made to existing laws, which enable persons to avoid the rigours of caste for purposes of marriage.

But so far as I can see, these laws impose various conditions, which are not acceptable to many persons who are desirous of contracting intercaste marriages. They have either to declare that they do not belong to any religion, or to lose various rights such as that of adoption, and their children lose certain rights of inheritance, and so forth. Those who feel no objection to the acceptance of such conditions, may and will certainly utilise those laws. But in the interests of those who feel conscientious objections to acting under them, the simple Bill which I have presented to the Assembly, deserves to be passed into law. It harms no one, in any way; it helps many, in many ways. If the leaders of the various sections of the Hindus give their support to it, it will initiate the restoration to health, of the Hindus directly, and of the rest of the Indian people indirectly, by the purification and the strengthening of the biological or the psychological or both kinds of bonds between all.

Such are the considerations I would place before those who may think that the Bill goes too far. Other friends, whose views are entitled to respectful consideration, have written that it does not go far enough. They have suggested that it should include provisions for the ensurance of monogamy and the possibility of divorce. After careful consideration of these views, my feeling is that when a grown-up pair—and persons who wish to enter into an intercaste marriage will presumably be such as have crossed well beyond the limits of age fixed by the Sarda Act—when a grown-up pair are earnestly desirous to make a sacramental marriage, the idea of the possibility of divorce should not be placed as sentinel at the threshold of their new home. It would be an inauspicious thought to begin their married life with, and would ruin the spiritual influence of the sacrament. It is against the ancient traditional ideal of the land, which is that marriage is holy, unbreakable, lifelong, and, in the case of rare, advanced, highly evolved souls, lasts even life after life. After all divorce is a

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

649

two-edged weapon; and the edge turned towards the woman seems the sharper. It is at least as likely to cause harm to her as good. To prevent that harm, provision has to be added for alimony; and then the danger arises of the growth of alimony sharks, as they are called in the U. S. A. There, in the U.S.A., it is reported, there is now one divorce for every seven marriages, taking the country as a whole, while the figures rise to so much as one divorce for every two marriages in some of the larger towns. It is also reported that women initiate divorce-proceedings for greed of alimony at least, as often as for real misbehaviour on the part of the husband. Such a state of things goes against the whole spirit of the Bill, which is directed towards the strengthening of the family bonds and the consequent wider and stronger integration of Hindu Society; whereas frequency of divorce acts in the opposite way. Of course, hardships do result in cases, now and then, by not making express provision for breaking the marriage tie in the case of persons who have developed distaste for one another and disparity of temperament. But no course of human action can lead to pure good alone, or satisfy everybody. Wisdom consists in the choice of the lesser of two evils. It seems that, taking all existing conditions into account, it would be more conducive to total general happiness if a grown up pair take up married life in the serious and solemn spirit of religion as a life-long union, which can be made a perpetual source of happiness only by ever-watchful self-discipline, and mutual forbearance, and constant self-denial for the sake of the children, and steady and deliberate cultivation of mutual affection, rather than if they take it up in the spirit of lightly indulging a passing carnal fancy for each other, to be discarded as soon as they get tired of each other. Such mutual tie comes very quickly to those who do not attach any spiritual value to marriage, begin it with the idea of the possibility of divorce whenever they like to take a dislike for one another, and diligently avoid all children. If it be destined that such things must come to this country also, they will come; but I shrink from making this Bill subserve their advent. I wish, instead, that the spiritual and sacramental idea of marriage and the resulting family life should be diligently cultivated and fostered, rather than the secular, contractual, and sensual view, such as seems to prevail now in the U. S. A., and in Russia and in the larger towns and capitals of European countries including Britain.

To meet cases of excessive hardship, the old Smritis themselves provide for the untying of the marriage knot in very rare and exceptional cases; and it is and will be open to the Panchayats of the castes to discharge their duties in a more enlightened spirit and revive the practice of utilising such Smriti text duly, in such a way as to make sure that justice is done, to both the parties to the marriage as well as to the children, if any, and that sufficient arrangement is made for the maintenance of the divorced wife, when the divorce is due to no fault of hers.

And much more than Panchayats now, the law courts can help in these matters. If the Judicial Officer exercises a wise discretion, he should be able to give to the woman the needful relief, when really deserved, by awarding adequate maintenance without restitution of conjugal rights; and he should be able to get from the men as well as the women elders of the caste Panchayats concerned, the evidence, as to the circumstances, which would enable him to judge the merits of the case properly. But if the Judicial Officers themselves suffer from biases and prejudices, the best and the most carefully worded law will be useless, except for promoting subtle circumvention and ruinous litigation and forensic eloquence and the length and number of judgments and the thickness and unmanageability of the law-reporters. I have been told of a case, in which the second wife of a dead Sub-Judge, was awarded by a living Sub-Judge, only Rupees Five (Rs. 5) per month as maintenance against a stepson who had inherited some lakhs of rupees worth of property from his father the deceased Sub-Judge.

MONOGAMY.

Somewhat similar considerations apply to the question of monogamy also. The vast mass of the Hindus are already as a fact, monogamous. The economic struggle is strengthening the fact, is raising the age of marriage for youth and maid alike, is drawing into its maelstrom the women also, is militating against bigamy and polygamy, and, indeed, making any marriage at all, more and more difficult for those whose temperament makes them look before and after.

In the sacramental marriage of the Hindus, bride and bridegroom have to make a number of simple and beautiful solemn promises to each other, not of one-sided obedience, but of mutual affection and faithfulness unto death and beyond also, and the placing of his earnings by the husband in the hands of the wife, and the consulting together of the two in every important matter, and so forth. Any man of mature age, who enters into an intercaste sacramental marriage of this sort, should, it seems to me, be liable to punishment under the ordinary Penal Code, if he should commit bigamy, and to pay reasonable and adequate alimony to his first and only lawful wife, out of his earnings, on the ground of such marriage vows, which should certainly have not less force than a civil contract.

Young men and young women who prefer to marry in the secular way of civil contract, at arm's length, so to say, can very well utilise the other existing laws, which suit their temperaments. The present Bill would serve the temperament which is spiritual and sentimental, and, at the same time, too rational to be satisfied with the irrational caricature of 'touch-me-not' nominal caste now current.

MYSORE AND THE WORLD OUTLOOK.*

(By Sir Mirza Ismail.)

On a previous occasion I have quoted, though not to this Assembly, from a book which bears the title "The Next Five Years." That book is described by its authors as "An essay in political agreement," "the taking up by a large group of "leaders of thought in many departments of life of "the challenge that the present situation offers to "give leadership in organizing a world order freed "from the menace of war, a challenge to develop an "economic system which is freed from poverty and "makes full use of the growing material resources of "the age for the general advantage, and a challenge "to safeguard political liberty and to revitalize "democratic government." I am tempted to quote from that book again, because I find that, in a world in which the old standards are rapidly disappearing or being discredited, it offers a new set of standards which at least have the merit of being clearly defined and of commanding the agreement of a large number of men and women of high talent and undoubted goodwill. I shall confine myself to-day to two brief quotations which seem to me to have a very definite bearing on our budget policy.

"In a time of depression one of the virtues of "public works is that they provide employment; their

* From Address to the Representative Assembly.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 13

"remunerativeness shows itself in the decline of unemployment and in the buoyancy of revenue arising out of the secondary effects in stimulating industry. Consequently, it is proper in times of depression to finance works of this nature by raising loans charged on the general revenue, that is by ordinary Government loans."

"Properly conceived, a programme of national development could be the embodiment of the social conscience. Looked at from the economic angle, it should be the outcome of a determination that the available resources of the nation shall not rot and waste in idleness merely because profit-making industry is temporarily unable to find them work to do. From the social point of view it is a resolve that some part at least of our efforts shall be consciously directed to the conservation and enrichment of the countryside."

Though we live in a corner of the world, we cannot be unconcerned with what is happening outside that corner. World affairs are in an appalling state. It is a world of ferment and conflicting ideas. The news of the day is filled with instances of outrageous breaches of faith, disregard of pledges, and avoidance of promises made in semblance of honour. Treaties, covenants, and agreements have been smashed the world over, and each instance of bad faith has brought contracting nations to war or to the verge of it. One is tempted to lose all faith in treaties, when so often their observance lasts only so long as they coincide with the interests of the contracting nation. Yet the one hope for us all is resolutely to keep our faith in human nature, and in that will towards peace and unity which we know is powerful even now among the people of all nations.

The present state of Europe offers a sad commentary on Western civilisation. Humanity owes a great deal to Europe. It would be no exaggeration to say that almost all its recent wonderful progress in Science and Art is due to Europe. It has been the creator of modern civilisation. It cannot be its destroyer too!

There seems little hope for the world unless the peace of Europe is achieved, and it will not be achieved, unless a just settlement of all pending issues takes place, unless all real grievances are redressed, and unless there is at least, a sincere desire on the part of the various governments to settle them in a spirit of goodwill and justice. For no settlement can endure unless it is based on a foundation of right.

The state of Europe is a matter which concerns India very deeply. The world is getting smaller and smaller, thanks to the great advance which science is making in the annihilation of distances. If there should be a conflict in Europe, Britain is almost certain to be involved in it and this will inevitably bring India also into the vortex. Who can prophesy the results of a conflagration of such a magnitude and foretell what the fate of India might be, defenceless as she is and incapable of offering any resistance, especially to an invader from the sea?

Britain, whose chief interest is peace, is striving might and main to evolve a satisfactory solution of a most perplexing problem. Let us wish her success in her search for peace.

Ladies and Gentlemen, in the grim light of present realities, how petty our differences appear, how insignificant the racial or religious barriers that separate us. Instead of standing shoulder to shoulder in the service of a common Motherland, we are perpetually quarrelling with one another over things that are of no real value either in this world or, I am sure, in the next. We hear talk of communism. We hear praise of Bolshevism from the lips of persons who should know better. Let us be more practical. Let us be more discerning. Let the bonds of a common aspiration unite us all together—Hindus and Muslims and Christians—British India and the States. It is only then that a new India will arise. It is only then that we can, in the memorable words of the Viceroy, who deserves our fullest co-operation, "move boldly forward with faith and courage," and "sustain in all its ancient fame and glory, the great name of India over all the world."

"MARRIAGE HYGIENE" AND BIRTH CONTROL.

Col. Owen Berkeley-Hill contributes the following editorial notes and comments to Marriage Hygiene—

For some time past the Indian Social Reformer has been indulging in attempts to deprecate 'birth control' as a measure of practical utility and mis-stating or distorting facts to prove its case.

1. To take an instance, the Indian Social Reformer is quite wrong in stating that there is a law in the United States against sterilisation. As a matter of fact, sterilisation is legally permissible in twenty-eight of the thirty-eight States to the Union and during the last twenty years 16,000 persons have been sterilised.

2. In another issue, (7th December), the Indian Social Reformer returns to the topic of 'birth control' in an editorial entitled, 'Birth Control and Population.' Here too we find a good many mis-statements. For example, priority in what has been termed the Birth Control Movement, is given to Francis Place although societies for the study and propagation of birth control existed long before Place took up the matter. Place may have been the first to circulate publicly (in Manchester) pamphlets on the subject, which was done in 1823.

3. Further, the Indian Social Reformer travesties the truth when it states that 'Malthus's theory was never held seriously in Europe.' On the contrary, Malthus's theory was held very seriously by a number of persons of first class intelligence, among whom Charles Darwin was perhaps the foremost. No doubt the theory of Malthus has suffered, then and later, by a too rigid interpretation of the formula he promulgated to express the antagonism between the variation of population due to a spontaneous tendency to multiply and the limitations imposed on it by the means of subsistence, disease, war and the desire for security and well-being. The Indian Social Reformer is probably right in observing that no country in Europe has as yet set about to reduce its birth rate.

4. At the same time, the Dutch have, ever since 1885, practised birth control very fairly systematically, so that it is not without interest to compare Holland and Belgium in this respect, for in the latter country the practice of birth control has received very little support. At the present moment Holland has a birth-rate one-fourth higher than that of Belgium, and between 1901 and 1929 the birth-rate in Holland diminished by 28 per cent while in Belgium the birth-rate fell by 85 per cent. No one can say that morals are more lax in Holland than in Belgium. The explanation of this state of affairs argues that besides a birth-rate we are concerned with a fecundity rate, a factor to which the Indian Social Reformer does not allude.

5. At a latter date, (14th December), the Indian Social Reformer publishes an article entitled, 'Birth Control and Eugenics,' in which an attempt is made to discredit the practice of birth control in regard to its effect on eradicating the propagation of worthless

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

651

or undesirable stock. Here again we may cite the instance of Holland where the exercise of birth control has brought about an increase in the health and stature of the people so that the average height of the population has been raised by four inches. As Havelock Ellis points out, (Little Essays in Love and Virtue, page 141), a random application of birth control cannot in theory affect the germinal possibilities of a community, but in practice it may improve the somatic conditions under which the germinal elements develop. As the Indian Social Reformer observes, no method has so far been discovered whereby we can foretell what mental and physical characteristics can be inherited, but, at the same time, there are certain bodily and mental condition so obviously of evil import alike to the subjects themselves and to their descendants that we cannot have any reasonable doubt about them. Havelock Ellis cites epilepsy as an example of such conditions and calls attention to the study of the transmission of epilepsy and of other inheritable abnormal conditions made by certain American observers, Dr. C. B. Davenport and Dr. Goddard.

6. It is by no means evident what the writer of the article entitled, 'Birth Control and Eugenics' means when he states that, 'the world has more to dread from scarcity in the lower classes than in the rich and intellectual groups.' It should hardly be necessary to point out that the maintenance, at the expense of the community, of numerous families of the poorer classes ends in diminishing the fertility of the independent class, owing to increased taxation. To mention an example, taken from Laski: from 1912 to 1932 an unemployed workman and his wife had no other resources than subsidies from the public purse; four children were born during these twenty years; the maintenance of this family cost the London taxpayers £1,819.

7. Further, the same writer states, 'the influence of environment is far greater than heredity on the individual, as is being increasingly recognised to-day.' This very dogmatic statement in respect to the old argument of 'nature v. nurture' is, one may observe, not supported by facts, although, while most observers are agreed that environment does indubitably play a part in the development of the individual, no evidence is forthcoming to support the contention that it plays a major part.

8. In respect to the influence exerted by religion on the practice of birth control, this contributor considers that objection to birth control is almost exclusively to be found among Roman Catholics. This is hardly to be wondered at in view of the Papal Encyclical dated January 8th, 1931, which forbids, in unequivocal terms, the use of contraceptives. At the same time, the Revd. Father Valentin Fallon, S. J., writes as follows: 'Does morality make it a duty to multiply, thoughtlessly and without limit, the population of a country, in spite of the prospect of poverty, famine, infirmity, debility and degeneration which would result? Does it make it a duty for the married to bring into the world indiscriminately children for whose necessities they are incapable of providing?' By no means. Morality says: "If you are not in a position to fulfil the duties and bear the expenses of marriage in a proper manner, remain continent." It says to the married: "Use marriage with moderation. Have consideration for your wife's health, for your own health and for the welfare of those to whom you give birth. Continence can be practised in marriage."

9. There is not much doubt, as Dr. Rane Sand observes in his recent publication, 'Health and Human Progress,' that 'the fear of universal scarcity of food caused by over-population of the earth is premature and probably chimerical.' To-day we suffer from under consumption, not from over-production. The fact of the matter is that the problems of population are extremely complex and delicate, as they affect religion, morality, politics, economics, as well as biology, psychology and sociology. They cannot be considered from one point of view only. Their obscurities and uncertainties remain numerous, and we are only beginning to approach them objectively. The wiser among us should be content to await the light that we may expect will be thrown upon these problems by the recently created International Union of national committees for the scientific study of the problems of population and in India by the Family Hygiene Society. In the meantime let us remember the words quoted by Zachary Macaulay to his son, Thomas Babington:

*"Vociferated logic kills me quite;
A noisy man is always in the right."*

A REJOINDER.

1. Col. Owen Berkeley-Hill is right when he points out that twenty-eight of the thirty-eight American States permit sterilization now. We are grateful to him for the correction. But it does not affect the argument in the Reformer that birth controllers in the U. S. A. classed sterilisation as a birth control measure to "smuggle" it into the States, because historically the States took to Birth Control long before they took to sterilization. "Twelve States passed sterilization laws before 1915, all of which have been at one time or other declared unconstitutional. After 1927, after a Federal Supreme Court decision, twenty-eight States adopted human sterilization laws." (Morris Siegel: "Constructive Eugenics and Rational Marriage.")

2. "It is to Place's campaign of education that we owe the beginning in the English-speaking world of the birth control movement in the genuinely modern sense. In a less direct manner than in the instance of England, he was also through his disciples responsible for the genesis of the American movement in 1828.....Place developed the theory of birth control, became its first systematic expositor, and was the first to organise an educational campaign calculated to enlighten public opinion. He was the arch-pioneer." (Dr. Norman Himes: "Place on Population").

3. The very fact that no country has attempted to check the birth-rate in Europe is proof that Malthus' fear of population outstripping means of subsistence was not gravely regarded in Europe. That a few persons of first class intelligence held his theory seriously has affected the trend of European affairs as much as the League of Nations' censures have affected Italy in her aggression on Ethiopia. As for Darwin's acceptance of the population theory, his own theory of survival of the fittest evolved out of Malthus, is by no means universally accepted today. History has disproved Malthus. Even Col. Hill, we see, deserts him while appearing to plead his case.

4. Col. Owen Berkeley-Hill, we are glad to note, reiterates our warning to birth control propagandists not to advocate birth-control as a measure for restricting population or preventing over population. That he does so in the guise of differing from us can only be attributed to the need for tact in restraining the enthusiasm of his readers.

5 & 7. Surely an argument for sterilization rather than birth control. But it is not easy in the light of our present knowledge to assess correctly how much of the mental or bodily defect is due to

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

652

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 13

realpatidar.com

bad nutrition, insanitary conditions of living, and close association with men in whom the defect is highly developed before resorting to this measure. Hitler's use of sterilization laws is the best argument against them since no one can guard against such perversions in a State. And only recently the press carried reports of a sensational sterilization case in which the doctor's conduct was not entirely disinterested.

6. This is not the fault of the poor so much as of the social system. What Col. Hill calls the "independent class" is, we are afraid, of poorer fertility not because of increased taxation as he suggests. It is unfortunate but true that modern industrial civilisation rests on cheap labour and plenty of it.

8. This looks more like an argument in favour of self-control. It is not clear whether the whole of it is from Father Fallon or whether the concluding passage is Col. Hill's.

9. To state that we suffer from under consumption not from over-production, is a catchphrase which looks smart but is meaningless. We suffer from poor distribution. And that is why large crops are destroyed, fish thrown back into the sea and production restricted in parts of the world while men elsewhere suffer want. The problems of population are no doubt complex but the problem of birth control is not until its advocates make it so.

* Lastly Col. Berkeley-Hill is wrong when he says that the Reformer seeks to discredit birth control. We are only warning Indian workers in the movement against making extravagant claims for birth control. Apparently foreign propagandists resent this. Col. Hill's request for "the wiser among us" to await the light which will issue from the Family Hygiene Society, is an insidious attempt to silence criticism. The Family Hygiene Society has adopted Birth Control as one of its main activities. On that question, therefore, it has a propagandist, not a scientific, outlook. Does Col. Hill in quoting Zachary Macaulay's doggerel ask his supporters and colleagues in the birth control movement to be noisy? It is unnecessary because they have already learnt the lesson.

SOCIALISM AS A PANACEA.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

After all the political furore which has recently been propagated before the unsteady Indian eye, by the Congress President, he now seems of late to have engaged himself in the propaganda of sugar-coating, as far as he can, the bitter pill which he had prescribed for his country's ailments. This bitter dose is known to be compounded altogether of foreign drugs which can never suit the Indian climate. If the rash physician persists in trying the same imported sort of an untried and unsuitable ingredient, he will have himself to rue his rash experiment before very long. By such an unthoughtful and ill-conceived prescription, he is sure to make the condition of his poor helpless patient immeasurably worse, and then he will have to leave him at the door of death, frantically crying for relief from heaven, which it may, then, be too late to hope for.

He is himself now trying to put some sort of altered interpretation over his original theories, as propounded by him at Lucknow. But people—I mean those who really matter, and whom those childish frolics and funs do really pinch—seem to be far from satisfied with the clever consoling alteration which is being offered to them by the President.

This is being done, obviously, in order that the large mass of those who are vitally concerned with the future frightful features of the Communist Indian society, may not altogether lose heart, and get estranged. So that, they may not, for the sake of their own safety, join any of the numerous antagonistic camps but remain within the fold of the newly designed Communist Congress. This, in all reason, seems impossible for them to do, in their own interests.

So far as disinterested patriotic, prudent politicians are concerned, it is easy to foresee that a large mass of people are sure to disintegrate from the main body, purely in a self-defensive policy. What will become of the poor Congress if faithless desertions of this kind continue to be the feature of the day? Gradually that body is likely to lose all its living force, and will occupy on the page of Indian history a glorious remembrance for its past activities in the eye of the future generations. What will then be the use of beating the dead horse?

One thing is fully known to the Indian thinker, with not the least bit of a cloud of suspicion. That is that Indian masses are hopelessly depressed under mountains of poverty, ignorance and of untold and unmeasured unemployment. Anything frightening may happen under such a hopeless condition of Indian society. Any new fangled dangerous ideas may crop up to engross the terrorised, trembling heart of the Indian, especially as he is made to see no ray of hope for the future before him. Such reckless people are numerous as are daily leading the poor Indian citizen to hazardous and dangerous pits of ruin—in the comforting name of socialism, communism, terrorism, bombism and what not. Poor ignorant hungry masses may be expected to blindly follow any false lead that may approach them in their dull distant hopeless workless and breadless villages.

It is a most lucky thing for India of the present day that the new Viceroy is trying to unfurl the flag of a new vision, a new political picture and new methods of work, with new ideals. It is a source of genuine comfort to come across the new ideals, to which the eye is being directed by Lord Linlithgo. Along with this smiling rose view of the new Indian political landscape, there is the strong background of the constitution under the Indian Reforms Act which is going to be worked from 1937. The prospect is hopeful. It is sure to lead India to its cherished goal of Self Government, within a short time.

But our Indian politicians of the decaying Congress School are desired in the name of the love for their motherland to open their eyes and view the future with all its bright prospects of a peaceful progress. This ideal can never be dropped out of a prudent consideration of the most patriotic true type of a political goal before the country.

If eyes are not now opened, it may, it is rightly feared, be too late. India may gradually drift along too far away in ruinous direction under the false lead of our new false political idealists who have borrowed the false inspiration from foreigners and untried friends. They have generated a false sense of patriotism on the slippery road of a political destination leading towards danger and absolute ruin. All this must be stoutly guarded against if there is anything of a prudent thinking, true loyalty to and love for the motherland, and farseeing considerations of India's progressive prosperity. Undoubtedly they must still be the ideals of our future advancement as they certainly were in the past.

Lahore, } Yours etc.,
1st June 1936. } NARAINSINGH, B. A., P. E. S.
(Retired.)

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

653

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive, of postage.

WANTED candidates for Telegraph and Station Master Class. Allowance Rs. 28/-, Uniform, quarter and passage free. Service essential. Rules and Entrance form on annas eight.

Director, Royal Telegraph and Rly.
Duties College, Bombay No. 14.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Georwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 22,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (SM) Agent, Ahmedabad,) Toolaldas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharilal Desabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallal Dalibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Maratli (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Krishnarai Vithalrao Ulap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Reserved for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 3 per cent. per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sodama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

Bombay

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

654

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 13

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT

VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,

Sheik Memon St., Bombay.

BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,

3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,

(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches:—

AHMEDABAD.

AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)

CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)

NAGPUR CITY.

POONA.

POONA CITY.

RAJKOT.

SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000

Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000

Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1½ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;

AND

TRUSTEE CO., LTD

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramatti (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondatcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirtoskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Mategaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panhala)
Paighar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Aklaj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chundil V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.	B. N. Rajadnya, Esq.
Madhoojee D. Thackersey, Esq.	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.
R. G. Saraya, Esq.	D. W. Bank, Esq.
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) — — — Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,

Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

655

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

656

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 13

realpatidar.com

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMARSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JUNE 20, 1936. No. 42.

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Mysore Widow Marriage Bill.
Harijan Workers' Conference.
Indian Address to Negus.
Sold into Slavery.
The Servants of India Society.
Practical Socialism.
Unity of Federation.
The Shahidgunj Dispute.
The New British Colonial Secretary.

The Matriculation Muddle.
"India, a Buddhist Nation."
The Falling Birth Rate.
Trade Between India and Japan.
Practical Citizenship & Elementary Education.
Failure of the Junior League of Nations.
Freedom of the Press.

NOTES

Mysore Widow Marriage Bill:—It is eighty years since a law was passed in British India validating the remarriage of Hindu widows. The Bill met with fierce opposition from conservative Hindus but the Government of India was firm for the first and the last time on a question of social reform, and the Bill became law. For many years there were very few remarriages celebrated under the Act but its educative influence slowly gained ground and, today, remarriages among Hindus in British India attract very little attention, practically no opposition. In passing, we commend this instance to those who are impatient about the apparently slow effect of the Sarda Act. Quick results in social reform are liable to be followed by strong reactions. A private member, Mr. Bhashyam, introduced in the Mysore Representative Assembly a fortnight back, a Bill to validate the remarriage of Hindu widows in Mysore State. The Assembly was unanimously in favour of the Bill and the Government of Mysore accepted it in principle. The Mysore Bill is in one important respect an advance on the law in British India. The British Indian Act provides that a Hindu widow who remarries will lose all her rights in her deceased husband's property, whether in respect of maintenance or by inheritance or even by virtue of any will, which does not expressly give her permission to remarry. Mr. Bhashyam's Bill provides that, in the absence of an heir to the deceased husband, the remarried widow will continue to enjoy possession of his estate as her absolute estate. The rights acquired by her under a gift of deed or will, will also be her absolute estate unless there is a clause in such documents expressly prohibiting remarriage. The British Indian Act presumes that if a deceased husband did not expressly permit his widow to remarry, he was against her doing so. The Mysore Bill, on the other hand, presumes that unless he expressly prohibited her remarriage, a deceased Hindu husband approved beforehand of his widow remarrying. The difference between the two is an index of the march of ideas in 80 years. Further, the remarried widow under the Mysore Bill, will continue to be the guardian of her children by her first husband unless a civil court appoints another person as a guardian at the instance of an interested person. It is not quite clear if the remarried widow would have any right in her husband's property where there is an heir.

Harijan Workers' Conference:—A Conference of workers of the Harijan Sevak Sangh met at Bangalore on the 14th under the Chairmanship of the President of the Sangh, Mr. G. D. Birla. In his address, the Chairman observed that he thought that they had originally planned their work all over India more extensively than they should have done. One result was that schools had been established which do not fully conform to the objects of the Harijan Sevak Sangh. The Conference passed a resolution requesting the Secretaries of Provincial Boards in South India to scrutinise the conduct of existing schools and where it was not possible to bring their conduct in conformity with the Sabha's objects to close them and divert the funds so saved to other important work. This will be a delicate operation as continuity is the essence of social work and the closing of schools, even when they do not fully conform to rules, is likely to be regarded as withdrawing from a field after having once occupied it. The masters thrown out of their jobs, will become counter-propagandists, and the Sangh has evoked much counter-propaganda. The Conference seemed to be of the opinion that the work of the Sangh might be more effective if it paid more regard to the specific problems of each district instead of having a general plan for the whole of India. Mr. Birla suggested that this may not be practicable, and we agree with him. The disabilities of antyajas are more or less the same all over the country. They consist in the denial of social amenities to these classes and do not much vary with the climate, geographical position or the fertility of the soil of different parts of the country. So far as we can see, the programme of the Sabha is comprehensive and there is nothing to prevent workers in a locality from devoting more attention to a specific local need, such, for instance, as lack of drinking water, as compared with others. It is not surprising that the Conference felt it necessary

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

658

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| June 20

realpatidar.com

to pass a resolution to form a central committee of workers who would pledge themselves to serve the Sangh for at least five years. The tendency of paid social workers to be on the look out for a permanent footing in Government, Municipal, Local Board or other services, is one of the most serious problems confronting movements of this kind. The worker argues somewhat as follows: the disabilities of the Harijans may cease to exist soon, in which case he would find himself without a job; or they may continue indefinitely in which case, his employers may transfer their resources to work in more promising directions. He is anxious, therefore, to find a job in a service in which the speculative element is absent. This problem may solve itself if Gandhiji's idea of making each district pay its own way, be given effect to. Mr. Birla encouraged the Conference to face this prospect by assuring them from his experience, that good work will never lack for funds. If it does, of course, it is not good work! Social work which depends primarily on the collection of funds is not a social but a financial operation subject to the vicissitudes of such operations. The true social worker will plan his work independently of financial prospects. This is not so difficult as it may seem, because personal example is the alpha and omega of social service. Money has no necessary affinity to a good cause. The whole world execrates Mussolini for his Ethiopian adventure. But he had all the money and credit needed to keep up his supplies of bombs and poison gas. All the world sympathised with the Negus. But his pathetic appeals for help in funds and war material fell on deaf ears.

Indian Address to Negus :—An ad-hoc Indian body under the title of the Indian Political group was formed to present an address of welcome to Haile Selassie, Emperor of Ethiopia. Dr. C. B. Vakil, President and P. B. Seal, Secretary were authorised to take necessary steps for presenting an address to his Majesty. The address read as follows :—"Your Majesty : On May 9th last the President of the Indian National Congress called for an "Abyssinia Day". In hundreds of thousands, the Indian people came out in streets, parks, fields and platforms throughout the length and breadth of the country to demonstrate their solidarity with the heroic Ethiopian people in their uneven struggle against rapacious Imperialism, to maintain their centuries-old Independence. In tune with the wishes of the vast majority of our countrymen, we take this opportunity of showing our sympathy with Ethiopian Independence in presenting an humble address of welcome to you, who led them in this heroic struggle. Though to day, the seared limbs splintered bones and burnt faces of the Abyssinian heroes lie unrecognised and unrecognisable in the valleys of Tembien, the desert of Danakil and the shores of Lake Tana, the epic story of their undying struggle for the freedom of their country will be immortalised in the hearts of the suppressed and oppressed peoples throughout Africa and Asia. The flame of the grim resistance which they have lit has already set ablaze the struggle for liberation from Colombo to Alexandria, from the Gold Coast to Shanghai."

Sold into Slavery :—The Patna correspondent of the Bombay Chronicle makes startling disclosures about agrarian conditions in Bihar which have come to light as a result of the inquiries of a Committee appointed by the Bihar Provincial Congress Committee and presided over by Babu Rajendra Prasad. That in some of the zamindaris the ryats are in extremely straitened circumstances, is well known, but it will come as a surprise to most people to learn that in some areas the peasants have sold their daughters and sisters to raise money to pay their dues. The correspondent does not give details of these transactions. We are not told, for instance, to whom the girls are sold and what happens to them after the sale. The report of the Committee will doubtless be more informative. But it is evident that, if the press report is correct, in Bihar, and probably in other parts of the country as well, an evil worse than predial slavery has come into being which must be immediately put down. For in slavery, at least slavery in the East, the victims had a recognised place in the household. The deprivation of personal liberty placed to a large extent a certain responsibility on the owner. But the purchasers of the women of Bihar's distressed peasantry have obviously little in common with their victims. We are told that the Rajendra Prasad Committee has placed the facts before zamindar representatives who have examined the evidence. Many of the zamindars, we are sure, detest this evil as much as people of other classes do. The remedy for it lies in the first instance in their own hands. The zamindari system can not survive unless it is shown that it can be cured of these defects. If the progressive element cannot persuade the more backward members of its class to adopt necessary reforms, the ryat problem will be taken out of the hands of the zamindars.

The Servants of India Society :—The thirty-first annual report of the Servants of India Society concludes with an appeal for financial support from the public. A perusal of the report shows the extensive activities of its thirty members, ranging from politics to rural uplift and scouting. The Society suffered a heavy blow in the death of Mr. G. K. Devadhar last year. Pandit Hriday Nath Kunzru who has been elected President in his place, is a worthy successor to Mr. Devadhar. But it is unfortunate that he has to spend the greater part of his time away from the headquarters of the Society at Poona. The fact that Mr. N. M. Joshi, the Vice-President, is also unable, on account of his work in the Assembly and at Geneva, to devote much time to the Society's affairs is a second misfortune to the Servants of India. Much of the work of

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

659

members is done through other organisations, like the National Liberal Federation politically and the Harijan Sevak Sangh socially, and this cannot be assessed as the direct work of the Society. The annual gathering which met at Poona was distinguished this year by the inauguration of the Women Servants of India Society which is to work at the outset under the guidance of the Servants of India Society. Pandit Kunzru administered the oath to two women—the first members. This little group of national workers has contributed much to public life in India and it stands more in need of help today than before not only for extending its activities but even for maintaining much of its work. We trust that the public will respond to the appeal.

Practical Socialism:—From time to time we have hints and suggestions from individual Liberal politicians to 'show that Indian Liberalism is not necessarily antagonistic to Socialism. Sir Chimanlal Setalvad himself, though generally regarded as representing the extreme right wing of the Liberal Party, has conceded that the State may take over the control of key industries. But Pandit Kunzru is the first President of the Liberal Federation to call for a Socialist policy, even though he qualified it at the Poona annual meeting with the word "practical". It is interesting to note that British Liberalism is more rigid. Mr. Ramsay Muir in "The Liberal Way" (published under the authority of the National Liberal Federation) is careful throughout to keep the line between Socialism and Liberalism clear and distinct. "Many who call themselves Socialists," he writes, "are really Social Reformers and ought to call themselves Liberals." In Britain it is essential that, hedged in between a large Labour and a larger Conservative Party, Liberals should guard their individuality jealously. In India the Liberal Party, however small its numbers, stands out as the only all India political group outside the Congress. It should not be difficult to find some common ground between the 'practical' Socialism of Pandit Kunzru and the 'scientific' Socialism of Pandit Jawaharlal. A Socialism that is practical but not scientific or that is scientific but not practical, is not likely to go very far in this world.

Units of Federation:—How very primitive some of the Indian States, potential members of the Federation of India, are in their conception of the relation between ruler and subject, is illustrated by an incident reported by the Ajmer correspondent of the Hindustan Times. He writes: "It is a practice generally enforced in Rajputana that, when a chief or anyone of his near relatives dies, all the male subjects of the State are required to get their heads shaved as a mark of sorrow. Defaulters have sometimes to suffer great humiliation. The Banjara Sikhs of Suhrani,—a small Thikana in the Masuda Isfimirari Estate in Ajmer District—are reported to have recently been forced to submit to this custom on the death of the mother of the Thakur, in spite of their protestations to the effect that 'kesha' was one of the five things sacred to the Sikhs. On receipt of information the local Guru Singh Sabha Executive held an extraordinary meeting and passed a resolution requesting the Chief Commissioner, Ajmer-Merwara, to institute an inquiry into the matter and take steps to prevent anything like this happening in future."

The Shahidgunj Dispute:—The Sessions Judge of Lahore, Mr. S. L. Sale, pronounced orders on the 25th May dismissing two suits for declaration of the right of Muslims to say their prayers in the Shahidgunj mosque and for its possession. The Judge held, among other things, that, though a mosque on the site was dedicated for prayers in the year 1722, it has not been so used since its possession and control passed to the Sikhs in about 1762. The judgment gave rise to an agitation among Muslims in Lahore. Mr. M. A. Jinnah and other leaders issued an appeal to the Punjab Government on the 11th June, to take steps by executive or legislative measures to find an immediate solution of the situation created by the judgment, which, they thought, was fraught with serious danger. We note, however, that this extraordinary recommendation has not commended itself to local Muslim leaders who have taken the right course of filing an appeal in the High Court against Mr. Sale's judgment.

The New British Colonial Secretary:—"Mr. Ormsby-Gore is no new-comer to the Colonial Office, where he was Parliamentary Under-Secretary for some years, with very considerable success," writes the London Correspondent of the Leader. "Even before he went there, he was familiar with problems relating to Indians Overseas, as a member of the Indians Overseas Association Committee; and he was also a member of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Kenya appointed some years ago and presided over by Lord Islington. Among the problems requiring his immediate attention the most obvious is that of Palestine, where the Arab population is in a state of almost open revolt. Another question that will have to be dealt with by Mr. Ormsby-Gore very shortly will be the Kenya Order in Council, regarding which, and its effect upon the African native population, Lord Lugard has a very interesting letter in the Times." The New Statesman of 23rd May wrote that an Order in Council on Kenya land was announced with a promise that promulgation will be deferred till after the debate on the Colonial Office vote. "There is reason to believe," it added, "that part of the highlands will now be legally reserved for Europeans, as in practice it long has been." This is a subject of great concern to Indians, though neither Lord Lugard nor the London weekly seem to be aware of the fact. We trust that the Government of India will not be caught napping about Kenya as it was about Zanzibar.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

660

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 20 ·

realpatidar.com

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, June 20, 1936.

THE MATRICULATION MUDDLE.

The Bombay University was the scene on Monday of a demonstration of which every one concerned should be ashamed. Apart from the merits of the grievance of the demonstrators, they completely forgot that the University is a place of learning and was entitled to be treated with respect by those who claimed, or wished to claim, her as their alma mater. They resent having been referred to as a mob by the Vice-Chancellor in adjourning the Senate, but their behaviour was that of a mob and not that of educated men and women in the precinct of an institution devoted to the advancement of knowledge. The immediate occasion for this attack on the right of the University to conduct its examinations free from interference from outside pressure, was that at its Matriculation examination this year only 29 per cent of candidates got through as against 44 which is said to be the average in previous years. But from the speeches made by some of the leaders, it is evident that it was inspired by other objectives than merely getting 15 per cent more candidates included in the list of passes. It portends, if left to develop, an early crisis in the life of the Bombay University. Our Universities are power houses which have supplied the country with its main motive power for progress and should continue to do so. The incident, therefore, is sufficiently serious to engage the immediate attention of men and women whose vision is not limited to a transient personal popularity. The Vice-Chancellor acted, in a situation of unprecedented confusion, with coolness, courage and patience, and saved the situation which, with less presence of mind on Mr. Chandavarkar's part, might have done irreparable harm to the prestige of the Bombay University. His task was rendered not less difficult by the surprising fact that some members of the Senate associated themselves with the demonstrators.

That 71 per cent of the candidates for the Matriculation examination should have failed to obtain the minimum marks to secure a pass, is a scandal of the first magnitude. It means that this enormous proportion of students, had been promoted from class to class and kept in their High Schools, under the false and fraudulent belief that they were being prepared to enter the University at the end of the course. The financial burden, fees and cost of maintenance, must have been very great on the middle and poor class families from which the large majority of secondary scholars are drawn. The blame for this unconscionable state of things attaches to the Educational Department of the Government which has the full control of secondary education. The University prescribes the course of studies for its Matriculation but has no control over High Schools which teach the course. When a High School applies for registration to the University the University as a rule acts on the report of the Director of Public Instruction regarding the adequacy of its staff, equipment, buildings and financial stability. Schools are inspected every year by the Educational Department for the allocation of grants. It is the duty of Educational Inspectors to see that they are efficiently conducted, that promotions are made only of suitable scholars and that the work prescribed for each year is fully gone through. The failure of over 70 per cent of the candidates in the last examination is prima facie evidence of the inefficient way in which High Schools are managed. It is also a reflection on the work of inspection of the Education Department. If the Schools did their work well and if the Department carried on its supervisions as it should do, practically all candidates for the examination should have got through. Ten per cent would be ample margin for failures due to natural incapacity or accidental circumstances. The demonstrators demanded that 44 per cent of the Matriculation candidates should be put on the list of passes, that being the proportion in previous years. The 56 per cent who would be left out, will have the same grievance as the 71 per cent and they will be justified, if Monday's exhibition is to be a precedent, in storming the Senate House and breaking up the Senate meeting which ignored their claim to be among the successful candidates. The holding of the Matriculation examination for thousands of candidates has, for several years past, been an incubus on the University. Each College should be allowed to admit students on its own examination and, as the number of scholars in the colleges is fixed by the University, one good effect will be to eliminate the surplus matriculates and induce them to seek some other outlet for their educational requirements. The financial loss to the University which will be considerable—the Matriculation is the backbone of its finance—may be made good by levying a fee for each scholar admitted to a College, as is now being done in the case of the first Year students promoted to the Intermediate course in Arts or Science. This will do away with the annual canvassing for the most remunerative of examinerships, chances of leakages and, above all, such discreditable exhibitions as that of last Monday.

It has been sought to enlist popular sympathy for the "44 per cent Matriculation passes" slogan, by alleging that the large proportion of failures this year was mostly due to the strictness of the examiners who valued the answer papers in English. One of the speakers at the public meetings held in support of the agitation, went very near arguing that as English is a foreign language, to fail to secure the minimum marks required in it was rather an act of patriotism. That the standard of English teaching in the Bombay University has steadily deteriorated, is a fact

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

661 patent to all observers. Commenting on a speech of K. T. Telang in the eighties, an English publicist wrote that the great possibilities of the English language as an organ of expression was never so fully brought out as when a cultured Indian played upon it. That is a compliment few undergraduates nowadays are likely to merit. Mr. M. R. Jayakar, speaking at the Fergusson College last February, called attention to the careless, slipshod way in which English is taught and learnt, and exhorted his hearers to cultivate a love for the English language for its beauty, simplicity and universality. People who regard it as derogatory to their patriotism to aspire to speak and write intelligible English because they choose to regard it as a foreign language, notwithstanding four generations of Indians who have imbibed their ideas of freedom and public spirit from its literature, should agitate to have English left out of the Matriculation and not merely to increase the proportion of passes in it by 15 per cent. At the same time, raising the standard of study in any one subject, by 'axing' a high proportion of candidates in that subject, is the most futile way that can be thought of. There used to be a system of moderation at a meeting of examiners in a subject where gross inequalities in the results were smoothed out before publication. We are sure something like that is being done now also. If that be the case, it is impossible that any single examiner could have incurred the responsibility for the Matriculation result this year. One of the "demands" of the failed candidates, which it is difficult to understand, is that the names of examiners should be published. We can hardly think that Bombay High School students would go to the length of tarring and feathering an examiner who did not pass them.

"INDIA, A BUDDHIST NATION."

[NAMO TASSA BHAGAVATO ARAHATO

SAMMA—SAM BUDDHASSA.]

(By Bhikku Mettaya)

We were glad to read your learned editorial of June 6th, entitled "India, A Buddhist Nation." There you have well enumerated the many golden threads that bind the two faiths together and which weaved in the past the splendid and variegated tapestry of Aryan civilization. The two faiths were friendly from the very first and their adherents lived in ecstasie unity. According to our sacred books, the Vedas of the Hindu brethren are of divine origin, being revealed unto our first forefathers by the benevolent Brahma.

The Lord Buddha, never came to bring disharmony. He, on the other hand, came treading the course of compassion to unite those at variance, which he did. He never asked the people to break the ancient traditions, nor to destroy ancient institutions. As an example of the Master's teaching on these matters, I may quote here His immortal words uttered near death into the ears of Ananda, the beloved disciple.

Having heard from Vassakara that Ajatasattu had vowed vengeance on the Licchavis saying, "I will root out these Vajjians, mighty and powerful though they be, I will destroy these Vajjians, I will bring these Vajjians to utter ruin," the Master asked the disciple who was fanning Him, "Have you heard, Ananda, that the Vajjians hold full and frequent public assemblies?"

"Lord, so I have heard," replied he.

"So long, Ananda," rejoined the Blessed One, "as the Vajjians hold these full and frequent public assemblies, so long may they be expected not to decline, but to prosper."

"So long, Ananda, as the Vajjians meet together in concord, rise and carry out their undertakings in concord; so long as they enact nothing not already established, abrogate nothing that has been already enacted, and act in accordance with the ancient institutions of the Vajjians as established in former days; so long as they honour and esteem and revere and support the Vajjian elders, and they hold it a point of duty to hearken to their words; so long as no women or girls belonging to their clans are detained among them by force or abduction; so long as they honour and esteem and revere and support the Vajjian shrines in town or in country, and allow not the proper offerings and the rites, as formerly given and performed, to fall into desuetude; so long as the rightful protection, defence and support shall be fully provided for the Arahats among them, so that Arahats from a distance may enter the realm, and the Arahats therein may live at ease; so long may the Vajjians be expected not to decline, but to prosper." (Translated by Dr. Rhys Davids in the Sacred Books of the East series)

True to the Lord's teaching, so long as they lived that life of unity and virtue, the Licchavis were invincible, but the day that they fell into disunity they lost their freedom and honour. These teachings of the Lord Buddha are timeless, of universal application.

The example of the Licchavis is a noble one for any people to emulate, even to-day. When they were at the zenith of power they lived in great amity and concord. If one Licchavi fell ill, all others flocked to nurse him. The whole clan joined in any festival performed in the house of a Licchavi. If any illustrious guest were to come, they all went forward in a body to receive him and to do him honour.

The young Licchavis were fair to behold, men like gods! Affluent and handsome as they were, the Licchavis were Stoic, hardy and ever active. In the book of Kindred Sayings (Samutta Nikaya, Pali Text Society, and quoted by Dr. B. C. Law in his Kshatriya Clans in Buddhist India), the Blessed One says:

"Look ye Bhikkhus here, how these Licchavis live sleeping with logs of woods as pillows, strenuous and diligent, zealous and active in archery. Ajatasattu, Vedehiputta, the Magadhan King can find no defect in them, nor can he discover any course of action against them. Should the Licchavis, Bhikkhus, in the time to come, be very delicate, tender and soft in their arms and legs, should they sleep in ease and comfort on cushions of the finest cotton till the sun is up in the heaven, then the Magadhan King, Ajatasattu, Vedehiputta, will find defect and will discover course of action."

If the Indian Nation to-day hearkens unto these wise words, she verily will prosper and become invincible in her unity.

Strenuousness, both in worldly and spiritual matters is the first and last teaching of Buddhism. The first verse that Nigrodha, the seven-year-old saint born in a Chandala village taught Asoka was: "Diligence is the path to the Immortal; Heedlessness is the way of Death. The strenuous never die; the heedless are already as dead."

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

662
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 20

This is equally true of every nation as of the individuals, and in the very first inscription of Asoka we read:

"Since I sought the Sangha more than a year ago, I exerted myself greatly, and during this time, the gods who formerly were held true by the people of Jambudvīpa were found to be false. This indeed is the fruit of unflinching exertion. And this is attainable not by the great only, but by the small as well. Great is the good that can be gained by following the Dhamma diligently.

"For this purpose has this message been proclaimed—namely: "Let the small and the great strive alike. Yeal even my neighbours must know this, and this exertion must long endureAnd 256 times was this message proclaimed by the king."

There was no one in the realm who worked more strenuously than the Emperor. Gleanings from other inscriptions read:

"In times past, the business of administration was not disposed at all hours, nor reports received. So I have thus arranged. Even if I am dining or in the queens' apartments, or in the bed-room, or even when I am in the bathroom, or in the preaching pavilion, or in the pleasure-grove, the superintendents I have appointed must constantly inform me of the affairs of my people. In all places do I the discharge of the business of my people.....I know no limit of exertion, nor satisfaction in the discharge of business.

"Work I must for the weal of the world. Of that also, the root is this: unflinching effort and dispatch of business. There is no work sublimer than the promotion of the happiness and welfare of the whole world. And this unflinching effort of mine is for this reason: that I may obtain discharge of the debt I owe all animate life and lead them to happiness in this world and to bliss beyond."

Even to-day, the duty of Mother India is to save the world. She who formerly was the Mater Consolatrix of the whole world, will she not rise up again to save this world again from the fearful labyrinth in which it is intricately? India has millennia of civilization behind her, and the immortal voice of the past speaketh to the present, which if listened to, will ensure her everlasting life.

From Megasthenes, the ambassador most scrupulous in his veracity and singularly correct in his statements, we learn that three hundred years before the birth of Christ, Aryavarta was a land of freedom where slavery was unknown, where men were valiant and women pure, where thieves were not and the people needed no locks to their doors, and where above all no wife was known to be unchaste and no soul was ever known to have uttered a lie. Further the people scarcely ever had recourse to the law. They were sober and industrious, prosperous farmers, cunning craftsmen and talented artisans, who lived peacefully under their native chiefs. Fa-Hian who came about 700 years later found India the same Heaven. Then capital punishment was unknown, there were neither distilleries nor butcher's shops, for no one in all the land drank wine or took meat. They never kept pigs or poultry farms but food was abundant and the people were prosperous and happy. Then the people were virtuous and the heavens being pleased rained nectar on them. From Claudius Aelianus, the historian of the second century, we learnt that in India, "Liquid honey falls like dew upon the herbage and the leaves of marsh-reeds, and supplies sheep and oxen with an admirable kind of nutriment, the exceeding sweetness of which the animals highly relish. Now the herdsmen drive them to those spots where this delicious dew falls and lies, and the cattle in turn supply the herdsmen with a delicious repast, for they yield a very sweet milk which does not require honey to be mixed with it as is done in Greece" (Dr. J. W. McCrindle's translation in Ancient India).

Hiuen Tsiang who came 200 years after Fa-Hian as translated by Watters, states:—

"Families are not registered, and individuals are not subject to forced labour contribution. Of the royal land there was a fourfold division; one part is for the expenses of government and state worship; one for the endowment of great public servants; one to reward high intellectual eminence; and one for acquiring religious merit by gifts to various sects. Taxation being light and forced service being sparingly used, every one keeps to his hereditary occupation and attends to his patrimony. The king's tenants pay one-sixth of the produce as rent. Tradesmen go to and fro bartering their merchandise after paying light duties at ferries and barrier stations."

When Hiuen Tsiang came, Harsha, that second Asoka, sat on the throne of Aryavarta. He had 60,000 war elephants and 100,000 cavalry, but after his conversion to Buddhism his arms reposed and everywhere he reigned in peace. Harsha's charity knew no bounds. At Prayag, that arena of charity, from five years to five years he distributed all his accumulated wealth among the monks and ascetics of all sects and fed the poor. He spared not even his personal jewels or raiment. A great poet in a class with Bhasa and Kalidasa, Harsha wrote in his Banskhera and Madhuban inscriptions, in the Vasantatilaka strain:

"May my body, mind and word be for the good of living beings: this has been declared by Harsha as the highest practice of the Dharma."

In his beautiful play Ratnavali, Harsha speaks of the tranquillity of his kingdom thus:

"Humbled are the enemies of the empire; competent ministers bear the burden of administration; freed are the people of all tribulation; and flourishing are they under peace and protection."

Through Jimutavahana, the hero of his own play Nagananda, Harsha reveals himself in the following beautiful words; "He who is ever willing to give his life, unasked, for the good of others,—how can he, so compassionate, even think of the enormity of himself destroying his fellowmen, avid for an earthly kingdom."

It is the glory of Harsha that he—even as Asoka had done before him—realised the lofty ideal that gleamed before his eyes.

"Be ye heirs unto the Dhamma, not heirs unto worldly things," said the Lord Buddha; and these devout kings, sacrificing their own lives at the shrine of humanity, worked for the happiness of others and centuries before Europe dreamed of its Utopia, which is no place, they made India the real Eutopia, or the good place on earth.

It is a weakness of the West that it believes more in fiction than in fact. They would believe the fictitious novels but not true history, for if they believe they must walk this path of peace and service for the good of the whole world. It was the sublime Dhamma of the Lord Buddha that made India a Heaven on earth and the consoling mother of the universe. He stopped the famous Asva Medha and the Purisa Medha. He made friends of enemies, Brahmins of the Candalas, and Brahmas of Brahmins. He fostered the forlorn, consoled the disconsolate and saved the lost. And because of Him, all the world honours India today.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real[1933]com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

663

THE FALLING BIRTH RATE.

(BY DR. HANS HARMSSEN, BERLIN.)

Nearly all European countries are showing a fall in the birthrate which constitutes a growing danger to the survival of the white races. Moreover, the true state of affairs is disguised by an abnormal distribution of the populations according to age. The statistics for a number of European countries reveal that although there is an apparent surplus of births over deaths, in reality the number of births is no longer sufficient to maintain the population in the long run at its present total. Statistics from the different countries show a decreasing birthrate from the South East to the North West, with a pronounced depression over Great Britain and Scandinavia.

Although the last census in Great Britain (1931) still showed an increase in population, the population of Scotland had already shrunk to some 40,000 people. The figures for Great Britain show, over the years 1929-1931, an average deficit of 33 per thousand. The rise in the average age of the population is showing its effects today in the slowing down of emigration to the Dominions.

The population problem in Scandinavia is likewise indicated by a rapidly increasing fall in the birthrate. Taking into account the decrease caused by mortality, there will be, in 20 years, for every thousand now existing, only 700 girls of child-bearing age in Sweden, about 800 in Norway and 900 in Denmark. The basic causes of this situation are to be sought, not in material difficulties, but in weak sexual morality, in the undermining of the ideal of marriage and in propaganda for contraception and for facilities for abortion.

In the Baltic regions, the unfavourable development of the population problem has to some extent been intensified since the formation of the national states. Finland alone shows a healthy increase. In Estonia, the distribution of the population according to individual national groups reveals the fact that only the Russian section, inhabiting the Eastern frontier, has a surplus of births over deaths of any significance. The same is true of Latvia, where, in the last ten years a strong decline in the birthrate has taken place among the Letts and the Jews. Urbanisation also constitutes a danger, 20% of the whole population living in Riga. The Lettgallians, on the other hand, a group dominated for centuries by Polish influence, and forming only a quarter of the total population, number 80% of the births. Lithuania and Poland are today countries which still show a large surplus of births over deaths and, as a result of a fall in the death rate, a strongly increasing total population. Owing to the cessation of emigration, the problem of over-population and of peasants without land is becoming for these countries one of increasing gravity. Quite recently, too, a gradual decrease in births has taken place in both these countries, most noticeably in the western districts.

Apart from Russia, only Roumania and Jugoslavia show a birthrate of over 80 per thousand. In spite of a very high death rate, the birth surplus in these countries is considerable. Specially remarkable are the effects of the fall in the birthrate in the states which succeeded the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. Hungary forms the transition between the extremes of East and West. The birthrate has fallen most in the towns and in the well-to-do peasant districts of the Trans-Danubian region. The north eastern part of Hungary, with a rather low level of culture, alone produces large families. In Czechoslovakia, the birth statistics show a noticeable drop from East to West. Whereas in Carpathian Russia the figures for 1932 still show a birthrate of 38.68 per thousand, Slovakia has only 27.48, Moravian Silesia 19.51 and Bohemia only 16.97. Specially catastrophic is the situation in Austria. 1935 revealed, for the first time, not only for the towns but for the whole country, a surplus of deaths over births of 2.957. In Vienna, which was largely responsible for turning the scale in this direction, the birthrate was only 6.5 per thousand, with 12.179 births as against 25.205 deaths. Over two-thirds of all Viennese marriages are either childless or have produced only one child. In Switzerland developments are also very unfavourable, although disguised for the time being by an unusually low death rate. As against a surplus of births reckoned at 4.6 per thousand, the actual birthrate is calculated at 0.84. The deficit in births per thousand inhabitants of the stable population amounts to 5.7. In contrast to these figures, France shows a much smaller birth deficit, with only 0.4 per thousand. In Belgium, the variety of tendency in the population in the Flemish as against the Walloon regions, involves very significant structural changes. Out of 498 communities which in the year 1930 had more deaths than births, 469 were in Walloon. The Netherlands alone, with a birthrate of over 20 per thousand, stands far above the level of the surrounding countries in this matter. It has the most favourable death rate of all Europe. The figures, taking the average of the years 1929-30, show a surplus of births over deaths of 4.3 per thousand. These favourable conditions must in particular be attributed to the strong religious life of the country and to the healthy solution of the housing problem. Portugal shows a very steady birthrate, while Spain is already on the down grade. Italy has succeeded, principally through the reduction of its death rate, in maintaining its natural increase in population at a steady level. Nonetheless, the numerous and energetic measures adopted in this sphere have not so far succeeded in arresting the tendency of the birthrate to fall, especially in Northern Italy and in the industrial spheres.

For all nations and especially those of Europe, the basic question as regards the maintenance of their existence, is that of the birthrate. Germany has shown, through the development of its population movement, that the fall in the birthrate is not something that cannot at any cost be avoided. The population movement of 1934 shows the influence of the movement for interior revival, as expressed in a marked increase in births, and in more than half the instances, in an increase in the number of births of second, third and subsequent children. Nevertheless, the birthrate for that year was still about 18% below the figure required for the continued survival of the German people.

Indians in Kenya:—The Imperial Indian Citizenship Association has received the following cable dated Nairobi, 18th May, 1936, from the Indian Elected Members' Organization of Kenya:—"Large mass meeting of Indian community has emphatically dissociated recent activities of Lord Francis Scott (Leader of European Settlers in Kenya) whose recent Mission to England directly opposed to Indian and African Native interests. His advocacy of the Order-in-Council to reserve Highlands for Europeans and the scheme of European Defence Force are particularly denounced. The Defence Force has no military value but is a definite menace to non-Europeans calculated to undermine established Government. We have informed India and Colonial Offices. We are sending a Delegation in June." The Indian Elected Members of the Kenya Legislative Council are:—Mr. J. B. Pandya of Mombasa, and Dr. A. C. L. Desouza, Mr. N. S. Mangat, Mr. Shams-ud-Deen, and Mr. Isher Das of Nairobi.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

664
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 20

TRADE BETWEEN INDIA AND JAPAN.*

(By M. KAKITSUBO.)

To avoid misunderstanding I think it is better to make it clear at the outset that what I am going to put forward before you is not my Government views on the subject but my personal ones. To be a spokesman of my Government I am disqualified both by my official status and personal temperament. My official status is not high enough to represent my Government and personally I have neither an inclination nor the capacity to be an orthodox diplomat whose function, as it is understood generally in Europe, is to "lie abroad for the benefit of his country." I prefer to be a simple student of economics rather than to be an honest liar. I shall put aside all sweet nothings which you hear too much from foreign diplomats and consuls and try to tell you unqualified truth supported by facts and figures already made known to the public.

The trade relation between India and Japan has grown closer in proportion to the industrialisation of Japan. In the 5 years previous to the outbreak of the Great War India ranked 6th in our trade list but during the war it ranked 4th and now stands 3rd.

From the Indian point of view Japan occupies 2nd position in her trade list. With all the hues and cries, quotas and tariffs which were raised against Japanese goods Japan remains the 2nd greatest trader in India, being surpassed only by England which is in a specially advantageous position. It is a significant fact that India and Japan are getting closer and closer to each other economically in spite of all sorts of artificial restraints intended to alienate them.

One of the most eloquent pieces of testimony for these artificial measures invented to regulate the Indo-Japanese trade is the quota system which is embodied in the present Indo-Japanese trade protocol. This protocol was concluded in 1934 for a period of three years. So it is going to expire next March. News regarding the fresh negotiations to be conducted for the renewal of this protocol is beginning to appear in papers and you will hear more about it in the near future.

Now let us consider how it came into being, how it has worked out in the past two years and how it should be modified in case it is renewed.

As far as I understand, the present Indo-Japanese trade protocol was concluded to improve the unhappy situation which was created, in 1932 and 1933. Before that time the trade balance between India and Japan had always been in favour of India. In the 50 years previous to 1932 not a single year had passed when trade was in favour of Japan. While in 1932 balance of trade was turned in favour of Japan by 75 million yen. The same exceptional trade balance was witnessed in the next year though in a very minor degree. This favourable balance of trade for Japan was caused mainly by the low exchange rate of yen owing to the Manchurian incident. India did not like this adverse balance of trade. What she did to save the situation was to abrogate the Indo-Japanese trade agreement, which had been in force since 1905. Furthermore, she raised tariff rate on Japanese cotton goods up to 75%. Japan answered reluctantly to this by boycott of Indian raw cotton. The prospect of the trade between the two countries appeared dark in 1933. These drastic hostile measures did not benefit anybody; but Indian cotton-growers and Japanese industrialists suffered a heavy loss. To bring back the Indo-Japanese trade relation from this unhappy state to the normal condition the present protocol was entered into after 9 months of arduous negotiations. The protocol does not regulate the whole Indo-Japanese trade but it regulates only raw cotton and cotton piece-goods, two of the most important items in their trade. Fundamental principle of the arrangement, from Indian point of view, is the linking of the export of raw cotton to the import of cotton piece-goods. According to the protocol Japan will be allowed to export 325 million yards of cotton piece-goods on the condition that she buys a million bales of raw cotton. This basic quota will be increased at the rate of 1½ million yards for each additional 1,000 bales of raw cotton. In the event of purchases of raw cotton falling below a million bales in any year the quota for the ensuing year would be reduced at the rate of 2 mm. yards for every 10,000 bales deficit. And the maximum amount of the export of cotton piece-goods is limited to 400 million yards; the corresponding import of raw cotton to this maximum export of piece-goods is 1½ million bales. This maximum amount of 400 million yards will in no case be exceeded however much raw cotton Japan may buy over 1½ million bales.

This is the basic principle of the arrangement. As to the cotton piece-goods imported from Japan the protocol classified it into 4 specific categories with definite percentage allotted to each category of the total piece-goods.

- | | |
|--------------------|-----|
| (1) Plain Grey | 45% |
| (2) Bordered greys | 13% |
| (3) Bleached goods | 8% |
| (4) Coloured | 34% |

The quota is further divided into two seasonal instalments. Transfer of over or under shipment from one allotment to another and from one season to another is allowed to a certain extent.

The import duty to be imposed on plain greys will be 50% ad valorem of 5½ annas per pound and that on others 50%. This is the outline of the protocol. Now let me pass a few brief comments upon this arrangement in the light of the last two years' experiences.

In 1930, the first under the protocol, Japan bought as much as 2 million bales of raw cotton; compare this figure with the taking of Indian cotton by Lancashire which bought 394,000 bales in the same year. Japan bought 5 times as much cotton as Lancashire took. But she could not sell maximum amount of 400 million yards of piece-goods. This under shipment of piece-goods in 1934 may be attributed to the fact that either the 50% duty proved too high or the classification of the quota proved wrong or both.

There is no doubt that these twofold obstacles of 50% duty in addition to the quota put on our exports are proving too much for the smooth working of the protocol. The object of quota system is to limit the competition of Japanese goods to a certain extent. The maximum quota allowed for Japan is 500 million yards that is only 1/10 or 1/12 of the total consumption of cotton piece-goods in India. Even if the Japanese cotton piece-goods were allowed free of duty the very fact that quota is limited to such a small amount compared with the total consumption of piece-goods in India would prevent the market price from fluctuating violently. The effect of quota system itself is to raise the price up and keep it up at a reasonably high level. To put high tariff upon quota is like putting roof upon roof.

The present improper classification of the quota into categories and sub-allotments is also spoiling the working of the protocol as it is intended to. To be more precise the figure of percentage given to

* A lecture, delivered before the Bengal Economic Society by Mr. M. Kakitsubo, Vice-consul for Japan, on the 21st April 1936.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

665

plain greys for example is too large and that given to the bleached goods and coloured goods is too small for the full shipment of the maximum quota. In fact our export of plain greys has always been lagging behind the permissible amount while that of bleached goods has been exceeding that allotted amount.

If the present protocol is to work out as it is intended to, more percentage should be given to the bleached goods and coloured goods and less for plain greys. This alteration will bring benefit not only to Japan but also to India. Because India contracted on producing plain greys and she imports practically all bleached and coloured goods. Both Indian and Japanese industrialists will be relieved if some percentage of sub-allotment is shifted from plain greys to bleached white in which they are not in any serious competition.

The system of seasonal instalments was introduced apparently to minimize irregular shipments and distribute shipments as evenly as possible over the whole year so as to prevent violent fluctuation of market price. But this seems to have proved wide off the mark. The seasonal instalment on the contrary tends to invite unnatural shipment. In case shipment is lagging behind toward the end of a season exporters are tempted to dump the goods in order to ship full quota. Thus the seasonal instalments are in fact doing more harm than good. It seems to me to be much better to let the flow of trade take its own course under certain limit without hampering it by artificial measures.

I want you to realise that the present arrangement is strongly in favour of India. Maximum quota of 400 million yards versus 1½ million bales in terms of money is 1:3. In order that Japan is allowed to export 1 she must buy 3 from India. In addition to this unfavourable arrangement to Japan the present system of classification and seasonal instalment together with high tariff are preventing Japan from exporting even 1 against 3 which she imports from India. In these circumstances quite naturally Japan is desirous of eradicating those obstacles which vitiate the principle of the protocol. The modern tendency of world trade is getting more and more nationalistic and Japan is suffering from this tendency. With India or Australia which provide us with cotton and wool we have strongly adverse balance of trade. But there are on the other hand many countries with which we have favourable balance. These countries are putting up high tariffs and other restrictive measures against Japanese goods as a means of claiming an equal amount of export to and import from Japan. This tendency is specially prominent in the Central and South American countries and also in Egypt.

In 1934 for example Japanese exports to Central and South American countries amounted to 104 million yen while her imports from them was only 24 million yen. To prevent this adverse balance of trade, Salvador, Cuba, and Haiti put up prohibitive tariffs one after another. Chile and Columbia decided not to buy more than she sells us. In this way our export trade to these countries with which we have favourable balance of trade is facing grave difficulties. In order to keep up trade with them Japan is forced to buy more of their products. Whether Japan wishes it or not she is being forced to buy raw materials, if any, from them regardless of price. In view of this world tendency, unless India buys more of Japanese goods to improve our balance of trade Japan will be driven to buy less raw material from India and more from those countries with which Japan has favourable balance of trade.

One more thing I want you to bear in mind is the fact that about 60% of our cotton piece-goods is made up of raw cotton. So by limiting the import of Japanese cotton goods India will be limiting her export of raw cotton to a large extent. Japan has for many years been the best customer for Indian cotton growers. In the last 20 years the average annual purchase of Indian cotton by Japan was more than 1½ million bales. That is 40% of the total production of raw cotton in India. It may not be too much to say that the living and comfort of a large portion of the Indian peasants and Japanese industrial population is dependent upon the future of the Indo-Japanese trade.

I have so far confined my study to the Indo-Japanese treaty. There are limitless articles of trade which are not regulated by the protocol. Tariff questions about these miscellaneous goods come up from time to time. I have no time to deal with this vast range of trade falling outside the protocol, but, before I conclude, I wish to drive it home to your mind that the bond of Indo-Japanese relationship is not only sacred and delicate but also vital to the interest of the two countries. So, whenever a question of putting restrictions on these goods comes up I wish you will think of the fact that taking the Indo-Japanese trade as a whole, the trade balance is strongly in favour of India and will give due consideration for fostering traditionally cordial relationship between the two countries without upsetting the normal condition.

PRACTICAL CITIZENSHIP & ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

Mr. S. E. Ranganatham's presidential address to the Educational Conference at Salem is suggestive and merits a closer examination in its implications. His observation that the present system of Primary Education "stood unrelated to life's environment" has for long been a truism and, in this land of villages in growing contact with the rapidly changing world, what represents 'Life's environment' is bound to be an ever expanding quantity, what with sewing machines, rice mills, dicorticators, motor vehicles, radios, talkies, gramophones, petromax lights, coffee hotels, election booths, self-governing institutions, and even electricity slowly penetrating into rural areas amidst ignorance, poverty, disease, insanitation, apathy, factious spirit and fear. The old world idea that 'Primary Education' is confined to the three R's has ceased to hold good and is for long exploded, while the new constitution is such as to make heavy demands on mass intelligence and outlook entailing a larger community of interest and endeavour with Swaraj for a new slogan which the national movement is spreading in nooks and corners. In the midst of such rapidly altering conditions it behoves both the Governmental authorities and the leaders of the country to sit together and boldly tackle the problem of extending the limit of Primary Education, giving it a new orientation so as to comprise practical citizenship in all directions affecting rural life in the new order of things, making for applied patriotism with the love of common good for a passion of purpose.

It is quite opportune, and what more, is in the fitness of things that the Madras Provincial Economic Council is to meet at Ootacamund to make recommendations among other things for reorganisation of 'Primary Education' in this province to suit the changing conditions.

It has to be borne in mind that the main spring in any scheme of rural reconstruction is to enlarge the out-look and to create as true foundation for citizenship, the capacity in the villagers to look after themselves in all that pertains to their immediate collective welfare such as Local Government

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

668
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 20

organisation, watch and ward, physical development, public health, sanitation, water supply, industries, employment, wage earning, co-operation, etc.

The curriculum of the new school, that is to be, must be such as to create this capacity at least among those of the younger generation in every village. This may sound to be a large order at first but, if we take into account various self-governing institutions such as Village Panchayats, Co-operative Societies, Forest Panchayats, Irrigation Boards, Excise Advisory Bodies and Village Court at work in rural areas with the potentialities of educational unemployment rapidly spreading throughout the country with its slogan of patriotism, it could be seen that there is considerable amount of growing energy waiting to be harnessed into constructive and useful channels.

Here is a picture of the new type of a village school in illustration of the revolution, that is suggested.

The teacher is at least a specially trained secondary grade man. His pupils are not only children but the grown-ups who have left the school as also may be illiterate adults. His classes are not confined to the schoolroom but largely consist of excursions. The first aim of the school is to create and foster health conscience beginning with lessons in teeth cleaning, self shaving, swimming and washing all by actual demonstrations.

The next item in the curriculum is creating a sanitary conscience. This lesson beginning with the school room, the pupils under the direction of the teacher with brooms in hand actually sweep the floor and walls as also the premises making them watch the effects of their handiwork producing growing tests for general tidiness. Extending the programme to village cleaning by parts, including the courses of water supply it would be easy to teach the inhabitants by contrast what is clean by the side of what is otherwise. For such an achievement we need not necessarily wait until illiteracy removed.

Watch and ward organisation consisting of sets of pupils and adults working by turns to prevent defecation of streets and lanes may be made to form another branch of activity building up health conscience.

As in Bombay the same village teacher may be trained in vaccination work giving him a small fee for each successful case vaccinated.

The pupils may be taught to make a half-yearly census of those in the village, suffering from malaria, tuberculosis, hook-worm, small pox and such other common diseases as a means to teach them by observation love of common good and social science generating a civic convenience.

The village loom, the smithy and the potter's oven at work may also be visited at stated periods, the teacher explaining to the pupils on the spot, the process of each industry with reference to its place in the village economy, its wage-earning potentiality and scope for improvement, if any.

The elementary instruction in the branch of co-operation and Village Government may likewise be imparted to the young with a toy co-operative society and a small panchayat board being organised among the pupils confining its activities to school life.

The teachers may with advantage take them to the meetings of Village Panchayat Boards and Co-operative societies explaining to them on the spot, the process by which common welfare is sought to be secured.

Agricultural operations in proper seasons may also be visited during school excursions making the pupils watch the process of work prevalent in each locality, thus rousing their active interest in what pertains to the main source of living in the village.

Instruction in geography may be made to begin with with the village map and the Settlement Register which is a mine of information enabling the pupils to intelligently read each in the light of the other accompanied with practical demonstrations in land measuring, fixing of survey stones, and identifying irrigation sources, etc. A visit to annual Jamabandi camp will also be a profitable excursion.

It should be the aim of every village school teacher to impress upon the pupils as also village adults to rivet their attention on departmental activities in the general welfare work, and creating in them a capacity to avail themselves of the same in an aggressive manner.

The Training school will be overhauled with altogether a new revised curriculum if this new experiment is to be tried.

It is only when Elementary Education is organised on these lines that it will begin to be related to 'Life's Environment'.

T. SIVASANKARAN.

FAILURE OF THE JUNIOR LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

A perusal of the proceedings of the South African Union Scout Council held in Durban in February last brings to light the fact that the potentialities of the movement, as conceived by the Chief Scout, 'in the strengthening of the bond of the British Commonwealth through its brotherhood and the promotion of international goodwill again through its brotherhood as a practical step towards permanent peace' have been flung to the winds. The faith in the basic principles of the movement, the Scout Law and the Scout Promise which bind every scout to be a brother to every other scout has been shaken by what has now transpired. Is the Junior League of Nations, then, a success?

The proposals lauded to the skies as being designed to extend to the non-European sections membership of the Scout movement through the medium of independent parallel organisations are given below:—

That there shall be constituted by the parent body (European) the three non-European sections of the Boy Scout Movement within the Union of South Africa and mandated territories, namely, Pathfinder Boy Scouts, Indian Boy Scouts, and coloured Boy Scouts. That any non-European section may have European officers.

That each section shall be self-governing with its own Union Council, independent administration and a constitution based on the principles of the Boy Scout Association's policy, organisation and rules. These constitutions shall be subject to the approval of the parent body, and may not therefore be altered except with its consent.

That in the event of any of the non-European councils passing any resolution considered by the parent body to be detrimental to the policy or spirit of the Scout Policy, Organisation and Rules, the matter to be referred to a committee consisting of representatives of that section and the European Scout Council, on which the European Scout Council shall have a majority vote. The number of representatives on the committee shall be four from the parent body, and two from the section concerned, and the quorum shall be in the same ratio. Minutes of the council meetings of each section shall be sent to the parent body and co-ordinate sections within a month.

That the Council of the South African branch of the Boy Scout Association is empowered to deal with all questions of registration with the International Bureau.

The Union Scout Council subscribes to the view of the inter-relation of colour set out by Lord Lugard, former Governor General of Nigeria in the following

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

667

words:— "Here, then, is the true conception of the inter-relation of colour—complete uniformity in ideals, absolute equality in the paths of knowledge and culture, equal opportunities for those who strive, equal admiration for those who achieve; in matters social and racial a separate path, each pursuing its own race purity and race pride; equality in things spiritual, agreed divergence in the physical and the material."

Thus the Union Scout Council has come to recognise that it is not possible in South Africa to form one movement embodying that principle of the International Scout Movement which provides that there shall be no distinction of race; and strange is the notion that by the creation of these three separate and self-governing bodies the benefits of scout training and scout methods can in the right spirit and form be extended to all races within the Union without requiring or permitting any form of social admixture which, it is explained, the community as a whole is not prepared to accept. It is clear that the proposals adumbrated do not at all mean amalgamation, or affiliation or any form of closer union between the European and non-European sections of the community, as the Union Scout Council emphasized in its proceedings that it is not intended that there shall be any joint scout activities, but that each section shall pursue its separate path along its own racial lines.

The tragedy of the whole situation lies in the disconcerting circumstance that the Chief Scout was not only present at the meeting of the South African Scout Council, but congratulated the Association on the successful conclusions reached thereat. Under the circumstances, the patronising attitude of the whites in giving the benefits of the character-training boy scout movement to the children of the coloured races will not develop their character, but will undermine their self-respect and self-reliant nature. The self-respect of the Indian community requires that their scout movement should, instead of being affiliated to the South African Scout Council, be affiliated to the Headquarters in India, where, fortunately, there is no colour prejudice in scouting. Considering the desperate struggle the Indian community in that land is having, the Agent-General in South Africa may consider the establishment of the scout movement on proper lines a trivial matter; and it would be no wonder if the scout idea has not yet formed part of his immediate programme.

Another suggestion I venture to make is the deputation to South Africa of an efficient contingent of Boy Scouts from India. The success of the mission of the company of the Indian Girl Guides only two years ago from the Arya Kanya Mahavidyalaya, Baroda, wearing khaki jackets and knickerbockers, with daggers slung at their sides, and swaying by their eloquence an audience of about 3,000 to outbursts of wild enthusiasm in the Selborne Hall should be green in the memories of all scouts. A 16-year old guide said that they had come to present a true picture of modern India, and urged the Indian women there to preserve their individuality. The Mayor expressed his great pleasure to be present, and wished the Girl Guides a happy tour of the Union. Addressing a Kumbakonam audience after his return from South Africa, Mr. Sastry made a powerful plea for the establishment of an institution of missionaries of young men and women who will go abroad among our people in foreign lands for five years or so at a time in order to maintain the cultural and spiritual connections. Who can be better missionaries of Indian culture and Indian civilisation than a group of Indian scouts and rovers fired with the spirit of service and sacrifice, their hearts surging with emotions of love and brotherhood? I, therefore, commend, for the kind consideration of the Baden-Powell and Seva Samiti Scout Headquarters in India, the question of the affiliation of the Indian Scout Movement in South Africa, and the deputation to South Africa of fine representatives of Indian National Scouting, Indian culture and Indian civilisation.

"WORLD BROTHERHOOD."

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

At the annual luncheon of the Associated Press in New York on April 20, 1936, Sir Wilmott Lewis, Washington correspondent of the London Times, warned the newspapers that "both in England and the United States the danger which confronts what we call the freedom of the press is not chiefly from without, for that we can meet, but from within. It is, as I see it, a danger which grows with the growth and with the increasing integration of the newspaper system—the danger that the freedom which makes us great and useful may make some among us too great, that individuals may acquire a power which (if the freedom we demand is to be ours) they cannot be prevented from harnessing in the service of personal ambition rather than of the community from which their strength flows."

He insisted that "there has never lived, and will never be born, a man wise and good enough to be entrusted with the irresponsible power over human thought, and the action which follows thought, which ownership of many newspapers conveys in the modern world, and the freedom to exercise it in the service of his own interest. To say that his interest might also be those of the community is to say something which might periodically be true, but cannot be generally true. It is to forget human pride and human weakness, and to break with history."

Quoting Graham Wallas, the British philosopher, on the position of the modern press as "the most insoluble problem of democracy," Sir Wilmott attributed Wallas' attitude to the fact that the owner of a group of newspapers "has more absolute irresponsibility in the use of great power than any other living man" as long as "his newspapers pay and the telephone from his house to the editorial offices is in working order." If this power is used to tamper with the news it becomes "the greatest danger which confronts popular government, because the news is the chief source of opinion by which government in democratic countries must proceed."

Edward A. Filene, the Boston merchant, created something of a furore among certain newspaper owners when he declared that "in America—at least theoretically—the people rule. What kind of a government we have depends upon their votes, and how people vote depends on how well they understand the issues at stake. Daily they read their newspapers because they want to keep informed, and they read them not only for the news but for the interpretation of the news, for some understanding of the meaning of events. And yet, in a great national crisis in which our national administration, working for better distribution of wealth, has somehow come into conflict with the great financial and business interests, it turns out that our newspapers—the very source of the average voter's information and education—are usually owned and controlled by these same special interests."

On January 16, 1936, Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, in a broadcast address before

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

668

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June :20

realpatidar.com

the Michigan Press Association, used the occasion to reply to Mr. Filene. Mr. Knox declared that he was "unable to understand how a man of such wide knowledge of affairs as Mr. Filene could possibly have fathered such an allegation." Moreover, he regarded Mr. Filene's statement as "an indictment of the American press" charging that the press is "the mouthpiece of big business" and that it is "controlled in its editorial functions by financial considerations."

To this Mr. Knox replied that "the real and genuine freedom of the press in the United States dates from the development in the last decade of the nineteenth century of the art of advertising and the choice of the newspaper as the major medium for its expression." Thus "it was only when the newspaper, through the means of advertising revenue, became financially self-supporting that the American press became really independent and wholly free. Those who prate about 'box-office control' of newspaper policy know nothing of newspaper history and nothing of present-day newspaper management."

However, Mr. Knox admitted that there were "isolated examples of newspaper freedom" prior to the days when newspaper advertising became the vogue. "But the few organs of free speech of those days were almost lost among the 'kept newspapers' that lived by subsidy of one form or another."

After citing leading newspapers in many cities Mr. Knox asked whether Mr. Filene contended that they were "owned or controlled by the 'special interest' and were pulling chest nuts out of the fire for special interest." He declared that Mr. Filene "surely knows there are no newspapers more completely independent of any form of financial duress than those included in the great Hearst, Scripps-Howard, Block and Gannett Chains, and the Booth group here in Michigan," and that "what I have said concerning the large publications is equally true of the much larger number of newspapers published in the smaller cities of the country."

Speed is the life-blood of INDUSTRY

Do your business
BY TELEPHONE

USE THE INDIAN
Air Mails
for correspondence.

INDIAN POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS DEPT.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

19381
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

669

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 8 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT - BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:-BARODA.

Branches:-Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harli (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mili Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand, Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharlal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallai Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratli (Shorrocks Mill, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to:-

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Drott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

realpatidar.com
Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

670

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 20

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

THE

Central Bank of India, Ltd.

SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,

Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Virangam (District Ahmedabad).
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulla (District West Khandesa).
Karad (" ").	Doudalcha (" ").
Tasgaon (" ").	Nandurbar (" ").
Satara (" ").	Shirpur (" ").
Kirloskarwadi (" ").	Shahada (" ").
Shirala (" ").	Sakri (" ").
Koregaon (" ").	Sindkheda (" ").
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malgaon (District Nashik).
Shevgaon (" ").	Satana (" ").
Ahmednagar (" ").	Kalwan (" ").
Bulwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panch Matals).
Palghar (" ").	Kalol (" ").
Kalyan (" ").
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS:

Sir Chinnilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhowjee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandekar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

671

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and
soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents :—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—

1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.
3. The Mysore Emporium, Kitab Mahal, Hornby Road, Fort, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 345.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office: KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JUNE 27, 1936. No. 43

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Britain and Ethiopia.
The Viceroy and Rural Uplift.
Christian Depressed Classes.
"Sold in Marriage."
Habu Bhagwandas Marriage.
A Case for Enhanced Sentence.
Gandhiji and Birth Prevention.
Mrs. Sanger on India.

Revolution and Reform.
I was a Missionary.
Movement for World Christianity.
Buddhism and World Problems.
Mother India as I saw Her.
Education for Social Work.
Caste and Industrial Progress.

NOTES

Britain and Ethiopia:—The attitude of the British Cabinet to the Italian annexation by force of Ethiopia has been condemned by the Opposition leaders in Parliament in terms seldom before used in Parliament. It has been stigmatised as treacherous, despicable, cowardly. There is no need to add any more adjectives to emphasise this condemnation. The Government defence in a few words is that nothing but military action can avail against Italy and Great Britain can not take such action because no other country is prepared to join her. This may be due to the fear that Britain by herself is not strong enough to fight Italy or that Ethiopian Independence is not a British concern, or both. This is not unreasonable. But if this was the line Britain intended to adopt, she ought to have refrained from the first from interfering in the affair. Ethiopia, unable to obtain help from anywhere against the invader, would have submitted to him and much loss of life would have been avoided. The most charitable view that can be taken of the British Government's attitude, is that the Cabinet had no definite ideas or policy and that it merely waited on events. It hoped that the war would last much longer and that Italy would be forced by want of resources to stop her aggression and seek the intervention of Britain and the League of Nations. Italy has shown that the power of wealth in international affairs is always on the side of the strong and aggressive. Hitler's Germany is another proof of the same truth. The strong man armed is not afraid of the rich man. Japan is yet another. Where a nation can manufacture her own arms and ammunition, including poison gas, it may snap its fingers at the wealthy nations whose sole concern is to keep the marauder from laying hands on their possessions. From the first, we were sceptical about the humanity of economic sanctions. They affect mostly the civil population. Women and children and the aged and the infirm feel their effect. In the present case, the one article the banning of the export of which to Italy would have seriously hampered her in the prosecution of the war, namely, oil, was not covered by the economic sanctions. Signor Mussolini declared that he would regard a ban on oil as an act of war, and nobody dared to challenge his declaration. Even the outrages on the Red Cross failed to evoke effective protest. The European nations including Britain never seriously intended to stop Italy's aggression. How can they? They had by treaties made behind Ethiopia's back recognised that Italy had a predominant interest in that country. If Ethiopia had not been a member of the League of Nations, the plan would have gone through. But Ethiopia was a member and the Emperor was determined that if his country was to go under, the League should go down with it. This is what has happened. Talk of reconstructing the League is absurd. India, at any rate, does not believe in reconstructing it and Indian opinion is strongly opposed to this country's further participation in it. Britain emerges from this affair with her prestige greatly impaired. The pity of it is that India against her wishes will be obliged to follow the British Government in its blunders.

The Viceroy and Rural Uplift:—In his circular letter to Governors of Provinces commending to their attention the important problem of cattle breeding as a means of improving the condition of the peasantry, Lord Linlithgow refers to the closely connected question of fodder supply. His Excellency says that he is having it considered officially as he feels very strongly that there is no point in trying to improve the breed of cattle if the fodder is not there for their nourishment. The simplest and most natural way of meeting the fodder deficiency is to reserve pasture lands in every village. This can be done only by the State assuming responsibility for seeing that no animal useful to husbandry dies of starvation. When the stud bulls have done their duty, the cost of maintaining the cows during the months of gestation is beyond the means of the peasantry. Many young cows are sent to the slaughter house because their owners can not afford to maintain them when they are not yielding milk. Unless Government or other agencies come to the relief of the raiyat either with a subsidy or by taking over the care of the cows for the time being, it is to be feared that the animals will be killed for food before they bring pedigree

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

674

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| June 27

calves into the world. One thing leads to another, and unless the problem is viewed and dealt with as a whole, the best intentioned efforts are liable to end in failure. The Viceroy is also interesting himself in the question of improving the nutritive quality of the peasant's daily food. In a country where custom and sentiment and climatic conditions favour vegetarian food, milk is the most valuable addition that can be suggested for improving the people's dietary. The cattle breeding movement thus fits into the movement for improving the diet of the people. In this connection, His Excellency, we trust, will look into the question of the adequacy or inadequacy of the food grown in the country. We published last week the speech of the Japanese Consul in Calcutta in which he said that Japan benefits India by buying a large quantity of cotton from her. But is it really beneficial to any country that she should grow a large surplus of raw material which she herself can not manufacture and must export to another country which returns it, made up into goods, to compete with her own goods in her home market? Much attention is paid in the United States at present to the loss to the soil occasioned by overproduction of one or a few kinds of agricultural produce. It seems to be foolish to impoverish our soil by growing cotton for Japan while the growth of food grains on the land will directly raise the standard of health of the people, returning to the soil the unused waste matter to fertilise it.

Christian Depressed Classes:—The question whether Indian Christians who were themselves, or whose forefathers were, before conversion, members of the classes known among Hindus as antyajas or depressed classes, are entitled to the special educational concessions provided for the latter, arose some time back in connection with the order of the Madras Government extending these concessions to the former. The same question was debated in the United Provinces Legislative Council last week at Naini Tal. In the Budget session some months ago the Government had carried against the protest of the leader of the Opposition, Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, a grant of Rs. 10,000 for 'Indian Christians whose origin is from among the depressed classes, for education and for aiding missions working amongst the depressed classes.' At the Naini Tal session, Syed Zahar Ali moved that Government should not spend the grant or such portion thereof which had not yet been spent. The motion was supported by several non-official members many of whom, like the mover himself, were Muslims, their main argument being that converts to Christianity ceased to be members of the depressed classes. This was also the opinion of the framers of the Order in Council where it is distinctly laid down that 'no Indian Christian shall be deemed to be a member of a scheduled caste.' Mr. Chintamani put the point of view of the Opposition clearly. His objection, he said, was not to the expenditure of Rs. 10,000 on education for Indian Christian children but to the political complication introduced in the matter by the note defining the purpose of the grant. He declared that the certain effect of helping missions engaged among the depressed classes, would be to give a powerful incentive to the conversion from their ancestral faith of the depressed classes into the fold of those who were offering them worldly benefits. The Director of Public Instruction, Mr. H. R. Harrop, defended the grant for the purposes stated in the note. But the Minister of Education, Sir Jwala Prasad Srivastava, admitted that the sentence to which exception was taken was a very unfortunate one and he did not know how it had slipped into the budget. The point of the Minister's argument to which we would call special attention, is that it was impossible to include Indian Christians among depressed classes, as they had changed their religion. The Minister also stressed the fact—an awkward one for advocates of mass conversions—that change of religion had made no difference in the condition of these Christians. He accepted the motion which was passed without dissent but said he would apply for a grant for the benefit of Indian Christian children who were backward. Mr. Chintamani did not object to this being done.

"Sold in Marriage":—We regret that in commenting last week on the report in The Bombay Chronicle that women were sold by raiyats to pay rent to their zamindars in Bihar, we accepted the story as substantially correct. A communication from its Patna correspondent has been subsequently published by our contemporary which takes away from the sensationalism of the earlier news. Mr. Harihar Prasad definitely asserts that many raiyats in Bihar had been compelled to pay rent by selling their daughters and sisters. "He also refers to a specific case in which ... a raiyat was confronted with the rent decree against him and that he could only pay the money by selling his daughter in marriage," writes the Chronicle correspondent from Patna. Selling in marriage is not an evil confined to Bihar or Bihar raiyats alone. "Sold in Marriage" is a good slogan in the campaign against the dowry system, but in the campaign for improving the economic life of the Bihar peasant it is ridiculous—particularly so when in that very province there has been established an agency for marriage reform. A few years back a "Marriage League" was started in Patna to fight the dowry system which is of peculiar strength in that province, in all classes. From the reports of that organisation, the evil seemed to be as intense among the middle and upper classes as among the poor. It is very probable, therefore, that the only difference prosperity would have made to the peasant who sold his daughter in marriage for Rs. 700, would have been to make him stand out for a higher price. To take one particular victim of the dowry system and hold him up as an instance of the hardship imposed by landlords on their raiyats is a method of propaganda which will do little good to the cause it

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

675 supports. It is the more difficult to understand as even without it the raiyat has quite a good case.

Babu Bhagwandas Marriage Bill:—The opinion is gaining ground that without the monogamous principle, Babu Bhagwandas's Intercaste Marriage Bill will land the Hindu community in social chaos. The Bombay Hindu Social Reform Association has declared itself to be opposed to the Bill if it does not expressly provide that a person who has a wife living can not take advantage of it. Professor M. D. Altekar in a letter to the Leader of Allahabad observes that "the Bill in its present simple form, if passed into law, will be one of the most mischievous pieces of legislation, and one more instrument in the hands of misguided or wicked males to torture Hindu women." The Professor continues: "I do not know about other provinces but in my province (Bombay) and in the neighbouring provinces of Berar and C. P. certain marriages (mostly intercaste and largely between highly educated parties) have taken place in which the husband has the first wife living and in many cases (but not necessarily always) she happens to be married when she was young and not very much educated and an educated girl comes along and bags her husband and the first wife is simply deserted. It is all very well to lecture the first wife about the sacramental nature of marriage and the necessity of her resigning to her fate, but what this new Bill, under the guise of reform, proposes to do is to issue a general license to males to give up their wedded wives and to effect unions with girls of other castes. Is the object of the Bill to encourage intercaste marriages or is it to encourage the desertion of wives? You cannot have it both ways. The cases may be a few (they are not as few as Dr. Bhagwandas appears to imagine them to be) but why allow injustice even to a few? Every intercaste marriage, now that we want it to be made valid by law, must be a monogamous marriage." What Professor Altekar says of Maharashtra is true of other provinces.

A Case for Enhanced Sentence:—Torture as a means of detecting crime, wherever restored to, is proof that the investigating agency is incompetent as well as brutal. It is a sort of vindictive action against persons whom a policeman wants to admit having committed a crime but who refuse to do so. Instead of taking the trouble of investigating a case by collecting all the evidence that could be traced, the policeman tortures the suspect to help him to get a clue. A particularly cowardly and brutal case of torture of two women—mother and daughter—by a Sub-Inspector of Police, was disposed of last week by the District and Sessions Judge of Poona. It was a case of theft; and the Sub-Inspector, Agnihotri, sent for the two women to the village temple and tortured them into making a confession. Not finding the stolen property in the place where they "confessed" to have hidden the property, he again tortured the poor women with redoubled vigour. The mother died from the effects before her husband, whom she had sent for, arrived. The Judge, according to the report in the Bombay Chronicle (June 23), held that violence was used to the mother and daughter, that the former died of the shock as a result of the injuries sustained at the hands of the accused, Agnihotri, and sentenced him to nine months rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100. Having regard to the enormity of the crime and to the position of the Sub-Inspector who is expected to set an example to his men, the sentence is absurdly inadequate. We hope Government will move the High Court to enhance the sentence. Conduct such as that of this police officer, is largely responsible for the distrust in Government agency especially among ignorant villagers. Few cases come to light. It is therefore important that when a case is proved, exemplary punishment should be awarded.

Gandhiji and Birth Prevention:—Irene Clyde, author of "Eve's Sour Apples", writes from London. "Mahatma Gandhi's answers to the British Preventer, in the interview in your paper for 1st February, were cramped by his admission that intercourse was permissible and desirable if perpetrated for the sake of progeny. It appears to me that such an admission destroys his whole case. If for progeny, why not for pleasure? There is no magic in progeny. It simply means attachment to the world of Maya—to corporeal existence in time. Hindu thought is no doubt concentrated on this continuance of corporeal existence of the family. But the thought of the West is emancipated from it. Neither for the sake of progeny nor for anything else, can a really one-pointed spirit recognize sex. Since sex spells division into two sects—one devoted to comparative sternness and the other to comparative subservience—a really generous mind will energetically repudiate the distinction, and will press forward to encompass all nobleness, all sweetness and all independence. Neither for the sake of progeny nor pleasure—neither for priests, physicians or politicians—will it stoop to sex limitations. Therefore it will do nothing of this flagrant kind to fasten the shackles of sex upon itself." This is a new argument which ignores posterity altogether.

Mrs. Sanger on India:—The Union of East and West, of which George Lansbury is president, held a reception on May 21, 1936, in honour of Mrs. Margaret Sanger, leader of the birth control movement, on her return from India in the Hotel New Yorker, New York City. Mr. Kedernath Das Gupta, Director of the Union of East and West, presided, and in introducing Mrs. Sanger, said, "We are fortunate tonight in having with us an American woman, who has been acclaimed by Dr. John Haynes Holmes as one of the ten greatest women in the world. Mrs. Sanger took with her to India, Sympathy, Understanding, and Kindliness, as her travelling companions." We print Mrs. Sanger's address on another page.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 27

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, June 27, 1936.

REVOLUTION AND REFORM.

The most noteworthy feature of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's Autobiography regarded as a statement of Indian political ideology—we dislike the word but the Pandit is fond of it—is its failure to understand the point of view of those who hold that it is possible for India to fulfil her world destiny without cutting herself adrift from the British Empire. This view comes naturally to those who have worked to effect social and religious reforms in Hindu society and have not succumbed to the temptation to end the struggle by quitting it. That social and religious reform is a far more formidable undertaking than political reform, goes without saying. In the early days of the National Congress, that body was criticised for not including social reform in its programme of work. There were many apologists for the exclusion, amongst them being Dadabhai Naoroji and A. O. Hume himself. But what caught the public fancy and seemed to be conclusive, was the brilliant thesis of Telang, based on the principle, observed in natural processes, of following the line of least resistance. Telang argued that it was comparatively easier to persuade our British rulers to grant political reforms than to persuade our conservative kith and kin to accept social reforms. To him and to many others of his generation it was a far harder task to work for social reform than for political reform. Many of the Congress leaders were sympathetic to social reform and the leaders of social reform were in sympathy with the political objectives of the Congress. There was very close co-operation between them, and the idea of quitting Hindu society or the British Empire as a short cut to social and political reforms never occurred to them. They accepted the British Empire, as they accepted Hindu society, as a heritage which it was their sacred duty to strive to improve and which it would be disloyalty to their own best selves to think of abandoning. There was a historical background to this conviction. India was not conquered by the British as South Africa was or as Ethiopia by the Italians. There is no need to enlarge on this fact as Pandit Jawaharlal quotes from Seeley in his book and Seeley was the first to bring out this unique feature of British Indian history in his "Expansion of England." The British were welcomed as deliverers from a humiliating tyranny in many parts of the country, nowhere worse than in the Pandit's own beautiful Kashmir. Due to circumstances which he could not help, the Nehru household before the advent of the Theosophical Society and its European and American evangelists, had stood completely outside the orbit of the movements which heralded the Hindu renaissance. It, or rather its head who ruled it with something of the rigour of the Roman paterfamilias, had embraced Europeanism, conspicuously in externals, as the absolute good.

Indian reform movements lay beyond its purview. It is this aloofness from the main current of Hindu thought that accounts for Pandit Jawaharlal's lack of insight into the sentiments which made Hindu reformers regard British rule as on the whole a blessing not a curse.

In the slight sketch of his own Life which Raja Ram Mohan Roy sent to Miss Carpenter, he said that, when he had to leave the paternal roof owing to his strong views on the idolatrous practices of Hinduism, he travelled through different countries within and without Hindustan "with a feeling of great aversion to the establishment of the British Power in India." He went on to say: "When I reached the age of twenty (he was sixteen when he was expelled from his home) my father recalled me, and restored me to his favour; after which I first saw and began to associate with Europeans, and soon after made myself tolerably acquainted with their laws and form of government. Finding them generally more intelligent, more steady, and moderate in their conduct, I gave up my prejudice against them, and became inclined in their favour, feeling persuaded that their rule, though a foreign yoke, would lead more speedily and surely to the amelioration of the native inhabitants." Ranade held and expressed publicly that British rule had replaced the personal rule of Indian princes by the reign of law, that it was a dispensation needed to discipline us in certain qualities of citizenship, in which both Hindus and Mahomedans were lacking, and that when its mission was fulfilled, it will drop off like a ripe fruit from the tree. Raja Ram Mohan Roy and Ranade were profoundly religious men but they were not fools nor were they lacking in patriotism. The Pandit does not believe in religion. His father regarded it as a women's affair. They may be right and the reformers entirely wrong. That does not justify the supercilious, almost contemptuous, tone in which Pandit Jawaharlal refers to those who cling to the older tradition. We hold no brief for the Liberals. We regard Dominion Status which they cherish as their political goal, as a misnomer to apply to India. We think that by their weakness for pulling Government chestnuts out of the fire even when, against their earnest advice, Government have chosen to thrust them in, they are doing great disservice to Government first, and to the country next. Not until the British public and statesmen come to believe that when an Indian statesman says that a scheme is unworkable, he means it without any mental reserve that he will work it when it comes, can there be the basis of any sort of honourable understanding between Indians and Englishmen. At the same time, we recognise that many Liberals have no other reason in taking up this obviously paradoxical attitude than the apprehension that, by strengthening the hands of non-co-operators, they may be laying the country open to a repetition of the humiliation and suffering which it has had to endure without any tangible result. Not only does the Pandit himself fail to appreciate the ideal of working from within the Empire but he dismisses the great speech at the Faridpur Conference—his last—in which Mr. Chittaranjan Das held up this as a greater ideal than Independence as “the speech of a person who is a little tired.”

I WAS A MISSIONARY.*

(BY G. B. HALSTEAD.)

This is a perfectly frank story of progressive disillusionment. Some readers will consider it an indictment of the mission system; others a challenge to redeem the true worth of the missionary impulse and to recast it in terms of modern social forces. And still others may merely dismiss it as a tale of utterly foolish, impetuous and impractical idealism. However, the motive impelling me to write it is not the desire to sit in judgment on the entire mission programme and personnel. I have the greatest respect for a certain few mission projects and the deepest admiration for a considerable number of missionaries, both American and English, who I know are genuinely trying to match their lives with their Gospel and the needs of the land they are serving. My purpose is to relate a story of an unfolding human experience that I feel may prove both interesting and significant.

On August tenth I sailed for India as a missionary under the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Early in the morning of April fifteenth, almost four years later I returned to my native land, no longer a missionary. Between these two dates my faith in the traditional mission system had slowly dwindled until it had all but vanished. Moreover, my earlier romantic ideas of the glory and justice of the British Empire had been replaced by a personal experience with the unpleasant reality of British Imperialism in India. But if this process had proved disheartening it had also been very exciting at times. And I trust it was not entirely lacking in a moral.

As I sit turning over the pages of my diary, I now realize how highly idealistic were my former conceptions of missions and missionaries. Thoughts jotted down during my last semester in college remind me that I then looked upon the rank and file of missionaries as true, consistent, sacrificial disciples of the Galilean Carpenter, earnestly seeking to identify themselves with the people they had gone to serve. Such ideas obviously left me feeling inadequate and unworthy to enter upon the ‘noble adventure’ ahead. In my diary I now find this statement, “When I compare my comfortable life with those of the people to whom I am going, how can I preach the religion of Jesus with effectiveness... I have so many unshared goods.” It was typical of the attitude of humility and simplicity that I then thought should, and did, characterize missionaries out on the far-flung frontiers of expanding Christianity. As I re-read these sentiments I am frankly puzzled as to whether I should smile ‘in wordly wisdom’ at this earlier naive idealism, or feel sad that something high and fine has been shattered.

En route to India I met, in Geneva, Switzerland, C. F. Andrews, the famous English missionary and intimate friend of Gandhi. This saintly man at once became my hero and model. Foolishly I assumed that most missionaries in India aspired to be like him. It was not long before I realized how mistaken I had been. However, such were the attitudes and idealism with which I entered India as a missionary.

*The first of a short series of articles giving the experiences of the writer who had come out to India as a missionary in 1929.

I shall never quite forget my first impressions of the mission station to which I had been assigned. It is difficult to adequately express the surprise and shock I received on that first day as my carriage entered the drive of the mission compound and I learned that the group of very spacious and attractive houses immediately ahead were the residences of the ‘missionary sahibs’. At once the thought flashed through my mind, and I noted it that night in my diary, “Why, these homes, with their beautifully kept lawns and gardens appear infinitely better than those of most middle-class American families.” Yet America is the richest country in the world, and India, the poorest! But if my first glimpse of the exterior of mission homes created indelible impressions of living standards that were in sharp and ironic contrast with those of the Indian masses I had seen since landing in Bombay, such impressions were vastly strengthened and extended by my initial experiences with the social life of the mission station.

How these Christians could entertain in their expensively furnished homes! Teas that would have made many a Park Avenue matron look to her social laurels. Six and seven course dinners, done flawlessly and served by one or two uniformed bearers. Could these things really be true, I pondered? Was this the mission field of my idealism? Life suddenly became the strangest kind of a jig-saw puzzle. I couldn’t seem to make any of the pieces fit. Here on one hand was the appalling need of India and on the other the very real sacrifices of many persons back home who were giving to support the missionary movement. But the living standards of the missionaries didn’t seem to fit with either. Somehow something tragic had happened. Someone had frightfully mixed up the Christian scale of values.

I ultimately realized that one has to go deep in the history of the missionary movement for an understanding of this paradoxical situation. This was suggested by an article I read in a missionary journal shortly after my arrival in India. Incorporated in it was a copy of a financial statement of property and building investments of the mission in the year 1864. Summarized it indicated that 24,000 rupees had been expended up to date and of this 12,500 rupees, over one half of the total, had gone into three large residences for the missionaries and 4,000 more into the land on which their houses were built. With the 7,500 rupees left, the mission erected a schoolhouse, a chapel and requisites, house for two ‘native’ helpers and, ominously enough, the enclosure for the mission cemetery. Here indeed was a strange tale of twisted values, I thought. Sixteen and one half thousand rupees for merely housing three missionary families, and less than 7000 for a schoolhouse, chapel and houses of two Indian workers. In time I came to believe that most mission stations I visited stood as abiding monuments to such a past distortion.

It remained for another aspect of the mission compound to give my idealism an even greater shock. It was the living quarters of the servants, located within a stone’s throw of the comfortable homes of the missionaries. Here lived some of the household servants of the missionaries as well as a few of the college. It would be more accurate to say, ‘here existed’, for in this section I found whole families, in some cases of six and seven members, existing in one room, windowless brick houses about twelve by eight feet in size. In addition these tiny houses were shared by the families’ chickens, goats and dogs, not to speak of those uninvited guests, the mice, snakes and scorpions. It was not that these poor human creatures wanted

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

678
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

June 27

to live like this. The plain fact was that they weren't paid enough to live any better. Most of them were in debt even in spite of such low living standards. I came away from my first visit to those quarters sick at heart. Could not we missionaries realize that the contrast existing between these miserable huts of the servants of the East and the living quarters of the western 'Servants of Christianity' vitiated much of our Christian message and ministry? How much more consistent and respected we would be if our mission compounds were small working models of the Kingdom of God on earth for which we prayed so earnestly, and about which we seemed to understand so little. Efforts on the part of a former missionary to substantially ameliorate these conditions of the servants had proved futile, as did mine subsequently. The mission pleaded poverty. But there always seemed to be ample money for any repairs that might be needed on the houses of missionaries.

Salary considerations were another source of disillusionment. In spite of my western background and standards, I just couldn't feel comfortable about my salary. It was small according to American standards but I soon discovered it to be more than twenty-four times the income of the average Indian. The servant who brought it to me received just one-twentieth of what I did. He had a large family to support and I had only my wife and myself. Even more disconcerting was the case of my Indian associate. He was at least ten years my senior in age and considerably more in experience and knowledge of the country, which, after all, was his motherland. When I arrived in the mission college he was the assistant director of the hostels. I assumed that logically he would be made director and I would become his assistant, at least for as long a time as it took me to adjust to the culture of the country. But to my surprise and discomfort I was informed that I would take over the position of director at once with this Indian man as my assistant. Protests were of no avail. It was then that I learned that the pattern of imperialism has come to materially define the social role of all white men in India, whether officials or non-officials. And this role is to be superior whenever possible to the 'native'. It appears to exert almost as much force in the mission system as in the imperial. But to return to my assistant. When I took over the hostels my wife and I, with our few needs, were given a spacious house, comfortably furnished by the mission and equipped with large over-head electric fans in practically every room. His family of eight with their many needs occupied quarters only half as large as ours, with a few scanty pieces of furniture supplied by the mission and no over-head fans. It was some time before I fully understood why we didn't live in the quarters assigned to his family and his in ours. And it was with considerable reluctance and disappointment that I had to acknowledge the part played in this paradoxical situation by totally unworthy and unchristian mission attitudes and policies of the mission.

Crowning this contrast was the fact that he received a salary less than half of mine. Moreover, he was not given the allowances for doctor's bills or the costs of periods of residence in the refreshing hill stations that I received. It wasn't strange, I thought, that this man never became my friend.

The contrast I have just described was largely typical of the total situation in this Christian College. An investigation of the treasurer's books revealed that the five missionary families represented on the payroll of the college received a total of 3,426 rupees per month, whereas the remaining 34 members of the staff were paid but 5,900 rupees. But this amazing story as told by figures is not complete the way it stands, for to make it accurate there would have to be added to the missionary total a good many hundred rupees for sickness and hill allowance. However, nothing more can, or could, be added to the Indian total!

It is obviously impossible to include in this short story all of the disillusioning revelations that came to me of the inequalities between occidental and oriental Christians, and of the standards of living, the salaries, the retinues of servants and even the race prejudice of the missionaries. I am greatly tempted to tell at some length of the mission station I visited out in a rural area where the missionaries were living in the magnificent house of a former wealthy rajah. Or of the medical missionary who spent a sum that was a small fortune in India, building a beautiful American colonial house in the heart of an Indian jungle. Or of the missionary family I knew that had two sets of dishes, the poorer for their Indian guests and the better for their occidental. However, I must resist such a temptation for there are other experiences yet to be told which I feel to be of greater interest and significance. But it was revelations like these that gave a cutting edge to the statement of an Indian friend who once told me, "You missionaries don't come out here to serve; you come to enjoy." I have often wondered if these material factors don't constitute a rather tragic and all too large a part of the answer to the question of why so many missionaries who have returned to their homelands still desperately long to go back to "the mission field."

MOVEMENT FOR WORLD CHRISTIANITY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

This is to acknowledge the recent editorial on this Movement which appeared in The Indian Social Reformer.

I feel confident that, as the attitudes and the spirit of this Movement become increasingly known, friends who desire a more cordial and co-operative attitude between the great religions will increasingly appreciate it.

While our Announcement made no specific reference to the question of Mass Conversions, I feel that you have drawn the correct conclusion from the whole tenor of the Announcement. While we desire to faithfully represent Jesus and his teachings, we also desire to increasingly understand other faiths and we would urge Christians, not only to make adequate recognition, but to joyfully recognize the great values in other faiths and to rejoice in every bit of progress that those faiths are making toward the enrichment of personal and collective life.

It is so easy for the representatives of a faith to desire to have their own faiths judged by its ideals and aspirations while they judge other faiths by their attainments. Any informed and sincere Christian must, it seems to me, because of the great difference between the attainments of organized Christianity and Jesus' ideals and quality of life, approach any other religion with great humility. We sorely need all the help that the living religions can bring to our troubled life today. In saying this, I do not mean to take an attitude unfriendly to conversion, though I do not believe in Mass Conversion. I do believe that men should follow what they believe to be the truth and should be ever striving for fuller truth. If, as a result of something deep and vital that has happened in a

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

19381.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

679 man's thought and life, he is impelled to make a transfer from one religion to another, I believe that to be his right. I have been much impressed by the recent discussion in the columns of The Indian Social Reformer on the whole question of conversion and, if I have correctly interpreted your attitude, it is very much in accord with my own.

CHICAGO.
May 22, 1936. }

Yours etc.
CHARLES. J. EWALD.

BUDDHISM AND WORLD PROBLEMS.

NAMO TASSA BHAGAVATO ARAHATO SAMMA—SAM

[BUDDHASSA]

(By Bhikku Mettaya.)

As Buddhism solved all the problems of yesterday, so will it solve all the problems that India and the world are confronted with today also. In our own land, there is that bitter question of Caste with millions of our brethren preparing to leave the Hindu fold. But Buddhism knows neither Caste nor creed. Of the Brahmin who reviled the Lord Buddha saying, "Stop there you wretched shaveling! Stop there you wretched Candala!" the Master calmly inquired:

"Do you, O Brahmin, know who the real outcaste is, Or the things that make one an outcaste?" Prayed by him to reveal the true Candala, the Master said:

"He that bears hatred; he that is rancorous, wicked and envious; he that is lost in perverse views and is deceitful, know thou him as the Candala true.

"He that doth living beings harm, whether once or twice born, in whom there is no ruth for breathing beings, know thou him alone as the Candala true.

"He that, when asked to give witness, uttereth lies for sake of self, for sake of others, or for the sake of gaining wealth, know thou him alone as the Candala true.

"Forcibly or with consent, he that keepeth company with the wives of relatives or of friends, let him be as an outcaste known.

"He that, being prosperous, cherisheth not his mother and father with reverent love and kindness, know thou him as Candala true.

"He that striketh, or with cruel words annoyeth, mother, father, brother or sister, or mother-in-law, know thou him alone as Candala true.

"He that, having committed an evil deed, thinketh 'Let no one know my wicked work,'—and covereth his sins, know thou him as the Candala true.

"He that at mealtime, useth harsh words on Saint, Brahmin or monk that cometh through compassion to his door, know thou him as the Candala true.

"He that, being enveloped in ignorance, covetous of some small gain, uttereth false predictions, know thou him as the Candala true.

"He that annoyeth others by word and deed, is avaricious, evil-minded, envious and mean, deceitful and hath no shame in sinning, and feareth not blame nor the results of wicked action, he that is unconscientious, know thou him as the Candala true.

"These that I have described to Thee, these alone are Candalas called. Birth maketh not the Candala and birth maketh not the Brahmin; actions alone make one untouchable and actions alone of man a Brahmin make."

This did the Lord wipe out from the brow of our race the shame that had lasted for long. Further, when the Lord took to sonship the untouchable Sunita of Rajagaha, and extolled his excellence saying:—

"Sanctifying discipline of senses, holiest living, and virtue and wisdom,—these alone make the Brahmin, and the highest Brahmin is he," that day was established for ever the honour of the noble race that renders society the sovereign service.

The Lord Buddha teaches even the lowest to become like a Brahmin and to live like a god wafting everywhere the fragrance of virtue. In Buddhist countries the lowest sit together with the highest and listen to the words of the Master. Further, when one enters the holy order, the highest in the land reverence him even by falling at his feet. An incident in the life of Asoka shows well how in this Aryan religion caste gave way to virtue and wisdom. One day when the devout emperor saluted the disciples of Lord Buddha by touching their feet with his head, a minister told him, "My Lord, it befits thee not to prostrate thyself before bhikkhus of all castes."

To which the emperor made answer: "Yea, by a sentiment of pride and delusion, fostered by beauty of body and power dost thou seek to dissuade me from prostrating myself at the feet of the saintly. And if my head, this worthless object which no man desires even if offered for nothing, meet with an opportunity of purification and acquiring some merit thereby, what is there unlawful in such a worthy action? In the sons of the Buddha thou regardest nought save the renunciation of caste and thou beholdest not their sublime virtues; puffed up with pride of birth thou forgettest thy error, both thyself and others. The Dhamma is concerned with virtue, and that has nothing to do with the caste. When a man of high birth falls into vice, he is blamed by the world; why then should not a man of low birth win all honour when he attains the highest sanctity and remains yet humble? It is by considering character that men's bodies are honoured or despised. These unworldly ascetics are worthy of all honour as their character has been completely changed and purified by the words of the Lord of Compassion."

Fa-Hian, speaking of ancient Mathura says: "The faith here is becoming very popular; and all the kings of the countries in northern to the west of the desert are firm believers. When they make offering to monks, they remove their turbans, and together with their families and officials of the court wait personally upon the monks. At the end of the meal they spread carpets on the ground, and sit down facing the president, not venturing to sit on couches in the presence of monks. The arrangements at these ceremonies of the Faith have been handed down by tradition from the time when Buddha was in the world even to the present day."

Let me here mention the fact that Buddhist kings pay homage even to their horse-keepers once they entered the order.

Now we come to war, with the fear of which the whole world trembles to-day. I shall here quote a few verses I had reserved from the Vasala Sutta. To Bharadvaja the Lord Buddha said:

"He that destroys or lays siege to villages, towns and cities, and by such ignoble actions is known as enemy, him know thou to be Candala true.

"He that being no saint, feigns sanctity, and is a thief in all the worlds, know thou him as the lowest Candala." This Mirror of Truth we keep before those mighty names of history, Alexander and Attila, Napoleon and Nelson, Caesar and the Kaiser and even before the Duce and the Pope, that deputy of God who has surprised all the world by praising the triumph of his people, the barbarism that made an end of the independence of Abyssinia.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

680
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| June 27

Buddhism never allows war and it is the one religion that has an unbroken history of peace and loving service. Never was a drop of blood spilled for the spread of this religion and it is the one religion that can prevent war. The simplest of Buddhist refrain from the five un-Aryan trades:—viz. trade in slaves and animals, trade in weapons, trade in poison, trade in fish and flesh and trade in liquor.

Thus the simplest tenets of Buddhism will ensure everlasting peace for the world. Let me here quote the Rev. J. T. Sunderland on the world's religions and war. Says this friend of humanity :

"If we were asked what religion has best promoted peace in the world, I am quite sure we could not say Christianity. Is it not plain that a candid survey of history would compel us to answer, Buddhism? Indeed, it seems to be true that, if we make the single exception of the Mohammedan peoples, there have not been any where else in the world so many and so terrible wars during the last thousand years and more as among Christian peoples."

Again, a beautiful passage in Fielding Hall's great book, the Soul of a People says :

"No ravished country has ever borne witness to the prowess of the followers of the Buddha; no murdered men have poured out their blood on their hearth-stones, killed in His name; no ruined women have cursed His name to high Heaven. He and His faith are clean of the stain of blood. He was the preacher of the Great Peace, of love, of charity, of compassion and so clear is His teaching that it can never be misunderstood."

To-day, with the sublimation of brute force by the West, these virtues are looked down upon as qualities of the weak. But India has shown the world that virtue is not weakness. According to Megasthenes, the inhabitants of Aryavarta were as valiant as they were virtuous, and they even excelled all other Asiatics in valour.

But great is the danger that lies in this teaching of the West. We find even such a leader of thought as Herman Keyserling spurning such sublime virtues like gentle love, compassion, humanity, obedience, long suffering and altruism as feminine qualities, and declaring that:

"We are already on the point of overcoming compassion, the fatal superstition that making others happy is in itself meritorious, that altruism possesses value itself.....we are on the point of supplanting these ideas by the general recognition that productive effort is ethically justified; that causing others to suffer is better than suffering with others!"

Why did Whitman say then :

"I do not ask the wounded person how he feels, I myself become the wounded person, My hurts turn livid upon me as I lean on a cane and observe."

Yes I banish compassion, and banish the sacrificial love that makes the eider duck pluck out under great pain the down of her own breast to make a soft nest for her little ones! The day that the whole world accepts these ugly doctrines, it will come to an end, for "each slays a slayer, and in turn is slain."

But so long as Buddhism is adhered to, the world will be spared the sight of such a catastrophe, for the song that the faithful daily sing is,

"Even as a mother, at the risk of her own life, saves the life of her one dear babe, so should limitless love be practised towards all living beings."

He that practises such love is a true Brahmin, and even in this life and this world he lives like the great Brahma, with faultless and saving thoughts towards all. Further, Buddhism teaches that salvation of the world is through a Brahmin, a Brahmin full of pity, pure and wise. This Brahminhood is limited not only to the twice-born, but even the humblest can gain it by sacred virtue, sacrificial love, unwearying service in the cause of humanity, and sublime wisdom. In our sacred books it is written that the next Saviour to come, the Buddha Metteyya (Sanskrit, Maitraya the Benevolent or the Mother-loving One), will be born a Brahmin, in the eternal city of Benares. Mother India then will not be a down-trodden land, and Benares will be called Ketumati, the City of Banners, and all India a Buddhist Nation!

MOTHER INDIA AS I SAW HER*.

(BY MARGARET SANGER)

I want to tell you a little about "Mother India As I Saw Her." The population problem, of course, interested me a great deal. Most of our time in India was spent in the large cities, but in travelling we went through many of the outlying districts and villages. We went from Bombay to Wardha to see Mahatma Gandhi and then to Calcutta and then to see the Himalayas. We came back to Calcutta to visit the poet, Dr. Tagore, and then on to Benares, Allahabad, Delhi, and Baroda, and again back to Bombay. In this way, we saw a great deal of the country, particularly in railroads and in railway stations, and we met many people who come in delegations to meet the trains.

Population is, I think, one of India's greatest problems. There are, we are told, some 850 millions of people, with an increase of thirty-four millions in ten years and of twenty millions in the last two years. I do not believe that this last figure is correct. When the census prior to the last one was taken, the non-co-operation movement was at its height and many of the people did not register. This fact alone could account for perhaps some fifteen or twenty millions, which would increase the total at the time of the last census, when the non-co-operation movement had subsided.

One of the recent aims of the public health program has been to lessen infant mortality and to raise the age of marriage. The Women's Conference passed a resolution to put teeth into the laws prohibiting child marriages by urging the penalty of a large fine when parents allowed young boys and girls below the age of fifteen to marry. By that very act they are going to decrease infant mortality, and at the same time save the lives of women. People are also being saved from famine, small-pox epidemics, plagues, and are being helped to live longer. This will, of course, tend to increase the population.

Infant mortality, however, is still high—far too high. Statistics show that one-fifth of the babies born do not live until their first birthday and one-half of them do not live until the age of five. There are three factors affecting infant mortality: first, the economic condition of the family, i.e. the father's wage; second, the spacing of the children; and third, where the child is placed in the family. We are familiar with the first two factors, but let us consider some statistics with regard to the third, and we shall be very much surprised to find how similar they are to our own figures in the United States.

In India, of each 100 first-born children 22.7 do not live, and this is only a little higher than the figure for our country. The second and third children have about the same chance of survival—21.4 of them do not live to complete their first year. The infant mortality rate increases rapidly with the fourth,

* Address given by Mrs. Sanger at the Union of East and West held under the auspices of the World Fellowship of Faiths, New York City, May 21, 1936.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

681

fifth, and sixth children because they have much less care. Of those who are born tenth in the family 42 out of each 100 died in infancy; and the rate rises to 51 and 60 for the 11th and 12th children.

Figures from the United States Children's Bureau show that the life of a baby in America is also largely dependent upon where the child is placed in the family. As for child spacing, unless the children are properly spaced the health of the mother is greatly depleted and the child is not born with a sound and healthy body. If during the pre-natal life it is not adequately nourished i. e. unless the father's wage is such to provide the family with sufficient food, the child, of course, does not have a chance to develop and grow through early infancy.

In all of India there are only 195 people per square mile, but in some villages we find that there are 2000 and even 4000 people living per square mile. These people simply eke out an existence—they are the poor farmer class with barely enough to eat, since they have not learned to use properly what little land they have. They know little or nothing of the newer methods of farming such as irrigation, rotation of crops, and the proper fertilization of the soil. It is said that ninety-five per cent of them do not have what we would consider a "full meal" a day, and that ninety-seven per cent live on less than five cents in American money per day. The figures given out by the British officials do not agree with these figures. They claim that only twenty-per cent of the people are very, very poor. Of course, as in all countries, a few people live in luxury and beauty and have some of the loveliest things of the world. It is difficult to find out the actual facts, just as it is difficult to find out even in America actually what ninety-five per cent of our people earn and what percentage go hungry.

In the large cities in India, we find people sleeping out of doors in the streets—people who have no homes or shelter to go to and who beg in the markets by day. I would far rather sleep out of doors in India where the nights are warm, with the wide blue heavens above me and the thousands of twinkling stars to make my roof, than to sleep in a crowded tenement on the Lower East Side of New York City, where there are eight and ten and even twelve persons packed into a three or two-room tenement with its foul and fetid air, its disease, and its lack of even the most necessary sanitation!

Welfare work in India has been largely concerned with obtaining the proper hospital facilities for women, and where formerly very few of the women had their children in hospitals with proper medical care, sixty-five per cent of the babies born in Bombay are now delivered in hospitals. In India, a new day is dawning. They are saving more babies each year by giving them the proper care in baby clinics—physical examinations, cod liver oil, and the correct diet. They are willing to assume the cost and make provisions for such care, but, as I pointed out to the officials and social workers in one community where they are making rapid strides in infant care, what are the provisions to be for taking care of these children when they reach the ages of two and three? Unless they know now that the families will give the same care to these babies when they become of walking age, the mortality rates for that age group will rise sharply within the next five years. They must plan their budgets to take care of the children until they are able to take care of themselves, or supplement the family income, or give the mothers knowledge of how to space and control births.

These facts had not previously been considered, but immediately these officials and workers asked how it could be done. They did not stop to parley about the cost or the work. They simply asked, "How?" And the answer is: by allowing the mother to space her children properly so that she can care for each one until it has a fair start in life. Mothers should know how to plan each pregnancy. Naturally the small child of two or three will receive more attention if there is not a tinier brother or sister, and perhaps another baby about to be born. The mother cannot possibly carry on with her strength constantly depleted by too numerous pregnancies, so that her body never has a chance to recuperate and build itself up. And, what is worse, she has very little chance of surviving such rapid demands on her body.

But these people asked: When can we begin? And I am happy to say that when I left India there were fifty contraceptive centres already established under the proper authorities either in hospitals, in public health clinics where the necessary information as to the methods is given by a doctor or nurse under the doctor's supervision to these mothers. There was no question as to this moral, is it ethical, is it proper. It was, they understood, necessary, and that was all. They were delighted to accept the idea of birth control.

We held over forty-three medical meetings, and the attitude of the doctors was splendid. I had with me two scientific films on "The Biology of Conception," and these helped in explaining the technical aspects of contraception to the physicians. Not only were the doctors willing to have these films presented to their own groups, but they invited senior medical students and trained nurses to attend. Here again I was impressed by the difference in attitude—in India when the doctors found something of interest and worth while, they were only too willing to share it and to have it used.

I have just one more story to tell you before I finish. I was the guest for a short time at the home of a very cultured family who had three girls, but no sons. My coming had been discussed and the youngest child, who was very precocious, had thought over what she had heard. Finally she came to her father: and said "Daddy, if you had met Margaret Sanger before I was born, would I be here?" And her Daddy took her up in his arms and gave her the answer which I am sure you will all feel every parent should be able to give his children. He said, "Joan, dear, if there were a hundred Margaret Sangers you would still be here, because we wanted you."

Amendment of Law of Divorce:—The Government of India is considering whether The Indian Divorce Act, 1869, should be amended so as to make it clear whether a High Court should pass a decree nisi in the first instance in case of nullity of marriage. Section 19 states the grounds upon which a decree of nullity may be granted. There is a conflict of judicial authority on the subject, which, it is desirable, should be settled by legislation in the interest of the children of the disrupted or of future marriages. The Madras High Court is inclined to agree with the Bombay view that a decree for nullity passed by the High Court should in the first instance be a decree nisi. It may be suggested that the practical arguments would be in favour of making the decree in nullity cases absolute in the first instance. The petitioner's own misconduct ought not to be a ground for refusing or rescinding a decree for nullity in a proper case, for instance, where the respondent was already married at the time of his marriage to the petitioner. In such cases, questions of collusion are much less likely to arise. In the majority of cases, the grounds on which a nullity decree is granted, are not such as are likely to be affected by facts coming to light after the decree.—Bombay Law Journal, realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

682
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 27

EDUCATION FOR SOCIAL WORK,*

(BY CLIFFORD MANSHARDT)

This informal opening session of the Sir Dorabji Tata Graduate School of Social Work may well be an important landmark in the educational history of India. India has always had social work. Men have always helped their neighbours in time of trouble. India has had and has today a long list of noteworthy social workers. There have been in various parts of the country spasmodic efforts for the training of social workers—for the most part short courses of a few weeks' duration. But this School, which is opening today, represents the first attempt in India to raise social work to the dignity of a learned profession, standing on the same plane as graduate schools of law, medicine or education.

Our student body is small. We have purposely made it so. You who are here today are a selected fellowship, drawn from all parts of India, chosen from over 100 applicants for admission to this school, and chosen in the belief that you are the kind of men and women who are ready to profit by this training and to take the lead in elevating the social work of India to a new status.

We have limited our numbers because we desire the School to be a fellowship. We desire it to be a centre where students and faculty can join together in a co-operative attempt to evolve a method of attack upon some of our most pressing social problems.

And if you say to yourselves: "What can 20 students do in the face of India's problems?" I would remind you that you twenty are but the beginning. Year by year your number will increase and the time will come when trained social workers will be at work in every important centre in India. I think back to the year 1904, which marks the establishment of the School for Social Workers, maintained by Simmons College and Harvard University in the city of Boston in the United States. This School opened with one class-room, a small office and 26 students. By 1910, there were schools of social work in 5 American cities. Within the decade, 1916 to 1926, twenty-five schools were established. And at the present time there are no less than 85 full-time schools of social work in the United States and Canada.

There have always been those who have contended that social work should be learned by experience and not taught. There is something to be said for this contention. No amount of book learning can ensure that solid common sense which is so essential a part of the equipment of the successful social worker. On the other hand common sense alone will not solve problems which demand specialized knowledge. The professions of law, medicine, teaching and engineering have all passed through the apprenticeship stage. It is not so many years ago that the proper training for a law student was considered to be a period of apprenticeship in the office of some established lawyer. It is only in comparatively recent times that schools, and particularly graduate schools, have been developed for these professions. The difficulty with apprentice training in social work is that the apprentice student is prepared simply for specific tasks within the organization in which he finds himself. He is denied that essential, well-rounded view of the whole field, which enables him to meet his particular problems in a scientific manner. The School of Social Work gives a perspective which cannot be obtained in any practice situation. A study of the history and development of social work in other lands, enables us to escape a long process of trial and to avoid the pitfalls into which others have fallen.

* An address delivered at the opening session of the Sir Dorabji Tata Graduate School of Social Work, Bombay, by Dr. Manshardt, Director of the School, June 22, 1936.

The Sir Dorabji Tata Graduate School of Social Work is, as its name implies, a graduate school. If social work is ever to attain a status comparable to that of law or medicine, it is essential that the training school be of equivalently high academic character. The student of medicine must have a college background of biology and chemistry. The prospective engineer must have a preliminary knowledge of mathematics and physics. Unfortunately, because of the backwardness of social studies in Indian colleges, we are compelled to offer here certain courses which should have been offered in the colleges, but in time that condition will be corrected. We look forward to the day when the prospective social worker can secure such excellent under-graduate courses in sociology, economics, history, political science, psychology and biology as will render it unnecessary for the School of Social Work to present this background material.

The activities of a high-grade School of Social Work fall into three general fields: the academic curriculum; practical work or field work; and social research.

If social work is, as it is so often defined, a process of adjustment, the social worker must have an adequate knowledge of human nature in order that he may understand the mechanisms of human behaviour. He must have an appreciation of the environmental background—a knowledge of the customs, habits, desires, peculiarities and general outlook of the people among whom he expects to work. He must have an adequate philosophy, in order to see the relation of his task to the social process and to view his work in its proper perspective. Since the time of the social worker is largely occupied in dealing with deviations from the normal, he must have an adequate conception of what constitutes normal human relationships. The social worker is the one person who is expected to know all the available sources of relief for those in trouble—economic, medical, legal, or what not. He is society's trouble specialist.

The major part of the curriculum of most schools of social work deals with what is called Social Case Work and its allied subjects. Under this heading comes the great number of problems connected with family welfare—such as broken homes, individuals in need of advice, of medical treatment, of employment, of interpretation to other members of their group. In our study of social Case Work we enter such fields as mental hygiene and psychiatry, medical social work, child guidance, vocational guidance, juvenile delinquency, probation and parole. We survey the various processes by which the individual who has not achieved a satisfactory adjustment to the demands of life is consciously adjusted to his social environment. The field is so vast that some schools give their entire attention to social case work alone.

While much of social work is conducted by private agencies, a great amount of work in every country is carried on by the State. For this reason we consider the general field of public welfare administration,—studying Government efforts to deal with public health, maternity and child welfare, the care of the blind, deaf and mentally deficient, housing, city planning, industrial welfare and the administration of justice. Although social work in most countries has begun under private auspices, the trend of the times is more and more towards the development of public agencies supported by the public funds. Such departments of Government need competent administrators as well as

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

683

able men and women who can do the rank and file work, especially that of individualizing and humanizing social treatment.

A closely allied field deals with social legislation: the drafting and administration of laws relating to social welfare. The social worker should know the laws connected with such every day matters as adoption, inheritance, eviction, wage claims, street begging, offences against children, prostitution, and the commitment of the insane. He should not only know the laws as they stand, but should also be ready with constructive suggestions for their improvement. The passing of laws providing widows' pensions and home aid to mothers, for example, have practically revolutionized certain departments of social work in the West, making orphanages in many centres practically obsolete by providing home care for needy children. A knowledge of what has been done in the West is of genuine value to India. We would disclaim any attempt to follow slavishly Western patterns, but at the same time worthwhile ideas are worthwhile ideas, whatever the source.

I have already referred to the importance of a knowledge of the history of social movements, but will once more call it to attention in passing. In social work as in walking, the longest way around is often the shortest way home.

So much for academic curriculum. I turn now to a brief consideration of practical or field work. Just as the medical student engages in clinical work in the hospital, so the social worker undertakes field work in various functioning social organizations as a part of his training. Field work is not to be confused with apprentice training. Field work is not a substitute for solid work in the classroom. The purpose of field work is rather an attempt to clarify technical instruction. Just as the botanist goes into the fields to study plants and flowers to supplement his text book knowledge, and just as the geologist turns from a study of books to the study of rocks, so the social worker goes from the class room to the appropriate field work activity, using the field work as a means of clarifying and adding point to the class room instruction. Schools of law make no attempt to provide field work. The young doctor does not begin his serious internship until after he has completed his course. So it should be in social work. Field work must not overshadow the academic studies, its purpose is purely supplementary. The feel of actually "doing something" may give the student a thrill of satisfaction which is more definite than that which accompanies his class room work. But mere doing is not necessarily sound training and the field work question must be viewed in its whole perspective.

The third major activity of a School of Social Work is that of social research. A school of social work is not a graduate school of Economics or Sociology. While sociology seeks to understand social phenomena, social work seeks to manipulate, change and control the materials with which it deals. Sociology seeks to understand the laws of human association, while social work seeks to apply these laws. The research activities of the School of Social Work are therefore eminently practical, dealing with the every-day problems of social life. But though practical, the research for which this School stands is both scholarly and accurate. We want to know how to discover facts and how to interpret them to the best advantage when they are found.

The Sir Dorabji Tata Graduate School of Social Work does not stand for a narrow specialization. The first schools of social work were for the most part training classes held by social work organizations for the benefit of their own employees. The schools accomplished their purpose of training men and women to fit into the immediate pressing situation, but they did not give that general background which is the necessary accompaniment of all sound social work. Through the years American schools of social work have tended to be dominated more or less by institutional needs. The emphasis in British schools, on the other hand, has been upon social philosophy and the development of a proper attitude of mind toward social problems. A study of catalogues of American and British schools reveals a wide divergence of opinion concerning methods of training. We are attempting in this School to provide both a philosophical background and a practical outlook. We do not believe in a narrow specialization, which prepares simply for one type of social work. A young man does not enter a medical college to study only eye diseases, heart disorders or gynecology. He first takes a general course of study and then undergoes his specialization. Similarly a law student does not confine his studies to criminal law or to corporation law. He covers the whole field of study. It is our opinion that a social worker in order to be prepared to meet effectively the multiplicity of complex situations in which he will find himself, must have much wider background than a knowledge of a particular type of work. He must develop habits of thinking which will stand him in good stead when he is confronted by a situation that is out of the ordinary. He must be prepared to face each new situation on its own merits and without prejudice. He should combine within himself both the critical attitude of the student and the enthusiasm of the man of action. He should cultivate reading habits which will serve him in good stead throughout his career.

The development of reading habits is a point which cannot be overemphasized. The faculty of the institution has been chosen with great care, and will, I believe, direct your class room work in a satisfactory manner. But in addition to your class room work, make it an early habit to use the library. Our library is not large, as University libraries go, but every volume in the library has been carefully selected. Move around among the cases and read those books which seem to you to bear upon your particular interest. Expand your interests. Do not be bound by required readings, but use the library as an indispensable tool for your complete education.

The materials of social work, dealing as they do with social life, are in the very nature of things often transient. For this reason the library is supplemented by a well-stocked periodical room, where you may put yourself in touch with current thought and movements. Looking back upon my own University education, I place the influence of books above that of the classroom, and the reading habit has become so much a part of my life that during my eleven years in India it has been my rule and pleasure to read one solid book every week. I know of no other way to keep one's self alive and abreast of current thinking.

The profession of social work is pre-eminently a profession calling for rich qualities of personality. The individual who is in trouble who needs food, clothing, shelter, medical attention, legal assistance, or help on personal, ethical or psychological problems — comes to the social worker for aid. The satisfactory adjustment of such a wide variety of problems is a severe tax upon the abilities of the social worker. He must not only know how to get things done, but must also be able to hold the confidence of his clients while the machinery is being put in motion. To help men to hope when they themselves feel there is no hope is no mean problem. We in this institution

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

484
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

1 June 27

cannot "make" personality. Your biological inheritance has had much to say about that question. But we can, I believe, help you to develop intelligent sympathy, social imagination and some of the inner qualities which will give you confidence, poise and balance. An academic curriculum which neglects personal values is not of much worth.

And as a final word, may I beg you to be humble. You are graduates studying in a graduate school, but there is much that both you and we of the faculty have still to learn. It is not our function to belittle the achievements of the host of untrained men and women who are doing social work in this country today. Some of us will never attain to their stature. But the fact that we are here should mean that we sense the magnitude of India's social problems, and in our own quiet way are seeking to prepare ourselves to play some part in bringing about their solution.

CASTE AND INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.* (BY CHANDRAKANT ANANT PHADKAR.)

One of the most serious disadvantages of the caste system is that it prevents that close correspondence between inborn capacity and industrial function which is such a fundamental element in economic progress and welfare. The moment you divide your men into water-tight compartments on the mere accident of birth irrespective of their temperament and qualifications and at the same time refuse them their birthright to develop their natural capacity and faculties to the highest possible limit, you deny your nation all the advantages that otherwise would have added to the store of national wealth and wellbeing.

Again, in a country where agriculture more or less supports 72% and over of the population, the caste prejudices and habits of the mass of the workers prevent their taking up other occupations to utilise their spare time. A man may have insufficient land to support his family, but if he is of good caste he cannot take to weaving or work for hire because that would lower his social standard or status. This difficulty is enhanced by the laws of tenant rights which have sub-divided holdings until they are minute in area.

Another great drawback is that the caste system prevents free mobility of capital and labour. Mobility of labour is hindered by making a change of occupations or of place difficult. As under the old system of handicrafts the artisan uses his own capital, immobility of labour necessarily implies immobility of capital as well. Furthermore the system leads to the formation of rigid non-competitive groups leading to the over-crowding of certain occupations and an undue advantage being given to others that lie strongly entrenched behind the caste walls artificially protecting them from external competition.

The caste system impedes the progress of large-scale enterprise in various ways. In the first place there is a lack of speedy adjustment between demand for and supply of a particular kind of labour. In the second place the system militates against the minute sub-division of labour characteristic of modern large scale production. Besides, owing to the caste system it is difficult to bring together intellect, manual labour and capital which are often isolated from each other forming separate castes. Then again, consumption becomes localised and sectarian as every caste distinguishes itself from every other in its mode of living, with many differences as regards food, apparel, utensils, etc. A very large variety of commodities is, therefore, to be produced but for each single commodity on a smaller scale.

* Extracts from the prize essay selected by the Bombay Provincial Social Reform Association.

The result is that though the country is large the scale of production tends to be small, making economies of large-scale production difficult of realisation. Another minor point is that improvement in the economic conditions of the socially lower classes is not always reflected in a better standard of life, there being no chance of the lower classes being admitted into the fold of the higher classes and thus by force of example adopting the superior standard of the latter.

The lower castes especially were bound to the village of their birth; they could never be more than strangers in another. In times of famines and distress the people could not leave their ancestral village lest they lose the hold on bare subsistence which their village assured to them. The normal operations of the laws of supply and demand which connect communities of people with natural resources have been rendered difficult in a country where the individual finds himself under caste restrictions. The finest art and workmanship, in India, as in other countries have been produced at times when individual ideas have had freedom to work without restraint from system or tradition in style and methods. Copyists are never efficient craftsmen; they can never produce an original idea in design or execution; and the tendency of caste can only be to produce generations after generations, imitators and copyists. The individual born in a caste can never find his place in society for which he is fitted by his ability.

In a caste-ridden society each man's lot and function are fixed; he cannot change them; he cannot rise above them. The want of spontaneity and enterprise of the spirit that dares and dies is only the natural result of centuries of caste repression and caste domination.

But more than all this is the curse that affects Indian life in its attitude to the depressed classes. These are mainly aboriginal castes of the tribal types; they are regarded as unclean. Washermen will not wash for the lower castes nor barbers shave them. In some castes the touch of a low caste man makes it necessary for a man of higher caste to be the and change his clothes. In others, his entry into a house defiles all the water therein. These untouchables over 50,000,000 in number, are kept in a state of abject submission and helplessness. Such a condition of affairs involves not only the economic waste and the moral degradation of the low caste themselves, but the moral degradation of the society as a whole.

In all civilised societies except those founded upon a rigid caste system, the social ladder exists; and every step forward in democratic organisation, everything that throws the world more completely open to talent, that finds the right man for the right place and the square peg for the square hole—educational facilities, scholarships, personal agencies—all such things contribute to the perfection of the social ladder by which the ascent of merit and the descent of inaptitude are made easy.

The caste system produces amongst people of higher caste a disinclination towards certain occupations and forms of labour normally followed by the lower classes and thus often prevents them from improving their economic position and intensifies the evil resulting from the overcrowding of certain so-called genteel professions.

Another loss entailed by the caste system comes from the existence of caste prejudices against the use of certain methods of improvement in agricultural and industrial production; the objection to the use of bones, fish and nightsoil as manure for agricultural land entertained by many castes is an instance in point.

(To be Continued.) realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

685

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase-the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:-BARODA.

Branches:-Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Waichand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskart, (MNL Agent, Ahmedabad.)
Tulsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda.
Raj Ratna Bhailal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. L. (Managing Agent, Alombic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrocks Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,
General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to:-

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 21, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,
2-28

Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

686

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[June 27

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1908.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches :—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ 1% per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to :—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulla (District West Khandesh).
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Ahmednagar (District Nasik).
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panch Mahals).
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS

Sir Chundil V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Sarlasya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshvini, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL :—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to :—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

687

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

688
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

June 27

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 348.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 26.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JULY 4, 1933. No. 44

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The Emperor and the League.
Bengal Hindus and the Communal Award.
Demand for Weightage.
The Co-operative Movement.
Pratioma Marriages.
Matriculation.
Hindu Women's Property Bill.
Kelkar-Nehru Controversy.
Social Reform—Social Service—Socialism.

The Hindu Inter-caste Marriage Validity Bill.
I Was a Missionary II.
The Co-Operative Movement.
Sikhism a Universal Religion.
America Faces the East.
The German's Vacation.
Caste and Industrial Progress.
Italy in Ethiopia.
Race Relations in South Africa.

NOTES

The Emperor and the League:—The Council of the League of Nations had the greatest day in its rather humdrum existence when the Emperor of Ethiopia, robbed of his crown and country by a fellow member of the League, stood before it to appeal to the conscience of the world which it is expected to represent, for justice against Italy. Mr. Motta, the Swiss representative, tried to get the Council to prevent the Emperor's appearance before it. But the Irish Free State President, De Valera who is one of the few statesmen who are true to their convictions in their speeches, insisted that the Emperor should have his say, and the Council, to its credit, took the same view. The Emperor spoke in his native Amharic, and it is clear even from the highly subdued reports of Reuter that His Majesty spoke with great dignity. The meddlesome who constitute nine-tenths of the League Delegations, will never in their lives listen to a more moving address from a greater man. Some lines learnt by heart at school of the British Warrior Queen, Boadicea, bleeding from the Roman rods, pleading before the hoary Druids to avenge her wrongs, seem to suit the occasion. The Druids could assure her from their spiritual insight that Rome shall perish because of her brutalities. The League delegates had no such intuition. They had only the instructions of their Governments. We do not know whether or not there was an Indian delegation. We hope there was none. If there was, it would be a great humiliation to this country that in this historic occasion it sat tongue-tied, knowing full well that Indian sympathy is whole-heartedly with the Emperor and Ethiopia. The British representative, Mr. Eden, declared that there should be no recognition of the Italian annexation of Ethiopia. As for the sanctions, the Russian representative, Mr. Litvinov, was right when he said that economic sanctions cannot right the wrong done to Ethiopia. On the contrary, economic sanctions cause far more injury to the civil population than to those who are responsible for the criminal aggression. Mr. Litvinov also said that unless one or two great Powers take upon themselves to act without waiting for all the League Members to join, there was no hope of thwarting Italian plans. This is perfectly true. Where is America? We read that she is building a great fortress somewhere to hoard her gold! Moral issues have apparently no concern for her. We are pleasantly surprised to find that the prevailing opinion in the League Council is that the League's power to take action against aggressors like Italy should be increased and not, as has been suggested in some British papers, that the League should be deprived of even its present powers and reduced to an advisory role.

Bengal Hindus and the Communal Award:—According to a United Press message published in the Tribune of Lahore an influential memorial, signed by nearly all prominent Hindus of Bengal, has been submitted to the Secretary of State for India praying that His Majesty in Council may be pleased to make an order for "effecting joint electorates in place of separate electorates and to restoring to the Hindi minority their due share of representation on the basis not merely of their population strength, but also their established economic, cultural, political and administrative importance." The Hindus of Bengal, though numerically a minority, it is argued, are overwhelmingly superior in all other respects. They are 64 per cent of the total literate population of the Province. More than 80 per cent of the schoolgoing population, 87 per cent of the legal, 80 per cent of the medical and 83 per cent of the commercial professions, are Hindus. The memorial requests that "pending the decision of their claims to a larger amount and weightage of representation the status quo be maintained in respect of communal representation in the Legislature in the absence of any fresh communal agreement." The signatories are headed by the poet, Tagore, the philosopher, Sir Brojendranath Seal, the scientist, Sir P. C. Ray, the Maharaja of Burdwan, Sir Nilratan Sircar, Sheth Jugal Kishore Birla, Mr. Ramanand Chatterjee, Dr. Radhakumud Mukherjee and several Congress leaders. An influential deputation, it is added, is likely to go to England shortly in support of this representation.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

690

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| July 4

realpatidar.com

Demand for Weightage:—The Marquess of Zetland has expressed publicly his opinion that the Communal Award is harsh and unfair to Hindus in Bengal and the deputation will find him personally sympathetic. But he accepted the office of Secretary of State for India on the understanding that he will not seek to give effect to his views on the Communal Award. Now that Sir Samuel Hoare is back in the Cabinet, he is most unlikely to get that body to agree even if he is prepared to risk resignation, to go behind that understanding. However that may be, we are surprised at the demand for weightage on account of cultural, economic and political superiority made by the eminent Hindu gentlemen whose names we have noted. It has been hitherto the strongest point of the Hindu protest against the Communal Award that it did not ask for weightages anywhere and that all that it wanted was that the franchise should be based on a non-communal and equal principle for all sections of the population. The present Bengal demand for weightage on account of economic and cultural predominance, is a deviation from this sound principle. It not only does not enhance the weight of the representation but it lays the Hindus of Bengal open to the retort that a community so predominant in all walks of life, should be able to make its influence felt in the administration, whatever the disparity in its representation in the Legislature. Incidentally, the representation is a public repudiation by the leaders of Bengal Hindus of the Congress' attitude of neither accepting nor rejecting the Communal Award.

The Co-operative Movement:—The Bombay Suburban Co-operative Workers' Conference was fortunate in having Mr. B. G. Kher, one of our most thoughtful social workers, to preside over its deliberations last Sunday. Mr. Kher in his address urged the importance of relating the movement to the life and needs of the community. All the work for improving communications, introducing better methods of cultivation, or raising finer cattle would be just wasted effort, he said, unless the agriculturist was relieved of his burden of indebtedness—and, if we may add, prevented from again getting into debt. In a reference to official influence on the Co-operative Movement in India, Mr. Kher remarked that there was no room for bossing and that the sooner it was freed of its association with the Government the better it would thrive in India. This observation applies with equal force to the concentration of influence in the hand of wealthier members of a society who generally try to convert a co-operative enterprise into a profit-making one. In discussing the possibilities of cooperation, Mr. Kher laid special emphasis on improvements in the food of the community, particularly in regard to milk, which can come most easily through co-operative societies. So long as the middleman is necessary in transporting goods from producer to consumer, there will always be the danger of adulteration. As a social movement, co-operation is invaluable is so far as it instils a self-reliant spirit in the members of a community. In this sphere the social worker's best achievement lies in keeping himself in the background, unobtrusively. We print extracts from Mr. Kher's address on another page.

Pratiloma Marriages:—Mr. Tatachariar in his article on Dr. Bhagwandas' Bill which we publish this week, apparently regards the measure as too advanced in so far as it permits marriages in which the woman belongs to a higher caste. But as a matter of fact the Bill is principally intended for this purpose. So far as marriages where the husband has the higher caste are concerned, the courts in at least two provinces already recognise them as valid. Mr. Tatachariar's quaint reference to the "seed being ever superior to the soil" is difficult to follow even if it is, as he says, supported by most modern scientists. Mr. Tatachariar is topical in taking his analogy from agriculture but what is the common ground between seed and soil to enable us to judge the quality of the one in terms of the other? More interesting is the question raised by our correspondent regarding the caste of the children of mixed marriages. It is significant that few of the reformers who have initiated inter-caste marriage bills, have considered the point. They have not unnaturally argued that those who contract an inter-caste marriage, are emancipated from caste. To them the marriages contemplated by their reform, are against Hindu law and practice. Mr. Tatachariar, on the other hand, regards inter-caste marriages as sanctioned by Hindu law, provided the man is of a higher caste than the woman. For this reason he wants Dr. Bhagwandas to restrict his reform to such marriages and to consider the caste of the children of mixed parents. The point is of some importance to those who believe in the caste system, as Mr. Tatachariar does, but to the reformer it is only of academic interest.

Matriculation:—Writing on the agitation in Bombay over the poor results at the last Matriculation examination held by the University, the Hindu observes that in Madras also the same state of things exists, and that though the agitation there in regard to this question has not been as aggressive as in Bombay, the situation created by the small percentage of eligibles is regarded as quite as serious and the managements and headmasters are giving the subject their earnest consideration. The situation is not confined to Madras and Bombay. It is acute in Calcutta as well. The object of Matriculation is to test the capacity of scholars at the end of the High School studies to benefit by the teaching given in the University. This purpose has been overshadowed in India by extraneous considerations, the latest being that Matriculation is a qualification for voters to the Provincial Assembly under the Hoare scheme of reforms. In Bombay the authorities preparing the rolls refuse to accept Degrees of Universities and insist on the Matriculation

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

691

certificate as the sole admissible credential for this franchise! The results of the Matriculation have thus acquired a political value. The true line of reform is obviously to restore to the Matriculation its primary purpose of being a test for admission to University studies. As these studies are conducted in and through colleges, they are the proper agencies to judge the capacity of students to benefit by their teaching. The examinations which they may conduct, will have no value for any other purpose. That is why we suggested in our leading article (Reformer, 20th June) that colleges might be left to matriculate their own students. The Hindu says that the experiment of giving discretion to heads of colleges was tried in Madras a few years ago, but had to be given up owing to some serious evils which it gave rise to. It is not difficult to guess what these were. But the University has the power and the machinery to take action against delinquent colleges and if these are firmly applied it should be quite possible to minimise these evils considerably.

Hindu Women's Property Bill:—With the principle of the Hindu Women's Property Bill which Dr. G. V. Deshmukh has introduced in the Legislative Assembly and which will come up for reference to Select Committee at the forthcoming Simla session in September, a very large body of opinion not only of the educated and the reformers but even of conservative Hindus will heartily sympathise. That principle is to equalise the rights enjoyed by men and women in regard to succession, inheritance and ownership. At present a Hindu woman has absolute right to her Stridhan but the property which she gets in this way, is limited. What Dr. Deshmukh proposes to do is to make the widow and daughters equal sharers in the property of a deceased person. He has added the mother and the daughter-in-law in the same category but this seems to be unnecessary as the former will inherit as the widow of her husband and the latter as the daughter of her father. Dr. Deshmukh's Bill does not clearly distinguish between a joint family and a separate family. In a separated family, the widow of a deceased son would inherit as a matter of course. The clause in the Bill which places a ban on women demanding a partition, cuts across the principal of equality which the Bill seeks to secure for women. Further it will cause great hardship to the women coparceners especially if the head of the family happens to enjoy a more than normal longevity. It is, moreover, not desirable to make women feel that the head of the house is an obstacle to their enjoyment of property. The Indian Succession Act provides an equitable arrangement in all these matters and, if Dr. Deshmukh's Bill does not secure the approval of the Assembly, it will be something if a Hindu is enabled, by making a declaration before a responsible authority, to be governed in matters of inheritance according to the provisions of that Act, in case of intestacy.

Kelkar-Nehru Controversy:—The veteran publicist of Maharashtra, Mr. N. C. Kelkar, has taken up twelve columns of his weekly, the Mahratta, for a "Rejoinder to Mr. J. Nehru." Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru—Mr. Kelkar studiously denies him the honorific—had criticised the policy of the Responsivists, a political party founded by the late Mr. Tilak with opportunism, using the word in its literal sense, for its creed, of which Mr. Kelkar is the most prominent representative living. Mr. Kelkar issued a "critical challenge" in the Mahratta to the Pandit. The Pandit, through the United Press Agency, responded to the challenge and the lengthy rejoinder is Mr. Kelkar's reaction to his response. Three charges brought against the Responsivists by the Pandit have received the special attention of the Mahratta Editor. One is that the Responsivists by their action supported British Imperialism. The second is that they were supporters of the repressive measures of Government. The third is that they hobnobbed with high officials. On the first point, Mr. Kelkar claims that so far from being supporters of British Imperialism, Responsivists have been the worst thorn on its side. The opinion of Government, if it can be obtained, would be conclusive on this issue. On the second charge, Mr. Kelkar pleads for acquittal on the ground that he and his friends condemned martial law in Sholapur more strongly than any other individual or political party. Pandit Jawaharlal will no doubt rejoinder that the incendiaryism which was the immediate antecedent of martial law in Sholapur, had nothing to do with Civil Disobedience which to him is the touchstone of nationalism. As regards the third indictment, the accusation against Mr. Kelkar is, on the face of it, untenable. It is impossible to hobnob with any one in a pair of Brahmani shoes, Mr. Kelkar's habitual footwear. As for the amenities generally associated with hobnobbing, the Poona leader's orthodoxy is proof against them. In replying to this as also to the rather trumpery charge about the congratulatory telegram to Mr. Tambe, Mr. Kelkar might have been expected, on account of his seniority and greater experience, to have resisted the temptation to bring in Pandit Motilal Nehru who is entitled to be left unmolested "where beyond these voices there is peace."

The Waiz Memorial Fund:—In memory of the late Rev. R. M. Waiz of the Church Missionary Society, Lahore, a fund has been instituted to encourage Urdu writing among Indian Christians of the Punjab. The Punjab Christian Council, a representative body of Christians, has been appointed its Trustees. Only interest on the amount collected for the Fund will be utilised for its objects. Among the sympathisers who have already donated to the Fund are: Sir Geoffrey F. de Montmorency, late Governor of the Punjab, The Hon'ble Kunwar Sir Maharaj Singh, Sir Syed Raza Ali, The Hon'ble Dr. A. C. L. Desouza of Kenya, Mr. K. J. Varma, Mr. Manilal Gandhi, and others. Donations may kindly be sent to Mr. B. L. Rallia Ram, General Secretary, Y. M. C. A., Lahore.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 4

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, July 4, 1936.

SOCIAL REFORM—SOCIAL SERVICE—SOCIALISM.

For the best part of a century social reform in India was devoted to removing the most pressing hardships within the framework of Hindu society. The con-cremation of widows with their deceased husbands naturally attracted attention first by its horrible atrocity. It was worse than lynching. While there is an element of emotional excitement in lynching the custom of suttee had degenerated into a cold-blooded ritual. The Emperor Akbar had used his influence to discourage it but the Moghul Empire did not claim to regulate the social life of its non-Muslim subjects. Many Anglo-Indian high officials were against interference even with a custom like suttee but Lord William Bentinck had the powerful support of the great Indian reformer, Raja Ram Mohan Roy; and public opinion among Hindus was also ripe for the reform as proved by the fact that, notwithstanding the vehement protest sent to Parliament by orthodox Hindu leaders, the country as a whole recognised the justice and humanity of the new law and acquiesced in it. The discussions on the custom led to attention being called to the hardships of enforced widowhood among Hindus. The Act validating the remarriage of Hindu widows was the outcome of the labours of the eminent scholar, Pandit Ishwar Chandra Vidyasagar. Enforced widowhood was particularly inhuman in the case of child wives, and child marriages were, therefore, the next evil which claimed the attention of reformers. With the caution which has characterised reform movements in this country, it was at first thought that the raising of "the age of consent," that is, the age at which a girl is deemed capable of giving a valid consent to sexual intercourse, within the marriage relation, was sufficient to prevent the evil consequences of child marriage. This view ignored the psychological factor and was, therefore, ineffective. The Moropant Joshi Committee, which was appointed to consider the desirability of a further raising of the age of consent, reported that such raising was useless as a measure for the protection of child wives and recommended the fixing of a minimum marriage age by legislation. This led to the enactment of the Sarda Act. This Act is now found to be slow of operation and there is an increasing demand to make its provisions more stringent. As the result of the prolonged discussions on these reforms, it was borne in upon the public that the education of women was the true remedy for all social evils. The transformation of public sentiment on this subject since the beginning of this century can only be described as phenomenal. The great obstacle now to the spread of women's education, is the absence of a sufficient number of institutions to take in the thousands of girls who are clamouring for it. The Women's Movement, which is the most striking feature of Indian life during recent years, has come as the crown of the labours of Indian reformers for nearly a century.

Sir Narayan Chandavarkar who succeeded Ranade as General Secretary of the National Social Conference, perceived fifteen years ago that the time had come for widening the scope of the social reform movement. This was not possible so far because of the unpreparedness of Indian women to take their proper part in reorganising society. As Lord Linlithgow truly observed in his speech at the Nutrition Research Conference the other day, without the active and intelligent co-operation of educated women, no substantial and permanent change can be effected in the habits and customs of the people. In a striking message to the Indian National Social Conference held in 1919 at Amritsar, Sir Narayan declared: "The time has now come for us, social reformers and workers, to enlarge the meaning and scope of social reform and extend our activity and outlook to such questions as the education of the masses, the sanitation of the country, the housing of the poor, the care of the sick and feeble, the employment of labour on rational lines, the provision of healthy recreation and amusements for the masses, village sanitation and rural education, instead of confining social reform, as we have hitherto confined it, to female education, widow-remarriage, removal of caste restrictions and such other items." In other words he wanted social reform in India to have the same connotation as in Western countries, with this difference that, while social reform in Western countries has largely been carried out by the State, social reform in India has so far had very little help from Government. Social reform in the less wide sense, involves no distinction between the reformer and the people who benefit by the reforms. He works both for himself and the community at large. But the widening of the scope to social service brought into existence the class of social workers who are, no doubt, reformers also in many cases though not in all. Social reformers had even before Sir Narayan's message been extending their activities to the sphere of social service. The pioneer in this direction was Lala Lajpat Rai who, during the great famine at the beginning of the century, established orphanages in Northern India for the benefit of thousands of children who, for want of them, were being swept into missionary institutions. The Depressed Classes Mission, established in Bombay with its schools and boarding houses, belongs to the same category. The Social Service League which celebrated its silver jubilee recently in Bombay was the first organisation expressly devoted to this kind of work. The lack of trained workers has been a great handicap in the extension of social service. This short-coming will be considerably lessened by

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real193611.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

693

such institutions as that of the Dorab Tata Post-graduate School of Social Work under Dr. Clifford Manshardt whose stimulating speech at its opening last week, was published in the Reformer.

The earliest efforts at the amelioration of the condition of workers in field and factory, were also made under the impulse derived from the evolution of social reform. Fundamentally, it was an ethical impulse. The first workers in this field were drawn from the ranks of religious and social reformers. Sasipada Banerjee at Baranagore started workmen's classes and recreation rooms, sixty years ago. He was a devout Theist. The story of his life is briefly told in the sketch which his son, Sir Albion Banerjee, published some years ago. In Bombay the claims of workers were espoused by social reformers who were also founders of the Social Service League. But two extraneous and distracting influences tend to draw the Labour Movement away from its moorings. These are the instilled philanthropy of Lancashire manufacturers and the Socialist movement in Europe. Lancashire sought to kill the competition of the Indian mill industry by instigating Factory Legislation on the lines of similar legislation in Britain. The Socialist Movement is the second extraneous influence which tries to break the continuity of the social movement. Broadly speaking, Socialism aims at effecting by coercion what can be effected only by the slow but sure process of social reform. Socialism aims at securing what it calls economic freedom by political coercion!

THE HINDU INTER-CASTE MARRIAGE VALIDITY BILL.

(By R. V. V. TATACHARIAR)

The Bill sponsored by Dr. Bhagawan Das in the Legislative Assembly is a welcome and timely measure, and is in perfect consonance with the spirit of the ancient Smritis. It has been the burden of all research-scholars' song that though Manu might be hard upon certain classes of people, like Herr Hitler of Germany, he was, in their unanimous view, a great nation-builder of far-seeing wisdom which has since unfortunately been wasted upon the long line of his successors in the ancient legislative gadi. Manu clearly ruled that men of every caste could marry in the same caste or in castes lower down; he only restricted the marriage to this anuloma type; that is, the man must always be of a higher caste than the wife. He interdicted in clear and unequivocal terms the Pratiloma marriage where the wife was higher in caste than the man. His view was that the seed must ever be superior to the soil that received it, and this view is still shared in by many a most modern scientist as well. It was perhaps on this score that patiyam or out-castedness, in the view of some rishis, never attached to the issue at all; and illegitimacy never affected the female issue, nor the legitimate issue of illegitimate sons. It is on the same principle that Vasishtha and Baudhayan among others ruled that the issue of the mixed or rather anuloma marriages belonged to the father's caste where the mother ranked next to him in the order of castes. The central idea of this arrangement was indeed the combined justice and necessity that evermore fresh blood should be imported into the higher but less numerous orders, while the lower classes should be prompted to elevate themselves by the prospects of connection with higher ones. If the rules of excommunication turn down men of evil propensities far, far below all castes into the so-called Panchama class, this rule of anuloma marriage was a ladder by which an individual, family, class or community was allowed to rise by sheer merit or simple condescension. Adoption of boys of all castes by the higher caste-man was another more direct though now obsolete method of social elevation, where also the adoptive father's caste settled that of the adopted boy. Why, for the matter of that, even the slave took his master's caste, just as a sishya or disciple took his guru's gotram in case he had none of his own; and the wife that of her husband on marriage at the Saptapadi ceremony.

The older rishis like Vasishtha and Baudhayan ruled that inter-caste marriage, inter-dining, or common seat and common conveyance did not in the least injure or in anywise effect one's caste; but only unlawful teaching of the Vedas and improper ministrations of religious services and sacrifices entailed degradation in caste. It is, therefore, in respect of the first two items that the later sages struck when they discouraged and even condemned them by saying that the Pitris cursed the parties to the mixed marriages and their issue, and thus put an end to the aspiration of entering into the higher castes either directly or indirectly. The legal and political sanctions of olden times, we know, always took the religious colour. But this religion that transported human beings to the Swarga or Naraka according to their deserts had to yield before the advent of a truly national Vaishnava (and Saiva) religion and philosophy; and Moksha (or Kaivalya) put an end to the ever-recurring Samsara or transmigration of souls here or hereafter. Thus another impetus was though rather unsuccessfully, given through the new national religion to the consolidating and nationalising forces in the wake of similar forces of Buddhism in the fields of imperialistic politics and proselytising religion.

But now that the present-day accent has been rightly placed as in Manu on the truly nationalistic consolidation of the people of India, this Bill is a welcome measure in the right direction. Only it is a little too wide as it does not, as Manu and his successors did, stoutly discountenance the Pratiloma kind of mixed marriages. But, as the issue of the worst kind of pratiloma marriage of a Sudra with a Brahmin woman was termed a chandala, and the Chandalas formed a sub-caste among Sudras, there being no fifth caste known to Hindu Law, the question of caste of the issue of such marriages has become immaterial or purely academical, if only the issue should inherit and partake of the father's caste. Hence none need be alarmed at the rather seemingly sweeping character of the proposed measure.

The broad-bottomed Hindu Law and the broader and ever elastic Usages among Hindus should not and cannot afford to countenance the sorry spectacle of the people renouncing their religion for purposes of holy marriage when religion is but a handmaid of a (marital) life of contented peace and efficient happiness. How can religion cease to rush to the rescue of even the most surprising aberrations of human nature, in the face of the fact that the brightest stars among the leading rishis have been notorious examples of such and similar aberrations of even the worst and gravest character? And after all who can say why, how and when these aberrations in simply social matters came to be regarded as so heinous and so disquieting as to be peremptorily put down notwithstanding the earlier law to the contrary? The later law perhaps grew in the wake of a revulsion of public

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

694
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 4

feeling and public opinion and the social and religious fervour of the latter day Smritikartas. Various kinds of flesh prescribed and graduated for occasions of Sraddhas and visits of kings and esteemed personages came, after the advent of Buddha, to be completely tabooed and the substitution of pure milk-preparations and vegetable dishes were, and till to-day remain, raised to the skies and extolled beyond measure. And inter-caste-dining was also given up along with flesh-diet. And on the heels of these, inter-caste marriage went out of vogue. So what was altogether unimportant from the religious point of view came to be given unexpected and undue prominence; and religion unwittingly trespassed into other regions and countenanced this curious change in the angle of vision. But religion does not and cannot honestly stand in the way of ensuring a close-knit and homogeneous nation of a model or ideal type.

Now, this Bill on the anvil of the Legislative Assembly is defective in one respect, that is, wholly silent on the question of caste of the issue of the mixed marriages. The trouble would be whether the older or later principle of the Hindu Sastras has to be applied and acted upon. The original view, as we have seen before, was that the issue took the father's caste, but the later change was to the effect that the issue belonged to the mother's caste. This indivisible distinction within the family of the same man, say a Brahmin, marrying from different castes could not, even in those days, be long maintained for a variety of reasons. In fact this new law soon led to the disappearance altogether of all kinds of mixed marriages, among the main castes and sub-castes as well. Hence if the legislature should now begin anew to validate such marriages it must so enact, in the clearest terms possible, that issue definitely belongs to the father's and not to the mother's caste. This then takes us to the original state of the law on the subject. Once the principle of mother's caste for the issue is allowed, the door is thrown wide open to all permutation and combination of castes and sub-castes known to the later Smritis and to emergence of superiority and inferiority complex among all of them at once, with the natural inevitable consequences of communal jealousies and social boycotts and the reduplication of the same institutions on the original model in each of the main castes and even sub-castes. To quote one instance, the cooks and some other menials among the Brahmins represent their old Sudra prototypes and are requisitioned to serve the other Brahmins, nay, all the other castes as well, whether in public hotels, or railway refreshment-rooms, or on occasions of public functions or social treats or even religious feasts. In fact they undergo all the costly samskaras relating to Brahmins only to descend later on to the veriest level of their Sudra compeers in point of occupation and, worse in their caste-status in the eye of a true interpretation of the Sastras that would rank them with the Panchamas only, or worse, with the Chandalas, for relinquishing all the required duties of a true Brahmin and becoming unfit for further intercourse without due prayaschittas. But nobody would really care to admit that it is this indiscriminate intercourse of high-class Brahmins with these fallen quondam Brahmins in the fields of marriage, dinner, and what not, that has been chiefly responsible for the fast-disappearing results of ever-declining religious mantras. It is a tragic and inscrutable fate and whirligig of awfully revengeful fate, on the part of all the castes, high or low, that we fight shy of doing sastraic things straight and take to most unsastraic and explicitly forbidden things in a most easy-going and unconscionable manner. To take another instance in point, the Brahmin ceasing to teach the Vedas or their spiritual import to the other castes, has ceased to think of the Vedas himself and has begun to run after learning and teaching English for the sake, not of the rest of the society, but for the sake of finding means of livelihood. He declines to learn or teach the Tamil Prabandhas to the Sudras for whom they were mainly meant. And the Sudra has to shift for himself for enlightenment from the Tamil Vedas and the result is a host of Sudra teachers from whom the Brahmin would not stoop to learn them. And there is a new crop of Sudra purohitas to officiate among Sudras on all funeral and marriage occasions; there is thus a parallel line of institution on failure of the Brahmins to serve the non-Brahmin, whosoever fault it might be. Why this perverted and unwanted reduplication of institutions it is impossible to understand. It is high time that this is put a quick end to and the original state of things restored in the best interests of the entire society. And the Bill in question, with the defect remedied as shown above, will go far on the road to unification, consolidation and homogeneous harmony of the Hindu population of India in the near future.

I WAS A MISSIONARY—II. (BY G. B. HALSTEAD)

It was not long after I arrived in India that I sensed the fact that missions were contributing quite definitely to the denationalization of the Indians, particularly of the Indian Christians. Practically everything I saw of the Indian Christian community impressed me that this community was merely a pale reflection of the missionary group, a fact readily enough understood, but nevertheless very regrettable. Most Christian and many non-Christian graduates of the mission schools and colleges I met seemed a strange composite of brown skin and anglo-saxon mentality; orientals oriented to western culture rather than to their own. The entire mission educational system was necessarily dominated by government policy and imperial considerations. Consequently it was doing a most effective job of educating the Indians against themselves. It was a case of the old imperialist plan of 'divide and rule' translated into an educational system. There was plenty of evidence all about me to support the accusation of Indian nationalists that the white man had deliberately created an educational system for India that would produce brown-skinned bureaucrats, persons who would think as Englishmen but live as cheaply as Indians. Of such would the foundations of Empires be made. Tragically, here again, I found missions had tragically conformed. Consciously or unconsciously they were pawns in the hands of an imperialist power.

However it was through the medium of clothing strangely enough, that this problem of denationalization first troubled me. True, clothes may not make the man, but they often indicate the social attitudes of those who wear them. At least I found this to be so in India. There was little room for doubt, I thought, that the missionaries in importing western civilization along with the religion of Jesus had strangely identified in the minds of Indians the acceptance of His teachings with the use of western clothes. I can still recall ever so clearly spending an entire evening in very earnest discussion with one of our Christian students over the question of his wearing Indian clothes. He argued stubbornly and vigorously that to replace his western suit by Indian clothes would involve a change in his religious views and loyalties. He seemed perfectly convinced that if he dressed

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

695

as a Hindu he would become automatically a Hindu; likewise to appear as a Moslem would magically transform him, quite against his will, into a follower of the prophet. Up to the time we left the college this boy and most of his fellow Christians persisted in their use of western dress in spite of the rising pressure of Indian nationalism that emphasized indigenous clothing. In fairness to this Christian, though, one must recognize the tremendous impact upon their thinking of a foreign culture common to both the mission agents and political rulers. Further, it was perfectly human that these students should conform to a social pattern of a religious governmental bureaucracy that held out the principal hopes of their economic security.

Aside from these somewhat nationalistic implications of dress, but yet a part of the total picture, were certain economic aspects. As an example there is the incident that came to my attention early in my missionary career. One of our Christian students while home on a vacation refused to return to college. He complained to his widowed mother, who was desperately poor, that since most of the other Christian students would return to college with new suits, he must have one too, or face great humiliation. Accordingly, in the universal spirit of motherhood, this poor Indian woman sold one of her only two decent saris (dresses) in order to purchase a suit for this spoiled westernized son in order that he could fit into the social picture created by foreign missions. Now it is important to learn, as I did, that most Indian dress is infinitely less expensive and vastly more practical for India than western. Moreover, this mother might conceivably have spun the thread and woven the cloths for her son's Indian clothes, if he had cared to wear them.

It is partly for such as this that Gandhi has identified simple, home-spun Indian dress and the use of the ancient spinning wheel with the struggle of his land for freedom from western economic and political domination.

On one occasion I attended a Christmas party given at a nearby mission college for girls. A very good Indian friend and associate was with me. We found upon our arrival at the party that nearly everyone present, most of whom were missionaries, were dressed formally. On the way home this friend confided to me how uncomfortable and out of place he had felt in his informal western suit. He had formerly concluded that if he was to rise in the mission system he would have to conform as completely as possible to missionary standards. Accordingly he determined to purchase some evening clothes at once. Now I knew that this man could not afford such a luxury, for the price of tuxedos in India is exorbitant, because of the small demand. Also his salary was very small, in spite of the fact that he was the head of the English Department. Moreover, he had serious and considerable sickness in his family. Evening clothes would have represented a terrible and needless sacrifice.

As months passed I felt increasingly that clothes constituted one of the barriers to effective service by missionaries in India. I was continually conscious that my western suits caused the average Indian to place me in the same category with the none too popular white rulers of his country. Perfectly frank written statements of Gandhi and other leading Indians confirmed my feeling. Also I observed that the few westerners, mainly Englishmen but a few Americans, who had adopted Indian dress seemed to have won the respect, love and confidence of Indians to a marked degree. These considerations finally caused me to abandon western dress completely and to use Indian. I was not disappointed in the result. But, I must regretfully add, this action evoked no sympathetic response or imitation from my missionary colleagues. I am afraid I became, in their minds, more of a freak, or menace, than ever.

THE CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT.*

(By B. G. KHER.)

I have all along been under the impression—and it is, I believe, the impression of many—that the Co-operative movement in this country is too much under the leading strings of Government officers to encourage participation by public workers independent or intolerant of official connection. This is perhaps one of the reasons why it has not taken root in the soil. I am sure as the movement grows more and more independent of official interference, it will serve the true purpose for which it was inaugurated better. Co-operation is the voluntary organisation of persons, who associate on equal terms for the satisfaction of their common economic needs. There is no place in it for outside bossing—otherwise it will not grow.

We have met to consider a number of important problems and the application to their solution of co-operative methods. The appalling poverty of our countrymen with their average per capita annual income of about Rs. 40/—, the miserable plight of our cultivators and their ever-growing indebtedness, the gradual disappearance of hundreds of small industries and crafts which enabled a number of people to earn their living, the capture of the bulk of our trade and commerce by foreign interests, the very unsatisfactory conditions of labour in such manufactures as we possess, the growing unemployment among educated and uneducated alike, these are questions, which have engaged the attention of our public workers for a very long time without any visible approach to their solution, so that many have now come to believe that they are impossible of solution unless and until there is thorough overhauling of our political, social and economic order of things. In this Conference, we shall try to consider how far conditions can be improved by the application of the co-operative method.

India has now been "been reduced from the state of a manufacturing to that of an agricultural country." Nearly eleven crores out of our earning population of twelve and a half crores earn their living from agriculture and they are at present heavily indebted—the total amount of indebtedness being nearly 900 crores. Our first Co-operative measure, the Act of 1904 was specially intended for their benefit but even then their indebtedness was so great that the Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale remarked in his speech on the Bill: "The first thing that strikes me on a consideration of the whole question is that there is no provision in the proposed scheme for a preliminary liquidation of the existing debts of those, who wish to avail themselves of the opportunity now offered, to improve their position."

Mr. Gokhale then divided the cultivators into 3 classes: (1) those who were free from debt, (2) those who were not hopelessly involved and were trying to keep their head above water, and (3) those who were hopelessly involved. Even in 1904, the first class was negligible. What has been the effect of the last 32 years on the second class? I believe it will not be an exaggeration to say that they have completely merged into the third. Mr. Gokhale had suggested a preliminary liquidation of their debts and quoted the Government of India as having recognised the need for this as early as 1884.

* Extracts from Presidential Address to Bombay Suburban Cooperative Conference, June 21 1936.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

696

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER :

[July 4

realpatidar.com

The Co-operative Credit Societies in India supply only about 7 per cent of current credit and they have not supplanted the money-lender but only supplemented him. Unable to repay his dues to the Credit Society, the farmer, in order to save his "Abroo," goes again to his "Sahukar" and borrows at any high rate of interest. If redemption is impossible, repudiation will be the result. This problem must receive immediate attention.

Co-operative consumers' Societies, Co-operative Dairy farming, small industries carried on on the co-operative basis can do a great deal for the promotion of Swadeshi in its broadest sense and are sure to benefit the country economically. The Banking Inquiry Committee has mentioned nearly 61 small industries which, in its opinion, can be carried on a small organised factory basis or by individual artisans and co-operative enterprise can undertake some of them without much difficulty. They were at one time in a flourishing condition. We can again revive them.

In this District, Poultry and Dairy farming will have special facilities and advantages. One specially important phase of scientific marketing is that relating to the sale of milk. The British farmer gains more from the sale of whole milk than he does from converting the cream from it into butter. The difficulties in this line that will have to be tackled are numerous. The utter ignorance and callousness of persons now engaged in this occupation to all considerations of hygiene and sanitation, their reluctance to tolerate any suggestions for improvement, the transport difficulty, the marketing difficulty are only some of them. Co-operative dairying has been in existence in England for over 80 years. The most distant part from which milk has been brought to London is 513 miles and the bulk of the milk supply comes from within a radius of 40 to 100 miles. This is how the Railway Companies helped. "In addition to putting their milk rates and charges on a uniform basis, the leading companies greatly improved their milk train services, opening branch lines for Sunday traffic, constructing special milk vans on framework similar to that of the best passenger rolling stock, concentrating milk from specified districts at suitable junction stations and carrying it thence in special and often non-stop milk specials run at a speed of over 40 miles an hour, and setting apart, more especially at London stations, certain lines with platform and approach road, exclusively for milk traffic."

In the Chapter on "How Co-operation can help" we find the following:—

1. Establishing closer relations between producer and retailers;
2. Setting up central depots at which by means of the most perfect machinery, the milk can be subjected to cleansing and proper cooling before being despatched by train.
3. Regulating the quantities of milk sent to the towns in order to avoid any fall in prices owing to the supplies forwarded being in excess of the demand.
4. Retaining the surplus and converting it into cheese or some other marketable commodity, thus not only avoiding a fall in prices for the milk but ensuring additional profits in other directions.
5. Opening up possibilities of a further resort to co-operation by the joint purchase of feeding stuff fertilisers, and other requirements, and
6. Encouraging the keeping of the cows by small holders, as is the case on the Continent, there being good reason for expecting that with co-operative marketing of the produce, the cow may become the mainstay of the small holder.

I will not try your patience by going into similar details about eggs and poultry. But here again there is a wonderful field for operation. I have seen some poultry farms run by individual enterprise and there is no question but that the occupation will be very remunerative if properly carried on.

I find that you propose to consider the question of village industries. Mahatma Gandhi has already given a great impetus to this movement and the All India Village Industries Association is engaged in valuable research and investigation—the result of which will no doubt be of great assistance to all.

Co-operative Housing Societies are of great assistance to the middle-class house-owner. There are many Societies in the City and the Suburbs also in Ahmedabad and many other places which show the advantages of co-operation in the matter of building houses. The amount of money that has been invested in Building Societies in England is tremendous. Co-operation, I believe, is likely to be very successful in the matter of housing and as the demand for decent houses increase, this activity is bound to flourish.

During the last six or seven years, women have been taking a prominent part in all our public affairs. If they turn their attention to Co-operative activities in the nature of starting stores of and organising the Co-operative movement in the country, I think the movement will be greatly benefitted. May I appeal to the ladies present here to take keener interest in the movement in future?

There is one more question to which I wish to refer before concluding and that is the formation of a Co-operative Land Mortgage Bank for the Suburbs, Thana and Colaba. Of course no one will oppose such a measure. The principal object of a Land Mortgage Bank are: (1) the redemption of the land and houses of agriculturists, (2) the liquidation of their old debts, and (3) the financing of costly agricultural improvements either in houses, methods of cultivation or otherwise.

I have already indicated my own views about agricultural indebtedness. But perhaps being a Congressman, my views may be considered extremely biased. In a meeting held recently at Nasik Mr. B. V. Jadhav, our Ex-Minister, is reported to have expressed the view that Land-Mortgage Banks can help very little and that more drastic remedies are called for if real help is to be given to the Agriculturists. I think the State must first undertake the liquidation of all old debts in a certain number of years, if any relief is to reach the suffering cultivators at all. If we are a country mainly populated by agriculturists and subsisting on agriculture, our Government must be run mainly in the interests of the Agriculturist, but as it happens, it is the Agriculturist, who is being exploited by all.

Situated as we are in this City of Bombay, the thing all of us can easily do is to try and spread the light of knowledge of every kind amongst our more ignorant countrymen. We can do a good deal of propaganda. We can make available to our Agriculturists in their own language a great deal of knowledge and information, about their occupation, improved methods of production and of marketing—we can help in the spread of literacy by simple methods—we can teach them to be vocal, to refuse to be exploited. Publicity and propaganda are mighty weapons which your Conference can resolve to utilise: "In human Society, improvement that is worth the name is never affected by one set of people forcing their ideas down the throat of another set. All improvements take place by consent, by men seeing eye to eye believing in common and acting together in good faith and mutual loyalty for the given end. This loyal and continuous consent can never be

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

697 obtained on a large scale except in communities, whose members as human beings are on good terms with one another, respect one another, trust one another, believe in each other's good intentions, and take a generous view of each other's merits and demerits."

If this is true and I believe it is, there is enough work out for us to proceed in our search for a better and a happier world.

SIKHISM A UNIVERSAL RELIGION.

(BY NARAIN SINGH.)

As a modern universal religion Sikhism is unique in itself. Its foundation stone rests on sincere devotion and universal brotherhood. In northern India it is a spiritual brotherhood which is known for the simplicity of its teachings and the purity of its faith. It is believed that the Divine inspiration which is its fountain head is distinctly impressive, and soul-penetrating, and produces its effect of purity at once. This is because of the deep-going simplicity of its language and its sublime literature. These essential factors are nothing but Divine and Spiritual from one end to the other. The great peculiarity of it is that once the music of Love enters the devout heart, the appeal to the sublime spirit is irresistible and immediate.

The essence of this religion, and spiritual society of universal brotherhood was first revealed by Guru Nanak. This inspiration first originated from the Punjab, from a place called Talwandi, in the Lahore District. The spirituality of worship, devotion of its followers and the purity of its doctrine had such a powerful and charming effect in them that Nanak's teachings spread all round, and had the force of an irresistible penetration in the human heart. They have always the immediate effect of raising the slumbering soul to the Divine and heavenly heights, in spite of everything else. They give the charm of sweetness to the craving and hungry heart. They point out to the heart, by means of a true revelation, the charming reality that heart is simply dying without that Divine Love which is the indispensable food for the heart to live and grow on. They show to it also the sublime method of worshipping that True Love which nourishes humanity and strengthens brotherly relations between man and man.

In the sublime Sikh scriptures the whole of the Divine Philosophy is reduced ultimately to the Supreme Being whose grandeur and the highest glory of Love is illustrated through the common working of the ordinary phases of human living. The relationship between the father and his son, between the husband and his beloved consort, are taken to exemplify and show to humanity what exactly ought to be the spiritual relationship between the mortal creature and his creator. The doctrine, in itself a philosophic discourse of lengthy and intricate proportions elsewhere, is most delightfully dealt with in the beautiful poetry of our scriptures.

There is nothing much of the possibility of ambiguity, equivocation or mystery anywhere throughout the teachings of this great religion, which seem to have been revealed by the Supernatural Being for the elevation of the modern age.

Like other religions in India, of our times, its aim has been to reduce the deep philosophy, and its difficult dogma, to as much of a simplicity as could benefit the modern easy-going man of the present age. All inexplicable points which baffled the human understanding, and were likely to lead us astray, have been simplified and put before us in as easy and clear a form as it was possible to be done.

Hindu philosophy, with all its mixed up essential details, has always been believed to be an ocean which it was not at all possible for every one to dive in to get the pearl of virtue or research in hand. Here in the Sikh philosophy, in a gloriously easy form, everything has been put clearly before the follower of the religion for him to solve the problem of his salvation in the right way.

It is an epitome or abstract of almost all the Hindu scriptures which were most difficult of understanding on account of the difficulty of language and of the great dearth of easily accessible literature. What is believed to have been enshrined in the unfathomable depths of the deep ocean of the original Hindu philosophy which seems to have receded beyond the reach of the modern humanity, is now revealed in the Sikh scriptures so that the same benefit may be derived after an easier and more acceptable effort.

The greatest beauty of our Sikh teachings lies in the choice made of the language in which the philosophy of the life and death of man is preached. The language of the Sikh poetry and its entire music is not always the Punjabi language of the land of the five rivers alone. But it is what may be called by the only suitable name of Brijbhasha. It is believed that the language of the sacred books of the Sikhs can easily be understood, as it is, throughout the greater portions of India. For instance, the U. P., Punjab, greater portion of the C. P., Sindh, N. W. F. P., and in many other parts of the country this language of the Granth Sahib is not very difficult to follow. At least, it is not so difficult to follow as that of the unapproachable treasures of the Sanskrit scriptures in which the old Hindu books deal with their teachings for the uplift of the adherents of the Hindu religion.

The universality, the extreme sublimity and the simplicity of the Sikh teachings for preaching their spirituality, in its most pure form for the benefit of man, is seen from the fact that inspiration, in its pristine purity, has been derived from different philosophies of contemporary religions. Islam has naturally contributed a lot for the clearer exposition of the details of spiritual points,—on a universal basis.

This fraternity, in itself, is not a small factor in proving the universality of Sikhism. For instance, what is common in the two has been beautifully brought to light in the same sweet form of musical song in the very words of the saints of those religions, and spiritual professions. There is quite a large number of poems in Persian which have been included. Contributions, in their own original form, from Mohammedan saints, and saints of the depressed classes of those days, under their own names, have been freely and reverently admitted into the portals of the sacred scriptural verse of our sublime Sikhism for the edification of man, and for his ultimate freedom from the trammels and tortures of the human life. Here the straightest path to the salvation of the long suffering human soul has been clearly shown for it to get rid of its hereditary vice and evil doings.

There is, however, one aspect of the rigidity of formalism linked to the spirituality of this religion which has at certain places seemed to form a deep ditch of difference of opinion. Some people think it to have marred its universality by restricting its growth rather in a narrower sphere. But, if one were to attach the same sanctity to this outward ceremonious formalism as is generally attached to so many other important phases of our life, there is nothing much that could be said about it. It may, in the ordinary sense, be looked upon as merely a badge of distinction just as the Hindu tuft was, or is, for the members of the Hindu community of a

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

698

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 4

certain type. All the same, if it is viewed in a liberal sense, and then hedged round by narrower considerations, the true essence of the universality falls a little bit under the cloud and loses its charm to a great extent. Besides, such old fashioned ceremonialism and communalism is altogether incompatible with the rush of the advancing tide of modern trend of thought and its easy-going methods.

AMERICA FACES THE EAST.

(By WALTER BROOKS FOLEY.)

Japan is a beautiful country to look at. The islands of the Inland Sea are charming when seen by sunlight or moonlight. The greens of the rugged volcanic hills meet the blue green of the sea. The fishing boats scud before the breeze or lie at anchor in tiny harbours.

The great modern cities of Yokohama and Kobe and Tokyo and Osaka are indications of how western industrialism has conquered much of the country. Yet the arched electric street lights in the shopping section of Kobe, made as they are like hanging lanterns, indicate that just below the industrialized surface the art and beauty of the country are still at work.

A visit to Kyoto, an interior city of palaces and Buddhist temples, of weirdly trimmed evergreens, of Shinto lanterns and red-lacquered torii, is stimulus enough to bring memories of splendid parks and the lights of the surrounding hills appearing after dark.

Our friends sat with us in the Roof Garden of the Hotel with its carefully worked-out service for guests with western tastes and we found ourselves in a veritable fairyland. The exquisite red lacquer tea-pot we brought away with us is a constant reminder of our time spent in Kyoto.

In the background of every landscape painting and in the lacquer, china and carving of the Japanese people is the actual or suggested outline of Fujiyama, the sacred mountain. It is beautiful whether seen by sea or by land. A picture of it travels with us wherever we go.

Japan is a land of beauty if one can think only in such terms as we have suggested. But Japan is not attracting world-wide attention today because of the beauty of her national landscape.

MILITARISTIC JAPAN.

Japan has always been like many western countries in her attitude of reverence for the soldier, the warrior. Until about 1867 the country was divided and sub-divided in many political sections. But the place of the soldier, the knight, the ronin, the samurai was always high.

So when Japan came to shift from feudalism to a national state it merely meant that the loyalty of the soldier was transferred to a larger political unit. One of the divisions assumed the leadership and maintained it by force as well as diplomacy.

The Japanese people have always had their personal liberty restricted. One reason for the exquisite Japanese art is that in the field of art the people had a chance for self-expression which they did not have in politics or economics or social relations.

The political loyalty of the people was made practically synonymous with a religious ancestor-emperor worship. The emotions of the people were keyed to this tune and have remained so to this day. The combination of nationalistic loyalty and religious devotions makes it comparatively easy for the small group back of the emperor to manipulate the affairs of the country. This is done through the army and navy, which though seeming to have minds of their own are a part of the authoritarian system still in control of the nation.

A Filipino friend of mine just returned from Japan gave us one impression of that country the fact that so many thousands were in uniform from boys and girls to adults.

Paying respect to the emperor has come to be a method of enforcing military discipline on the entire population.

EXPANDING JAPAN.

Japan is definitely controlled at present by the idea that she is the leader of Asia. No matter what group of Japanese citizens one talks with the same sentiment is expressed.

One would have no particular objection to the idea if it were based on moral and ethical principles. But the Japanese method—similar to the European method—of proving superiority is to take possession of other countries by military and naval force. Her doctrine of approval of the soldier of feudal times has fitted in very well with the western emphasis on the power of the sword as a basic means of settling disputes.

The military expansion has been linked with commercial developments. Industry has been the handmaiden of the emphasis on controlling the Asiatic sector of the planet. The march of the Japanese armies southward into China has gone hand in hand with smuggling of Japanese goods into the country without paying any customs and without regard for the integrity of China.

The expanding of Japan is not for the purpose of settling millions of Japanese in the other countries. That has not been done and will not be done. It is for the purpose of satisfying the grandiose schemes of Asiatic dominion and also of providing natural resources for the industrial life of the Empire. The population of Japan began to increase rapidly with the development of industry.

There are times when one could wish Perry had never insisted on opening Japanese ports to trade!

CHINA WILL WIN.

Japan may seem to swallow China economically and politically. But when the final pages of that chapter of history are written Japan will be only a province of the great Chinese Republic of the future.

Japan is only following, in exaggerated fashion, the practice of England and France and Germany and other countries in regard to China. We must not forget that England fought a war with China to force China to buy opium, or that the United States has warships on the Chinese rivers! Why? For the good of China? Not exactly! For the sake of trade. For the sake of controlling the life of China in the interest of western nations.

Now, when western nations are otherwise occupied with their disastrous militaristic policies and antipathies, Japan is making the same mistake. And she will lose. China will win unless she, too, comes to believe that military power is the final resort in human relations.

We ought to get into our thinking the idea that militarism emphasizes destruction, while what Japan and all the rest of us need is construction. We can't go on dealing in death and expect life as a result. Japan in dealing out death will destroy, in the end, not other countries, but herself.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

699

THE GERMAN'S VACATION.

(BY PROFESSOR DR. RAUECKER.)

From the 1935 annual report of the Savings Banks and Bankers Association (Sparkassen-und Giroverband), which is the central organization of German Savings Banks, it can be seen that even during the darkest days of the economic depression in 1932, the amount of monthly deposits never sank below 330 million marks. In 1933, with the revival of confidence in the nation's political leadership, and a renewed recovery in business, the monthly deposits in savings accounts rose to between 370 and 438 millions. In 1935, they fluctuated between 392 and 664 millions. The peak figure of annual savings deposits was reached in 1934 with 5,660,000,000 marks, as against 4,700,000,000 in 1932, 5,070,000,000 in 1933, and 5,580,000,000 in 1935. Here must be taken into consideration that the trifling decline in deposits in 1935 was more than offset by the very marked decline in payments during that year. The total amount drawn out of savings accounts in 1935 was 5,080,000,000 or considerably less than the deposits, and this is the decisive factor in determining the saving propensity of any community.

The report of the Savings Banks and Bankers Association also refutes the myth—and is not here, perhaps, the wish father to the thought?—of the exploitation of the German workman. It is, often a fact that on the average more savings have been accumulated in the rural districts in the Eastern, Northern and Southern parts of the Reich. But even in the industrial regions of Central Germany, where the population is largely composed of factory labourers, the average of savings is high. Another, and no less convincing, proof that the German labourer has set aside a certain proportion of his earnings, is the increase in what is called the "travel savings," or the weekly or monthly sums deposited with the "Labour Front" organization, which gives the labourer or employee the right to participate in a vacation trip arranged by the national organization, "Kraft durch Freude". The amount of money saved through this medium and for this purpose reached the total of 3,200,000 marks the first year the organization was in operation. Apart from the advantages gained, this system also prevents the thrifty workman from drawing his vacation money and spending his vacation time making money "on the side." For this form of savings can only be applied for the actual expenses of a holiday.

It is also an interesting fact, recently confirmed by the International Labour Bureau, that of all the labourers in the world who have a legal right to an annual vacation, more than 50% are German labourers. This high percentage is liable to be still higher when the "Kraft durch Freude" organization has completed its scheme of vacation schedules. This scheme was the subject-matter of the proceedings at the annual meeting of the organization in November 1935, when a so-called "three year plan" was announced in the following form: The keels of two 15,000 ton ships have already been laid, and a third, of 22,000 tons has been ordered. The lodging accommodations in the several Provincial Recreation Homes has been doubled by the addition of 30,000 beds. By 1938, the first of five seashore resorts at Lins on the island of Ruegen, built to accommodate 20,000 persons, will be completed. This enterprise has furnished the architects and contractors with a novel problem. As the length of sojourn of each individual is tentatively fixed at one week, so that arrangements must be made for the arrival, housing, feeding, amusement, and departure of about 400,000 guests annually, the problems of transportation and provisioning and the way in which they will be solved will undoubtedly be of great interest to those concerned with similar problems in other countries.

For after all, the plans, arrangements, and general functions now being put into effect by "Kraft durch Freude" do not constitute an enterprise which should be considered as being limited to Germany. The fundamental social idea, not only to secure for the less well-to-do labourer the legal right to a vacation, but also to give him the opportunity to spend such vacation to his best advantage, is one which must appeal strongly to many industrial nations to-day. Its realisation embodies the surest and most successful means of reconciling the working man with present-day industrial conditions.

CASTE AND INDUSTRIAL PROGRESS.

(By C. A. PHADKAR.)

The caste system is a negation of the beneficial principle of equality and injures the higher as well as the lower castes. It breeds in the former a false and distorted sense of superiority and in the latter a mental attitude fatal to the development of self-respect. An extreme example of this is offered by the depressed and the untouchable classes, who are subjected to unheard of humiliation and to many disabilities not only social but also economic. The unfortunate victim of this system is constantly a loser in ordinary commercial operations through his inability to enter a shop or even to pass through streets where shop-keepers dwell.

The influence of Western thought and the introduction of so much of the modern machinery of civilisation like railways etc. is tending in some measure to break down the barriers of caste. Owing to the linking up of the village with the outside world and the growth of trade and modern industry an increasing number of people have begun to find it advantageous to give up their old traditional occupations and seek employment in the new mills, mines and workshops. With the growth of commerce and introduction of machinery in production the old social organisation has become unsuitable and is bound to be subordinated to the exigencies of economic life.

Western education and culture, university and college life where the low caste man rubs shoulders with the high caste man, the growth of large towns, the influence of the ruling race, the development of spirit of scepticism are all undermining the spirit of caste exclusiveness. While reducing amongst the higher classes the inclination to insist on their privileges they are making the lower classes less disposed to admit without question the superior status of the higher castes. Again, there is now only one law applicable without distinction to high and low caste and the state no longer encourages the pretensions of the higher classes, nor does it favour their admission to the superior posts in government service. On the contrary appointments are now preferably given to the lower castes and a sort of inverted caste system is being introduced. The lower castes are becoming more self-conscious and alive to the necessity of removing their old disabilities by concerted communal action. Various Hindu political leaders have started a "crusade" against the caste system and Mahatma Gandhi has initiated a movement particularly directed towards the removal of the curse of untouchability.

In spite of all this, however, it would be a mistake to suppose that the caste system is moribund. Unfortunately, it still holds its sway in practically unabated strength. We have referred above to the general awakening among the lower castes and although this is a welcome development in many

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

700
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 4

ways, in practice it is often seen that devotion to one's caste means a fanatical hatred of the superior castes and much energy is thus being wasted in feeding fat the ancient grudge against the higher castes. The new rights conferred on the people by the reform are not infrequently misused for fostering narrow sectional interests to the neglect of the wider national interests and the various castes with their improved organisation and strengthened self consciousness are made to serve as a ready-made system of standing political causes. While the different castes are giving free vent to their grievances against the caste higher up they are generally not prepared to treat on terms of perfect equality the castes lower than themselves in the social scale.

(Concluded.)

ITALY IN ETHIOPIA.

The Royal Consul-General for Italy in Calcutta has issued the following:

ADDIS ABABA: The Viceroy has issued a proclamation raising the dignity and status of women as mothers and wives, declaring that women should not have to descend from horses and vehicles, when they meet the motor-car of the Viceroy.

The Economic Commission of the Empire has started its work. The tribunals in the city's sectors are regularly functioning and the Bank of Italy is carrying out all banking operations from the 16th instant. Representatives of various confederations and of big Italian commercial concerns have arrived at Addis Ababa.

Home newspapers are already being sold and very soon the first Italian library will be inaugurated. The working of hotels, restaurants and public resorts has been regulated. Sanitary measures have been taken in respect of animals and of the slaughter of animals. Arrangements have been made for controlling the conditions of consumable articles. Constructions of buildings are in full swing.

The express Marconigraph Service between Addis Ababa and Rome has commenced.

Submissions of Shoa chiefs are proceeding. The organisation of the Empire has so far touched the military problems, the administrative organisation, the development of roads, the study of the resources of the soil and the sub-soil, the commercial possibilities, judicial and religious arrangements, the health of the population, schools and buildings.

The activity of the Fascio of Addis Ababa upto now is summarised in the opening of Italian schools with 1,000 students, the institution of the Ethiopian Youth of Littorio with 1,000 native boys, and the foundation of the Institute of Culture.

A Commission has been appointed for studying the economic and financial reconstruction of Ethiopia, for the speedy and disciplined exploitation and enrichment of the territory. At present 80 per cent of the wealth of Ethiopia has not been exploited and the remaining 20 per cent has only been exploited in a preliminary form.

A decree has been issued prohibiting the export of foreign money. The same decree further states that owners of foreign bonds and securities are bound to declare them. This law applies only to Italian citizens and to the colonial subjects.

ROME: The Duce has laid down that all offers in money from private persons or institutions for the celebration of the foundation of the Empire should be allotted to charitable institutions and to the support of summer colonies for children.

RACE RELATIONS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

A survey of race relations in South Africa during 1935 by J. D. Rheinalt Jones, Secretary of the South African Institute of Race Relations, is published in Race Relations (Johannesburg, South Africa), official journal of the Institute. During the year public attention has been drawn to cases of assaults by Europeans on non-Europeans. There are no statistics available to indicate whether these are increasing or not. But there is "a sounder public opinion on such matters," and some of these cases have shocked a large portion of the public. In certain sections "the relations between the police and sections of the non-European public are very strained," with the result that there are assaults by the police on the Non-Europeans and by them on the police. Stock theft by natives is a frequent cause of racial friction, but a magistrate has commented that the first step in the protection of stock is for farmers to "pay their natives a decent wage and see that they are properly fed."

The treatment of natives by the courts has roused complaints that the sentences imposed on natives are out of proportion to the offense and to those imposed on Europeans for similar offenses. For instance, a European convicted of four assaults on natives was fined in all £15 with an alternative of two months and 24 days' imprisonment. The fine was paid. But a native convicted of stealing a fowl was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and eight strokes of the cane!

The "colour bar" is another important question. It is said that non-Europeans are allowed, "at the discretion of the chief steward," to enter the dining saloons on railroad trains "for the purpose of obtaining meals after all Europeans are served." In Johannesburg an effort was made to prevent the erection of a church "unless the Bishop inserted a clause in the trust deed prohibiting the use of the church by non-Europeans." In the same city there is an ordinance which forbids European women to attend dances "in premises licensed for the entertainment of non-Europeans." The appointment of a Zulu poet as assistant in the Department of Bantu Studies in the University of the Witwatersrand was opposed as indicating "a policy of social equality" and as "a danger to the safety and welfare of the students." Legislation to prevent intermarriage has been proposed, although in some sections of the country there is an effective bar since there is no legal provisions for interracial marriages. The most frequent cause of racial feeling is the employment of Europeans by non-Europeans, usually Indians.

The problems of harmonizing the economic interests of whites and natives is, of course, particularly serious. But the need for it is being "more generally realized. The permanence in our urban areas of large numbers of whites who have migrated there from rural areas is being recognized, as well as the necessity for ensuring that they have permanent employment under conditions which will enable them to live decently. Similarly, it is more generally admitted that the non-European who is a permanent town dweller needs, for the maintenance of a decent civilized life, at least the minimum wage and living conditions which the white worker requires. While the approximation of white and non-white living standards in urban areas is becoming steadily closer, both groups are seriously handicapped by the low wages which native seasonal and temporary labour from the Reserves earns in urban areas."

It is interesting to note that "in remote Native Reserves the [Abyssinian] War is a topic of conversation and the cause of anxious concern for the fate of what is regarded as a native state."

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

701

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEACRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase-the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

26-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT. BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897.)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Siddpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MHI Agent, Ahmedabad.)
Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Krishnaraj Vitthalrao Ulap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 4 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 4 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,
2-36 Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

702
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 4

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches:—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{4}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramatti (District Poona)	Viramgam. (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kalwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panhale)
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhraj D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Bant, Esq.,
R. G. Saria, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

703

realpatidar.com

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore
DRESS and SARI
Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and
soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—
1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.
3. The Mysore Emporium, Kitab Mahal, Hornby Road, Fort, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE

Registered No. B 348.

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 28.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JULY 11, 1936. No. 43

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Indus Valley Culture.
Indian Science Institute.
Congress and the Elections.
The Tenth All-India Women's Conference.
Arab Women's Appeal.
Mischievous Outburst.
The Unity Editorial.
An American Experiment.

Should India Remain in the League?
The Communal Question.
Planning for Social Welfare:
A Great Experiment.
I Was a Missionary.
A Creed of Service to Humanity.
Family Settlements Among Muslims.
News of the Week.

NOTES

Indus Valley Culture:—Dr. Charles L. Fabri, the Hungarian archaeologist, has been appointed by the Government of India to classify and catalogue the finds of Mohenjo Daro. Dr. Fabri, it would seem, is unacquainted with the progress made already in solving the problems arising out of these finds. He told a Karachi audience last month that at present we had not the faintest idea as to what race they, the people of Mohenjo Daro, were, if they belonged to any race at all, what was their religion, what were their customs. Their script, he added, had not yet been deciphered. The New Review, which, by the way, has been maintaining a high standard of scholarship since it was started two years ago, publishes in its current issue an exceedingly interesting paper by the Rev. Father Heras entitled "Light on the Mohenjo Daro Riddle." The script he calls proto-Dravidian, parent of the two Brahmi scripts North and South, of India. The Tamil script is the Mohenjo Daro script directly continued and developed by the people of South India. The Brahmi script of the Asoka inscriptions is the same script as developed by the Aryans. However that may be, the words which Father Heras cites as from the finds, are several of them in common use in Tamil. Some words have dropped from Tamil but are found in Telugu and Kanarese. The inscription on the Mohenjo Daro seal, number 321, which Father Heras transcribes, sounds like a verse taken from the oldest Tamil classic extant, the Kural, both as regards words and metre. Not only the words but the construction of phrases in proto-Dravidian is identical with that in Tamil. Surely, the people of this buried city were of the same race and language as the people of the Tamil land. Then, as regards religion, they were surely worshippers of Shiva. Three or four words reproduced in Father Heras' article are names of Shiva, Mun-tan, the three eyed. Dr. Fabri said that in the Vedas they speak of horses which were unknown in Mohenjo Daro.

But Father Heras reproduces from one of the seals the picture of a dog (nai in proto-Dravidian as in current Tamil) and the horse and the dog were domesticated at about the same stage of human civilisation. Further finds will disprove Dr. Fabri's conclusion that the horse was unknown in Mohenjo Daro. Sind from ancient times, was the country from which the best horses were imported into other parts of the country. Sindhu horses of noble breed are praised in the Chammapada. What is more, the Vedas themselves refer to horses from Sind as of special value. (Vedic Index, Vol. I page 43). Father Heras with one or two South Indian scholars would have been a more appropriate choice to catalogue these finds than this Hungarian scholar of Sumerian reputation.

Indian Science Institute:—The Times of India published on Tuesday what purported to be a summary of recommendations of the Council of the Indian Science Institute at Bangalore, based on those of the statutory Quinquennial Committee which reviewed the work of the Institute some months back. The alterations now proposed, according to the Times summary, will make it clear once for all that the Institute should concentrate mainly on scientific research applied to the immediate industrial needs of the country. It is sought, thus to correct, it added, the over-emphasis on Physics and Mathematics and generally for abstract research which, it is alleged, has been the policy of the present Director, Sir C. V. Raman. If this is really the purpose of the Council's recommendations, it will be regarded as an extremely retrograde step in the scientific world. Not long ago a manifesto signed by leading British scientists was issued protesting against the tendency to subordinate Science to Industry. The aim of Science is to enlarge human knowledge. Incidentally, its discoveries have been applied to develop industries including the armaments industry. No true scientist will agree to substitute for the pursuit of Truth which is the sole aim of Science, any ideal which makes it subservient to other ends. Sir C. V. Raman at the Science Congress held in Bombay some months ago stressed this point, as against Lord Brabourne who in his opening speech had advocated the cause of applied Science. It can be easily shown that even from the point of view of Industries, the maximum benefit accrues in the long run from the labours of pure researchers. The statement that the recommendations

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

706

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| July 11

realpatidar.com

are intended to reverse the policy of the present Director, Sir. C. V. Raman, smacks of propaganda. It was somewhat of a surprise that he, with his passion for pure science, should have tied himself down for a period of years to a position involving much work of an administrative character. The recommendations of the Council so far as they relieve him of this distraction are to be welcomed. It is also well that each Professor should be free to work on his own lines without interference from the Director or Council. What is objectionable is that Science in the Institute should be made the handmaid of Industries. If and so far as this is done, the Institute will cease to rank among the great centres for the advancement of knowledge. This was certainly not the object of the far-seeing Founder of the Institute, Jamshedjee Tata, or of Burjorji Padshah who conceived the idea and laboured hard to give it shape and form.

Congress and the Elections :—Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel speaking at a meeting at Congress House this week, asked the country to return Congressmen at the next elections to the reformed Provincial Legislatures in such numbers that they would exceed the strength of all other parties. He suggested that this would enable them to refuse, to take office without incurring the gibe that their action is dictated by necessity. This is certainly an ingenious way of appealing to the large section of opinion in the country which is opposed to Congressmen or others who have condemned the Reforms as unworkable, taking office under the scheme. But we doubt if it will catch. The position of the Congress in the country, nobody can know better than the Sardar, is not what it was at the last election to the Legislative Assembly. This is due to many causes. The Congress members of the Assembly have not acted uniformly as men with a definite and serious purpose. There has been too much of Government baiting merely as a pastime. Such lapses from ordinary courtesy as not getting up when a message is read from the Viceroy or even when he addressed the Legislature in his official capacity, do not impress the public as essential or helpful to the transaction of public business. There has been too much diffusion and too little concentration in the proceedings of the Congress rank and file in the Assembly. Singleness of purpose has been conspicuous by its absence. The strength of the Party has been wasted in skirmishes and the battle line has often presented inexplicable distortions. The fact that many of the members had gone to prison, which had a great influence at the last election, no longer commands the same amount of it. Also, the uncalled for personal attacks on leading men who do not worship in the Congress pavilion, at a time when every effort should be made to soften asperities and invite co-operation on the principle that those who are not against us are with us, has also affected public opinion to the detriment of some Congress leaders. Babu Rajendra Prasad did his best to promote this end but he was not sufficiently supported by all his colleagues. The country is in no mood to give a carte blanche to anybody not even to Congressmen. We are not unfriendly to the Congress. We can not think of any other political group at the moment which contains a larger proportion of men and women who have earned the respect of all classes by their spirit of service and sacrifice. If, therefore, we suggest that the Congress leaders should get down from the fence and tell the people what exactly they propose to do if returned in a majority, relative or absolute, it is with no desire to detract from the Sardar's appeal.

The Tenth All-India Women's Conference :—

The Report of the Tenth All-India Women's Conference was held at Trivandram in the closing days of last year and the opening days of this year. We have now before us the report of its proceedings, compiled with great care and printed and got up admirably at the Government Press, Trivandram. The excellence of the report and the promptitude with which it has been issued, are typical of the organising capacity of Indian women. The Women's Conference is remarkable in many other ways also. It is refreshingly free from the taint of communalism, the canker which has a blighting influence on so many men's movements in this country. The one touch of Nature which makes the whole world kin, is, in India at least, concentrated in women. The membership of the Conference as well as its executive is representative of all communities, Christian, Muslim, Parsi, Hindu and Jew. English, Anglo-Indian and Indian women meet here on equal terms—Maharanis, middle class matrons, University graduates, women engaged in the learned professions, doctors, teachers, social workers, politicians, women who had gone to prison for civil disobedience, women who have been decorated by Government for public service, they are all here. Another noteworthy feature of the Women's Movement in India is the total absence of the rancorous attitude affected by feminists in Western lands towards men. Her Highness the Maharani of Travancore in her presidential address made gracious reference to "the innate chivalry of our countrymen, which we must ungrudgingly recognise" as having helped the removal of all political restrictions on account of sex in nearly all provinces, as also the admission of women to the liberal professions. She rightly claimed that "one of the biggest successes of the Conference lies in the promotion of the idea of unity of Indian women" and that "we have successfully fought against the communal and provincial outlook which has been a disquieting feature of public life in India." Even a cursory perusal of the proceedings (conducted in the English language) is enough to impress one with the intelligence, good sense and quick grasp of questions, displayed by all those who took part in the Conference. The report prints at the end all the important resolutions passed at this and previous Conferences, names of delegates and office-bearers at head-quarters as well as

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real1933]r.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

707

in the provinces and also a statement showing the sound financial position of the Conference. This report furnishes the readiest means to an understanding of the Indian Women's Movement and should be included in every collection of literature bearing on modern Indian life. It is priced Re. 1-8 and can be had from the office of the Hon. Organising Secretary, Gilchrist Gardens, Chetput, Madras.

Arab Women's Appeal:—As we have repeatedly observed the sympathy of the people of India, irrespective of race or creed, are with the Arabs in Palestine in their struggle against the imminent danger of being overwhelmed by the influx of Europeanised Jews under the aegis of the British mandatory. We have received a copy of a moving appeal by the Arab women of Palestine addressed primarily to British women and generally to women of all countries. In clear terms the women of Palestine declare that they are not fighting against the British mandatory and that they are not financed from any outside agency. They give statistics showing that the number of immigrant Jews has multiplied enormously since the early years of the mandate. If this goes on they fear that their culture and civilisation which to them are as precious as those of the British to Britons are in danger of destruction. The appeal is a dignified, sober, temperate statement of the position and will, we are sure, evoke sympathetic response in those to whom it is addressed. There is one matter in which the appeal is creditably distinguished from the appeals made in India on behalf of the Arabs in Palestine. In India the tendency has been for some Muslim agencies to treat it as a purely Muslim issue. These agencies have, unconsciously it may be, in view to exploit the Palestine question to consolidate Muslim communalism rather than to help the Palestine Arabs in their national struggle.

Mischievous Outburst:—The Unity of Chicago is a journal uniformly friendly to India. Its Editor, Dr. John Haynes Holmes is one of the leading religious thinkers of America and a whole-hearted admirer of Gandhiji and his message of non-violence. In America he is generally believed to be in touch with Gandhiji. It is, therefore, with surprise that we read the editorial headed "Gandhi Meets Force Again" in the Unity of the 1st June received by last week's mail, which is likely to be taken as authentic. We knew that the allegation that Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru had declared against non-violence was baseless and we strongly suspected that the remarks quoted as Gandhiji's were also "faked". They are not the sort of language one associates with Gandhiji. For these reasons we felt it necessary to refer the paragraph to Gandhiji. We have received the following categorical contradiction from him. Mahatma Gandhi writes:—"The editorial you have sent me from Unity is extraordinary. The views attributed to me and reproduced in inverted commas were never uttered by me, and, what is more, they have never been held by me. From nothing that I have heard from Jawaharlal's lips have I ever even suspected that he contemplated the use of violence for the attainment of India's independence. It is surprising how Dr. Holmes has allowed himself to be duped into thinking that I had ever made the remarks said to have been made by me."

The Unity Editorial: Here are parts of the Unity's paragraph:—The long threatened break between Gandhi and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru seems at last to have come. Elected President of the Indian National Congress at its recent meeting at Lucknow, Nehru came out for the use of violence in the struggle for independence, and is reported to be "planning a movement to shake British rule in India." There can be no personal break between Gandhi and his youthful follower, the Mahatma does not work that way even though he confesses at the movement that his "life work is ruined." Meanwhile, Gandhi has met the situation with utter realism and imperturbable sweetness of temper, also with unshaken confidence in his principles of non-violent resistance. "Not even the firmness and repression of the British government," he says, "have harmed my work as much as the new policy outlined by Jawaharlal Nehru." The sincerity of this utterance may be measured by the fact that Nehru has declared that "our members must fight, and not spin," and seeks an armed revolt of the organized peasantry and trade unions. But when this campaign fails, continues Gandhi, as it will "in two or three years," then Nehru may return, and he will be welcomed. So Gandhi, however much disappointed, serenely bides his time! "When Nehru realizes his mistake, he will find me not only willing to help him," says the Mahatma, "but ready with a new program which will startle Britain even more than did my civil disobedience campaign."

An American Experiment:—We publish this week the first of three articles describing the work of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The Tennessee Valley is an area which sprawls across parts of seven American States. Two million people inhabit this well-watered region. It is one of the richest tracts, with a temperate climate and well endowed in mineral resources. But the people have been agricultural and forming a colonial society they have been exploited by an economic system which restored nothing to the residents. The Tennessee Valley Authority was started in 1933 (May 18) to develop the potential usefulness of the entire Tennessee River. The immediate good to the United States was the relief of unemployment; nearly fourteen thousand men were put on the vast enterprise. For the future greater prosperity is envisaged for not only the Valley people but for all America through cheaper electricity. It is a vast experiment in State operation of a mammoth hydro-electric undertaking. But it is more than this. It is an attempt to change the lives of two millions who under the past system had been reduced to a form of serfdom. realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

708
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 11

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, July 11, 1936.

SHOULD INDIA REMAIN IN THE LEAGUE?

July 4 marked the lowest point in the fall of the League of Nations from the high pedestal on which it was placed when it was inaugurated. The League Assembly adopted a resolution 'closing' the Abyssinian affair. Immediately after, it proceeded to deal with this very affair by voting out two resolutions proposed by the Negus. The first was that the League should not recognise any annexation obtained by force of arms, and the second was a request for a loan of ten millions sterling to enable Ethiopia to carry on her struggle against the Italian invader. Instead of the direct reference which the first resolution might be understood to make to the annexation by Italy of Ethiopia, a resolution confirming one which was adopted four years ago in regard to some quarrel between two South American States, was passed; and this was supposed to cover the annexation of Ethiopia. The object of this round about method appears to be not to give offence to Italy whose presence was desired at the conference about the fortification of the Dardanelles by Turkey two days later. Under Article XVI of the League Covenant "any Member of the League which has violated any covenant of the League may be declared to be no longer a Member of the League." But for such a declaration to be made, all the Members of the Council, except the Covenant-breaker, should concur. Not only was there no possibility of such concurrence, but the Member States were most anxious to keep Italy in the League while condemning its action against Ethiopia. The words in which the late Czecho-Slovakian Foreign Minister, now President of the Republic, Dr. Benes, defined the position of his Government last November, represent that of most others. "Czecho-Slovakia," he said, "is neutral in this question and will remain so: she does not interfere in the actual dispute between Italy and Abyssinia nor will interfere in the future. In so far as she is compelled directly or indirectly to deal with the dispute in any way, she does so solely and exclusively on the basis of decisions made at Geneva by the League of Nations and binding on all members of the League." The present Foreign Minister of Czecho-Slovakia, went further. Speaking before the Foreign Affairs Committee of the National Assembly on May 2th, Dr. Kamil Krofta observed: "We have fulfilled and continue to fulfil the obligations which arise out of our membership of the League of Nations, striving at the same time to maintain not only an absolutely correct but also a friendly attitude towards Italy." Anticipating the suggestion that the unwelcome obligations imposed by membership of the League, should be avoided by giving up membership, Dr. Krofta added: "As a State which does not desire to, and indeed cannot, surrender the advantages accruing to it from the League of Nations, we could not, of course, allow our actions to deny the principles of collective security and assistance, the application of which we might one day be called upon to ask for ourselves." This, more or less, is the attitude of the European States. Members of the League, including Great Britain, and France the two most important of them.

How does India stand in this matter? The League of Nations can do nothing for her either by way of advancing her political status or by way of improving her economic condition. The Indian delegation has no independent voice on questions coming up for discussion before the League. The Irish Free State delegation, the South African delegation and the New Zealand delegation, could and did express their dissent from the British view about the raising of sanctions at the Assembly meeting last week. The Indian delegation sat tongue-tied although feeling in India is unprecedentedly strong against the aggression of Italy. Occasionally, Indian representatives are permitted to grumble about the sparsity of Indians employed in the League establishments and of the comparatively heavy contribution which India makes to the League's revenue. Otherwise, they have to say ditto to Mr. R. A. Butler. The social and humanitarian side of the League's activities are of relatively little benefit to India. The Labour Conferences make recommendations which often ignore the actual needs of the Indian worker and aim at satisfying imaginary ones. In any case an agency which focusses attention on one aspect—an important one certainly,—without reference to the conditions of industry as a whole, does not help industrial growth. The Indian worker himself would more appreciate an increase of his wages than a reduction in his present hours of work. But the tariff policy of the Government of India is so erratic and is governed by considerations extraneous to the interests to Indian industries, that no steady advance is possible in the direction of increased wages. Recently, they reduced the import duties on cotton goods as the result of the report of a Board appointed to enquire into the demand for enhanced duties from the Indian mill industry! In another social activity of the League, namely, that which has reference to narcotics and deleterious drugs, India's insistent cry regarding the havoc wrought by alcoholic drinks, finds no place. On the other hand the League with its social amenities operates as propaganda for the liquor habit. Indians who by heredity and habit were total abstainers have taken to the wine habit in the League atmosphere. The League propaganda against prostitution, has not been a success. For some years after the War, prostitution in Western countries seemed to have materially diminished. The improvement has not been maintained. A recent investigation in New York City showed that until 1933 the city's prostitution was individualistic with a few 'bookers' operating small

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

709 strings of apartments. Since then it has grown into a powerful organised business with some 200 houses and 1000 girls and profits amounting to over 12 million dollars a year. It may be noted in passing that Prohibition was repealed in 1933. In the light of these facts, it behoves Indian leaders to consider seriously whether this country gains anything by its membership of the League to compensate for the humiliation it suffers from being a silent participant in the cold, calculating decisions which that body is obliged to take in such grave matters as the unprovoked war on Ethiopia by Italy, without the least regard to the moral issues involved.

THE COMMUNAL QUESTION.

Dr. Clifford Manshardt came out to India nearly ten years ago. He has throughout that period participated actively in the social welfare activities of Bombay and he has to a remarkable degree won the confidence and affection of citizens of all communities and opinions. A book by him on any subject might be expected to throw fresh light on the issues involved. His recent publication on the communal question is therefore disappointing. The conclusion of Dr. Manshardt's thesis on "The Hindu-Muslim Problem in India"* that the solution lies through the method of intelligent goodwill, is unexceptionable. In fact, it is so obvious that one wonders whether it was worth while writing 128 pages to support it. And among Indians of all communities, whether intelligent or otherwise, it is as commonplace as the good old maxim that honesty is the best policy. It is possible that our lack of appreciation of this "scientific" study is due to a fundamental difference in temperament between the Occidental and the Asiatic. "Only true scientific discipline," writes Dr. Lin Yutang in 'My Country and My People', "can enable a scientist to take delight in the discovery that an earthworm has a certain protective covering, for it is on the accumulation of such minutely observed facts that science grew from generation to generation to its present magnificent attainments. Without that scientific outlook, and with a large share of humour and common sense, the Chinese must necessarily consider the study and observation of the life of an earthworm or of a gold-fish as beneath the dignity of a scholar." And this applies equally to the Indian. It is surprising when a distinguished social worker puts up five methods for consideration and finally selects as the most useful that which the "instinct," common sense—call it what you will—of the Indian people has long recognised as the only one. Intelligent goodwill, in fact, will not only solve the problem. It will completely exterminate it.

A book, however, should be judged more by what it is than by what it fails to be. Dr. Manshardt has brought to the study of the communal problem the technique of American social workers and he says as much in his last chapter. But he has unfortunately discarded the experience of the United States in treating of Indian conflicts. One cannot understand, for example how any student of world affairs can quote with complacency Theodore Morison's summing up that "the Hindus and Muslims who inhabit one village, one town, or one district belong to two separate nations more distinct and spiritually farther asunder than two European nations," in 1936. What about the Jew in Europe? How does post-war Europe look on its American residents? Sir Adbur Rahim is quoted as saying that Indian Muslims feel total aliens when they enter the Hindu quarters of a town. There are even, we do not doubt, many Hindus who feel the same way. But does Sir Abdur speak for his co-religionists? His Highness the Aga Khan who as the head of a religious community is able to take a closer view of the problem, has born frequent testimony to the many common interests and sympathies of Hindus and Muslims. And the Census Commissioner gives a direct answer to Morison when he explains the difficulty of distinguishing between Hindu and Muslim castes in Bengal and the Punjab where Muslims are seen in their largest numbers, in Bombay and Madras where they are minorities. "Repugnance to inter-marriage," say Dr. Manshardt, "is another cause of tension." Surely Dr. Manshardt does not seriously maintain that every sect will fight with every other that does not marry into it. Even the West is giving up this primitive conception of marriage as a test of friendship. Dr. Allen Hunter, on the other hand, in "Social Perplexities" states emphatically that, if the American white can be persuaded that the coloured man does not want to marry into his group, much of the difficulty of settling the different races together would disappear. India is used for generations to communities living together without inter-marriage, without even inter-dining, and this can be no true cause of communal tension. Besides, if it were really so, we would be in perpetual strife. Every Hindu girl who married a Hindu man should provoke Muslims to riot and vice versa.

But it is not so. Few people have realised how many problems India has in common with the United States. The communal question is one of these. The Hindu Muslim conflict drags on because both communities are equally weak and defenceless against hooliganism, rowdysm and mob-violence. The White-Negro conflict is unequal. Therefore, the tension seems less. The Negro is suppressed and has little hope of winning in a revolt against White America. Therefore lynchings which result in more lynchings but never grow to riots. How many riots have there been in India from 1930 to 1935? Thirty at the most. There were 94 lynchings in the United States, with one-third India's population, between 1930 and 1934, lynchings in which 95 per cent of the Whites of the districts concerned participated.

* Messrs. George Allen & Unwin, price 5 s.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

6710
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 11

ed. "During the whole business," writes an eye-witness to one of the incidents, "it was impossible to find a law officer. The whole trouble was they were for the lynching themselves." And how the women supported it. One out of every seven or eight people at the lynching party was a woman. Then they started going around trying to find Negroes to beat up." If the development of political parties in India will solve the communal problem, why do such things happen in the United States where, according to Dr. Manshardt, "Catholics have strong religious sentiments but in political affairs they think in terms of politics?" Even about Catholics the statement is not quite accurate. Did not American Protestants raise the Catholic cry in a presidential election against Al Smith? Dr. Manshardt cites Madras as a province where the party system has displaced communal trouble. If he really believes that he will believe anything in Indian politics. An extension of the Madras Party system would shock Dr. Manshardt out of his present admiration, but it will not solve the communal problem.

Dr. Manshardt, with a caution one is compelled to admire, avoids any criticism which might be interpreted as an attack on the policy of the British in India. But no solution can work which does not take into account the British factor in the communal problem. He traces the history of Hindu-Muslim relations—up to the advent of the British. Discussing political issues, he presents without comment the claim of the Muslim Deputation in 1908 for larger representation than its numbers entitled it to because of political importance; which was accepted by Lord Minto. He makes no criticism of the peculiar Communal Award which preserves both separate electorates and weightages for the Muslim community. "It is the political situation," he says, "which is militating against the improvement of communal improvements in other directions." But he intends this more as a reflection on Indian leaders than a condemnation of State policy. For he does not stop to enquire why here alone where an outside party "holds the ring," there should be discord. In explanation of conditions in the Indian States where communal strife is comparatively absent, he quotes with approval the Simon Commission's conclusion that there was peace because there was little for members of one community to fear from the predominance of the other. Just as in his comparisons with Europe and America, the Jew and the Negro are discreetly kept out, so in India the British contribution to the communal problem is slurred over. There is reason, therefore, for the hope expressed in his preface that other studies may arise out of his which will "really carry this problem along the way to solution." Dr. Manshardt's only justification for rushing into a discussion of this involved subject is the impartiality possible for an outsider. But that he has failed to bring to it. It is not by cautious and timid treatment like this that the communal tangle will be unravelled.

PLANNING FOR SOCIAL WELFARE : A GREAT EXPERIMENT.

The Tennessee Valley Authority was created by an act of Congress of the United States of America, May 18, 1933 and amended August 31, 1935 "for the purpose of maintaining and operating the properties now owned by the United States in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals, Alabama, in the interests of the national defense and for agricultural and industrial development, and to improve navigation in the Tennessee River, and to control the destructive flood waters in the Tennessee River and Mississippi River basins." So begins the second annual report of the Tennessee Valley Authority, a public owned corporation created by Congress at the request of President Roosevelt.

To direct the project, three directors particularly well qualified for such work, were designated; Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, Chairman, who had had a long and remarkable record as a practical and social engineer and as President of Antioch College in Ohio, and who, in addition, was interested in the development of small industries and co-operation; Dr. Harcourt A. Morgan, who, as President of the University of Tennessee, was a recognized authority on soils and agriculture, and an advocate of decentralized industry; and Mr. David E. Lilienthal, a lawyer, specialist in Public Utilities. The three Directors have incorporated as the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The purpose of the Authority is: (1) "Control and proper use of water resources; (2) Conservation and preservation of land resources; and (3) A more wide-spread use of electrical energy." But all this has for its main objective, as all three directors constantly say, "the well-being of the people of the whole area and ultimately of the whole country."

40,600 square miles about the size of the deltaic plain of the Ganges is included in the area, which consists of parts of seven states. The length of the Tennessee River itself, from Knoxville south through Tennessee into Alabama, where it turns abruptly back north to flow again through Tennessee and into Kentucky to empty into the Ohio River (a tributary of the Mississippi River), is 658 miles but with its sources it is over 900 miles.

THE DAMS.

For the control, conservation, and maximum use of water resources of the area, the Tennessee Valley Authority (T. V. A., as it is called) took over preliminary plans already made by U. S. Army engineers, and developed them into an integrated system of dams for the whole valley. Muscle Shoals, now known as Wilson Dam, with its nitrate plants—one of which is now a fertilizer plant—had been built as a war measure. Norris Dam, some 400 miles above Wilson Dam, and Wheeler Dam, only 155 miles above Wilson Dam, had been proposed and their location selected. Construction of the Norris Dam began in October 1933, under the T. V. A. which was also authorized to proceed with the construction of Wheeler Dam. Though the power-house at Norris Dam was not yet finished, it was important to catch the 1936 spring flood waters, and on March 4th, 1936, President Roosevelt, in Washington, touched a golden telegraph-key which gave the signal for the closing of the eight great sluice gates and the impounding of the waters forming the great new Norris Reservoir, with its nearly 800 mile margin and 34,000 acre surface, began. Wheeler Dam, with its 50 feet high lock is substantially ready, and active work on a fourth—Pickwick Landing

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real1936.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

711

Dam—has been under way since January 1935; Guntersville Dam was started December, 1935 and Chicamauga Dam on January 2, 1936, while six new dam projects were recommended to Congress by a T. V. A. report of March, 1936.

These great dams whose height and length and storage lakes, power houses and fertilizer plant are so impressive, are only part of a planned series of high dams on the main river and storage dams in the deep canons of the tributaries,—a gigantic engineering 100-year long project for the eventual unified water control of the whole area. Obviously this will do much for navigation and flood control, as the great resulting storage dams can help prevent floods by holding back the waters during the wet season and can help navigation by releasing them as needed during dry periods, thereby securing a relatively steady depth of channel and flow of water.

PRELIMINARY WORK.

It is not possible to go into the careful surveying of even the most minute details which was necessary, the tests that had to be made before work could really get started. All engineers would be familiar with many of these technical studies, but, as Dr. A. E. Morgan says, "laymen could not know, for example, that it took a twenty-seven days' test of the rock at the Norris Dam site to discover how strong concrete it would make before deciding whether we should have to build a railroad to bring in sand and gravel from a distance"—they did not need to. Nor would they know, for instance, the research which went into the study of the all-time records for flood possibilities in this country and in Europe,—(as for example, of the Danube near Vienna the flood of 1055 A. D. which was 50% larger than any flood since)—which necessitated a study of even the ring-growths in trees to carry the data about floods of the area back further than the written historical record, so that for all time there need be no question of the Dam's being able to withstand a record-breaking flood.

Moreover, similar thorough research is, of course, preliminary to every step of the work. The concern for "securing the maximum use" of the area demanded that, before the dams could be started, all the wealth of the valley, little as well as great, human as well as economic, should be known, especially in those parts that would be submerged by resulting reservoirs. The whole area consequently has been thoroughly surveyed by airplane, excavations, studies, photographs, tests,—for mineral deposits, natural resources of all kinds, soils, crops, even archaeological and Indian remains, possible sites for agricultural and industrial developments, forests, towns, highways, railroads and bridges that would be flooded and must be replaced and ready, water power for electrical energy, human interests in homes, churches, cemeteries—that all possible values might be conserved and the residue removed, destroyed or burnt lest it should pollute the valley. In all this, the human side was never forgotten. The people living in the areas that would be under water were transferred with gentlest consideration to sites they, themselves, selected under the wise counsel of impartial experts from the University of Tennessee and elsewhere. No one scoffed at the reluctance and regret of those who had lived all their lives, in, perhaps, the very cabins their pioneer ancestors had built in Daniel Boone's time. Even the embers of the fire "brought over the mountains" before the day of matches, were carefully preserved and moved, and the small, scattered cemeteries reverently relocated in the most beautiful spots in the mountains. All this was done in the spirit of respect for human personality, so characteristic of the Authority, at once so outstanding, so amazing, so all inclusive.

Long-time integrated planning for the good of the area as a whole must, moreover, see to it that never again could a million dollar bridge authorized by one group of officials, be built just above a dam (also authorized by government officials a year or two earlier) which, when completed, will put the bridge under water. There must be co-ordinated planning.

EROSION CONTROL.

But the "conservation and preservation of land resources" called for more than dams and reservoirs. One glance at the muddy, sometimes turbulent, sometimes sluggish, waters of the Tennessee River would suffice to show anyone, even the least informed that dams alone will not be enough. The soil, itself, must, somehow, be kept in place. If you could see the barren, treeless, sharply-sloping mountains, the deep, deep gullies that seam the mountain and hillsides like dreadful crevasses in a glacier, ten, fifteen, twenty feet deep, running from ridge top to valley levels, over range upon range of mountains, you could get some idea of the top soil that goes down to clog and eventually fill up river channels, reservoirs, the dams themselves, or be washed out to sea and forever lost to agriculture. You would realize then why it is that the Tennessee Valley Authority has for its second purpose the conservation and preservation of the land resources, and why it is conducting such an intensive campaign against soil erosion, and inaugurating and recommending the building of "check dams," reforestation, planting of cover crops and terracing.

The hills are alive with "C. C. C. boys" (Civilian Conservation Corps) vigorously building stone or log check dams, making tangled masses of brush and cedar boughs in the gullies which are then seeded over, or better still, under the direction of the expert and able Tennessee Valley Authority Forestry Division, setting out thousands and thousands of young trees. It is a joy to see them, not swelling the ranks of the unemployed but, in their splendid young manhood, tossing off hard and strenuous work as if it were play.

The farmers, too, becoming erosion-conscious, have formed soil conservation clubs and are planting cover crops, particularly of lespedeza, and terracing the land, doing everything to catch and save the precious soil, or letting their farms be used, under the direction of experts from the T. V. A. and some seven Agricultural and Land Grant Colleges, State Universities and their experiment stations, for demonstration purposes for crops, soils, and fertilizer use. Slowly they are learning to change their traditional crops of corn and cotton into something equally good as crops, and not so destructive of land values—land which, even as they use it, they can enrich; learning too, that the earth is a heritage belonging to the race where "owners" are trustees and must so treat their soil their crops, their forests, and help to create an intense and active public sentiment in favour of erosion control. Incidentally, it is said that this programme of natural water storage by sods, leguminous crops and reforestation throughout the area would eventually create a water storage capacity equal to that of the Norris Dam Reservoir itself!

The soil has not only been carried away, but also so exploited that much of its fertility has been lost; hence plant food must be supplied through fertilizers. The nitrate plant built at Muscle Shoals during the War had lain idle for years, during which

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

712

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 11

realpatidar.com

time newer and better ways for making nitrates have been discovered both for war and soil purposes. Even so, the best, quickest and most satisfactory way of putting nitrogen back into the soil, is of course, simply by planting leguminous crops. But plants need also phosphates, potash and lime. Now the Eastern part of Tennessee is peculiarly lacking in phosphates, while other parts of the area are extraordinarily rich in phosphate desposits from prehistoric animal remains. Could these be made available for fertilizers? (The great drawback, of course, was the cost of transportation of the heavy phosphate rock.) The fascinating story of that search and that achievement is embodied in Nitrate Plant Number II at Wilson Dam, now cheaply making and distributing highly concentrated phosphates for experimental purposes, and ever still pursuing at the same time studies for the better and cheaper ways and means of producing more highly concentrated phosphates as well as for the use of potash and lime.

June 10th 1936.

CAROLINE J. PORTER

I WAS A MISSIONARY.

(By G. B. HALSTEAD.)

III

It was the indifference of the missionary group to the injustices of India's foreign rule that became my most disillusioning and disheartening experience. Finally I became convinced that this lack of concern on the part of missionaries for India's political condition constituted an appalling betrayal of the Christian cause and purpose. The argument advanced by so many of them that missionaries were engaged solely in a spiritual task in India and thus were not to be concerned with political issues, struck me as utterly untrue to the facts of the wide range of missionary activity, as an expedient and convenient rationalization of an embarrassing challenge, or evidence of a spiritual blindness to the full social implications of the Gospel of Jesus.

Several considerations caused this conviction that missionaries were betraying their Gospel and India. The grave consequences of past and continued British rule steadily became clearer to me as I read books and pamphlets on the British connection with India and received the confidences of Indians, young and old, men and women. Further, the drive of my own idealism was pushing me increasingly closer to India's most serious problem. Vicariously I tried to put myself in the place of nationally-conscious Indians. From this vantage point I saw a group of American missionaries professionally representing a religion whose Gospel told of the largest human freedom and of the most abundant Life for all men of all races and nations. Yet they presumed to spread this Gospel in a land under foreign rule that had rendered any genuine fullness of life for the masses virtually impossible. I could readily imagine these Indians silently asking us, is not the spiritual freedom and abundance of the Gospel you missionaries preach, predicated on the attainment of certain inalienable political and economic rights? Men may not live by bread alone, but surely they need at least bread to live.

These Indians saw us, moreover, not only as Christian missionaries, but as Americans, citizens of a free nation, a nation that prized freedom highly. It seemed logical for them to believe there might exist a great invisible bond of fellowship and sympathy between India and America, for both countries had known the heavy hand of British imperialism. Also in the past century the United States had believed in its then new revolutionary sentiment of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" with justifiable enthusiasm and pride and had even sought to spread these principles to other peoples. Was it to cease this political ministry in the twentieth century? Or were these doctrines to be limited to the west only? If liberty had been of inestimable worth to this western land of the missionaries, would it not be just as valuable to the eastern land they were supposedly serving? How, then, was it possible for these missionaries to be indifferent or critical of India's struggle for the very rights that play such a great part in the historical tradition of all Americans?

Further, I thought of the influence missionary motives had exerted in abetting, if not definitely promoting, early western expansion and the subsequent development of modern economic imperialism. Now, in partial atonement, could not missions exert just as effective a force in checking and perhaps ultimately destroying this evil movement, which spelled disaster for both the religion of Jesus and the victims of imperialism?

Finally there were the considerations growing out of Gandhi's unique organization of the power of love and sacrifice into a method constituting a moral equivalent for violence. Here for the first time in all human history was a large scale demonstration of a great people struggling for freedom and justice by means that would not vitiate the ends. Many of our Indian friends, but few of our American, sensed the larger significance of Gandhi's weapon. One of them, a young instructor in a Calcutta college, appealed fervently to his fellow Indian Christians for these reasons to join the Gandhi Movement. His love of justice and liberty soon became a criminal offense and he was put safely behind prison bars. But wasn't he right when he wrote, "India is on trial...But Christianity in India is also on trial. Our Christian profession has already committed us to this struggle both as to its objectives and its methods. For as Christians we are bound to stand out against all injustice and oppression. As to non-violence, it is our Master's method; the Way of the Cross; and it is certainly up to us to be interpreters of its meaning and guardians of its integrity in the Holy War that has already begun... If we appeal to Christians...to join this Movement, it is because we believe that this Movement under Mahatma Gandhi will lead to a partial realization at least of that great goal before mankind, the Kingdom of God..."

In January Gandhi returned to India...I was among the millions that went to Bombay to shout themselves hoarse in tremendous ovation to their revered leader. A few days later he was arrested. It was then that I wrote a public letter to my fellow missionaries in India calling on them to unite in ethical and spiritual judgment on the basic issues of India's present struggle. I published it over my own signature alone, for I had realized by then the utter futility of expecting the missionaries I knew to take any initiative in protesting against this recent example of British repression. However, I had no plans in mind for the formation of any definite organization or the shaping of any specific lines of action. It was intended to be merely a moral indictment of British Imperialism in India. In part I wrote, "The Indian struggle...is based on deep, underlying moral issues...Clouded as it has been by economic, social and political smoke screens...laid down by vested interests, the supreme issue has been obscured...(By what) ethical principle (can one) nation continue to hold another in bondage...Upon the right of every nation...to express and develop itself to its highest and greatest cultural, spiritual, economic, social and political capacities depends in great measure the prosperity...and stability of the world today and the world

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

713

tomorrow. That India has not that right is clear..." It concluded with an appeal to all Christians, regardless of face, to protest Britain's injustice to India. Three days after it was printed the Government, through the office of the President of the College, ordered that I leave India within ten days or face forceful deportation under arrest. I knew the mission would not challenge this Government order, so I had no other alternative but to leave.

My letter caused widely varying responses. The missionary body, with few exceptions, joined in unqualified condemnation, destructive criticism or repudiation of my action. In contrast were the many enthusiastic tributes showered on us by a few Indian Christians and a large number of so-called non-Christians. Of the messages I received perhaps the most significant and stirring was that sent by an ardent Indian Christian nationalist. He wrote, "Let me tell you that your declaration has touched my heart deeply. Like a torch in the darkness it has reflected to me the latent possibilities in the Christian forces of the world for helping the cause of India's freedom. For years I have longed to see some missionary who would speak in this language and direct the Christians in this way and dare as you have done. May God make your voice heard throughout Christendom..."

Another letter, written by Govindh Ballabh Pant, one of India's foremost leaders and a close associate of Gandhi, expressed a point of view typical of most of the letters we received from non-Christians. In addition to profusely thanking me for what he termed "a sacrifice in our cause," he said, "I concede that it (the Indian struggle) is not exclusively a parochial concern; the triumph of non-violence over violence and of freedom over bondage are bound to raise the moral stature of humanity. In this light our struggle transcends all territorial and racial limitations." Why in the world could not missionaries understand this, I wondered. Had their eyes been blinded, their lips sealed, their minds closed and their hearts turned to stone by the insidious poison of imperialism?

Although the mission administrators spared me the discomforts of any paternal lectures on the folly of my ways, I was not so fortunate at the hands of the local ranking British official, who happened to be very high up in the Indian Civil Service, since the city in which I lived was the capital of the United Provinces. In a manner befitting the prestige of his high office he strongly 'recommended' that I return, in penitence, to my Bishop for 'further spiritual tutoring.' It was evident to him that I had grievously missed the path to be trod by devout Christian missionaries in India. Graciously he referred me to the Bible, to that famous or infamous, passage in Romans where Paul had written, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For... the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God..." Wasn't it strange, I thought later, that this was the exact scriptural reference used by Napoleon the First to give his empire spiritual sanction and himself divine authority? But stranger still, that it had been these Britishers, very probably some of the ancestors of my host, the official, who had so irreverently 'resisted' this particular 'ordinance of God', finally to overthrow it at Waterloo. The official also had something to say about 'biting the hand' that was feeding me, referring of course to the grant given our mission college by the government. I had chance to rhetorically inquire of him from whom the British received the money to make these grants and to pay the huge costs of their administration of India. How strangely vision can be distorted by imperial moats, in imperial eyes!

Finally the day of our departure came. I waved a sad farewell to India and faced homeward disillusioned but wiser in the ways of missions and empires.

A CREED OF SERVICE TO HUMANITY.*

Three years have passed since I had the honour of delivering an inaugural address to you at the first Parliament of Religions in Chicago. I am proud to have this further opportunity of associating myself with your noble labours to bring to the solution of many dire problems the universal truths which are fundamental in all religions. Three anxious years ago we were drawn together by our belief that the practical application of such truths to the conduct of our personal lives and public affairs would make the world happier for ourselves and for our fellow men.

When to-day we survey a sorely troubled world, riven by intolerance, prejudice and greed, with complex problems of such magnitude that they almost defy understanding, we may well be dismayed at the thought of the task to which we have set our hands. Nevertheless, we may go forward with resolute hearts and high hopes. We have with us leaders and exponents of every kind of religious belief, and we may be said to represent millions in every country who think as we do—that in the brotherhood of man lies the salvation of the world.

If, as I am convinced, that belief exists, it behoves us to study where religion is failing to achieve its ultimate objective and to eliminate its faults, and so failing to harness and direct a tremendous potential force, the effect of which would be irresistible. For I doubt if anyone will care to deny that the cumulative effect of worldwide goodwill and understanding must be irresistible.

But if we are to succeed, we must be completely frank in our analysis of religion and its present-day shortcomings. It will not serve our cause to deny that the insular intolerance and prejudice, which we find so blameworthy in national and international relations to-day, have their counterpart in religious rivalry and prejudice. Nor can we deny that the gross materialism which we would replace with that innate spirituality of man which strikes at the root of all evil, is largely the outcome of religious apathy, ignorance or struggles for supremacy. And if that be true, we must accept our share of the blame for the unhappy condition of the world in which we live.

Our primary need is to return to simpler beliefs, common to all religions, and to base on them a fellowship of faiths wherein there is not only toleration, for that is insufficient, but co-operation for the good of humanity. It is not to a new religion that mankind should be urged to turn, but to consideration of the fundamental beliefs which are common to all religions and to their evaluation in the light of modern needs and conditions and in accordance with the great truths of science.

After all, this conception of a fellowship of faiths cannot be regarded as a new one. Bana, in his Harshacarita, tells us how the great Hindu King Harsha presided over a religious conference consisting of men of all creeds and of no creeds, where fruitful and friendly discussions of fundamental religious problems were held. In the sacred scriptures of India, we find the different religions compared to different rivers flowing to the same sea, and being coloured by the soil of the countries through which they pass. In the Upanishads they are likened to parallel streams of rain

* Speech by His Highness the Maharaja Gaskwar of Baroda, at the Public Inaugural Meeting of World Fellowship of Faiths.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

714
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| July 11

water flowing down the sides of a hill, or to different vessels fashioned from the same clay.

In the Mahabharata we read of a universal religion and the specific religions. The universal religion is defined as faith in a truly moral life, universal friendship, charity and goodwill, and in ancient times Hindu monarchs encouraged the observance of the principles of this universal religion among the adherents of different faiths in their kingdoms. The famous King Asoka had the principle of this religion inscribed in popular language in rock edicts and on pillars, throughout the length and breadth of his vast empire, while religious ministers were appointed to impart such principles and to encourage their observance.

The long and peaceful reign of Asoka, whose work for the uplift of humanity is almost unequalled in the annals of Indian history, is a glorious and abiding testimony to the security in peace and goodwill which can be secured by moral and religious uplift without resort to force and fear. What a pity that this magnificent example was not followed through the many changes of later centuries. Yet the writing is still there for those who care to read. I would that in India, the land of many religions and superstitions, my countrymen devoted more attention to the great truths preached by Asoka and worked with sympathetic understanding for the well-being of society. If they did so, I am sure that the majority of their trials and tribulations would soon disappear.

The creed which Asoka accepted and preached so fruitfully is fundamental in all religions and all moral philosophy, and it is true of all ages. Among the truly enlightened, religion has always implied fellowship of faiths and fellowship of mankind. The Buddhist preaches universal friendship and universal compassion, and where Hinduism says "A wise man looks upon others as himself," Christianity preaches "Love thy neighbours as thyself." It is only the bigoted adherent of a particular faith who emphasises the narrow meaning of religious union as restricted to members of that same faith.

Unhappily, those earlier and simpler truths have become obscured by rites and rituals, and too often we find ourselves slaves to shibboleths and outworn ceremonies. Though we deplore the development it is at least understandable. In earlier times, religion, with all its rites and rituals, served to unite people in different groups on the basis of the faiths they possessed. The import of any religion, the rites and rituals, changed as the religions migrated from one country to another, according to the genius and temperament of the different races among whom such religions found shelter. They changed also in accordance with political, social and economic developments and with variations in world conditions. In short, religion, like every other phase of life, is subject to environment and to the laws of nature.

Christianity as taught by Jesus in Palestine is different from Apostolic Christianity, and that again is very different from the Christianity as practised in Catholic and Protestant countries to-day. Buddhism as preached by Buddha underwent manifold changes as it spread in India among adherents of the Vedic faiths and through Central Asia and the Far East.

It remains, however, that we can still distinguish a variable and an invariable part in religion. The variable part consists mainly of creeds, rites and rituals which have changed and are still changing according to racial genius and temperament, and to psychological and other requirements. The invariable part consists in the function of religion in uniting the adherents of all faiths in ties of fellowship and friendship and in common acceptance of those fundamental truths which are universal and ageless and transcend the confines of the narrow nationalism and international selfishness which are the bane of modern times.

Let us base our labours, then, upon the simple moral tenets common to all religions and make them a common ideal in our dealings between man and man, between nation and nation. Let those tenets enter into the daily lives of our children as essentials of their earliest education. The child of to-day is the citizen of to-morrow, and it is in childhood that character can best be moulded. As true enlightenment and sympathetic understanding spread, so will our troubles diminish and disappear. The old order is passing and values are changing apace, but whatever comes to pass, there is no problem, personal or international, which cannot but benefit from consideration in the light of the fundamental truths on which all religions are based. But our influence and our labour must not be of a passive nature, and we must not submit meekly to inevitable setbacks and disappointments. The brotherhood of nations is a righteous cause, and we must strive for its attainment, for a new world and a new society, with pride and with unrelenting energy.

Looking back through the long years of my life, I cannot avoid the reflection that never before has there been the same compelling need for goodwill, understanding and co-operation in all our relationships. It is, indeed, rather a sad reflection upon the march of civilisation that many centuries after the great prophets preached the fellowship of man, and only twenty years after the world war which brought sorrow and suffering to millions, nations should again be arming and our natural desire for peace and amity be obscured by tendencies which we all deplore. Nevertheless, I remain an optimist and a firm believer that good must ultimately triumph over evil. Let us take the best from all religions, and base on their fundamental truths a creed of selfless service to humanity. Whatever religion we profess, it does but colour our lives, whereas the fundamental truths which we share, irrespective of our country or religion, are those which mould the substance of our lives and relationships and will lead us to the attainment of our highest ideals.

Let us, then, continue to emphasise in theory and practice the supreme value of those fundamental truths as a great unifying force through a fellowship of nations and a fellowship of faiths. The difficulties are many and the way is long, but if the inherent goodwill and commonsense in man is brought to bear upon our problems, the world will find peace again in the wider vision of God and the brotherhood of man. Civilisation to-day is blindly groping. Let us try to give it direction and restore its lost or wavering faith. It is a noble work to which we have set our hands and hearts. Let us go forward in the spirit of Abraham Lincoln: "With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right—let us strive on to finish the work we are in."

General Evangeline Booth:—Information has just been received at the Territorial Headquarters of the Salvation Army, Bombay, that it has been decided for General Evangeline Booth to visit India and Ceylon. The General will arrive in Bombay on November 28 and conclude her tour at Colombo on January 14, 1937. From there she will proceed to Java. Beginning at Bombay, meetings will be held at this and other centres finishing at Anand. Further particulars will be published later.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

715

FAMILY SETTLEMENTS AMONG MUSLIMS.*

(BY NAWAB SIR AMIN JUNG BAHADUR.)

The Muslim Law of Waqf-alal-Awlad (family settlements in perpetuity) is contained in the British India Act No. VI of 1913 (Muslim Law Waqf Validation Act). No such Act has yet been passed by the Hyderabad Legislature, but I am quite sure the High Court of Judicature at Hyderabad will unhesitatingly act on the principles enunciated and embodied in that Act. It is because they are principles binding alike on Shias and Sunnis throughout the world with but slight modifications in certain particulars. A great part of Muslim corpus juris is derived by analogical reasoning from the Quran and Traditions—a reasoning which easily lent itself to difference of opinion among the great jurists of early Islam.

I need not go behind the Anglo-Indian Act to explain why the Judicial Committee of the King's Privy Council in England long fought shy of the elements of perpetuity and remoteness embodied in the Family Waqf, how in the end it agreed to them but tacked on a proviso that the benefit to "the poor" or charity should be substantial, and how Legislation in British India validated the Waqf's other element, vis., that the ultimate benefit to "the poor" or other religious and charitable objects, be it however "remote" and howsoever "unsubstantial," was a good charity according to Muslim Law of all Schools. Thanks to the powerful advocacy of the law by the Rt. Hon. Syed Ameer Ali both as an author and judge in India and as a Member of the Privy Council in England, and the skilful piloting of the Bill by Mr. M. A. Jinnah in the old Imperial Legislative Council of India, the Waqf Validation Bill was passed for the preservation intact of the extensive estates of ancient or rich Muslim families which ran the risk of fragmentation and disappearance in the course of two to three generations by the inevitable operation of the Muhammedan Law of Testamentary and Intestate Succession. This great benefit was clearly pointed out by my old friend Mr. C. Vijayaraghavachariar of Salem who was a member of the Imperial Legislative Council when the third reading of the Bill was passed. It should be noted that this legislation did not make law but merely declared what had always been the law.

The law is there for the benefit of any Muslim who wishes to avoid the rigour of the temporal side of the Sharai-Sharif by taking advantage of its spiritual side, vis., the dedication "in the way of God" (= fi sabil-lil Lah) of one's property to Charity in the widest sense of the word. It is based on the universally accepted principle "Charity begins at home." The Quranic injunction concerning it is:—

Ata-al mala ala Hubbihi, sa-wil Qurba wal Yatama, wal Masakeena, wa idrus-Sabeel, was Sai-illeena, wa fi-Riqab.

—Quran 2: 177.

Give property out of love for Him (God) to the near of kin, and the orphans, and the needy and the way-farer and the beggars, and for the emancipation of the slaves.

Note, "the next of kin" comes first in the order of enumeration of beneficiaries. The Rt. Hon. Syed Ameer Ali in an appendix to his classic Muhammedan Law, Vol. I, gives several authentic ahadis (traditions) which commend Waqf-alal-Awlad (Dedication for Descendants) which I would call Family Settlements in Perpetuity. Mr. Abdulla Yusuf-Ali has summed up those Traditions in these words: "In the view of the Prophet, to provide for the comfort and dignity of one's own family is quite as much an act of piety, quite as genuine a form of almsgiving, as to provide for the poor in general."

The best thing which a man of property among Muslims could and should do, is to take advantage of this branch of the Sharra to Waqf, i. e., "to tie-up" his immovable and movable property (including Stocks and Securities) in his family till it becomes extinct and thereafter to leave it for the benefit of any public Charity implied in the phrase "the poor". I have included in Waqfable property "securities and stocks" on purpose to point out that the best opinion among jurists of modern days is that the so-called "interest" received from Stocks and Securities does not come within the prohibition of "riba", i. e., usury. It is asserted that a constitutional Government of these days is a concern as good as any other business firm in the world and to take its stocks and securities is, as it were, taking small shares in it. Still whatever be the opinion as to stocks and securities being Waqfable, there is no question as to dividend-paying shares of Joint Stock Companies being properties that could be lawful subjects of Waqfs of all kinds.

All that a Muslim in these days need do for a settlement of his property in his family, according to law, is to draw up a Declaration (a) giving particulars of his property, (b) saying, as clearly as possible, that he has transferred his property fi-Sabil-lil Lah (in the way of God)* for the benefit of his descendants of all degrees and, in case of there being none of them at any time, for the benefit of the poor or any religious or charitable object. As a rule such a declaration is made as a Will to take effect after the death of the declarant called Wa-qif. But if he wishes that his declaration (= Waqf) should take effect at once in his own lifetime (not after his death as usual) he should appoint a Manager or Trustee generally called "Mutawalli" and hand over the property to him and separate himself from it altogether. But if he happens to be a Sunni Mussalman of the Hanafi School (hanafi-ul-mazhab), he has the privilege of appointing himself as Mutawalli and of reserving for himself a life-interest in the property and of managing it himself during his lifetime. This privilege is peculiar to the Hanafi Muslims only and is expressly recognised by the Waqf Validation Act. It is not, however, allowed to the Sunnis of other three Schools or to the Shias generally. All other provisions of the Family Waqf Law, are however, common to all Muslims whether Shia or Sunni.

The Wa-qif, i. e., the Declarant of the Waqf, may make any lawful condition or limitation as to the preservation of the corpus of the property and as to enjoyment and distribution of its income by the beneficiaries, i. e., his descendants and the poor. On this point Ameer Ali quotes the Rad-dul-Muhtar which says that "the conditions laid down by the Wa-qif, if lawful (i. e., if not illegal), are to be strictly carried out in the same way as if they were the commands of the Law-giver." The Courts are bound to give effect to the Wa-qif's wishes if they are rules of law for his particular Waqf.

World Congress of Faiths.—H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda presided at the first public meeting of the World Congress of Faiths in Queen's Hall, London July 3. He announced he had sent a message to the King, to which His Majesty replied: "I earnestly hope the deliberations of the Congress will help to strengthen the spirit of peace and good-will, on which the well-being of mankind depends".

* It is necessary to put in the phrase "in the way of God" or "for the love of God" to show that the Wa-qif takes advantage of the spiritual side of the Sharas.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

716

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 11

realpatidar.com

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Nicaragua And League :—Nicaragua's reason for notifying her resignation from the League is that the questions at present convulsing the League are foreign to the permanent interests of American countries and Nicaragua's fear is that she may be drawn into other people's wars.

The Bank of India Limited :—The transactions of the past six months have resulted in a profit of Rs. 9,09,417-8-8 from which sum has to be deducted Rs. 75,000/- for Income Tax and Super Tax, leaving a net profit of Rs. 8,84,417-3-8 for the half year ended 30th June 1936. To this amount has to be added Rs. 6,03,990-4-7 brought forward from the last account, making a total of Rs. 14,88,407-8-3. This sum the Directors have disposed of as follows:—In payment of an ad-interim dividend at the rate of ten per cent per annum (Rs. 2/8/- per share) free of Income Tax on the paid up capital of Rupees One Crore for the half year ended 30th June 1936, which will absorb Rs. 5,00,000/- carried forward to the next account Rs. 9,88,407-8-3.

Indian Athletes for Germany :—India will follow the fortunes of the Indian Athletic Team which left this week to take part in the Olympic Games in Germany with much interest. From one point of view, it is a great advantage to the Indians that the games are held in Germany. Germany was the first European country to study and appreciate Indian culture. Her great thinkers like Goethe, Schopenhaur, Nietzsche and others had high admiration for Indian philosophy. Max Muller rendered the greatest service as a pioneer of Sanskrit learning in England. In Germany, therefore, Indians will find an atmosphere more congenial to them than in any other European country. As in our arts and crafts the results achieved in Indian athletic exercises owe more to the man than to his tools and apparatus. The Indian athlete's training is carried out in simple, every-day surroundings and with the use of very few accessories and these are cheap and easily made. Indian athletics, therefore, answers the definition of art which from a few common things evolves objects of great beauty. This is a lesson which the West has to learn from the East.

Speed is the life-blood of INDUSTRY
Do your business
BY TELEPHONE
AND USE THE INDIAN Air Mails
for correspondence
INDIAN POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS DEPT.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

717

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirchand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (M.N.)
Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharlal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallal Daljibhai Amin, B.A., M. S. G. I.,
(Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnarai Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 3 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Reserved for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 1½ per cent. per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

BOMBAY.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

718

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 11

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

Branches:—

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY
CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulia (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kalwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panhala)
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	B. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhobjee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Baul, Esq.,
R. G. Sarfaya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) — — — — Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

719

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

720

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

July 11

realpatidar.com

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury, but a Social necessity.... A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty.... Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MY SOIRIE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

THE MYSORE SOAP FACTORY, Bangalore

THE MYSORE SOAP FACTORY, Bangalore

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 349.

THE

INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 22.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JULY 18, 1936. No. 46

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The Late Sir Fazli Hussain.
Labour-Saving Machines and Unemployment.
Roads and Railways.
Congress and the New Constitution.
A Working Programme.
Anti-Nehru Fr paganda in America.
A Weighty Pronouncement.
Bengal Hindus' Protest.

India and the League of Nations.
Planning for Social Welfare:
A Great Experiment II.
Hindu Women's Right to Property Bill.
Ideals of Indian Education.
Hindu Social Reconstruction.
India's Untouchables.
Indian Institute of Science.
Christian Churches Denounce Violence.

NOTES

The Late Sir Fazli Hussain :—The death of Sir Fazli Hussain at a critical moment in Punjab politics is a great loss to the country. Whatever might have been his earlier leanings, he during recent years had grown considerably in width and stature as a nationalist and we have no doubt whatever that, had he been spared, he would have managed to evolve order out of the rather chaotic public life of his province. It is remarkable how the hand of death has seemed to guide the course of India's politics. The death of Sir Pherozeshah Mehta and Gokhale in 1915 left the field clear to Mr. Tilak who signified his leadership by getting the National Congress to place its seal of approval on communal electorates, to which Sir Pherozeshah and Gokhale were irrevocably opposed. When the fate of non-co-operation was hanging in the balance, Tilak who looked upon it as ridiculous, died, and Gandhiji became the Dictator of the Congress. C. R. Das died soon after he foreshadowed a new orientation of Indian nationalism with reference to the British connection. Pandit Motilal Nehru was opposed to the Gandhi-Irwin Pact but he died just when it was being negotiated. Sir Fazli's death at this moment has something of tragic destiny like unto these.

Labour-Saving Machines and Unemployment :—The introduction of labour-saving machinery a century ago led to large numbers of workers in village industries and handicrafts being thrown out of employment. There were riots in which machinery was smashed but eventually these unfortunates were forced to take employment in factories and workshops. Ruskin and others of less note inveighed eloquently against what they regarded as an iniquity but the laissez faire doctrine was then in the ascendant and their protest was a voice crying in the wilderness. The industrial revolution led to agriculture being more or less completely neglected in Great Britain. But it was not much affected by the adoption of labour saving machines. "Since Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin in 1793," we read in Information Service, "no mechanical contrivance has contributed much to cotton production except where gang ploughs pulled by tractors may have been used to prepare the soil. For the most part the use of horse power or man power for soil preparation and for cultivation is much the same as in colonial times. Necessity, it has been said, is the mother of invention. The invention now announced by the brothers, John and Mack Rust, of a mechanical cotton picker which, it has been demonstrated, can pick as much cotton in 7½ hours as the most diligent handpicker can, pick during the regular season of three to four months, does not owe its birth to necessity." The necessity at present in the United States is to reduce the production of cotton. Under the cotton acreage adjustment plan 10 million acres have been taken out of cultivation and 500,000 families have been thrown out of employment. The general adoption of the new invention, it is estimated, will throw about 7 million persons out of employment. In order to avert this result which will seriously aggravate the unemployment situation, it has been suggested that the machine should not be sold but only rented and the income derived from rents used to establish the former tenants on lands of their own. This will be no easy matter. But there is one country in the world where the new machine is expected to produce no hardship to workers. It is to be taken to Russia this autumn. "In case the Russians adopt it," concludes the Bulletin, "an interesting demonstration will be given of its contrasting effect in a planned economy based on common ownership, and in a profit-making economy under private ownership." It quotes the opinion that it is the profit system and its necessities, and not the machine which relegate human workers to the scrap-heap and concludes that "where production is for use planned, and under national ownership, any method or machine which lessens the amount of labour necessary in any stage of the production cycle will redound to the interest of the worker in the form of increased leisure as well as freedom from primitive toil."

Roads and Railways :—The address with which the Viceroy opened the second meeting of the Transport Advisory Council on Monday was

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

722

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| July 18

realpatidar.com

a plea for protection of Railways against the expanding traffic by motor vehicles. It was more or less on the same broad lines as the speech of the Commerce Member on the Railway Budget in February last in the Legislative Assembly. The Central Government depended for a part of its revenue on Railways and a fall in their earnings was, therefore, a matter of grave concern to it. His Excellency made a rather novel point, that railway freights were discriminatory. They were based not upon the cost of service but rather upon what the traffic can bear. Lord Linlithgow did not for good reasons go into details. The discrimination of our railways has not always been used on behalf of indigenous and inland traffic. Sometimes there have been complaints of preferential treatment of foreign goods and commodities for export. However that may be, the claim which His Excellency made of the part played by railways in the agricultural and industrial development of the country, has a set-off in the deterioration which they have been the means of causing in the health and prosperity of Bengal, which is no longer a matter of controversy. The extension of railways in this country was carried out without regard to the needs of the country and in order to facilitate foreign trade. Indian politicians for many years complained that the irrigational requirements of the country were sacrificed to railway expansion. For that and other reasons, chiefly the scant consideration shown to third class passengers, Indian railways have always been unpopular. To a certain extent, the rapid development of motor road traffic is due to the disfavour with which the Indian public has come to look upon railways. Any attempt on the part of Government to coerce people to travel or move their goods by railways, in order to provide revenue for them would be unjustified. The vast majority of the travelling public in this country travel short distances; and motor vehicles are more convenient for their purpose than railways. "Let me assure you," said the Viceroy, "that my Government will strive constantly both to improve the services of all kinds available to the public on the railways and to effect all possible economies in their management." If this undertaking is steadily carried out, there should be no need for any special measures to hamper motor traffic.

Congress and The New Constitution :—Writing on Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel's speech exhorting electorates of the new Provincial Legislatures, to return Congress candidates in such an overwhelming majority that the Party, without being suspected of making a virtue of necessity, may decide, in the plenitude of its strength, not to accept office, we suggested, in no spirit of unfriendliness, that voters should be told definitely what the Congress Party intended to do if it obtained such a majority, instead of asking them to give a blank card on which Congressmen may write what they liked whenever they liked or not write anything at all.

Since then we have read two important speeches, one by Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya and the other by Mr. Satyamurthi, which throw some light on what the Congress Party would do if it finds itself in power. Mr. Satyamurthi was the first to suggest a change in Congress policy towards the legislatures. It met with a hostile reception from some who are now among its most convinced advocates. Mr. Rajagopalacharya in the old Swaraj Party days had the reputation of being an implacable No-Changer, that is, one who was irrevocably hostile to Congressmen entering the Legislatures. The conversion of Mr. Rajagopala to Council-entry, was of the greatest help and it was his unrivalled organising abilities which ensured the sweeping victories of Congress candidates at the last election for the Legislative Assembly, in the Madras Presidency. In the expectation that the Justice Party would emerge triumphantly and would give a lead to other Provinces, the polling in Madras was timed to take place before all other Provinces. The arrangement had a directly contrary effect. The Congress victories in Madras undoubtedly assisted in securing the return of Congress candidates by large majorities in other provinces also. When the Congress Parliamentary Board was formed, the first place in it should have gone to Mr. Satyamurthi. But the leadership has reverted to the Southerners. The immediate cause of this transfer of leadership was Pandit Jawaharlal's presidential address to the Lucknow Congress with its reflections on "scientific socialism." It threw the Northerners who have all along enjoyed a certain preponderance in the non-co-operation Congress, into confusion. The South without a moment's hesitation denounced the President's heresies in its ancient role of custodian of Indian tradition. The fence is a safe position but it is not a commanding one to sit on.

A Working Programme: The leadership in the movement for the acceptance of office by Congressmen happens thus to be in Southern hands. It is to the speeches, of the Tamil leaders, therefore, that we should turn for light as to their intentions. In passing we may call attention to their attitude to the admission of non-Congressmen in the South. Referring to the recent admission of Dr. Subbarayan to the Congress Party, Mr. Rajagopalacharya said, in his speech at Madras on July 12 that it was not the right way to think and speak of Dr. Subbarayan being a prospective Congress Minister, as some responsible Congressman had recently done from a public platform. While on this point he threw out a hint that one of the first measures of the Congress Party if and when it came into power would be to cut down the salaries of Ministers so that "in the Congress Administration a ministership is not and will not be a paying concern or a bed of roses." In his speech in Bombay on Monday, Mr. Satyamurthi repeated that the salaries of Congress Ministers would be "very small," and that "they would have their

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 | realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

723

resignations in their pockets" which they could not, if their salaries were as large as they are now. As a shrewd business man put it some years ago, one can not reasonably expect a pleader who was perhaps making five hundred rupees in a mofussil district, to give up a job carrying ten times that amount, because he was over-ruled by the Governor. After all, the Governor might be right and, in any case, if he resigned another man was waiting to step into his shoes and the interests of the country might fare worse in his successor's hands than in his. The programme of the Congress, Mr. Satyamurthi observed, should be based on the Karachi Congress resolution which, we believe, fixed Rs. 500 as the maximum pay of Ministers. The Congress programme in office would include, according to him a declaration of Fundamental Rights, the graduation of land revenue according to the wealth or poverty of the landowner, the relief of agricultural indebtedness, something to be done for raising the prices of agricultural produce in the country, encouragement of cottage industries, "education, sanitation, water supply, properly tackled for the benefit of the country," Prohibition in 20 years. Summing up, Mr. Satyamurthi said that the Congress Ministers would have to carry out a programme of elevating the administration and serving the poor, and they should strive to get the greatest happiness of the greatest number. All this is vague, but they do not spell "wrecking" which, at the outset, Mr. Satyamurthi declared was their main objective!

Anti-Nehru Propaganda in America:—In last week's Reformer we published Gandhiji's letter categorically denying the statements attributed to him with reference to Pandit Jawaharlal's presidential address at the Lucknow Congress, in an editorial paragraph in Unity of Chicago. Parts of the paragraph were also reproduced. The Rev P. O. Phillips of Nagpur sends us an editorial from the New Outlook of Toronto dated May 27 much on the same lines as the Unity editorial. He adds that the New Outlook is the official organ of the United Church of Canada and has a very wide circulation in that country. Mr. Phillips, like ourselves, doubted the authenticity of the statement attributed to Gandhiji and wrote to Mr. Mahadev Desai who replied to him to the same purport as Gandhiji's letter which we published. The origin of this canard, according to Chowdhuri Krishna Gopal Dutt who recently returned from the U. S. A., was a message circulated by the Associated Press of America dated from Wardha and published in the New York Times and also presumably in many other papers.

A Weighty Pronouncement:—The presidential address of Mahamahopadhyaya Pramathanath Tarkabhushan at the Hindu Conference held at Barisal, of which we publish a report, is remarkable for the sure grasp and the breadth of view which it shows in dealing with the problems of Hindu Society with special reference to Bengal. Orthodox Hindus are supposed to be incapable of taking broad views on social questions. The Mahamahopadhyaya is one of the most orthodox Hindus. His photograph with his body bare except for the thin Brahmanical thread across his chest, may pass for that of any Shastri from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin. But he is a very learned man which few professional Shastris are. And the weight of his learning has not robbed him of the power of observation and judgment of current events. It is obvious from his speech that in his view the political situation, except for one exception, does not directly bear on the problems of Hindu society. These problems are the dowry evil which prevents an increasing number of Hindu girls in Bengal from having a chance of marriage, the caste system and, as part of it, the position of outcastes. Deriving both authority and inspiration exclusively from the ancient Scriptures and Acharyas, the Mahamahopadhyaya calls upon his co-religionists to remove these evils which cloud the greatness of their religion and sap the vitality of Hindu society. He felt it his duty to depart from his non-political attitude with reference to the advocacy of Socialism in Pandit Jawaharlal's address to the Lucknow National Congress. The Hindu social system in its integrity harmonised individualism and socialism. Pandit Jawaharlal's plan would destroy equilibrium which is the keyword of the Hindu scheme of things.

Bengal Hindus' Protest:—Something has happened to effect a radical change in the political outlook of the Hindus of Bengal. The Communal Award on the distribution of seats in the new Legislatures, according to the public testimony of Lord Zetland, now Secretary of State for India, did much less than justice to the Hindus, especially in Bengal. But he had accepted office on the understanding that the Award would not be touched. The National Congress by its curious decision neither to accept nor reject the Award, put a wet blanket on any attempt to get it modified. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Mr. Aney and other Congressmen were obliged to form a party apart from the Congress, because of their opposition to the Award. They had no support from the Congress members in the Assembly for their opposition. The Law Member of the Government of India, a Bengali himself and one of the stoutest opponents of the Award, told the Legislative Assembly that there was no hope of getting it changed. Owing to other circumstances also, it seemed unlikely three months ago that any public agitation, least of all one in Bengal, to get the Award modified, was practicable. The manifesto of Bengal Hindu leaders against the Award, and the confident language in which it was couched, was to us a complete surprise. It has been followed by a monster demonstration this week, which was presided over by the Poet, Rabindranath Tagore, who usually keeps aloof from politics.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

724
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 18

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, July 18, 1936.

INDIA AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The Right Hon. Srinivasa Sastry in a talk to the students of the Annamalai University of which he is Vice-Chancellor, is reported to have said : "Whatever be the strength and reasonableness of the agitation against our participation in the League of Nations, it is still to be contended that it will not be ultimately in our interests to cut away from the League. If the League starts functioning properly tomorrow and really achieves its object of being the guardian of world peace, then India will find it difficult to re-enter it. If India throws up her membership voluntarily, Britain may not be in a position to help us to the membership again if and when we seek to have it after a period. It will, therefore, be prudent for India not to cut away from the League at this stage." With great respect to Mr. Sastry, we ask what chance is there, having regard to the present European and world situation, of the League starting to function properly tomorrow or even ten years hence. The prudential considerations which weigh so heavily with the veteran Vice-Chancellor, were no doubt present to the minds of Japanese and German statesmen, when they decided that it was not to the interest of their countries for them to remain in the League. The case of Germany is particularly worthy of note because, unlike Japan which was an original member of the League by virtue of her having been one of the allied and associated Powers during the War, Germany was a vanquished enemy and it was with great difficulty that she was admitted to the League. Japan and Germany, it may be said, are strong and powerful nations who can at any moment enter the League and be welcomed, but India is a dependency, poor, weak, divided, and, if she gets out of the League to which she was admitted by the recommendation of Great Britain, she must for ever remain outside, for Britain may not be able or willing to recommend her again for admission into the sacred circle. This is what is said to be a realistic view but is no more than a pessimistic view.

The League membership includes many States far worse situated than India. Iraq was admitted at the recommendation of the Mandatory Power who surrendered the Mandate in order to have Iraq entered on the League Roll. France proposes to do the same in the case of Syria. Ethiopia was admitted two years ago on the recommendation of Italy. It would seem that Italy was really opposed to Ethiopia's admission, but supported it in order to circumvent another Power. The League is far from being exacting in the qualifications it expects in its members. From the pecuniary point of view alone, the withdrawal of India would be a loss to the League. But there are other ways in which India's membership is an asset of value to the League. Although many of the men who have figured as Indian delegates left behind them no traces of their membership, some others, prominent among them Mr. Sastry himself, by the impression which they made on their colleagues from different countries, raised India in the world estimation. It is curious how little the political, economic and subject position of India enters into the general estimation of her in Western lands. India's withdrawal will be felt widely as a loss in League circles and there will be no difficulty at any time in her being re-admitted on a footing in which she can exert much greater and more effective influence in promoting world peace, which is pre-eminently the mission which her history and culture has marked out as hers. Mr. Sastry takes much too modest a view of his country's position and prestige.

Our position there now is one of sufferance. We can not speak what we think and must say what we are told to. The Aga Khan on landing in India a few months ago stated in a Press interview that the success of Italy meant the collapse of the League. In the League itself where he leads the Indian deputation, he must sit silent or mouth some platitudes to coincide with the moods of the British delegation, which do not remain the same for any length of time. There is another point which Mr. Sastry overlooks. Whatever might be the original object of the League, it is no longer the same. The League today does not think of being guardian of the peace of the world. Any one who has followed the speeches of British, French and Italian statesmen, cannot have failed to note that what they are all anxious to ensure is not the peace of the world but peace in Europe. For the peace of Europe they have sacrificed Ethiopia. To induce Signor Mussolini to condescend to attend the Dardenelles Conference, they hastily "closed" the Ethiopian affair. But the Duce did not attend. Instead the world heard with astonishment the simultaneous announcement in Berlin and Vienna that Austria has become a German State with the Duce's blessings. The European nations, although they talk of it, no longer rely on the collective security of the League for their national security. They have formed independent groups outside the League to guard themselves against attacks from their fellow Members. If India is attacked by Italy or Japan and Great Britain is unable owing to her own pre-occupations to defend her, the collective security guaranteed on paper by the League will not avail us. We shall all be poison-gased like the Ethiopians into submission to the invader. Mr. Srinivasa Sastry admits that the arguments of those who wish India to quit the League are strong and reasonable. Prudence lies in acting upon reasonable grounds. His counsel to sit tight in the hope that the League may suddenly be transformed into the guardian of the peace of the world, is based not on reason but on the fear of being left out when the Transfiguration takes place.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

725

India will have to give two years' notice of her withdrawal from the League. If the League does not pull itself together during that period, there is sure to be another war which will put an end to it and many other things besides. If it does assert itself in two years, India may withdraw her notice and elect to remain within the League. Let us therefore give notice immediately. It may stimulate the League Members to forget their differences.

PLANNING FOR SOCIAL WELFARE: A GREAT EXPERIMENT.

II

Of course, the intense heat (2750°-F) necessary in their manufacture (of phosphates) was possible because of the use in their furnaces of electricity from near-by Wilson Dam. Now the manufacture, use and sale of electricity is the part of the T. V. A.'s programme most under attack. Yet one of the most cherished goals is the constantly widening use of electricity not only in the area itself but in all American homes. For this Mr. Lilienthal proposes a four-point programme which, greatly condensed, is this:—

1. Change in our ways of thinking of electricity as something to be used in a niggardly way, as at present, to electricity in unlimited and universal use throughout America, with ever developing new ways of putting electricity to work. At present, the average monthly use of electricity for domestic purposes in this country is about one-third the monthly use in the province of Toronto, Canada. It should be a universal servant.

2. Drastically lowered rates for electric service to increase (1) the number of consumers, as well as (2) the amount of electricity each consumer uses. Incidentally, where it has been tried in the T. V. A. area, while rate reduction initially inevitably resulted in lowered revenues (a) total consumption has equally inevitably ultimately increased, ranging from 267% in 23 months, 222%, 272% and even to 293% in 18 months, (b) the number of consumers has increased, and (c) the amount of electricity used by the average household per month not only more than doubled but even became more than twice the amount used in the all-America average home; so that in some cases by the end of the first year the "percentage of profit has been substantial," and in the case of several communities, revenues were completely recovered inside a year! Net income has accrued and is available for new expansion, new construction, retirement of debt, and possible future rate reduction.

3. The discovery, manufacture, sale and distribution of all sorts of electricity-using appliances (from better electric irons, washing machines, boilers, stoves, refrigerators, heating and air-conditioning devices in the homes to electric motors, water pumps and electric-run machinery on farms and in factories) at the cheapest possible cost and on the widest possible scale at such rates that the "bulk of our people cannot afford not to own such appliances." The T. V. A.'s programme has already stimulated the inventive genius and practical resourcefulness of electrical engineers. The designing rooms and experimental laboratories of the manufacturers are now humming with activity. Almost unbelievable advances in the electric home equipment are being made and may be ready for announcement in the coming months. What will a cheaper price, say, for electrical refrigerators do, if in ten years the sale of 30,000 refrigerators at price of $450 each (valued at $13,500,000) was increased to a sale of 1,400,000 refrigerators at a price of $172 each (valued at $240,000,000)! Do Public Utilities need fear an expansion of business such as that would bring? And if one item alone changes the amount of electricity needed to such an extent as that, what will be the result when all these new inventions are ready for use? "Estimates of demand have reached the conclusion that power demand in the Tennessee Valley region will soon exceed the dependable power supply of the area, and that power available at the Authority's dams will be needed and therefore have a ready market." "Studies clearly indicate an impending shortage of power of considerable magnitude in the systems that supply most of the markets in the South East."

4. Concentration on the problem of reducing the cost of operation, obviously a problem for the engineers.

Publicity:—"Less than 12% of the American farms have ever experienced the benefits of electric power," so Dr. H. A. Morgan says. Hence, "just as every housewife who has ever used them—or seen them used—knows what a transformation the electric bulbs have already made in the comfort, convenience and safety of the home," so housewives, farmers and businessmen everywhere must be enabled to see what a difference there will be through the "universal use of the limitless, unpredictable future possibilities" of electricity and electricity-using appliances, as yet undiscovered and undreamed of. What this will mean in social welfare, Mr. Lilienthal only hints. Back in the mountains, where water is drawn from wells and carried by hand, where logs are cut and stacked for fires for heating and cooking, where the one and two room cabins are still lighted by candles or dirt-making kerosene, the lives of the farmers and the farmers' wives have been as full of hardships as those of their pioneer ancestors, and here and everywhere people should be brought to look forward hopefully and confidently to a better, a freer, a fuller life, a life relieved of many of its burdens and drudgeries, demanding more skill and creating newer, better, more challenging jobs, better commodities, more leisure, more happiness, more joy in living, more sharing. For here the towns already see that their prosperity depends on the prosperity of the whole area, including the farms, and electric rates on the farms are no higher than in the towns, as electricity becomes the servant of all. It is the hard-boiled public utility expert who carries around with him the vision of this, for the integrated control of the area which the T. V. A. dreams of is unique, it consciously plans for the "better life" for all, not just better business for some.

LAND PLANNING AND HOUSING.

It is for the area as a whole, too, that the Land Planning and Housing Division has photographs and charts and plans to show the best places for roads, bridges, buildings, farm-lands, factory sites and towns (with plans for low-cost houses), and for the location of forests. You should see the topographical maps worked out with infinite care by surveys and airplane photography in co-operation with the Coast and Geodetic survey, Geological survey and other government agencies, so that work may be not haphazard, with inevitable wastes, but permanent, because the end was planned from the beginning.

For the forests, a Forestry Division of experts is working ceaselessly. Forests must be restored and replanted in the right places, in marginal lands around the reservoirs, and on the steep mountain sides. Under long range planning they must be scientifically

* The first article of this series was published in last week's Reformer.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

726

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 18

cally cut and guarded from fires. Foresters are being trained and prepared right on the spot. Large reservations and parks are bought and set aside, and with the aid of the government and other agencies, rivers and lakes stocked with fish and forests with game, and—perhaps partly as a sort of protective measure for the forests—playgrounds and recreational spots, even swimming pools, are alluringly placed and equipped.

For health, there is, for instance, their own programme for malaria control for the reservoir areas they create—apparently the first instance in which malaria control has been an important determining factor in the development of plans for a system of dams and reservoirs—and fullest co-operation with all the public health agencies, local and national. Experimenting goes on in this as in all other lines—for example, highly mobile, motorized hospitals—tiny to be sure, but fully equipped for emergency operations,—have been devised for instant use in remote clearance areas and for other distant emergencies and so light in weight, too, that a gang of men could carry them where there is as yet no possibility of roads—way into the uncleared tract.

SOCIAL WELFARE.

Through the Social and Economic Division, the T. V. A. is making plans for a well balanced agricultural and industrial long-range programme for the fullest possible social-economic development of the area so that this heretofore stranded and isolated population can be given a chance, and become largely self-supporting, self-dependent, in a fuller, richer life. Dr. A. E. Morgan says: "Every stage is present from prosperity to poverty, from excellent farm management to a bitter fight for a bare living," but in the greater Appalachian mountain region there are now 6½ million white people most of whom have never known prosperity in any form. The T. V. A. area itself has a population of 2½ million people. One country in this Southland, surveyed by a member of the Faculty of a Southern University, showed an annual average total cash income (1934) of 845 for each farm in the country. Yet the people are of good American stock with a remarkably high native intelligence and ability. "Nowhere in America," says Dr. A. E. Morgan, has he found "a superior labour force in adaptability, intelligence or workmanship," and the T. V. A. is giving them what they have lacked—opportunity.

PROMOTION OF WELL-BEING

For, through all the constant experiments and, various programmes of dams, surveys, reservoirs, power houses, rural electrification, road-building re-forestation, erosion and flood control, intelligent planting and improvement of crops, terracing and manufacture of fertilizers, it is very evident that, as Dr. A. E. Morgan says, the promotion of well-being is purpose, all the rest is method.

For the well-being of the 14,000, or so, human beings, the employees themselves, working in about 80 different divisions, thoughtfulness and consideration are expressed in every possible way. It began in the selection of the workmen; tests were given to 38,000 people of the area, and no job was assigned to an outsider, or "foreigner" if there were a man of the area equally well qualified to fill it. Nor was prejudice allowed to keep anyone out. Dr. A. E. Morgan had been told, "No use looking for workers in that town" (a small township near Norris Dam), "they are all a shiftless, lazy, lying, worthless lot, thoroughly undependable." Quietly the Personnel Division made their own investigation, picked out 100 workers and put them to work. They have proved themselves to be among the most highly dependable, loyal and satisfactory. They never complain, nor can anyone complain about them. All they needed was "a chance."

Handicapped people are given special consideration. A blind stenographer is one of the best in the stenographic pool. Infantile paralysis sufferers are given suitable positions; and one girl, frightfully disfigured, was welcomed so heartily into one of the divisions that she never even suspected why she so easily found her place, but quickly lost all self-consciousness and became one of the most beloved members of the group, because of her loyal devotion and willingness to help. Failures in one division are transferred to another, and usually become successful under changed conditions. The turnover in personnel is almost negligible. "On Norris Dam to date (March 1935) we have had the remarkably low rate of less than 1% a month."

June 10, 1936.

CAROLINE J. PORTER

HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHT TO PROPERTY BILL.

The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association state that they entirely accept the principle of the Hindu Women's Right to Property Bill for removing the inequality at present existing in the rights of Hindu women to property as compared with those enjoy by men. The Managing Council of the Association strongly recommend that the Bill be referred to Select Committee and with a view to make improvements in the Bill for giving effect to the principle underlying it and to make it more acceptable to public opinion, submit the following suggestions for the consideration of the Select Committee.

(i) Section 3. This is superfluous as, under the prevailing Hindu Law, sex is not a disqualification and a female is not incompetent to own property by reason of her sex. If the object is to enlarge limited interest in the case of certain females into absolute estate, the purpose is served by Section 5.

(ii) Section 4. This Section has mixed up the case of Hindu dying as a member of a Joint Family and of the Hindu dying separated from it and thus leads to confusion. It should, therefore, be split up into two separate Sections for providing for each case.

(b) In the first part, the widow, mother, daughter and wife of predeceased son of a Hindu dying intestate are placed on an equal footing in sharing his estate along with his sons. No system of jurisprudence provides equal shares for all these female heirs. It is therefore suggested that differentiation should be made in assigning the individual shares to these female heirs, not only inter se, but also in relation to the sons along with whom they share the estate.

Besides, the daughters will inherit in the family of their birth, before marriage, and in addition, both as wife and mother in the family into which they will be married. Then, the position of advantage over the sons, in which the daughters are placed under the Hindu Law of Stridhan is ignored.

In the case of a Joint Family, the mother will on each occasion get a share in the event of the death of each of her sons dying in her lifetime. As regards the widow of a predeceased son, it would be inequitable that she should get a share when her son will not get any share in the estate.

(c) The Council have indicated a few of the discrepancies and inequalities brought about by placing all the females on equal footing in sharing the estate with the sons and on closer examination of the bill, further difficulties will appear. In order to avoid them, the better plan would be to provide for the case of each of

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

727

the females separately and the bill be modified on the lines of the legislation in the Baroda, Mysore and Travancore States on this subject.

(iii) Section 5. The scope of this section should be widened, so as to cover the case of the females inheriting the property of a Hindu who died separate and was not a coparcener in the Joint Family.

In the event of the provisions of the Bill being considered too drastic, making a radical departure from the existing Hindu Law, the Council suggest that it may be simply enacted that the interest of a member of a Joint Family shall not be by birth under the Mitakshara Law, but the interest of the coparcener in a Joint Family shall be according to the Dayabhaga, so that a coparcener can dispose off his interest in a Joint Family by gift or will. The position of a coparcener in Joint Family will thus approximate to that of a member who has separated from it and a Hindu will then have full power of disposition, in favour of his female relations, of his share in the Joint Family property as in the case of his self-acquired property. If this proposal is accepted, then, in the event of his dying intestate, it may be provided that the shares of the females will belong to them absolutely as provided in Section 5 of the present Bill.

The Council earnestly feel that radical amendment in the prevailing Hindu Law of succession is necessary in order to do justice to Hindu women and to secure to them the rightful economic and social status in the community, and for this purpose, the conscience of the Hindu Community should be roused. If, however, it is found that the general sense of the community is not in favour of this radical alteration in Hindu Law, it stands to reason that those sections of the community who are convinced of the justice of the claims of Hindu women for equality with men in the Law of Succession and inheritance, should be allowed the liberty of giving effect to their convictions by enacting permissive legislation enabling them to change the devolution of their interest in Joint Family property. The Council suggest that, for this purpose, legislation may be enacted making it permissible for a Hindu to declare that his estate should be governed by the Indian Succession Act. The Council will prefer to accept the amendment of the present Bill or a fresh Bill so as to enable any Hindu to make a declaration before a prescribed officer appointed by Government that his property should be governed as regards succession by the Indian Succession Act and that such a declaration should ipso facto be tantamount to his separation from the Joint Family if the declarant is member of the Joint Family. If an analogy is required, it may be found in Sections 22 and 24 of the Special Marriage Act of 1872 as amended by Act XXX of 1923.

In expressing their views in favour of the present Bill generally, the Council are fully conscious of the difficulties which beset the path of the reformer. There exist several schools of Hindu Law in India and the interpretation of the original texts and the judge-made Law on this subject vary in the different provinces, thus making it difficult to promulgate a common measure of legislation for the whole of India. But the Council submit that those difficulties are not insurmountable, owing to the growing uniformity of public opinion on this subject. Hence, the Council suggest, that, in the event of the present Bill or the alternative Bill proposed by the Council not being found acceptable to the Government or the Legislature, a Commission may be appointed, as prayed for by the Women's Associations in November 1935 at public meetings held in the several provinces so that it would be possible for such a Commission to take evidence and arrived at a common measure of agreement on the main points of difference and a Bill acceptable to all sections of the community may be framed on its recommendations.

IDEALS OF INDIAN EDUCATION.

(By NARAIN SINGH, B. A., P. E. S., RETIRED.)

The question of national education is receiving the serious consideration which it deserves. Everybody is anxious to say some thing about it which to his mind, seems to have been confirmed by the kind of experience which he has had in his own life.

The real aim of education is not a riddle which cannot be solved. Those who are actually engaged in the task of imparting instruction in our Indian schools have a good idea, and a clear notion of what they are about. Our school teachers have by now become fully aware of the material that they are called upon to turn out from their classrooms, and what functions their students have to perform in life in their own good time.

The method to be adopted by the teacher towards this end is not a matter of any uncertainty, or wavering, in the daily discharge of his duty. This supposition is, I believe, correct.

Without any idea of interference with, or discussion of, the matters of fact lines of his day-to-day work, I wish to invite the attention of our practical educationalists to the young minds of today which our teachers are supposed to develop and educate in their classrooms. The younger generation is believed by many to be much more intelligent, active, spirited and clear-headed than the previous one. Our young men are decidedly more ready-witted, fresh-minded, exact, straightforward (verging to the extent of being even unmannerly and impolite), but less hypocritical. They are more assertive, and are prone to question the authority of discipline much more openly before they submit to its yoke. They are also a bit restive in spirit and restless in mind.

The difference in the respective standard of mental development of these two or three generations is due apparently to the difference generally, in the standard of the civilisation and culture, of the parents of today, and the parents of the past one or two generations.

But young students have been observed to be more careless with regard to the general trend of their own affairs and are certainly less responsive to general responsibilities in their own particular spheres of school, college or home life. This defective tone of daily living, more generally on the increase, day by day, seems to come down in most cases to all functions of their life. But, even when they become unruly, my idea is that they do so purely out of a spirit of playfulness and not with a view to show deliberate wilfulness or studied disrespect to the individual confronting them.

Such instances must be numerous in the daily experience of the schoolmaster. And if on every such occasion he is going to have merciless resort to his ready rod, he will surely make his position worse in the classroom. He is not likely to gain much by his anger. At all such moments patience, cheerful forgiveness, loving control (subjective and objective sides of it), paternal tenderness of mind are the most essential qualifications for being brought into use in a practical and prudent spirit. By a wise resort to the large reserve stores of his own practical foresight a great deal of the bad situation can easily be brought under control without any loss of one's prestige or of the school standard of discipline. In a large number of cases, our school masters possess false notions about both of these

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

1 July 18

essential factors in the school-life. This simple fact, as it must have come to the notice of many experienced teachers, cannot be disputed.

The sooner a schoolmaster loses his self-control by getting over excited, or over enthusiastic or nervous, the sooner he comes to grief. The larger the number of eccentricities, or even of personal peculiarities, in him, the greater the chance of his drifting along to the sphere of superficialities, and to a wasteful activity in work. Solidity, steadiness with a sure grasp of the end in view, in a serious spirit, unflagging energy and practical determination of the efficient discharge of his duty, are the most essential qualifications demanded in abundance, from all those who aspire to be makers of future generations.

Coming to the narrower sphere of our daily duty, in the classroom, I should like to revert to the consideration of a few minor points of practical importance in our work of education. Both the teacher and the taught, for their own respective advantage, have to realize the importance of the following essentials which are helpful to their work. Positive essentials in the sphere of the school room and the home are:—

- (1) Steadiness of Conduct: Ahistgi.
- (2) Correctness of Conduct: Darustgi.
- (3) Mannerliness & Propriety of Conduct: Shaistgi.

These three essentials should always be carefully kept in mind everytime, even in the subsequent course of life. Much of our success and happiness are known to depend upon the right understanding and proper use of these essential points of daily conduct.

Similarly, from the negative side, I shall deal with three other points. I ascribe the existence of this deficiency to certain other factors operating just at present in Indian society. I am not prepared at this place to discuss any of these special factors that I am referring to. It must be a matter within the ordinary experience of many thinkers. The difference of individual opinions may not be a matter of serious moment, but the particular deficiencies of conduct in the youthful mind demand most serious consideration from all those who are directly concerned with the bringing up of youth.

These three negative points affording a great material of an undesirable nature for us to ponder over are:—

(1) Disregard to advice, and to a steady effort at guidance. The origin of this defect is youthful recklessness or careless disregard to consequences. No doubt, youth cannot be expected to be much mindful of what will happen if a certain line of conduct is adopted. But, the loving guidance, gentle control and tender considerations of the elder, be he the teacher, or the parent, must work a great deal to the benefit of it. It may be theoretically right to assert that the child must be given full independence of action on the lines that he or she chooses.

(2) There is manifest generally a persistent attempt at disobedience. This effort to disobey is deliberate and is an indication more or less of the venturesome and adventurous, risk-loving spirit of this future generation. It is a part of what I have remarked above.

(3) Finally, there is after all this, an intelligent attempt to disprove the accuracy of the advice given to the junior by the responsible senior. There is visible a dogged determination to put forward a possible alternative to what has been suggested to the junior. Within certain limits, this may not be altogether a discouraging indication in itself. But, a lengthened experiment of such hazardous proceedings is likely to lead to a total trampling down of the discipline and general orderliness of the institution or the family in which such scenes occur.

HINDU SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION.

The fourth Backergunge (Bengal) Hindu Conference was held at Barisal commencing from the 27th June. All castes of Hindu were represented including the depressed classes. A large number of women was among the audience. Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Pramathanath Tarkabhushan presided.

In course of his presidential address Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Pramathanath Tarkabhushan said that if in a gathering like this he could indicate some lines of action which might be beneficial to the cause of the Hindu society, particularly of the Bengal Hindu Society at its present critical stage, it was only then that he would consider himself worthy of the honour done him by calling upon him to guide the deliberations of the Conference. But that depended on the collective good-will and hearty co-operation of those who were interested in the welfare of the society. What they were required to do was to sacrifice personal and party interests for the greater interests of the Hindu Society at large.

Reviewing the work that was being done by the Hindu Sabha, the Hindu Mission and similar other organisations in the matter of solving the various social problems, the speaker said that eight years ago when he participated in the Mymensingh Conference Hindu Society was confronted with two very grave problems, namely, Suddhi and organisation. The resolution on Suddhi that had been adopted at that conference gave rise to a storm of agitation both friendly and hostile. Judged by the standard of prevailing customs, that might seem unseemly, but that this line of action which had been followed by the Vaishnavacharyayas was extremely necessary for the present-day Hindu society, had been admitted by all educated and right-thinking well-wishers of the society from one end of India to the other. A hundred doors lay wide open for going out but the entry was prohibited—such an arrangement could hardly be conducive to the well-being of the Hindu Society. And even in olden times when India was looked upon as the Guru of Greater India such an arrangement had not the approval of the leaders of the society—this fact was now acknowledged as a historical truth. The controversy in this matter might not be wholly over but even those who opposed it on the grounds of the Shastras or general practice had to admit the most forceful of all logic—the logic of facts. If Hindustan was converted to non-Hindustan their Aryan civilisation, culture, religion, usage and purity of family life none of these could be saved—this fact was quite evident in India, particularly in Bengal to-day.

Their second problem, continued the Mahamahopadhyaya, was organisation. There were innumerable impediments in the way of organising the Hindus. Various attempts had been and were being made to remove those obstacles. For certain class known as Hindus, the service of washerman, barber, boatman and bearer would not be available; but once the former embraced Christianity or Islam they received ungrudging service of the latter. Nothing could be more illogical and iniquitous than that. They could easily visualise the consequences of supporting this sort of humiliating and irrational arrangement. The reason for the gradual decline of the classes among the Hindus earning an independent livelihood was the narrow-mindedness of their own people belonging to the same society. That was a great loss to the whole society. Inclination to cut off all connections with a society where one was deprived of indispensable necessities was only natural. And therefore if the so-called depressed classes, officially designated as Scheduled Castes,

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

729 wanted to get away from the Hindu Society they could not be charged with having a perverted sense or an unnatural crookedness of conduct.

TEMPLE-ENTRY QUESTION.

Another reason why the backward classes felt uneasy in the Hindu Society was the bar to temple-entry. It was futile to repeat what the Shastras had enjoined, in this connection because that was now a matter of history. It was gratifying to find that the liberal practice that had been prevalent in Bengal from before with regard to temple-entry was now being gradually observed in other parts of India. They had found from newspapers reports that even some of the old temples in the Deccan had been opened for this class of people. The All-India Sanatan Dharma Conference under the leadership of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya annually declared the backward classes' right to have access to public places of worship in the same manner as they had access to wells, tanks, highways and schools. The object of this Association was to organise all classes of Hindus and to lead them on in the path of necessary reforms. It was a hopeful sign and a matter of rejoicing to find that the Pandits had begun to rally under its banner in an increasing number. In the opinion of Pandit Malaviya, giving 'Mantram' to the backward classes was the principal means of removing the barriers from their way. The way he met the volume of opposition in going to adopt that means and the calmness and fortitude with which he overcame the difficulty and stuck firm to his duty were well-known to all. But removal of the barriers in the way of the backward class was not alone sufficient for the organisation of the Hindus. They would also have to take serious note of other evils that had crept into the society. What did they find to-day? Want of bride and bridegroom, intolerable dowry system and extinction of certain classes for want of facilities for marriage. The dowry system had brought untold sufferings to fathers, especially among the middle class Hindus. The way in which it had now become an anathema and menace to the life and safety of unmarried girls was manifest everywhere. The large number of unmarried Hindu girls was a peculiarly difficult problem of Bengal. The oppression of villains and the crime of abduction of women were on the increase with the result that it had been impossible for the Hindus to live in those places where non-Hindu population preponderated. And yet the great evil of the dowry system was growing all the while in the society. What could be more lamentable than this state of affairs? The absence of any earnestness or organised efforts to make an end of this pernicious system of which every householder was a miserable victim, was possible only in a society that was dead to all feeling of compassion.

Proceeding the speaker said that during the last eight years the Hindu Sabha, the Hindu Mission and similar other organisations had been trying to tackle these problems. But before there could be any solution of these problems, they were confronted with many new ones, namely, inter-caste marriage, Hindu women's claim to share of property, the system of co-education, the bread problem among the Bengali Hindus, the Harijans' movement for conversion to other religions and the newly preached socialism of Pandit Jawaharlal. Considering the manner in which complications were accumulating one after another in the Hindu Society like mushrooms in the rainy season, it was difficult to come to a decision about one's duty on any well-defined principle or plan of action. If this most ancient race in the world were to survive by adjusting itself to the environments of the modern age, then they had got to face fresh problems from day to day. That was inevitable. But it must be borne in mind that their aim was to attempt a solution—and not to create unreal problems. For the solidarity and well-being of the society it was wise to take the straight and easily accessible path—but the result of entering into a thorny jungle was forsaking the path leading to one's destination.

SOCIALISTIC VIEWS.

Referring to Pandit Jawaharlal's Socialistic views the speaker said he was not a politician and as such it was not for him to say whether socialism would bring in a solution of the thorny political problems of India. It only appeared to him that in this unfortunate country of theirs necessity was not the mother of invention but it was invention that gave rise to necessity. At the last, Lucknow session it was declared by the Congress President that his object was to ameliorate the condition of the poor and the down-trodden and that the means for achieving that object was the awakening of all classes of labour. That this awakening would lead to a clash between labour and capital was sure.

But that did not matter. Zamindars, mill-owners money-lenders and businessmen were all capitalists; they all enjoyed the lion's share of the world's wealth depriving the labourers of their legitimate share in it. In India British Government was the patron of these capitalists. In the struggle for attainment for Swaraj native princes and landlords were indifferent. The strength of the capitalists and the middle-class people had been by trial proved to be inadequate. And therefore the supreme need of the hour was the awakening of the masses which meant that they had got to organise the agriculturists and the labour population, to inspire them with the new ideas and ask them to be careful about their own interest. It was this organised mass strength that would crown the political battle of India with success, this was Pandit Jawaharlal's faith.

Socialism, continued Pandit Pramathanath, was foreign to the soil of India. Where the ruler and the ruled were of the same nationality, where literacy was wide-spread, where landless labourers crowded together in small urban areas—in a homogenous country like that was born Socialism out of long-continued want and grievance. But if, in a country where there were differences and dissensions all round, where ninety per cent. of the population were illiterate agriculturists who lived together separate from one another in large areas of land, any one entrusted with power for one year thought of imprinting socialistic ideas on the minds of the masses, it was nothing short of an unreal dream. Such ideas might have a certain amount of influence in crowded mill areas where labour might declare war against capital, or it was possible that in a province where village after village were inhabited by agriculturists, over head and ears in debt, the raiyats in a body might raise the standard of rebellion against money-lenders and zamindars. But what next?

In a country where lack of organisation itself was a peculiar problem it was not very difficult to sow the seeds of disension there, but what was beyond one's power was to make an end of such dissensions. The Congress history of the last half a century gave proof of it. During the last thirty years there were disputes between moderates and extremists, landlords and tenants, between Hindus and Mussalmans, co-operators and non-co-operators and so on. But which of these disputes had been settled? If that had not been done, the creation of additional troubles in imitation of the West only served to make them forget their real problems and run after will-o-

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

730

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 18]

the wisp. In a conference of the Hindus a discussion on the doctrines of the Congress President was in a sense irrelevant. But he would only ask the social workers to take serious note of this and exhort them to be careful.

Concluding, he said that their primary concern was to devise remedies by which they could help in increasing the solidarity of the Hindu society. What they wanted was unity and organisation. The absence of fellow-feeling, sympathy and co-operation was manifest. The pressing need of the hour was unity and co-operation among the Hindus. And the success of this conference would depend upon the amount of work it could do in that direction.

INDIA'S UNTOUCHABLES.*

(BY GORDON B. HALSTEAD)

Three paths to freedom from past and present restrictions of untouchability are proposed by those who claim to have the interests of the untouchables at heart. The first, but by no means the most popular or significant, is that the untouchables shall renounce en masse the Hindu faith and accept some other religion. A return to the former Government-inspired policy of separate political representation as a community in the various provincial legislatures and in the National Legislative Assembly comprises a second but questionable road. Gandhi and the powerful Indian National Congress, along with the vast majority of Indian social reformers and indigenous social reform organizations, favour the third road. It leads to the abolition of untouchability through the medium of mass education, the voluntary and willing removal by caste Hindus themselves of the disabilities affecting the untouchables, and the improvement of their economic conditions through the bettering of those of India's masses, both caste and outcaste.

Dr. Ambedkar, an American educated (Columbia University) untouchable and a Government nominee to the Round Table Conference of 1931, has identified himself with the first two paths. Knowledge of Dr. Ambedkar's past relationships to the British Government is of considerable importance for those who may wish to note the present policies of Government in respect to the future status of the untouchable community. The ultimate solution of a social problem touching the lives of 43 million Hindus cannot be viewed with unconcern by a Government whose interests too often have coincided with the continuing disunity of India's various religious communities.

It was Dr. Ambedkar who caused considerable consternation in the rapidly dwindling ranks of Hindu orthodoxy last fall with the declaration that while he had the misfortune to have been born a Hindu, he would not die a Hindu. Accordingly, he recommended that all untouchables make a similar resolve. Dr. Ambedkar made this statement as president of a provincial depressed-classes conference—a conference of untouchables, but definitely not representative of the mass of them, who are not yet organized.

Although Dr. Ambedkar's meeting, passed a resolution asking the untouchables to sever themselves from Hinduism, it refrained from mentioning the names of any faiths that might be embraced. Subsequently an All-India Conference was held in Lucknow in February, supposedly to consider the question of the new faith. The question remains unanswered, and if I may venture a prediction, it will remain so for some time—perhaps indefinitely.

*The concluding portion of the article on "India's Untouchables" from the Current History June 1936.

Group or mass renunciation of Hinduism by untouchables and subsequent conversion to another faith is by no means a new idea in India. Sufficient experience has been had with such a phenomenon during many decades to arrive safely at some definite conclusions. An authoritative study of Christian mass movements, painstakingly made over a period of two years (1930-31) by a competent group of scholars under the direction of Dr. Wascom Pickett, affords conclusive evidence that mere conversion to Christianity does not remove the disabilities of untouchable converts. In fact the published report of the study goes even further, saying:

"The process of liberation (from untouchability) is not helped, but is hindered, by the claim that the mere public profession of Christianity is sufficient to effect immediate removal from the ranks of the depressed."

Even more recent evidence of the illusory character of conversion as an escape from untouchability is found in a speech made last November by Dr. S. C. Chatterjee, President of Christ's Church College, Cawnpore, India. He said: "In the United Provinces out of a total Indian Christian population of 173,000 over 125,000 are village Christians belonging to the untouchable classes, and their lot is as pitiable as that of the classes from which they have come into the Christian fold. In many places they are denied the elementary human rights to draw water from public wells, their children are not allowed to attend public schools and their acceptance of the Christian faith has resulted in additional economic and social disabilities being imposed on them."

Embracing Islam has been equally unsuccessful as an attempt to lift restrictions, it has been shown.

Mahatma Gandhi at the 1931 London Round Table Conference forcefully pleaded the case of Indian nationalism against the Government inspired policy of "separate electoral" representation of the untouchables in the provincial and national legislatures. In part he said:

"It (separate representation) means perpetual bar sinister. I would not sell the vital interest of the untouchables even for the sake of winning the freedom of India... And I would work from one end of India to the other to tell the untouchables that separate electorates and separate reservation is not the way to remove this bar sinister. Let this Committee (Minority Committee) and let the whole world know that today there is a body of Hindu reformers who feel that untouchability is the shame, not of the untouchables, but of orthodox Hinduism, and they are, therefore, pledged to remove this blot... We do not want on our register and on our census, untouchables classified as a separate class. Sikhs may remain as such in perpetuity, so may Moslems, so may Europeans. (Would untouchables remain untouchables in perpetuity, I would far rather that Hinduism died than untouchability lived.) Therefore, with all my regard for Dr. Ambedkar and for his desire to see the untouchables uplifted, I must say that here is a great error under which he has laboured. Therefore, I want to say with all the emphasis that I can command that if I was the only person to resist this thing, I would resist it with my life."

The logic of this appeal seems irrefutable, if viewed from the perspective of the national interests of India. Gandhi and the vast majority of Indian leaders, do not intend that these religious differences, which have already been intensified by foreign rule, shall be further widened or multiplied by

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

731 according them permanent political recognition and status.

It was this policy of separate electoral representation of the untouchables as embodied in the final results of the Round Table Conference that precipitated Gandhi's famous "fast unto death" of September 1932. As a result of this fast, the original policy was radically altered so that at present the untouchables are guaranteed seats in the legislatures, but their representatives are elected by the general Hindu electorate. This is regarded by Indian nationalist leaders as a definite step forward and they will resist vigorously any attempts to return to the former method.

The third road to freedom, calling upon untouchables to join hands with high caste in the fundamental task of abolishing untouchability through mass education and reorientation and the reconstruction of their national economic life, appears to be the only road promising emancipation without sacrificing the ultimate unity of India.

The present work of Gandhi and his associates in the mental, physical, social and economic rehabilitation of the outcastes, or of the Harijans (children of God), as he chooses to call them, might well be called India's silent revolution. There are many who feel that here is Gandhi's greatest movement and contribution. However, great as it is, we must not lose sight of the fact that he is building upon a foundation laid by many other Indian leaders over the past one hundred years. Without the far-reaching effects of the lives and teachings of Ram Mohan Roy, Dayanand Saraswati, Bhandarkar, Ranade and Gokhale, and Vithal Ramji Shinde, to mention only a few, Gandhi's present movement would not have the significance and appeal it has. Likewise, his recently created Harijan Sevak Sangh (the fellowship of the servants of the untouchables), is but the last in a long list of Indian national organizations, such as the Brahma and Prarthana Samaj, the Servants of India Society, the Depressed Classes Mission Society and the Indian National Congress which have aimed at the removal of untouchability, root and branch, from Indian soil.

Many Indian scholars and leaders are now presenting evidence indicating that untouchability, and in fact even the caste system, are not only dispensable accretions of the Hindu faith, but inconsistent with the moral ideals of the early sacred books of Hinduism. To quote a resolution to this effect passed by a recent session of the important Hindu Maha Sabha, a relatively orthodox Hindu reform society:

"Whereas the caste system based on birth as at present existing is manifestly contrary to Universal Truth and morals, whereas it is the very anti-thesis of the fundamental spirit of the Hindu religion, whereas it flouts the elementary rights of human equality ... this all India Hindu Maha Sabha session declares its uncompromising opposition to the system and calls upon the Hindu society to put a speedy end to it."

The true nobility of the high-caste Hindu personality, the fresh, dynamic impulse of the awakened spirit of freedom and the high quality of India's present national leadership cause one to predict that the untouchable masses eventually will take this third road. As Hindus and Indians, their complete emancipation seems inextricably linked with the larger freedom and unity of the Indian masses, whether caste or outcaste, Moslem, Christian or Parsi.

INDIAN INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE.

The Indian Institute of Science at Bangalore, of which Sir C. V. Raman is the Director, has come in for a good deal of criticism at the hands of those who are unaware of the purposes and ideals of the Institute, says the Statesman's Bangalore correspondent. It is forgotten by its critics that the late Mr. J. N. Tata's foundation is not intended to be an industrial research institute for investigating and promoting commercial enterprises. Under the terms of the benefaction advanced scientific instruction (in the lecture room, laboratory and workshop) is the Institute's primary object.

One of the most obvious defects in the organization of the Institute, said Sir C. V. Raman in an interview, has been that its activities do not include a sufficient number of subjects of importance related to one another to give it the broad basis so vital to any institution of University rank. Then again though academic ideals have not been altogether ignored in the past, nevertheless, the work of the Institute has not been sufficiently influenced by them. To no small extent this has been due to a confusion of ideals and to the fact that the Institute has often been expected to perform functions which are incompatible with its primary object as a centre of advanced study and search.

Amongst the suggestions often pressed upon the Institute is that it should be a national testing and analytical laboratory, or a place for carrying on semi-commercial experiments, both of which objects, in the opinion of the Director, are incompatible with its primary aims, and are calculated to retard progress in the right direction.

The income of the Institute which in the financial year 1920-21 stood at Rs. 3,50,000 suddenly increased to Rs. 5,75,000 in 1921-22, as the result of the sale of several of the house properties in Bombay and re-investment of the proceeds in Government securities by the Bombay Board of Management. One of the terms of reference to the special committee presided over by Sir William Pope which sat in November-December, 1921, was to consider and make recommendations as to the manner in which the increase of income which was expected could be most advantageously utilized. The Committee went into the question thoroughly and presented a carefully worked out scheme of development.

The Committee emphasized their conviction that the success of the Institute demanded the creation of a number of new Chairs dealing with subjects not already represented at the Institute and indicated their opinion that the Chairs most likely to be immediately useful were a Chair of General Physics, an additional Chair of Chemistry, and a Chair for Thermodynamics and Heat Engines.

Sir C.V. Raman stated that, with the support of the Council, he had effected a number of changes which had resulted in utilizing to the fullest possible extent and to the best advantage the existing resources in staff, buildings and equipment. He had also cut out superfluous and wasteful expenditure in every direction, avoided all duplicate effort and expense, and with the money thus saved opened out new departments on the general lines recommended by the Pope Committee in 1921.

Summarizing the developments initiated and carried out during the past three years Sir C. V. Raman stated that a Department of Physics had been newly organized with a laboratory equipped for investigations in chemical physics, spectroscopy, magnetism, X-rays and electron-diffraction.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

732
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 18

A beginning had been made in the organizing of a Department of Mechanical Engineering intended for the promotion of study and research in Applied Mechanics and Thermodynamics. The Department had been provided with a new building and a large and well-equipped workshop with facilities for the practical training of students and for the construction of apparatus and other requirements of all departments of the Institute.

One of the urgent needs of the Institute was a means of bringing to the notice of the scientific world, both in India and abroad the results of the researches carried out in its laboratories. This need has been supplied by the establishment of the Indian Academy of Sciences, whose Proceedings published the valuable results arising from original work done at the Institute. The Academy had succeeded in bringing the staff of the Institute into close co-operation with other scientific workers at Bangalore, elsewhere in India and abroad.

In consequence of these the developments, scientific life of the Institute had been greatly quickened and its publications had increased greatly in volume and what was more important, in quality. Especially gratifying was the fact that, for the first time in the Institute, its scientific work had begun to receive marked recognition and appreciation in the scientific world.

Sir C. V. Raman incidentally referred to the new and flourishing chemical industry which had been successfully established at Bangalore, under the aegis of the Director, for the extraction of rare earths from monazite and for the manufacture of incandescent gas mantles.

Questioned as to the admissions of scholars to the Institute, Sir C. V. Raman said that emphasis was being laid on quality rather than on number. At present, only students with a first-class honours degree in science could ordinarily find admission to the research departments of the Institute. Women, provided they are well-qualified, could now hope to enter the Institute as regular students. A Women's Hostel had been established at the institute for their benefit.

At the conclusion of the interview Sir C. V. Raman declined to express any views on the press reports of the proceeding of the emergency meeting of the General Council of the Institute held last week. The report of the Irvine Committee, he said, had not yet been released for publication and it would not be proper for him to discuss the contents of a confidential document.

CHRISTIAN CHURCHES DENOUNCE VIOLENCE.

The Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America adopted on June 5 a message to the Churches on suppression and violence. The full document is as follows :

"The present denial of freedom and the resort to violence over wide areas of the earth, and the threatening signs of trends in this direction even in our own country led the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to address a message to the churches, directing their attention to the crucial nature of the issue before the nation and urging a united stand in support of the ideals which lie at the heart of our American commonwealth and for which the Christian Church has stood."

"In Europe today civil liberties are threatened from opposite directions. There is a communist challenge on the one hand and a fascist challenge on the other.

Both rely on coercion instead of enlightening discussion and free persuasion. However much they may differ in other respects, communism and fascism have been alike in suppressing political freedom and in turning to force as a solution of social problems.

"Against such dangers we must be on our guard, and no groups more so than churches. In Russia communism deliberately sets out to destroy the Church and to eradicate religious belief. In Germany a fascist state attempts to coerce the Church into supporting policies which are contrary to fundamental teachings of Christ. Our opposition as Christians, however, to the denial of freedom rests not only upon the danger to the Church and other minority groups, but upon the conviction that the substitution of coercion for freedom is a direct challenge to our Christian faith in the value of human beings as the creation of God.

"In our own country there is disquieting evidence of influences moving toward a similar denial of freedom and a temper of violence. The menace of communism to both religious and civil liberty has been frequently and rightly pointed out. Not enough attention, however, has been given to the more imminent danger of repressive tendencies of another sort. We observe, for example, a sinister intolerance which brands as communistic even those constructive proposals for orderly social progress which are the best defence against communism. Suspicion is engendered against thoughtful and patriotic citizens who oppose the present hysteria for military preparedness or stand for the right of labour to organize for better standards of living. Even the churches are labeled as 'subversive' for pointing out economic injustices and evils, which can be corrected within our present system if there is the will to do so, and for emphasizing the necessity of bringing Christ's spirit and teaching more fully to bear upon our industrial and international life. Gag laws which are unworthy of a free people are being introduced into Congress and have been passed by several state legislatures. Teachers are compelled to take oaths which degrade their professional standing and are contrary to the free spirit of our educational institutions. Lynching is still rampant. Groups of vigilantes take the law into their hands and perpetrate brutal outrages such as that which recently disgraced the City of Tampa. There are even signs of a whispering anti-Semitic agitation such as, unrestrained, has left an indelible stain upon the German government.

"The direction in which these happenings are tending is brought out in the shocking revelations of the operations of the Black Legion in Michigan. These disclose the extreme of cruelty and social danger to which a red-baiting anti-Semitic, anti-Negro, anti-Catholic organization easily goes. Its use of the name of the God Almighty in its oath is blasphemous and its description of itself as Protestant is unjustifiable and shameful.

"We appeal to Christians throughout the nation to exercise the utmost vigour in opposing such tendencies as these which are sowing fears, hatreds and dissensions at the time of great social emergency and danger when our people should be able to think soberly and to act unitedly."

Temple Excavation in Travancore:— Certain temple structures popularly believed to have been built in the time of Mahadali, the legendary king whom Vamana, the incarnation of Vishnu, dethroned and vanquished are now being excavated at Triktakra, North Travancore. The State archaeological superintendent has exhumed the lateral wall on the west side, which is 580 feet long and 8½ feet thick.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

733

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Inquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897)

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MNI Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolaldas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhaialal Daljibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. I.,
(Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1 per cent per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 1½ per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,
2-28

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 18

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

Branches:—
BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.
CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

" Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT with us and earn interest on Daily balances SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,

Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Virangam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulia (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondaiicha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Palghar (" ")	Kajol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS

Sir Chunnilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
R. G. Saraiya, Esq.,	D. W. Rant, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	C. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) — — — Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

735

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA!

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,
The Indian Social Reformer,
Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK FABRICS are pure Swadeshi materials, made of the finest Indian Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades, Mysore Silks are hard-wearing materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours are permanent, fast to sun and soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—

1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.
3. The Mysore Emporium, Kitab Mahal, Hornby Road, Fort, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY JULY 28, 1936. No. 47

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The King.
The Tamil Alphabet.
Bombay Women's Meeting.
The Liberal Conference.
The Reforms and the Liberals.
The Liberty of the Press.
The Tennessee Valley Scheme.
European Situation.
Rajatarangini.

Planning for Social Welfare:
A Great Experiment. III
Hindu Women and Property Rights.
The New Russian Constitution.
Legal Facilities to Agriculturists
Notes on the Way.
Overseas Indians Reciprocity
Bill.
Glass-Eyes.

NOTES

The King:—The congratulations which poured on His Majesty the King from all parts of the world on his escape from what has been described as an attempt on his life, are proof of the high regard which he has won for himself during the short period of his reign. The accounts of the attempt are conflicting. The same message stated that the loaded revolver was thrown at the King and hit his horse and that the revolver was struck out of the hands of the would-be assailant by the bystanders. The man himself declared that he did not intend to do harm to the King and that his object was merely to draw attention to some public grievance. The Calcutta correspondent of the Hindu has gathered some details relating to George Andrew MacMahon, the assailant, from Mr. Neville C. Coutts, a businessman of Calcutta. Coutts went to England in 1934 for training in the advertisement line and got into touch with the Paramount Service Association run by MacMahon and another, E. W. Harrington. MacMahon always spoke of starting a journal. He approached Lady Houston who promised to help him if his journal advocated Fascist principles while he wanted it to propagate Socialism. Later the American Ambassador in London promised some support on the strength of which MacMahon brought out an issue of a journal called the Human Gascette. The second number did not appear and Coutts left MacMahon. MacMahon told Coutts that his ambition was to be a second Horatio Bottomley.

The Tamil Alphabet:—In the Sunday Hindu which, in its new form, is a valuable accession to Indian periodicals, Mr. C. Rajagopala Charya claims that in beauty of form, ease for the reader's eye as well as for the running pen, and adaptability to the printers' art and to the type-writer, the Tamil script is superior to any other indigenous script in India. Both the Tamil and the Devanagiri scripts are descended from the Brahmi script as Father Heras observed in his article on the Mohenjo Daro script in the New Review. The form which they took is probably due to the media available for writing in Northern and Southern India—barks of trees in the former and palm leaves in the latter. Writing on palm leaves is really a sort of engraving. Horizontal lines had to be avoided as far as possible to protect the palm leaf from being torn to shreds by the iron style with which the characters were engraved. Mr. Rajagopala also points out the resemblance between the Tamil and Roman system of forming syllables and the consequent reduction of printers' troubles. The sounds represented in the Tamil alphabet are nearly the same as in the Roman. Tamil like the Roman alphabet eschews the whole series of aspirated letters, "she refuses to bother with aspirated consonants." The similarity between the Tamil and the Roman characters in these respects is the main reason why a Tamilian finds it easier to learn English than to learn Hindi. Referring to the experiment of reproducing Tamil writings in Devanagiri characters in Mr. Munshi's Hamsa, we remarked that it would be of more practical service to try and reproduce Hindi in Tamil script. As Mr. Rajagopala Charya says, the absence of the aspirates has not come in the way of the free adaptation of Sanskrit words in the Tamil vocabulary. Many Tamil hymns, except for the linking syllables, consist exclusively of Sanskrit words. Tamil, as spoken by Brahmins, abounds in Sanskrit words pronounced more nearly as in Sanskrit than in Gujarati or Bengali; and that is why the Tamil Brahmin has always been at home in every part of India. The Rajatarangini records ancient Dravidian settlements in the heart of Kashmir—not as students as Mr. R. S. Pandit thinks, but as teachers. Mr. Rajagopala maintains that when an alphabet provides all the sounds needed in a given language, it has fulfilled its purpose and should not be expected to do more. True but it can not claim, as Sanskrit can, to be a complete or perfect alphabet. Sanskrit to a Tamilian may seem to have many superfluous sounds. But Tamil is not the only language of India. The Devanagiri alphabet is pre-eminent in as much as there is no language spoken in this country, including Tamil, which can not be written in Devanagiri nearly as well as in its own particular script.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

738

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

July 25

realpatidar.com

Bombay Women's Meeting :—A representative public meeting of the women of Bombay was held on Monday to record their opinion on four Bills bearing on social questions which have been introduced in the Legislative Assembly. These have been circulated at the instance of the Assembly for suggestions and criticisms from representative public bodies and they are expected to come up at the Simla session of the Legislative Assembly in September for the second reading and reference to Select Committees. The amendment of the Sarda Act on the lines of the Bill introduced by Mr. B. Das was generally approved. Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale made a point which should receive consideration by women's organisations throughout the country. She pointed out that the vast mass of Indian women were illiterate and could not read newspapers and that, unless special efforts were made to acquaint them with the provisions of the law and the reasons for them, the mere stiffening of the Sarda Act would not go very far towards changing their present view of the urgency of early marriages. On Mr. Bhagwandas's Bill to remove caste restrictions in Hindu marriages, Dr. (Mrs.) Sukhtankar who moved the resolution and Mrs. Hansa Mehta who seconded it, laid stress on the importance of embodying the principle of monogamy. Dr. Deshmukh's Bill on the property rights of Hindu women met with warm support but it was felt that the Bill needed drafting improvements in order to make it fully effective for the end in view. Mr. M. C. Rajah's Bill for the removal of the disabilities of the depressed classes was cordially approved. The speeches of the Chairman, Sir G. D. Madgaonkar, a former Judge of the Bombay High Court and of Mr. Justice Divatia, his successor on the Bench, were weighty pronouncements on the socio-legal aspects of the proposed legislation.

The Liberal Conference :—The Bombay Provincial Liberal Conference which was held in Sholapur on July 18 and 19, under the presidency of Sir Cowasji Jehangir, was primarily devoted to a repudiation of Socialist and Congress tactics. The President expressly laid down in his address the principle that the Liberal Party was prepared to join with any political party in an endeavour to formulate an economic programme on lines which have proved successful in countries "other than Russia". We do not know how many Liberals share Sir Cowasji's unreasoning objection to Russia but it seems to us as absurd to rule out the Russian example as to seek Russian inspiration exclusively. Even in his concluding remarks, the President was unable to shake off the Congress spectre. "I will refuse to shake hands with or join anyone," he said in explanation of his refusal to join the Civil Liberties Union, "if I suspect ulterior motives or if I suspect that his words or actions would lead our country into a condition worse than she has ever experienced in the past." When he himself admits that he does ascribe ulterior motives to political opponents, how can Sir Cowasji object to Liberals being dubbed self-seekers and sycophants by equally suspicious Congressmen? Sir Cowasji might have justified his abstention from the Civil Liberties Union without questioning the motives of those who are forming it. The same feeling of vague grievance against the Congress seems to have inspired Mr. Sirdar's welcome address to the Conference. "The Liberal Party," complained Mr. Sirdar pathetically, "although it is an old party with a splendid record and traditions, has fallen on bad days. It is not very well organised; its branches are not functioning very efficiently. Consequently the Liberals who were once an influential body exercising considerable influence on the actions of the Government have been recently in a decadent position. Other political parties have been taking undue advantage of this position and have been ceaselessly trying to decry it...We have failed to reach the masses and take them into confidence. Others who are more vocal and agile have stolen a march over us." This is not the note which would inspire confidence in the destinies of a political party among the masses.

The Reforms and the Liberals :—Though all Liberals seem to have made up their minds to work the reforms, there seems to be some confusion as to the value of the new constitution. Mr. N. M. Joshi, who is more a Labourite than a Liberal, reiterated the view that the constitutional position would be worse under the new Act than under the old. His remark later that "we should use the power given by the new constitution to compel the British Parliament to give more power," does not seem logical. In the first place, if the old constitution was better, there can be no gain in power from the new. Secondly, how can Mr. Joshi believe that the new constitution can be used to improve India's position when he concedes that the manipulation of the 1919 reforms has only resulted in a worse position today? Sir Cowasji Jehangir, on the other hand, is a believer in the new reforms. His references to the good that can be got out of the constitution, is as great a breach of party discipline—since the Liberals have declared their aversion to the Government of India Act of 1935—as Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's advocacy of Socialism from the Congress Presidential chair seems to be to Sir Cowasji. Liberals who have discussed the propriety of the Pandit's propaganda, would do well to devote some time to considering Sir Cowasji's commendation of the reforms. "Would India," he asked, "have obtained even her present constitutional position...." And again, "Our ministers of the future...will bring a new angle of vision into the governments of the provinces—nay, they are sure to change the mentality of the servants who work under them." Surely there is as great a difference between this and Mr. Srinivasa Sastri's emphatic refusal in 1935 to hold up "Sir Austen Chamberlain's baby and invite our countrymen and countrywomen to kiss it" as between Socialism and Capitalism!

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

739

The Liberty of the Press :—In public references to the liberty of the press we have been accustomed hitherto to regard governments as the greatest source of danger. In recent years, however, there have arisen instances of encroachment on such liberty from another quarter. Only the other day it was reported to us that a journalist in this city lost his job on a newspaper because he proposed to settle a personal quarrel with an eminent political leader in a Court of Law. A rather complicated case comes from Karachi. The Secretary of the Sind Journalists Association wires on July 22 that Mr. K. Punniiah, who has been founder-editor of the Sind Observer for sixteen years and enjoys in Sind a position comparable to that of Mr. C. Y. Chintamani in the United Provinces, was asked by his Board of Directors not to publish reports of the Congress President's activities in Karachi or the proceedings of the States' Peoples' Conference or of the Congress Socialist Conference. Mr. Punniiah, if he did not accept the views of the Board, should have offered to resign. Mr. Punniiah, however, continued as Editor and published extensive reports of all three functions. The Directors decided to dispense with Mr. Punniiah's services and in addition to charge him at advertisement rates for the publicity he had given the Congress against the wishes of the Board. On the facts before the public the Board of Directors cannot be condemned for their action in dismissing Mr. Punniiah unless one takes the view that the proprietors of a paper are not entitled to decide what to publish or leave out in their publications. Both the public of Karachi and the Municipal members there seem to have adopted this attitude in censuring the Board. It is nevertheless strange that a long association of sixteen years has not produced a better understanding between editor and proprietors.

The Tennessee Valley Scheme :—We publish to-day the last of the series of three articles by Miss Caroline J. Porter of Philadelphia who has herself taken active part in the social side of the scheme. The New Republic of the 10th June contains a special supplement entitled 'Balance Sheet of the New Deal' in the course of which the editors observe with reference to the T. V. A., and Planning generally as follows :—"Much has been said about social-economic planning under the New Deal, but little has been done. Over-all economic planning of such matters as price, wage and production policies and co-ordination of industries has been conspicuously lacking. Planning for development of a region is being attempted under the T. V. A., and is being executed in such limited but useful fields as electric power, flood control and erosion control. Planning for employment of surplus farmers and other unemployed in the Tennessee Valley has, however, met formidable obstacles. Industries are not being created by government; few private industries will move in without general industrial expansion; even if they do, such isolated plants as may be attracted may exploit labour and by their competition decrease employment elsewhere. Successful regional planning in the industrial sphere is impossible except in the setting of a successfully planned national economy. The National Resources Board has made a number of valuable reports in the field of conservation and development of resources, notably the Mississippi Valley Report, which outlines for that region a possible project of power development, flood and erosion control, navigation improvement, irrigation and water supply, afforestation, recreation, etc. A bill to create a Mississippi Valley Authority was introduced by Senator Norris, but has not passed. Creation of planning agencies by the various States has been encouraged; a number of such agencies have been formed and have rendered excellent reports covering such matters as highways, parks housing recreation, water supply, etc. The reports may guide legislation but are not likely to affect greatly the sector of economic life controlled by private business. In sum, it may be said that social planning has made advances in strictly governmental activities but has been retarded in private enterprise, which in turn does much to hamper Government planning."

European Situation :—The Dardenelles Conference has ended in a manner wholly favourable to Turkish aspirations. Turkey has been permitted to fortify both sides of the Straits. She might have done this even without permission as Herr Hitler did in Rhineland. But the Powers are grateful to Turkey for having asked their leave and thus helped to revive some of their own vanishing self-esteem. A rebellion has broken out in Spain. Notwithstanding the official assurances that the situation is under control the rebellion appears to be spreading. Spanish Morocco is involved. In France Socialists and Communists are co-operating in supporting the Blum Cabinet. In India Socialists are identified with Communists for purposes of denunciation. In Spain Socialists are fighting the Communists. The latest news is contained in a message from Washington dated the 24th, which runs: "The Embassy in Madrid has cabled that food supplies in Madrid are only sufficient for two days. It is reported that the rebels killed the guards on the city water reservoirs and the water supply is threatened. The American Consul Bilabo has urgently appealed to the State Department to send a warship to evacuate American women and children as he fears food shortage. It is reported that Government have captured San Sebastian." An earlier message from London stated that heavy fighting continues outside Madrid, from where a column of 5,000 militia marched at dawn towards Guadalajara to assist in stemming the rebel advance. It is reported that all shops are closed, streets deserted and places of worship and a convent burning. A Hendaye message states that the revolution has reached a crucial point, with both sides having equal chances of success.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

740
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 25

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, July 25, 1936.

RAJATARANGINI*.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru in his brief Foreword to the English version of Kalhana's "Rajatarangini" by Mr. Ranjit S. Pandit, remarks that 'one of the reasons which led him to translate this ancient story of our (the Pandits') old homeland was to enable my father to read it, for he knew no Sanskrit.' Pandit Motilal did not live to see the work which the author has appropriately dedicated to his memory. Mr. Pandit himself explains in his prefatory note that he has translated the "Rajatarangini" into English as Sir Aurel Stein's translation published in 1900 'does not give an adequate conception of the work as a literary composition to readers unable to study the original.' Further, Sir Aurel's main interest in Kalhana's Chronicle was archaeological and topographical. Mr. Pandit's translation reproduces, so far as a translation can, the spirit of the ancient chronicler. It gives us vivid pictures of the scenes which were present before the poet's mind when he composed his great history. What is more, Mr. Pandit by his footnotes, which display a wide range of reading, brings out the relation between Kashmir and the rest of India in social, religious and cultural spheres. In Sir Aurel Stein's translation, Kashmir is isolated from its Indian heritage, environment and even geography. In Mr. Pandit's, the extent to which these influenced the mind of the author as well as the history of Kashmir, is brought out clearly. Mr. Pandit's translation links up Kashmir with the history of the rest of India. Sir Aurel Stein's work will still remain the standard work for the scholar and the archaeologist. It is the work of an expert in historical research and is marked by scientific precision. By comparison, the amateur character of Mr. Pandit's translation is more conspicuous than it should be on its merits. This is largely due to Mr. Pandit's voluminous erudition of a rather desultory kind, selection from which demands severe self-denial possible only to disciplined scholarship. In this respect, he is a true exponent of Kalhana himself. A minor defect is the intrusion of colloquialisms like "pal" for boon companion, "duffer" for dullard, in the translation of the classic.

The following passage taken from the author's "Invitation" to his readers, illustrates his special point of view as distinguished from Sir Aurel Stein's. "Kalhana's poem," writes Mr. Pandit "proves that the ancient system of the Aryans in India, who...recognised the freedom of women prevailed up to the 12th century. The ruling princes had plurality of wives... Seclusion or veiling of women was unknown even among royalty. The queens of Kashmir were sprinkled with the sacred waters of the coronation side by side with the kings who shared the throne with their consorts. The queens had separate funds, their own treasurers and councillors and were actively interested in the government of the country...Inter-caste marriages are mentioned and a princess of the blood royal was given in marriage to the Brahmin superintendent of a convent. The best of Kashmir rulers were, according to Kalhana, the King's sons by a divorcee, a Baniya woman from Rohtak near Delhi, while the mother of another warrior king, Samkarvarman, was the daughter of a low caste spirit distiller. Even untouchability was no bar. King Chakravarman married an untouchable Domba woman and made her the premier queen. Kalhana relates that she entered the sacred temple of Vishnu. Her relatives were appointed ministers." One may doubt how far these marriages represented advanced social opinion. The Baniya woman of Rohtak was seduced by the king when he was a guest at the merchant's mansion, and the husband, making a virtue of necessity, offered his wife as a gift to the king, and went to the length of proposing that he would dedicate his wife to the temple in order to enable the king to take her into his harem. The marriage of a king of Kashmir with a Domba woman is likewise rather evidence of the whim of a despotic ruler than of the non-existence of the custom of 'untouchability.' That the courtiers followed the Domba queen to a Vishnu temple only shows that courtiers at all times are obsequious to those who happen to wield the sceptre. Rulers in some Indian states in our own time have been credited with equally heterodox alliances with the acquiescence of their orthodox courtiers. Mr. Pandit rather idealises the state of society in Kashmir. Kalhana had a very poor opinion of the natives which he does not take pains to conceal. Whatever might have been the case with queens, the women of Kashmir did not enjoy a higher status than their sisters elsewhere.

* English Translation by R. S. Pandit, Allahabad.

Who was Kalhana? Sir Aurel Stein makes out that he was a Brahmin, son of a minister of State though he himself never held office, and was in touch with the leading men and events of his time. Kalhana describes several incidents as having happened before his eyes. Of others he had information from persons who witnessed them. Mr. Pandit does not devote so much attention as Sir Aurel to Kalhana's personality. He assumes that he was a Kashmiri. Without any pretensions to the scholarship of Sir Aurel Stein and Mr. Pandit, it strikes us that Kalhana need not have been either a Brahmin or a Kashmir man. He has no high opinion of Brahmins. For Kashmir Brahmins in particular he seems to have cherished nothing but contempt. Again and again, he sneers at them for accepting gifts from kings and others who were notorious for their infamies. In one instance, when a bandit band raided a temple, the Brahmins sneaked away concealing the images under their arm-pits. Kalhana was deeply versed in Buddhist

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

741 lore although apparently he professed the dominant Saivite faith. Neither Sir Aurel nor Mr. Pandit care to notice the reference which Kalhana makes to a Rajaputra of that name. Was Kalhana a Rajput? Of the bravery and constancy of Rajputs he expresses much appreciation. Sir Aurel Stein argues that only a Brahmin of Kalhana's time could have had the mastery of Sanskrit which his poem shows. Many kings and princes were erudite scholars and Brahmins even in Vedic times went to them to learn the philosophy of Brahman. Kalhana's attitude throughout the poem is that of a disinterested onlooker. He does not feel as a Kashmiri but as a sojourner in a strange land. Anyhow, he was a writer much in advance of his time. His outlook is quite that of a modern especially in what constituted good government. This is well brought out by Mr. Pandit in several footnotes.

PLANNING FOR SOCIAL WELFARE: A GREAT EXPERIMENT.

III

For the safety of the workers all sorts of methods have been devised:—safety talks, printed warnings, safety devices, so that the number of fatalities is far below the average.

Partly for their health, partly to distribute labour as widely as possible, there are four shifts of 5½ hours each for the workers on the Dams, where there is no way to escape the finely powdered dust. (The other two hours of the 24 are needed to clean the machinery).

This short workday leaves so much time free that an adult educational programme has been worked out under trained educators and both men and women employees can secure almost any course they want,—Arithmetic, English, Radio, Forestry, Agricultural subjects, Automobile mechanics, Metalwork, Blue-print reading, Photography, Book-keeping, Mechanical drawing, Air-conditioning, Foremanship-training, practical electricity, Carpentry, Dairying, Poultry-raising, Shorthand, Typewriting—almost anything, in fact, that will increase their efficiency in their present jobs, fit the peculiar needs of the area, make for a better life, or train the workers for future leadership in the community.

The Educational section provides not only vocational training but recreational and cultural opportunities as well, through programmes, games, gymnasiums, movies in places where there are otherwise no such facilities and libraries—central libraries and travelling loan libraries, so that a reservoir clearance crew, for example, can take along to their remote and lonely work a book-box brought up to date every two weeks,—over which the saw-filer presides. These libraries are all under one of the most able, popular and successful public librarians of the area, a very remarkable woman, for women are granted recognition in the T. V. A. and assigned important posts like this. The treasurer of the T. V. A. also, for example, is a woman.

The wives of the employees, too, are provided with courses in home-making, child study, gardening and all sorts of household arts, while in areas where state or public education is not available, elementary and secondary education is provided for their children.

Instead of the usual temporary construction camp, there was built near Norris Dam a permanent town, of small, inexpensive houses, rental from $ 14½ to $ 45 per month, for families and bunk houses, or dormitories, for single men and women. There is a most attractive Community House, built of logs, and a school house, for progressive education, of latest designs and equipment, with assembly room where public lectures and church services are held.

Religious Fellowship is through union services for all denominations, under the leadership of a minister whose "messages" are so helpful that people come from miles around. During the week he has another job.

The town of Norris, which is under a qualified Town Manager, is thoroughly electrified, most of the houses having not only electric lights, but appliances for house-heating, cooking, washing-machine, automatic hot water, heaters, refrigerators and all sorts of minor electrical appliances.

By the time the power house is finished, it is probable that the bunk house may be vacated as the men are transferred to other work. But a small nucleus will remain and the bunk-houses will be needed for electrified factories; for one of the great ambitions of the T. V. A. is to help create an area of decentralized small or local industries using the easily-transferred cheap electric current in factories which will use local products and give employment, and, therefore, cash to people living in small communities where each house has, perhaps, its own 4 acre farm for crops, kitchen-gardens, flowers, fruit trees; and the community has poultry-farms, dairies and forests for daily needs.

EXPERIMENTS.

1. Trees.—Meanwhile experiments in improving native trees, fruits and nuts canning and preserving, or in introducing products, like the white potato, not native to the area, are going on, and the resources of the area are being investigated with an eye toward starting new industries using these home-grown products and not competing with anything already established in the United States.

2. Starch.—A thrilling development followed the discovery that starch—excellent starch, too, could be made from sweet potatoes, a drug in the market, food for pigs. And practically no starch is made in the U. S. A. Within a few weeks after the discovery had been made public, the newspapers carried an advertisement of a private firm asking for sweet potatoes to be delivered at a price to a rejuvenated building, which will be used as a starch factory—a new source of revenue for the people, a market for their sweet potatoes and a factory with jobs. This illustrates the alertness to find new opportunities, the resourcefulness in creation, in securing interest and co-operation, and the ability of the T. V. A. to turn new discoveries into immediate and practical use.

3. Ceramics.—In ceramics, too, a specialist, highly trained in European countries in the use of electric kilns for pottery manufacture, was at work; for tests had shown that the soil around Norris makes remarkably fine paste for dishes and a porcelain factory would not encroach on any established business. Then, too, native insulating materials around there, how can these be used and how take advantage of all the other natural resources? For the T. V. A. does not mean to leave the area destitute and resourceless and full of wandering, dislocated men, as many construction projects do, but equipped and ready for a well-rounded life.

A GAIN FOR THE WHOLE COUNTRY.

With all these new needs and wants and interests and an already increased cash income, the area even now is buying "from outside" all sorts of things, such as agricultural implements and electrical

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

742
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 25

appliances for the increasing use of the cheap electricity and so the whole country has profited from this new prosperity and enterprise. Dr. A. E. Morgan says, "Every man employed in the T. V. A. makes work for two men outside."

The T.V. A. does not compel action unless it must. What it aims to do is to suggest ways and means and methods, to be a reservoir of information about the possibilities, to be drawn upon for advice or help, or to refer the seeker to the right one of the amazingly many co-operating agencies already lined up for mutual service. This co-operative line-up as one of the strongest factors in prompt and efficient accomplishment, for co-ordinating and unifying all sorts of local, state, federal and private agencies and their specialists, is an outstanding feature of the T. V. A. effort. The list of co-operating agencies is very impressive, but too long even to enumerate.

The quest for the best results in a spirit of gay adventuring inquiry and experimentation, minds always open to suggestion and alert to see possibilities and to turn the impossible into possible. During a particularly cold spell, neighbours greeted each other, not with questions as to the health of the family, though some one might be ill, but, "How did your heating stand up during this weather?" for this trying out of electricity for heating on a large scale for the first time was a matter of personal concern. As you enter the area, you are struck by this spirit of proprietorship, enthusiasm, responsibility, bustling activity, extraordinary co-operativeness, hope. You feel almost overwhelmed by the "boom spirit," the spirit of the pioneer, by the released and abounding energy on all sides, set free to work and think and act, by the consciousness of a great group, dedicated and consecrated in an almost religious sense to a high ideal and a consuming purpose. There is no loafing anywhere. It is as if everyone leaped to his task with limitless joy and inner spiritual satisfaction. The work, in shifts, continues night and day; someone is always working; and it was one of the most spectacular of sights to see the intense activity going on at night, under the brilliant overhead lights, so dazzeingly reflected in the water of the Clinch River, just below Norris Dam.

The work of the Tennessee Valley Authority, as Dr. A. E. Morgan says, is "more than building a dam"; it is nothing less than helping people see and use all the great possibilities and opportunities around them; helping them to "achieve new levels of practical and social well-being in a studied and integrated programme" which includes everything and everybody, makes for a united area, throbbing with happiness, full of absorbing interest, in which it is a challenge, a delight and an inspiration to live, and results in a great, glowing enthusiasm, joy of life, spontaneous creative ability and a shared and boundless hope, as all work together in the closest kind of mutual helpfulness and co-operation with a common purpose and for a common good, the all inclusive, rounded out well-being of the whole Tennessee Valley.

June 12, 1936.

CAROLINE J. PORTER.

Social Legislation:—The Bombay Women's Association held a meeting on 20th July 1936, when the following Resolution was adopted:—

1 Mr. B. Das' Bill to Amend the Child Marriage Restraint Act. "This Public Meeting of the Women of Bombay held under the auspices of the Bombay Women's Association, gives its whole hearted support to the provisions of the Child Marriage Restraint Act Amendment bill introduced by Mr. B. Das in the Legislative Assembly."

HINDU WOMEN AND PROPERTY RIGHTS.

(By B. G. KHER.)

The object of the Hindu Women's rights to property Bill is to amend the Hindu Law as it stands in order to give better rights to women in respect of the property of a Hindu, who dies without making a Will, whether that property was his separate property or whether it was the property of a joint family of which he was a member. This assumes that a woman is entitled to have certain rights to property and that the rights accorded to her under the Hindu Law as it stands are inadequate. There are unfortunately many people in our midst, who dispute both these propositions. The Bill has already been the cause of a battle in the more sturdy and virile Central Provinces where weapons other than words and arguments were freely made use of by men and threats of perpetual banishment to hotels and boarding houses were resorted to by the fairer sex. I am very glad we have at last begun to think and to feel on this vital subject.

Whatever may have been the rights and status of woman in the times of the Srutis (Vedas), from the times of the Smritis at any rate in India, and from the very beginning of history in almost every other country, woman appears to be in a state of subordination, of subjection, to man and her legal status is one of perpetual tutelage. It is the opinion of many thinkers that this subjection of woman arises from the conscious or unconscious worship of physical strength as the supremely important element in human life. For this worship of force, they advocate the substitution of the worship of human personality—so that there may be a full and free development for all who share a common humanity. They contend that unless women are free, there can not be freedom for society as a whole. "For it is in the mental attitude involved in a tolerance of women's subjection that is to be found the cause of the enslavement of half the world and once the revolution involved in the granting of equal rights to the weaker, were completely accomplished, militarism and the baser sort of imperialism would ipso facto have been thrown over-board."

Until recently, the position of women in the West, so far as education, work, franchise and rights to property are concerned, was not at all satisfactory. It can not be said to be so even now, but women there have themselves been carrying on a vigorous agitation since the middle of the Nineteenth Century which has improved their condition immensely. The history of the emancipation of Englishwomen is full of interest and has many lessons to teach us. Since the publication of the "Subjection of Women" of J. S. Mill, says Blease, the whole course of the emancipation of women may be traced in an unbroken line down to the present day. "Women were allowed to vote at municipal elections in 1869. In 1870, they were made eligible for membership of the new School Boards. In 1875, they sat for the first time on Boards of Guardians. They were permitted to acquire medical qualifications in 1876. The Married Woman's Property Acts in 1870 and 1932 protected the earnings and property of wives from the rapacity of their husbands and a number of statutes have brought legal separation within the reach of those poorer women who most need it. The Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885 improved the existing means of protection against sexual offences and raised the age at which a young girl could consent to her own dishonour."

*Adapted from a speech in Marathi, delivered to the Brahmin Bhagini Samaj.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

743

from thirteen to sixteen years. In 1886, women were permitted to act as guardians to their own children after the father's death. In 1886, they began to vote for County Council. The right of the husband to the absolute possession of his wife's body received a serious blow in 1891, when the famous Clitheroe case decided that a husband had no right to carry off his wife by force, or to imprison her until she submitted to his wishes. In 1907, they were admitted to membership of County and Borough Councils, and even to the office of Mayor. Every year has seen a larger interest taken by women in National politics. They have taken rapid strides in education, their influence is felt in legislation, women are now treated as friends, where fifty years ago they would have been treated merely as potential wives. One of the greatest revolutions has taken place in the short space of a generation.

Women in India have a great deal of distance to cover. They can very well avoid the mistakes of their sisters in the West, but take up their spirit, agitation and struggle. I am by no means a blind admirer of the West, but I do feel that our attitude to woman must now undergo a thorough overhauling. Her complete economic dependence; marriage—the sole choice of her life; domestic tyranny and drudgery—her absorbing occupation; motherhood thrust upon her when she is but yet a child; education next to nil—I am not speaking here of the insignificant number of advanced and well-to-do women in cities who have other problems of their own—all this must be changed.

In order to "ensure that girls may be brought up with some definite purpose in life, that their choice of a husband and their choice of whether to marry at all may be influenced by no irrelevant motives" that after marriage, their life be rendered fruitful and happy, their economic independence is a necessity. Even before a boy begins to earn his own living, the knowledge that he will soon do so gives a certain sense of liberty to his life but the girl knows that she will be in dependence on her father until she substitutes for it the dependence on a husband. Dr. Deshmukh's Bill, therefore, in so far as it is intended to achieve this object, must be welcomed by us all.

I shall now say a few words about the Bill itself. I will not here go into details which can only be appreciated or understood by persons familiar with the intricacies of Hindu Law. Hindu Law is, no doubt, a very difficult subject to modify and legislate piece-meal, but the alternative—vis, to codify the whole of it—is almost an impossibility at this stage. At the risk of some confusion arising, therefore, it is necessary to alter it in such matters as are vitally concerned with the progress of our Society as a whole.

The preamble of the Bill is unexceptionable; it says that it is necessary to give better rights to women in respect of the property of a Hindu, either separate or a member of a joint Hindu family, dying intestate and in respect of separate property and the joint family property. Section 2 of the Bill enacts that, save as altered by the provisions of this Act, Hindu Law is to remain in full force. Section 3 provides that sex should not be a ground for disqualification from having a right to property.

Section 4 is the most important Section, but I am afraid it is not very clear and not very happily drafted. It falls into two divisions which should be separated: the one relating to self-acquired or separate property—the other relating to joint family property. There ought not to be very great opposition as to provisions dealing with the first kind of property, though it does no doubt alter the course of succession. Even as the Hindu Law stands today, by making a Will, every Hindu will be in a position either to allow or to prevent devolution in the manner suggested. Dr. Deshmukh has recently issued a statement to the Press of which you are all on doubt aware. He has pointed out that his Bill is not opposed to Hindu culture and is welcomed by many distinguished social reformers. The first part also requires some drafting alterations.

As to the second part—vis, that relating to joint family property—I think there will be a storm of protest on the part of those who consider that Hindu Society has been preserved because of the joint family system. I shall not attempt here to deal with this controversial question, though I am myself of opinion that the widow and the daughter of a co-parcener having no sons, should succeed to the whole of his share after his death and it should not lapse to the surviving co-parcener of the joint family. This clause is, however, not properly worded. The Bill says "the widow and the daughters of a co-parcener having sons shall succeed to his share." Here the words "along with the sons, all of them having equal shares" should be added to make Dr. Deshmukh's meaning clear.

The Bill will have to be carefully considered and drafted in the light of the numerous contingencies arising and this neither is the place nor the time to attempt such a task. I should rest content by according my whole-hearted support to the principle underlying the Bill and leave the drafting and the actual settlement of the words of the Section to a Committee of Expert Draftsmen. The Bill is no doubt revolutionary in character but we, who are seeking to build a new order of society, must not be afraid of the word "revolution". If you once recognise that woman is entitled to a position which will enable her to develop fully on lines best suited to her nature, we ought not to grudge her a measure of economic independence. She must have opportunities of playing her destined part in the evolution of a better world and, apart from any consideration of theoretical equality of sexes which is sometimes the cause of much illogical controversy, she must be placed in a position in which she is not utterly dependent for her livelihood on the good-will and tolerance of men. Women's Associations must not rest content with merely supporting such measures, when someone initiates them but be more aggressive, assert their rights to fair treatment in all spheres of life and uphold the dignity of womanhood.

Russian Decree:—A Revolution in personal relationships is being effected by a decree which has become effective throughout Soviet Russia. The decree ends the system of easy divorce and abolishes the only widely-known method of birth control. It forbids abortions except to save the life of the mother or in cases of hereditary disease. It sets up bonuses for large families, enforces alimony payments for the support of children, and raises the cost of divorce—in some cases as much as $8,000 per cent. It also forbids divorces on the petition and appearance of one party only. Vast increases are made in the Budget for the assistance of mothers and children. Under the present birth rate of 32 per 1,000, the increase of the population to 800,000,000 by 1971 is assured. The present population is 170,000,000, and the increased use of the tremendous natural resources will make the nation capable of supporting many times the present population. The decree was foreshadowed a month ago, and is signed by M. Kalinin and M. Molotov, the Soviet "Premier". The expenditure on hospitals, nursing, maternity homes, arches and clinics is greatly increased under the 1936 Budget which provides largely increased bonuses for big families.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

744

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 25

THE NEW RUSSIAN CONSTITUTION.

The announcement of Soviet Russia's proposed new constitution could hardly have come at a more dramatic moment. Political democracy is at a heavy discount in many countries throughout the world today. Theorists have been telling us that it provides an inadequate answer to the problems with which the nations are now confronted. Yet the proposal that has been made for the U. S. S. R., and will undoubtedly be accepted, goes a long distance toward liberal, democratic organization on the model of the United States or Great Britain. It gives powerful ammunition, just at the moment of greatest need, with which to answer the fascist theorists of Italy and Germany.

Under the new plan, the U. S. S. R. will be governed by a bicameral legislature. One house, the All-Union Soviet Congress, will consist of about six hundred members chosen by direct, universal and secret suffrage, on a geographical basis, one member to each 300,000 of population. The House of Nationalities, of about three hundred members, will be chosen by the Provincial Councils, with ten members for each of the federated republics, five for each autonomous republic, and two for each autonomous region. These two houses will jointly elect the Council of Commissars, Presidium of thirty-one members, president, four assistants and secretary. The two houses are expected to meet twice a year, for sixty days at each session. If they disagree with each other a new election is called; otherwise, the term in office is four years. Any member can be recalled by two-thirds vote of his constituents, and referendum on important national subjects are provided for. Under a plan similar to that of the British House of Commons, questions may be asked on government policies and replies by responsible officials returned within three days. All persons of both sexes over eighteen years of age have full right of suffrage, with a special proviso that this applies to formerly disfranchised "class enemies." The disparity between the voting power of the industrial worker and the peasant is now to be abolished, as was promised in February, 1935. While the summaries of the Constitution thus far available are not quite clear, apparently large numbers of government officials will be under compulsion to seek membership in the All-Union Soviet Congress, and must resign their posts if defeated.

Some of the other new aspects of the Constitution will seem equally startling to many persons outside the U. S. S. R. The right of private property of a personal character is strongly emphasized. Even private farming is sanctioned, provided there is no exploitation of labour. Freedom of religion, the press and speech are underlined. Both houses of the new legislature will contain non-Communists as well as Communists. Further assurance that the civil rights of individuals will have increased protection is to be found in the fact that judges are to be elected—those of the lower courts by direct popular vote—for terms of limited duration. To round out the changes, the number of federated republics is increased from seven to eleven, the Caucasian Federation being broken up into Georgia, Azerbaijan and Armenia, and Kirghizia and Kazakstan added.

While these changes are of profound significance, they are of course less sweeping than much of the comment that has been made outside the U. S. S. R. would imply. It was never true that Soviet Russia had a one-man dictatorship, as hostile critics have maintained, and even the dictatorship of the proletariat, operating chiefly through the Communist Party, has been much exaggerated both as to its efficiency and the ruthlessness with which it has carried out its aims. Some of the provisions of the new Constitution have been foreshadowed, and even partly effectuated, years ago.

The new proposal embodies no retreat from the programme of socialism. The right of property will still not include the use of private capital, or the exploitation of another's labour. The guarantee of religious freedom means in essence the same situation that now exists, with churches tolerated but with only a decreasing and insignificant part of the rising generation embracing the old doctrines. Freedom of speech and of the press does not mean that advocates of private capitalism will be permitted to engage in public propaganda; it means increased emphasis on self-criticism within the assumption that the ideal toward which to work is a classless society and common ownership of the means of production. The Russian Communists will continue to believe that political liberty without economic security and justice is a delusion, and to safeguard their experiment at any cost.

The new proposals, in fact, are not an acknowledgment of failure but a demonstration of success. Marxian theory has always held that the dictatorship of the proletariat was merely a transitional stage in the movement toward completely democratic socialism. Over and over again the Russian leaders have emphasized that they were in the "war phase of communism," an interim period that was still at least as far from the ideal toward which they were working as it was from the imperialism and capitalism of the days of the Tsars. If today they are able to relax the restrictions of the past, it is because the first phase of their work is largely completed. They began in a society that had never known liberty at all, a society 90 percent of whose members were the children or grandchildren of serfs. Today there are millions of adult men and women who have no memory of anything else than the socialist state. Of all the revolutions that have been going on simultaneously in Soviet Russia in the past eighteen years, none is more remarkable than the revolution in the outlook of a whole generation.

It will be said, of course, that the liberalized Constitution is part of the preparation for the coming war with Japan, that the leaders in Moscow are removing grievances of individuals at home in order to mobilize more effectively against an alien foe. While this result may take place, we do not believe that it is a matter of cause and effect. We believe the changes would have come about in any case, and have probably even been postponed by the desperate necessity of improvising military defenses both in the East and the West.

It is far too early to discuss the effect of Soviet Russia's new Constitution on her foreign relations. Vast quantities of anti-Russian propaganda in the Western countries have been based on the assumption that here was a remorseless dictatorship regimenting millions of reluctant slaves. When the new scheme goes into effect, the value of such propaganda will be greatly diminished. We doubt, however, whether any important realignment of the nations will, or can, result. The Great Powers, are guided chiefly by what they consider to be their national self-interest and this includes, in most cases, a strong desire to see any and every socialist experiment fail. The leaders of the U. S. S. R. knew this when they entered the alliance with France. They are well aware that if their experiment is to be preserved in the midst of a hostile world, their own strength is its best and only guarantee.—The New Republic. realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com
1936

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

745

LEGAL FACILITIES TO AGRICULTURISTS.

(BY K. B. GAJENDRAGADKAR.)

The uplift of villages is the fashion of the day. Government, on one side, is trying its best to make the villagers happy in its own way, through its official machinery. Our leaders, on the other hand, are also anxious to improve the conditions of the poor villagers who are mostly agriculturists, in many popular ways which appeal to the people. It is an admitted fact that social customs which take much money of the agriculturists, and a keen desire for litigation are two great factors which are mainly responsible for the poverty of the villagers. It is a happy sign, however, that propaganda is being carried on to educate the people not to spend lavishly upon their social functions. Litigation is another source of expenditure. Attempts should, therefore, be made to instruct the villagers in the broad principles of law in general so that they may not rush to the court at once to get their grievances redressed.

The Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act was passed to help the agriculturists against the deceptive remedies used by moneylenders. No doubt, opinions are expressed even by the eminent judges that Act has not fulfilled the purpose for which it was meant. Still it gives many facilities to agriculturists to protect them against the greedy sowkars. It is generally found in everyday practice that a proper use of this Act is not made by the public. An attempt is, therefore, made in this article to give in short the facilities given to agriculturists by this Act. If proper advantage is taken of these facilities the conditions of the agriculturists will certainly be improved. The attention of our leaders is therefore invited to these lines.

Money suits against the agriculturists must be instituted where they reside. In case of agriculturists the Court has got the power to admit evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement, and inquire to determine the real nature of the transaction, to find out if any ostensible sale is in reality a mortgage. In money suits and in suits for foreclosure, possession or sale of mortgaged property when the defendants are agriculturists and in suits for redemption when plaintiffs are agriculturists, the Court has power to exercise the broadest equity. The court is bound to inquire into the merits of every claim, from its earliest origin with a view first to ascertain, if there be any fraud, mistake, accident, undue influence or otherwise, and then to make a debit and credit account between the parties according to certain prescribed rules which allow only simple interest at such rate as may be reasonable to the Court, notwithstanding any agreement between the parties as to following compound interest or taking the profits of mortgaged property in lieu of interest. The Court can order a decree for redemption on a suit by a mortgagor though the term fixed by the mortgagee has not lapsed or the debt has not been paid.

Agriculturists are allowed to sue for accounts in ascertainment of debts due for money lent etc., also when there is mortgaged property to be redeemed on their depositing money in Court. In such suits no interest will be allowed. No agriculturist can be arrested or imprisoned in execution of money decree and no immovable property can be attached or sold, standing crops excepted, unless specifically mortgaged. The Court, even of its own motion, can direct the collector to take possession of such land as is not wanted for the support of the judgment-debtor and his family and manage it by letting it on lease or otherwise for benefit for the decree-holder for any period not exceeding seven years. The collector can set aside the sale by the public auction of the property of an agriculturist if he thinks that the price bid by the purchaser is inadequate.

Subordinate judges shall have power to declare in agriculturist an insolvent. Their orders are not appealable. An agriculturist having a debt of Rs. 50/- or upwards may claim to be declared an insolvent. The Nazir of the court is to act as Receiver of his property except immovable property without charging any commission. The collector may be ordered to manage the immovable property of the agriculturist for a term upto seven years according to rules framed for the benefit of his creditors except such portion as is necessary for his support and that of his family and such buildings as are occupied by him. He may let the property for a term upto twenty years if mortgaged and secure the permission to pay off the debt. He may even sell it if necessary and after the balance available has been distributed, the claims of the creditors will be deemed to be discharged. Village munsifs may be appointed for any village within a radius of two miles with jurisdiction in money claims not exceeding rupees twenty-five. Their decrees shall not be subject to appeal but shall be liable to be set aside by the district judge for gross partiality or misconduct. The suit filed in the courts of village munsifs are exempt from court-fee stamp. Pleaders are not allowed to appear before the village munsifs.

As regards registration in case of agriculturists instruments are to be drawn up by the Registrar or under his superintendence, to be read aloud, and to be executed in his presence by the executants. They are to be attested by two witnesses and the Registrar. The consideration is to be fully stated by the Registrar and also an endorsement is to be made on the instrument if any consideration is actually paid in his presence.

Instruments required to be registered under Section 17 of the Indian Registration Act are to be written or caused to be written by the sub-registrar and are to be attested by two witnesses.

Money lenders are obliged under penalty to give receipts, pass books, containing accounts made up from time to time and annual statements of account. A sub-judge is empowered to give professional assistance to an agriculturist in proper cases free of costs.

The period of limitation for suing an agriculturist on any registered bond is extended to twelve years and for a suit for recovery of money in other cases is extended to six years.

NOTES ON THE WAY.

Dr. G. V. Deshmukh's Bill to confer property rights on Hindu women is very much the subject of the day. The meetings arranged by women in support of the Bill all over the country, have been a great opportunity for ventilating feminine grievances before a select audience of distinguished men and with, generally speaking, eminent men in the Chair. Only Nagpur men have revolted against the Bill which they detest as strongly as Capitalists abhor Socialist measures. One Mr. Paranjpye—not to be confused with Dr. R. P. Paranjpye, Vice-Chancellor of Lucknow University, who as Rationalist and Liberal leader is twice precluded from opposing reform measures—raised a persistent and obstreperous voice against supporters of the Bill. Mr. Paranjpye, as a staunch Hindu Sabha man, felt it his duty to point out a new aspect of the problem. Giving women the right to possess and inherit property, he said, would increase abductions since the abductor would

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

746
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| July 25

get both woman and property through his act. But for the pandemonium which brought the meeting to an abrupt end, I am sure some ingenious speaker would have put the abductor's case before Mr. Paranjpye. So long, he would have argued, as women had no interest in family property, the family was of little consequence to the abductor. Whether the family approved or not, he gained nothing more than the woman. On the other hand the movies and the novels had raised young Lochinvar high in the esteem of young women at the expense of the honest respectable citizen. So abduction wins the day. Under Dr. Deshmukh's dispensation, however, things will be different. Women are to be given an interest in family property and at the same time every man is left secure in the right to dispose of his own property by will. There is every reason, therefore, for keeping the family in countenance and the would-be abductor will realise how much more he has to gain as son-in-law than as tough. But this probably would have been an even more distressing prospect to Mr. Paranjpye.

Nagpur women, however, have no intention of letting matters rest at that. At a subsequent meeting they declared for a Lysistratian policy of having nothing to do with men till they proved more reasonable. This seems to have won the admiration of Mr. B. G. Kher who referred to their reported decision to banish Nagpur men to hotels and eating-houses at a meeting of Brahmin ladies in Bombay. "I am glad," said Mr. Kher, "that we have begun to think and feel strongly on this vital subject." Nagpur is a long way off and Mr. Kher can afford to rejoice at the music of a distant drum. Even if Bombay women did decide to join the Nagpur crusade, there are enough good eating-houses to look after the men. In fact it is reported that few women in Bombay can hold out the Nagpur threat because cooking is well-nigh a lost art in most families. I would earnestly advise women here to run a census to see how many middle class families get their food from eating-houses, hotels or other agencies before taking up this two-edged weapon. It might end in driving many women back to the kitchen—to cook their own food.

So long as sports are a matter of interest only to the men who take part in them, there is much to commend them. But there is little to say for international contests. International diplomacy has seen many follies but I doubt if there has been anything to equal the recent cricket episodes which have figured on the front pages of our press. Nothing is a stronger argument for India's withdrawing from these games than the fact that one young man was considered so indispensable as to be rushed to England by air and another was regarded as so unamenable to discipline as to be packed off to India, asked on apology to return by air and finally in the interest of discipline told to go home. One can understand that men are anxious to win but that they should lose their sense of proportion so much as to quarrel among themselves is absurd. And all for pitting eleven Indians against eleven Englishmen on a cricket pitch! If the team had been from Fascist Italy instead of non-violent India, I could appreciate this tense desire to do their best. For Mr. Tunis in Foreign Affairs tells us what Italy expects from her representatives. "I was standing," he writes, "in the lobby of a Central European hotel. Along came a group of war veterans, at least they might be war veterans had their ages been right. Limping, hobbling, patched and battered, they were the football team of Czechoslovakia. Their Italian opponents that afternoon had gone out to win regardless of rules and umpire; they had hammered, hit and gouged their way to victory. And so would you in their places, knowing what would be the attitude taken at home to man who proved themselves so unworthy as to lose in an international contest." It would be a healthy innovation to award the prize in advance before competing with Fascist sportsmen. But what a development from the games of the village in which no one bothered about the result! If Fascism brings about the end of all international sports, it would have more than made up for the evils it has inflicted on a long-suffering world.

Weak end:—"The foolish idea that Britain can be intimidated," the Times of India admonishes Indian readers, "is denied by facts. British Governments like the British people are not impressed by disrespect for law and order whether in violent or non-violent form."

V. A.

OVERSEAS INDIANS RECIPROCITY BILL

His Excellency the Governor-General has accorded sanction required by Section 67 (2) (d) of the Government of India Act to the introduction of the "Overseas Indians Reciprocity Bill" in the Legislative Assembly. Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant, M.L.A., Deputy Leader of the Congress Party in the Assembly, will accordingly move his bill during the forthcoming session of the Assembly.

TEXT OF BILL

The Overseas Indian Reciprocity Act—An Act to safeguard the rights and interests of Indian Nationals abroad.

Whereas it is expedient to safeguard the legitimate rights and interests on Indians in countries outside India, it is hereby enacted as follows:—

(1) This Act may be called the Overseas Indians Reciprocity Act.

(2) It extends to the whole of British India.

(3) In this Act unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context—

(1) "State" means a foreign state or a colony as defined in the General Clauses Act (Act No X of 1937) but does not mean any state under an Indian Prince or Chief in India.

(2) A "notified state" means a state in respect of which a notification has been published under Section and has not been withdrawn under Section 5 of this act.

(3) British India includes Burma.

(4) British Indian Subject includes an Indian settled or domiciled in a State.

(5) European British subject means an European British subject as defined in the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

3. Whenever British Indian subjects are subjected, directly or indirectly, to any disability, restriction, condition or liability in the matter of taxation or entry into a state, or in regard to the holding of public office or property of any kind, the carrying on of any profession, trade business or occupation, or the employment of servants or agents, or in respect of residence or travel within the boundaries of a state or in any part thereof, to which the subjects of or European British subjects in that state, are not actually subjected, the Government of India shall, on being satisfied about the imposition and existence of such disability, restriction, condition or liability publish a notification in the Gazette of India specifying the name of the state concerned along with the nature of such disability, restriction, condition or liability.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

747

4. Subject to the provisions of this act a subject of a notified state,

(1) may not hold any public office and if employed in any such office he shall be removed therefrom,

(2) shall not engage in any trade, profession, business or occupation,

(3) may not be granted a certificate of naturalisation and shall not be entitled to the benefit of Chapter XXXIII of the Criminal Procedure Code or Act IX of 1874 as distinguished from Chapter VIII of the Criminal Procedure Code, notwithstanding the provisions of the Indian Naturalisation Act, (No. VII of 1926,) the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act, (No. XII of 1923), and the European Vagrancy Act (No. IX of 1874).

(b) No bounty or subsidy may be granted out of public funds to any subject of a notified state or to any company, firm or partnership in which a share or interest is held by such subject.

5. The Government of India may by notification in Gazette of India

(a) impose on the subjects of a notified state any disability, liability, condition or restriction in the matter of taxation, entry into British India or holding of any property.

(b) order such subject to leave British India and

(c) prohibit the entry of goods of any kind from a notified state into British India;

And it may similarly rescind any such notifications or add to, amend or vary its terms.

6. When the Government of India is satisfied that the grounds which gave occasion for a notification under Section 3 of this Act have ceased to exist in respect of any state it may publish a notification to that effect in the "Gazette of India" and such state shall not be regarded as a notified state after the publication of the latter notification.

7. The disabilities and restrictions mentioned in Section 4 above shall come into operation only after six months from the date of publication of the notification under Section 3.

8. (1) The Government of India may exempt the subjects of a notified state from all or any of the disabilities and restrictions specified in Section 4 above by publishing a notification in the "Gazette of India."

(2) No notification shall be made under Sub-section (1) unless it has been laid in draft before both chambers of Indian Legislature and has been approved by a resolution of each chamber either with or without modification and except in the form in which it has been approved by both chambers.

9. A Local Government may, in special cases and for reasons recorded by it, exempt any individual subject of a notified state from any disability, restriction, condition or liability.

10. A District Magistrate may direct any person who may be acting in contravention of or who has omitted to comply with the provisions of Section 4 or any notification under Section 5 to abstain from or to do such act within a specified period as the case may be, in conformity with the requirements of the said section of notification.

11. A subject of a notified state or any person who has failed to carry out a direction under Section 10, shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months or with fine or with both if he has intentionally committed any breach of Section 4 or of any notification under Section 5 unless he is exempted under Section 8 or 9 of this Act.

12. The Government of India may, by notification in the "Gazette of India" and after laying the draft for consideration before both chambers of the Indian Legislature make rules for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS.

In the course of the statement of objects and reasons of the Bill, Mr. Pant says that the number of Indians overseas is considerable, being no less than 25 lakhs. They have built up large interests abroad, mostly in countries which at present form part of the British Empire. Indian subjects migrated to these States at their instance and on their invitation, and the latter owe their progress and prosperity to the Indian industry and enterprise to a large measure.

The questions concerning Indian Nationals in foreign lands are of manifold character. Their grievances have been a constant source of embarrassment and concern to the people of India, having aroused intense public feeling here on many an occasion. The treatment meted out to Indians is hardly fair anywhere, while in the British colonies it is particularly galling and irritating. The disabilities and hardships of Indian settlers have grown more onerous and acute with the influx of Europeans and consequent increase in the number of white settlers in colonies. The progressive deterioration of their civic status is similarly due to the growth of European interest with the full backing of their dominant political power. The Government of India has patiently pursued the unobtrusive and unoffending course of negotiation and representation with all the arts of persuasion they could devise, but the results have been utterly inadequate, if not adverse. New measures and subtle devices have been introduced recently in Zanzibar, Kenya, Iraq, the Union of South Africa, British Guiana, Fiji, Malaya and other places which have rendered the unenviable lot of Indians in these countries well-nigh intolerable. The situation has become veritably grave and calls for immediate and effective action. This Bill is an attempt in that direction. In view of the ceaseless inroads on the legitimate interests of Indian settlers, the impudent challenge to the national self-respect of the people of India and the futility of the methods adhered to so far in spite of grave provocation, there is no other way out of the impasse and such a measure has become inevitable.

This Bill is based on the recognised and accepted principle of reciprocity, while laying down a guiding principle for safeguarding Indian rights and interest against invidious discrimination, it leaves the Government and legislative bodies free to exercise unfettered discretion in deserving cases with due regard for special circumstances. Even in respect of offending states, it does not contemplate any action by way of retaliation except when the Government is satisfied as to the necessity and urgency of such a step, of which the Government alone is to be the sole judge. The existence of superior privileges for the benefit of foreigners which are denied to the children of the soil, is a degrading paradox and the withdrawal of such privileges from the colonial responsible for invidious discrimination against Indians in the Colony concerned should not be resented by any body, and, even this clause will not be put into effect till six months have elapsed from the date of notification. Thus the Bill ensures a period of six months for further negotiation in every case, and if the delinquent state remedies the wrong and accepts a satisfactory solution during this interval it will not be affected in any way. Under the scheme of the Bill even discriminatory states can be granted complete exemption, if there are exonerating circumstances. Even when a State is truculent and recalcitrant, the Bill provides for the exemption of individuals. This measure is scrupulously just, if not generous, and must commend itself to all fair minds not only in this Country but also in the colonies and foreign territories.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

748
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[July 25]

GLASS-EYES.

(BY CYRIL MODAK.)

Imagine, for a moment a man who has both glass eyes instead of his natural ones. For a while he may deceive people into believing that his organs of sight are normal. But his behaviour will inevitably betray his blindness. How many of us go through civic life with glass-eyes, betraying our blindness in our actions? Our representatives fondly believe, they have duped people to trust their powers of perception and to vote for them. But in their elected capacity, the moment they move about, they stumble and feel around for a guide. Is it their fault that their mental and moral vision was undeveloped and undermined until it atrophied? Or must the blame be laid at the doors of our educational institutions? What is the purpose of education, and what is the function of teachers, if it is not to use all the technique available to develop the physical, mental, and moral perception of each future generation? Our own teachers send forth from our schools men who are incapable of perceiving the needs of their fellow-citizens, of distinguishing the true from the false, right from wrong.

When individuals of this class aspire to dabble in politics, they are naturally unable to recognize principles for what they are worth. They are, for the most part, incapacitated for the proper intellectual and moral approach to politics wherein an individual accepts certain principles and identifies himself with a particular political outlook which he feels to be correct. It is, therefore, necessary for them to pledge their blind allegiance blindly to persons who dominate the political parties. Whatever these pseudo-leaders dictate is accepted as right. Whatever they want to be done is believed to be beneficial. There are no standards, no principles to judge by, and there is frequently no desire for independent thought on the part of our representatives on local bodies—these miniature legislatures of the land.

How can we expect these men to see the various public needs of their area? Wearing one or both glass-eyes fashioned for them by their education, they are aware of nothing save themselves. Blind self-interest motivates their conduct. Self-respect and conscience are unknown qualities. They sell their votes to the highest bidder. There are exceptions to be sure; and we are grateful for the few noble exceptions. And it is on them that we can stake our faith that if a more wholesome and educative influence were exerted by the majority of our schools and teachers the exception would assuredly become the generality. It is at school that our future citizens must learn self-denial and catch the glow of true public-spirited altruism from their teachers.

It is at our schools and colleges that methods should be contrived to teach students a proper regard for other people's property. It is then that, being appointed to offices of public bodies, they will remember that wastage of public money is a crime. It is then they will remember that to husband public resources is essential to progress and stability. When those who have not been drawn to make honesty the ruling passion of their lives, and have not been apprenticed, to whatever small extent in actual situations requiring a choice of items of expenditure, enter local self-governing bodies, they often form profiteering cliques to the detriment of public service. Public finance is a department of study by itself. It is not intended that schools should aspire vainly to incorporate courses on this intricate subject. But it is necessary that schools should not fail in preparing the moral background for a conscientious manipulation of public resources and the useful study of problems of public finance when their students reach places of trust. Technical questions will require technical knowledge. But moral questions will require moral standards which should be acquired from the agency of vital control, the educational institution.

With vigilant supervision of finances, our local self-governing bodies would be able to undertake significant programmes of constructive educational and social activity. It is often a cruelly vicious circle: because there is no vision among the representatives. They play fast and loose with finances and because money is wasted no constructive work can be accomplished. But the fact remains that there is unlimited scope for constructive effort and reforming zeal. The other fact is, nevertheless, equally obdurate, that men with glass-eyes must be for ever unable to see these opportunities. How many pitiable beggars, do they not pass by on the streets, stretching out lank arms from the dust crying out in unearthly tones for a piece of bread? Is society not responsible for these unfortunate blind and halt, crippled and maimed, weak and diseased members? Does it not reflect discredit and shame on a social structure which compels beggars to haunt the streets and infest the market-places? And what are the honourable 'city fathers' doing to counteract the civic and social disgrace of beggary? Each town should have its combined asylum and work-house where these luckless human beings may find shelter. Those who are professional beggars, able-bodied but lazy, should be put to work and trained to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, while those incapacitated for physical work should find that they live in a civilized world where public funds supply the needs of such as they.

Much ought to be done to remove the social stigma of prostitution. To allow these maladjusted creatures to ply their nefarious trade within municipal limits is to give them social sanction. We are severer with smugglers of opium and liquor than with smugglers of vice and disease. If brothels must be allowed to exist for the sake of the revenue accruing from them they might at least be banished from the city, from streets traversed by countless students, to some distant corner outside municipal bounds. If they still did continue to spread disease they would not outrage the decency and respectability of the town. It does not seem unlikely that if sufficient civic interest were manifested and these helpless sex-perverts were housed and tended and taught an honourable trade, many of them could be won to a decent mode of life. But how are we to expect men with mental and moral glass-eyes to see these glaring facts?

From the heart of the labouring classes comes the piteous cry for friendly help. Worn with toil, emaciated with unhygienic and intemperate living, oppressed with unbroken drudgery, these labourers, men and women and even children, deserve all the relief that social workers can bring them. Local self-governing bodies ought to undertake to alleviate the condition of these classes by organizing social uplift work among them expressly for their benefit. In many places child welfare centres have been opened and are doing excellent work; but greater supervision is necessary to ensure that the poorer classes receive the attention they require, for, after all, these centres are for those who cannot afford to call in a doctor to attend on a sick child. Centres ought to be started also for women's welfare work to relieve their suffering, increase their efficiency, and teach them to be worthy mothers.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

749

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase-the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana Dabhol, Surat, Pottad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mili Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhalal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnarai Vithalrao Ulap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 1/2 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 1 1/2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta.

Burma calling at Galle Tutuoorin

Colombo and other coast ports

according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

750
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

July 25

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches :—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to :—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR;
AND
TRUSTEE CO., LTD

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulia (District West Khandesh).
Karad (" ")	Dondaicha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nasik).
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kalwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panch Mahals).
Paighar (" ")	Kaloj (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale, Esq.
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.	B. N. Rajadnya, Esq.
Madhraj D. Thackersey, Esq.	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.
	D. W. Raut, Esq.
R. G. Sarlaja, Esq.	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.

SHARE CAPITAL :—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to :—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

751

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

752

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

July 25

realpatidar.com

NO THING IN THE WORLD IS MORE BEAUTIFUL THAN A FLAWLESS SKIN

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSCORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY AUGUST 1, 1936. No. 48

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Go to the Himalayas. "Triveni."	Marriage Ideals.
The Sind Observer.	Widow Remarriage.
A Misconceived Defence.	Religion and Religions.
Mr. Amritlal Seth.	Tagore on the Communal Award.
Indo-British Trade Relations.	The End of Marriage.
Caste in Indo-Europe.	Illiteracy and Education.
Civil Marriage and the Catholic Church.	India's Depressed Classes.
A Plea for Monogamy.	Women in Hindu Law.
	Problems of Men and Women
	Students in India.

NOTES

Go to the Himalayas :—It is a fundamental creed of British policy that India is not a country or a nation but only a geographical expression. The new Government of India Act is a statutory monument to this creed. The several provinces and States of the Federation will be so many distinct countries, the sole link between them being the British Crown. Nevertheless, India is one and indivisible. Deeper than the political divisions is her spiritual identity. In an interesting account of his pilgrimage to the shrines at Kedarnath (11,950 feet) and Badrinath (10,200 feet) in the Himalayas, published in the current Modern Review, Mr. Nitya Narayan Banerjee reflects: "One thing strikes the tourist on this way. The whole of India is represented here, in this difficult, dangerous mountain footpath. Men and women from all parts of India—from Bengal, Bihar, the United Provinces, the Punjab, Marwar, Rajputana, Madras, Bombay, the Central Provinces—from Kashmere to Cape Comorin, could be seen here with their varied dresses and complexions, different languages, peculiar customs and etiquette, but all united by one tie, religion. All of them know the stories of the great epics, the Ramayana and Mahabharata, they chant the same slokas of the Gita, only with different intonations. Here one can feel what a great language was Sanskrit which the people of a sub-continent used even when there was no press or printing." Mr. Banerjee and his companion, a 68 year old South Indian Brahmin, more than once narrowly escaped serious accidents on the rugged and snow-covered mountain paths. The journey by air has reduced the duration of the pilgrimage from a month to about fifteen days. But the most difficult part of the ascent to these shrines has yet to be done on foot. The whole cost to Mr. Banerjee of the journey including the fare of the air-plane came to Rs. 150. "Those who are not particular about the time spent," he writes, "can go on foot, which will cost them barely Rs. 50." He recommends young men and women of India to do the journey. "The youths of other countries," he writes, "go on mountaineering, skiing and skating whenever they find the opportunity. Fortunately the youth of our country have now a tendency to see the country. But it must be remembered that India is not only rich with its historic Delhi, Agra, Peshawar, or religious Benares, Madura, Dwarka, or with the lovely plateau of and lake of Kashmir, but also with the ever mysterious Himalayas." Mr. Banerjee himself is an inveterate traveller. At the age of 14 he went to Nepal. At 16 he accompanied his mother to Mount Kailas and Lake Manasarowar, and Tibet. At the age of 19 he went to Kashmir and up to Amarnath, the ice-god who is worshipped by thousands of devotees only once a year. Mr. Banerjee's article will no doubt fill many readers with a desire to follow in his footsteps.

"Triveni":—At the end of eight years, Triveni, devoted to Art, Literature and History, has found it necessary to change from a bi-monthly to a monthly in order to be able "to hold its own against old and well-established monthlies." In countries where conditions of life have reached a certain equilibrium, quarterly, bi-monthly and monthly journals have the most chances of thriving. In the present unsettled times, periodicals of this kind have been hit hard even in Great Britain and America. Even the weekly press suffers. The New Statesman bears on its title page the mark of the struggle. The Nation and the Week End Review, famous in their time, are remembered only by their names in association with its on the cover. The old trenchant, Saturday Review, is no more. Conditions in India are very much worse than in Great Britain. The reading public is limited, and so is the field of writers. Mr. K. Ramakotishwara Rao, Editor of Triveni, does not in the least exaggerate when he refers to the past eight years of his journal as years of unremitting toil. He has managed, on the whole, during these arduous years to keep his journal to the high standard which he had set before himself. The current number is the first of the monthly series and it is a strong number. In the editorial notes there is one deploring "the realism of the cesspool and the gutter" periodicals "which are out to swell their circulation figures by appealing to the lowest instincts of the mass mind." The Editor writes in feeling terms of the late Sir Mocherla Ramachandra Rao who first suggested the conversion of Triveni into a monthly. He did not live to see his suggestion carried

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

754

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 1

realpatidar.com

out. We are glad to read Mr. C. Ramajachariar's fervent tribute to the late Mr. V. Krishnaswami Aiyar who died twenty-five years ago. Krishnaswami was a great man cut off in the prime of life though he was never a popular idol, and never wished to be one. In the course of an interesting article on "Music during the Muslim Period" Professor Abdul Gafur of Aligarh refers incidentally to a pamphlet by a ninth century stylist of Baghdad on "The Superiority of the Dark Races over the White." During the last century, the Whites have persuaded themselves (and, to a large extent, the Dark races also) that they are the superior race. It is well to know that a thousand years ago the Dark races regarded themselves as superior to the White.

The Sind Observer :—The Sind Observer of the 23rd had the following editorial note:—"A wrong impression is being assiduously cultivated in the public mind that the Sind Observer is shutting out news about political events. This impression is calculated to prejudice the Sind Observer in the eyes of the reading public. All reasonable people who would like to see their newly created Province have as few handicaps as possible, will, we are confident, support the attitude taken up by the Sind Observer in creating a healthy atmosphere. We assure our readers and the public at large that, as is evident from the issues of the Sind Observer dated Tuesday and Wednesday last, no authorised news about political events is being or will be excluded from our columns." The party who has the right to complain of a wrong impression being created against him, is Mr. Pooniah, lately Editor, and not the Sind Observer. So far as we have been able to gather, the case against him is that the Board of Directors passed a resolution that he should not give publicity to some current events, that he was informed of it and acquiesced in it, that, contrary to it, he published matter relating to the forbidden topics, and thus violated his instructions. Is this the correct version of the facts? Are these all the facts? The Observer in fairness to Mr. Pooniah as well as to its Directors should tell the public what exactly happened instead of asking it to infer it from two or three recent issues. Healthy and honest journalism is even more essential to the future of Sind as an autonomous province than it was when it was a sub-province of Bombay. As matters stand, an Editor, who for sixteen years has worked devotedly for and succeeded in making his paper one of the principal organs of opinion in the country, appears to have been sent away as if he were a menial servant.

A Misconceived Defence :—Since the above was in type we have seen a statement issued by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. The Pandit begins by bewailing the hard lot of the Indian journalist whom he pictures as being in constant dread of what may happen. From a fairly long and wide experience of journalism and journalists, we must say that this is not a true picture.

This is not to justify the pains and penalties which the Executive Government is empowered by law to impose on newspapers whose writings are not to its taste. In this respect, however the Press is no worse off than politicians. Pandit Jawaharlal would be the last man to admit that he lives in constant dread of what might happen to him under the various laws and sections of the law which are designed for the control of political institutions and their personnel. We assure him that journalists are quite as capable as himself of taking it all as in the day's work. The Pandit prefaces his observations on the action of the proprietors of the Sind Observer by explaining that it has never been a Congress organ. "Its old editor, Mr. Pooniah, has frequently criticised the Congress policy strongly. He has criticised me!" While this shows that the Pandit is disinterested and chivalrous in championing the cause of the dismissed editor it is beside the point as an argument in this affair. The point is that the Board of Directors or the proprietor gave certain instructions in writing to the Editor. Some of these instructions are quoted by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. It is clear to us that these instructions were inspired by the proprietor's opposition to socialism and to the socialistic trends of the Congress under the Pandit's leadership. The question is not, whether these instructions were right or wrong, wise or unwise, patriotic or unpatriotic. They were the views of the proprietor. Unless we are to hold that the fact of a man owning a newspaper disentitles him to have views differing from those of the Editor, we can not deny the right of the proprietor of the Sind Observer to entertain them and, if he chose to do so, to expect them to be regarded in the conduct of his newspaper. An Editor's course is plain. If he feels that he can not conscientiously carry out the proprietor's instructions, he must say so and, if the proprietor insists, he should resign. We do not understand what the Pandit means by saying that Mr. Pooniah refused to obey the instructions. Did he tell the proprietor so and was he, nevertheless, allowed to remain in office and publish the things which the proprietor had instructed him in writing not to publish? If the Pandit will extend his researches a little further he will find that there is not a single newspaper office, except where the proprietor is not himself the Editor or the Editor is expressly declared to be the sole judge of his policy, in which similar restrictions are not observed by tacit understanding, if not by written agreement, between proprietor and editor. We are afraid that the Pandit's statement has not strengthened Mr. Pooniah's case.

Mr. Amritlal Seth :—We are really sorry for Mr. Amritlal Seth. There can be no doubt, however, that he has done the right thing in withdrawing from public life, we trust, temporarily. Certain allegations affecting the purity of his life, he says, have been made. There is, he adds, a large amount of truth in them. He has admitted as much to his friends.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

75

and now he makes a public confession. He makes a declaration of repentance. Repentance, of course, implies a resolution not to repeat or continue in the lapses which called it forth. We write in complete ignorance of what the accusations were but the rule holds in all cases that realisation of one's guilt accompanied by sincere repentance, and as full reparation as is humanly possible to any one wronged, restore the broken harmony within. From what little we have known of him, Mr. Amritlal, besides being a person of ability and energy, is endowed with many good qualities of head and heart; and it will be a great pity if his services are permanently lost to the people. He has been conspicuously associated with the Indian States' Peoples' movement for constitutional government. It is a perfectly legitimate movement. But somehow it has got mixed up with a sort of inquisition into the private lives of several rulers, which is entirely irrelevant as an argument for constitutional rule. If every Indian ruler were a saint the case of constitutional Government will in no wise be impaired. It is impossible to touch pitch without getting some of it on one's fingers. In the interest of the workers themselves, it is most desirable that the personal foibles of rulers should be kept out of the polemics of the movement.

Indo-British Trade Relations :—The British Government has accepted the resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly on the motion of Mr. Jinnah to terminate the Ottawa Pact. It has also agreed to initiate negotiations with the Government of India for a new Trade Agreement between the two countries. This is a welcome sign. The British Government, however, should bear in mind the present relations between itself and the Government of India—the latter is still what Lord Curzon called it, a subordinate branch of the British Government—and take special pains to satisfy the Indian public that the negotiations and the Treaty, when one is eventually made, are absolutely fair to this country and calculated to advance her interests. To do this, it is necessary that the Government of India should seek the advice not only of Indian trade interests but also of Indian economists and political leaders. Business men are experts in their own lines but the future trade relations between Great Britain and India should be determined not with a view to the advantage of one or some industries but with reference to the interests and sentiments—sentiment plays a large part in human affairs—of the public. If this is not done, the new arrangement will aggravate instead of alleviating the tension which, unfortunately, has all along characterised the economic relations between Britain and India.

Caste in Indo-Europe :—Caste is believed all the world over as the special iniquity of the Hindus. The Hindu admits it. But the caste sentiment is by no means confined to Hindus. It prevails in worse, because insidious, forms among people who suppose themselves to be above to all such anachronisms. In the course of proceedings in a breach of promise case before Mr. Justice Talbot in the King's Bench Division in London, the defendant, a European employee in a British firm in Calcutta, denied having promised to marry the plaintiff, also a European girl but born in India. "Plaintiff knew," he said, "I would not get married to her." Counsel: "Why not?" Defendant: "Because my firm would not allow me to. Plaintiff and every girl in India knows that no British firm will allow any member of its executive staff to marry a locally-born girl." Counsel read from a letter of the defendant saying that the firm could not interfere in his private affairs. Counsel: "The company did not care how immorally you behaved as long as you do not marry a girl born in India?" Defendant: "Yes." Mr. Justice Talbot: "It is impossible to reconcile the two statements."

Civil Marriage and the Catholic Church :—The Rev. Father W. Dempsey's promised article in answer to Miss Sylvia Pankhurst's charge that the Catholic Church under the Concordat with the Fascist Government authorises a religious marriage, carrying no civil rights, between persons one or other of whom is already married to someone else, is published in the current Hibbert Journal. Father Dempsey does not deny that this is the fact. His contention is that the responsibility for this undoubted anomaly lies not with his Church but with the Fascist Government. The Catholic Church does not recognise a civil marriage. It regards it as legalised concubinage. It requested the Government which agreed to recognise Catholicism as the State religion in the Concordat, to extend the same recognition to its marriage. But this was refused. "The Church's effort failed," writes Father Dempsey, "and she has accepted a meagre advance towards the just arrangement which the Concordat embodies. But she has not abandoned her claim, either in theory or in practice: on the contrary, here as in the question of the right of the Church and of parents to educate their children or of the right of Catholics to form associations for religious purposes, the Church has lived, since the advent of Fascism and even since the Lateran Treaty, in a state, as it were, of beleaguered resistance." Father Dempsey is disappointed that, instead of praising the often hard-pressed leaders of the Church in Italy, Miss Pankhurst finds fault with them for having lent the odour of sanctity to concubinage. The Church has to submit for she cannot do otherwise. But it will not accept the same excuse if it is put forward by others.

A Plea for Monogamy :—The Women's Indian Association, Madras, in a memorandum on Dr. Bhagwan Das's Bill in the Assembly to validate marriages between different castes of Hindus, says :—"In supporting the principle of the Bill we would ask Dr. Bhagwan Das to amend the measure so as to make polygamy impossible and encourage only monogamous marriages among the Hindus. We who are running women's institutions and Homes of shelter and protection for helpless women have seen many such sad cases."

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

756
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| Aug. 1

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, August 1, 1936.

MARRIAGE IDEALS.

The Student World, the quarterly organ of the World's Student Christian Federation, published at Geneva, devotes its current number to expositions of the Christian view of the right relations between men and women, culminating in the marriage tie. As a matter of fact, there does not seem to be one Christian view. The Catholic view is different from the Protestant. Protestants themselves hold different views. Differing from both, the Orthodox Eastern Church's ideal, derived from Greek philosophy, is a purely mystic one. We reprint elsewhere a part of the interesting article by Parlick Evdokimoff explaining this ideal. "Any union of man and woman in marriage which has as its sole aim procreation," he writes, "must be considered as immoral from the point of view of Christian ethics. That would be, according to Berdiaev, an application of breeding to human relations." Birth controllers will be disappointed if they claim Evdokimoff as their champion. He hastens to add: "The marriage which is based upon the physical relationship is only a respectable form of debauchery." The ideal marriage, according to the Orthodox Eastern Church, is said to be one in which the inspiring thought is union in spirit. The physical union is incidental to this, and not essential to it. The ideal marriage of the Eastern Church may, in fact, totally exclude the sexual relationship. Marriage is defined by Evdokimoff as the meeting-point of those who love one another in God. Eduard Thurnysen approaching the question from a wholly different point of view, holds that "sexual intercourse (in marriage) is a token, the strongest and final token, which two beings of different sex set up between one another, can and should exchange with one another, in order to attest to one another their real and total together belongingness, so far as that exists on earth." This writer denies that marriage is a Sacrament because it is not regarded as such in Holy Scripture. At the same time, he is emphatic that marriage must have as its basis, and be conducted within the Church, as a Church marriage. He also holds that sexual intercourse in marriage is legitimate only when it is not prevented from bearing fruit. He goes on to observe: "The validity of marriage does not depend on whether children are granted to the married couple. Even the purpose of sexual intercourse is not described by saying that it must subserve the procreation of children. It is first of all valuable in itself and valid as that token of which we have spoken. But now, beyond that God has taken sexual intercourse in marriage into service. It is His Will that it should subserve propagation." He might yet use other means of propagating the human species. He can, as the Pharisees, proud of their ancestry, were authoritatively told, raise from the very stones children unto Abraham.

Such mystical and semi-mystical speculations have no interest to the non-Christian and very many Christian readers. The article which is of the most practical interest on the subject is the one headed "An American Viewpoint" by Mr. William E. Kroll. Mr. Kroll maintains that owing to the waning influence of religion in the American marriage, the marriage relation has fostered selfish and anti-social tendencies. "Too much of the conception of love held by our young people," he writes "as well as by many who are older, is of the stuff that comes out of Hollywood; the worst of which is not its badness but its gross selfishness, having for its theme song: 'You belong to me and I belong to you.' And, as a consequence of some years of this influence, we are today millstoned with countless marriages and homes whose members are living so completely as though they belong only to each other that their capacity for social responsibility seldom gets far beyond their respective firesides." He goes on to point out that this condition is reacting upon the very home life of these same families. He writes: "Married persons, that is, committed only to the ideal of living for each other, instead of making the home the training ground that it should be and once was for the cultivation of a larger social consciousness among its members, are demonstrating that by such selfish ends their own capacity for caring even for each other is being starved down, until these persons have come to care ultimately only for their individual selves." He puts his finger on this as the cause of the large number of divorces in the country. Many explanations have been advanced for the growth of that problem. What has obtained almost general acceptance has been the theory that sexual maladjustment is at the bottom of most divorces. But not so much because of physical sexual maladjustment, as is commonly supposed, as because of the notion that a man and a woman find lasting happiness only by living for each other and their own children. He quotes as the secret of married happiness the words of a great preacher: "Let a man and a woman who care greatly for each other begin to care for much else besides, developing an intelligent and unselfish interest in world affairs, and they will discover as year follows year that they are caring more for each other and that, through a common devotion to some thing greater than self, they are developing a union of selves which nothing on earth can destroy and which, they may hope and believe, not even death can dissolve." We are not prepared to sav with the writer that this is possible only to those who believe in religion. But, certainly, it comes more easily to those who believe in something beyond and greater than themselves than to those who think that they are an end in themselves.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

757

WIDOW REMARRIAGE* (BY SIR MANUBHAI N. MEHTA.)

The Widow Remarriage Act has successfully braved the storm of all hostile criticism for the last eighty years. It has splendidly stood fast and steered its way clear through all the shoals and sandbanks it had to encounter in the midst of all the angry passion it provoked and the rancorous controversies that raged round it for a number of years. Born of bias and unwise idealism popular opposition to a measure of social reform is loudest when it is reinforced by the cry of religion in danger. We are often apt to forget that Society, like an individual, suffers decay as it advances in age and becomes a prey to short and distorted vision, unless glasses of suitable lens and appropriate power are timely renewed to set right its growing myopia. Knowing full well that his very life means growth and change, man is averse to change and prefers to stand still. Climatic conditions also influence his habits. "Lulled by the languor of the Land of the Lotus" to use Lord Randolph Churchill's alliterative description of our country the untutored Indian saw the finger of God in everything that befell him and loving his inertia he was too lazy to apply his shoulder to the wheel and change the rut which Kismet had chalked out for his wheel of fortune. He had no faith in man's power to conquer nature or scope over his surroundings and he did not believe that man could ever be an architect of his own fortune. Whatever ill befell him he had to bow his head to the cruel Decree of fate with folded hands, sincerely believing that perhaps his own misdeeds in his previous birth had brought their retribution in his line. His bias in favour of antiquity induces him to believe that everything old is gold and it is only presumptuous, foolhardiness that prompts the Reformer to raise his head against the sage commandments of the Holy Shastras of old. He has no faith in the law of revolution and does not believe that only by clever adjustment and will timed adaptation to the changing environments any living organism can survive in this deadly struggle for life. The world however is moving fast in the face of all orthodox opinion in the country and we would do well to remember that our Hindu Society and our Hindu Law have survived the storm and stress of all these ages only because we have tried to keep alive their elasticity and adaptability to the fleeting need of the times. Our people should not forget that when the whole world is advancing our not advancing would by the law of relativity only result in our receding. Stagnation is impossible; it is death.

It is a wellknown fact that the position of women in Hindu Society had deteriorated considerably in the first half of the last century. Woman like any other goods and chattel had become an object of property, liable to be bartered and sold. The country was torn up by racial feuds and communal quarrels; and when during the internecine wars that harried the land, a Ruler was defeated, his whole harem was blown up in a huge holocaust along with everything else near and dear to him, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy and being carried away by the victor as the spoils of his conquest. When the Ruler died a number of his wives were burnt on his funeral pyre along with a few slaves to keep him company. The ideal of suttee is indeed sublime and ought to inspire every patriot with admiration and reverence for the noble spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion that led the Hindu widow to give up her own life so that even in Death there was no parting from her dear Lord. In this transcendently sublime ideal there is no untying in the nuptial knot and even Death is powerless to part the devoted wife from her loving husband. The ideal is sacred and sanctified, provided it is left entirely to the option of the bereaved. It is only against enforced Suttee that the whole country naturally revolted and the British Government had to stop this cruel practice by a legislative enactment in 1835. It was so difficult to distinguish between what was a purely voluntary sacrifice of self immolation and what was enforced burning of the widow in the interests of social prestige. The British Government wisely interfered by passing that humane law that has earned the gratitude of every civilised man and woman. That was indeed the first occasion when the plea of religious neutrality and non-interference with the social customs and usages of the people was set aside in the interests of humanity.

Similarly it has been only against the evil of enforced widowhood that the Reformer has been waging his crusade. According to the spiritual ideal inculcated by the Shastras, a woman when married becomes a part of her husband, sharing with him all the merit he may earn by his pious deeds, his devout offerings and his sacrificial rites and rituals. Even after death she shares the obsequial offerings and libations poured out to the soul of her husband and his ancestors. She could receive them apart only if she predeceased him. Marriage thus involves complete self-effacement and spiritual absorption of the wife in to her husband's being. She retains no individuality. It is against this conception involving the loss of woman's individuality and her becoming a mere appendage of man altogether that modernity looks askance; and that with reason when there is a total absence of reciprocity in the matter. No one has heard of any enforced widowhood, much less of any enforced immolation of the husband on the funeral pyre of his beloved better half. In these days of an advancing tide of opinion in favour of the equality of the sexes, an equality of rights and of opportunity it is difficult for any save a conservative mind to uphold the justice of enforcing widowhood on a bereaved childwife for the rest of her life.

It is scarcely necessary to dwell upon the evils of enforced widowhood. They are manifold and the enormity of the iniquity must have indeed grown appallingly manifest so as to call forth from a reluctant Government another act of interference with the social and religious practices of the Hindus within a short space of twenty years. In 1856 the Government thought it wise to correct this gross injustice and to stem the rot undermining the very vitals of Hindu Society by permitting the remarriage of Hindu widows. It is this Act which we have met to bless this evening.

Widow remarriage was one of the most vital, as also one of the most difficult problems of social reform which the advocates of Reform at one time found themselves called upon to defend before the tribunal of public opinion. Interested publicists, bent upon misrepresentation and mischief, endeavoured to blur over its purely permissive character and blow themselves hoarse with ories of religion in danger by circulating misleading reports that Government were going to drag every widow in to compulsory remarriage. There were at one time grave misgivings about the intentions of Government in the public mind and Social Reformers had for a long time to strain every nerve to allay these misgivings and remove wrong notions from the mind of the people. Popular opinion and prejudice however were so strong against this measure that hardly one

* Presidential address at public meeting held on July 25, 1936 in Bombay to celebrate anniversary of passing of Hindu Widow Remarriage Act.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

758

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 1

realpatidar.com

widow was found bold enough to muster sufficient moral courage to enter into a legalised remarriage in public. Advocates of Social Reform had to endeavour their utmost to demonstrate their sympathy in every way possible by undertaking to help the poor widow by holding public gatherings of sympathisers, at the time of celebrating the remarriage, by finding out employment for both parties to the marriage, and by alleviating all the terrors of ostracism and social tyranny to which they were sure to be subjected. As times advanced this active hostility ceased and the interest of the Social Reformer proportionately waned in the matter. We do not now often read of widow remarriage celebrations or gatherings of Social Reformers to bless the remarried couple or on the other hands of hostile demonstrations and gatherings of the headmen of castes and leaders of caste panchayats for fulminating their anathemas and bans of excommunication against the offending parties.

The evils of enforced widowhood required also to be vigilantly watched and sympathetically tended as long as the practice of infant marriages which often left only a trail of helpless child widows at the end, flourished broadcast in the country. The Government of India and several Indian States have by now passed salutary laws prohibiting and penalising early marriage of girls and one festering sore of Hindu Society is being closed up and healed. In consequence of these humanitarian laws penalising the marriage of girls below 14 there has been an appreciable and welcome fall in the number of child widows during the last decade. Out of a population of 8,36,07,223 Hindu females as recorded in the census of 1931, so many as 5,83,53,082 were returned as married and among this number there were to be found so many as 11,67,060 child widows below the age of 15. This is an appalling figure sufficient to make any sensible Hindu hang down his head in shame. He has at the same time some reason to congratulate himself for this result; for as compared to the figures of 1921 there has been a striking decrease in the number of such child widows. Their numbers one decade ahead has been no less than 15,75,531. The census figures on the whole had registered an increase of over 16 per cent on the total population and this increase may have prepared us to encounter a similar increase in the number of child widows. On the contrary there has been a fall of 30 per cent in this number. Had this progress been maintained the advocates of Social Reform would have ample cause to feel satisfied. There has been however a grievous set-back in the year 1930—the very year that witnessed the passing of another humane measure of Social Reform in the shape of the Sarda Act to prevent early marriages in the Country. It is sad to note that by a cruel stroke of Nemesis the very Act for the prohibition of early marriages, which the British Government in contravention of their much vaunted policy of non-interference with the religious practice of the people of the country felt compelled to pass, proved itself to be responsible for a very large number of marriages of infant girls that were celebrated in hurry to escape the consequences of the Act and which in consequence left a hideous legacy of a large increase of child widows in one year, so as to be clearly reflected in the census of 1931, and whose far reaching consequences we shall have greater reason to bewail in the two succeeding census figures for 1941 and 1951. The Sarda Act was passed by the Legislature on 28th of September 1929; but it came in force only on the 1st of April of the following year; (they might have selected a more auspicious date; but inscrutable are the ways of Bureaucracy; even the much trumpeted provincial autonomy is to be ushered in on 1st of April 1937.) There had been a tremendous agitation in the country against this unfortunate Child Marriage Restraint Act which had been sponsored by my friend Dewan Bahadur Har Bilas Sarda. The Bill was being debated and hotly discussed in the country since September 1927 and it had roused such angry passions by the time it was passed that its opponents had made up their minds to defy the Act and get all the girls available married in anticipation of this much resented prohibition. There was a regular stampede and a rush to hasty marriages in the marriage seasons of 1929-1930. In spite of its flowery hyperbole the pen picture delineated in the Liberty issue of 13th March 1930 affords a graphic and yet accurate version of the regrettable fit of dementia that had seized the people. "A matrimonial wave is just passing over the country. Brides in embryo are being mated to grooms in the cradle. The Sarda Act is coming into force; and the pigtailed Pundits have sanctioned rather juvenile unions to stave off perdition. Poor girl just learning to suck the feeding bottle is being carried over to the wedding bower. Urchins are being snatched from the arms of their playmates to don the garb of a groom. As an emergency measure the elastic pundits have issued an edict whereby they have certified the month of Caitra to be the proper season for matrimonial alliances. Our pundits have extended the limit this year. We are sure before the 1st of April dawns there will hardly be left a single unmarried man or woman in the country." Two thousand child marriage contracts had been reported from Gujarat alone as early as November preceding and demand for dowry were said to have become exorbitant and the business of money-lenders brisk. Cases have been reported in which money was borrowed at a usurious rate of interest as high as 78 per cent for the celebration of one child marriage in the Bogra District in Bengal. In Bankura child marriages were reported to be taking place at the rate of 1000 a day on propitious days in the month of February 1930. In Dinapur alone some 10,000 marriages were reported to have been celebrated mostly in order to anticipate the Act. The rush of marriages in Gujarat went on in December and 1000 were reported to have taken place in Surat on the 12th of December alone. In one sub-division of the Nadiya District some 4000 marriages in a day were reported to have involved difficulties in the engagement of musicians, palanquin bearers and even of motor cars and buses to carry the bridal parties and to have kicked up the prices of fish, curds and sweetmeats to exorbitant figures as was also the case in Chittagong. In Larkhana town alone in Sind 300 pairs of infants were tied up in the bond of wedlock in the month of March and the numbers in some districts rose so high as to cause great difficulty in getting the services not only of musicians, but even of the officiating priests.

RELIGION AND RELIGIONS.

(BY SIR S. RADHAKRISHNAN.)

While the religion of spirit regards dogmas as more or less tentative views, to be adopted for the purpose of awakening spiritual life, and judges their value by their capacity to humanise and spiritualise life, organised religions assume that the doctrines are commanded by God directly and individually to man or indirectly and institutionally to a priesthood who obtained it from God. Supernatural sanctity and finality are attached to them, and they are declared to be the same yesterday, to-day and for ever. Thus we get idolatry of the worst type. If we condemn the idols of clay and wood for their

* Excerpts from address at World Fellowship of Faiths, London July 8, 1936.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

759

meaningless rigidity of countenance, what shall we say of the equally meaningless oppression of the mind and stifling of spirit by the idolatry of dogmas and tyranny of phrases. Finality belongs only to the lifeless.

God is not an abstraction but a Being. Knowledge of God is to be obtained not by intellectual discussions but by a self-deepening, self-transcending and absolute consecration. What we intellectually assent to must become a part of our being. Only in so far as the belief is assimilated by our mental organism does it become real. Knowledge must be made effective and transfiguring. Opinions may be commanded but not convictions. Religion is deeper than theology for it is life; it is deeper than morality for it is love, that which gives wings to morality and makes it a regenerative force in human life and society.

Attempts are made, now and again, to have a purely spiritual religion without creeds and sacraments, a religion of heart and mind but they cannot succeed, for inward living must have outward expression. Even as the soul fashions for itself a body to complete its otherwise imperfect life on earth, so men's thoughts and ideas tend to embody themselves in some concrete form, which appeals to the imagination and the senses, but there is no reason why we should force others to adopt the same forms and apprehend things exactly as we apprehend them. So far as outer expressions are concerned, there must be freedom of manifestation. All that we need insist on is that the outward visible expression must be entirely governed by and obedient to the ever growing inward truth. Dogmas and rites are not unnecessary or unworthy or negligible, for they are aids and supports to religion, though they are not its essence. Dogma is a temporary mould into which spiritual life may flow but it should not become a prison in which it dies. An idea is a power, not when it is simply professed but when it is inwardly creative. A symbol is there to help us to realise in life the thing symbolised. All these function properly when they bring about a change in human life. Yajñavalkya tells us that the chief aim of rites and ceremonies, of ethical codes demanding self-control and non-violence, charity and study, is to enable one to attain by yoga insight into the eternal. A society that lives by its institutions and not by its individuals is a mechanical group, not a living growth. The individuals who perceive that a remaking of man is the goal of humanity and lead others to it so that it may become the goal of the race, are the saviours of society. To the extent in which they succeed, and to the degree to which they carry their evolution, the yet unrealised potentiality which they represent will become an actual possibility of the future. Until such a spiritual oneness based on psychological unity is developed, the problem of fellowship of peoples can be attempted only by the mechanical means of political adjustments. But the higher hope of humanity lies in the growing number of men who will devote themselves to the task of accomplishing a spiritual oneness of the world, enriched by a free inner variation and a freely varied self-expression.

This Congress does not ask anyone to change his faith, for it allows that the great religions have had a large share in the progress of civilisation. They have helped mankind to discover himself to some extent. The pagan religion gave us a sense of the beauty and the largeness of life. Hinduism has revealed to us profound spiritual possibilities. Buddhism has shown us a way to be pure, gentle and compassionate. Judaism and Islam teach us to be zealously devoted to God and faithful in action. Christianity shows us the power of love and suffering. Though these different religions have been able to save a number of souls, none yet has been able to spiritualise mankind. For that we need not a new cult or a creed but a sustained endeavour at spiritual evolution. The changes we see in the world to-day are social and political, intellectual and moral, but the spiritual revolution has not yet come, though it throws out its feelers here and there. Until it comes insisting on a more perfect self-discipline, the sense of the others cannot be properly understood. Its quality and power will determine the next cycle of human evolution.

This spiritual revolution demands not so much a change of faith as a vitalising of it. In order to grow, religions have had to emancipate themselves from the trammels of authority. They had to discard the letter of the scriptures while remaining inspired by their spirit. If they are to take us to an ideal which is truly and completely human, they must pursue the course of emancipation in a more rapid and forceful manner.

The most hopeful feature of the religious situation to-day is the fact that such a process of reconstruction is at work in all religions. Leaders of different religious groups believe in the hidden possibilities of their religion, its adaptability to new needs and knowledge. They are trying to reorient their ancient faiths to the needs of current knowledge and contemporary aspiration in two important directions, the prophetic and the social.

It may appear somewhat irreverent to speak of any one religion as being but one of many actual and possible religions, and it is not a matter of great moment which of any existing religions one should adopt. There is a natural temptation to assume that the order of ideas to which one is accustomed from childhood is the necessary, natural and the only conceivable order of things. We take our religious view from the society in which we happen to be planted and then invent reasons in support of them. We then flatter ourselves with the belief that our religious system is built up logically from principles which are quite independent of consequences and are of universal validity, while other religious systems are based on false notions, imperfect logic and unsound philosophy. In a Congress like this where we meet cultivated minds from other religions, we are bound to realise that every religion has its own estimable contributions and no one religion has cornered all the saints. By comparing our ideas and traditions with those of others, we save ourselves from the narrowness of religious provincialism.

Fellowship of faiths which implies appreciation of other faiths is no easy indulgence of error and weakness or lazy indifference to the issues involved. It is not the intellectual's taste for moderation or the highbrow's dislike for dogma. It is not the politician's love for compromise or being all things to all men, nor is it simply a negative freedom from antipathies. It is understanding, insight, full trust in the basic reality which feeds all faiths and its power to lead us to the truth. It believes in the deeper religion of the Spirit which will be adequate for all people, vital enough to strike deep roots, powerful to unify each individual in himself and bind us all together by the realisation of our common condition and common goal.

TAGORE ON THE COMMUNAL AWARD.*

My friends, considering the gravity of our situation my address today will be brief because in my age expenditure or breath has to be economised specially as there is every likelihood of its being wasted.

It is needless for me to say that I have no gift for politics. The subject of this meeting—which is the communal award—carries chiefly a political implication.

* Address at the Public Meeting at Calcutta.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

760

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 1

realpatidar.com

tion and this for a long while is my first participation in a discussion which deals with politics. In spite of some hesitation I yielded at last to a growing anxiety in my mind for my country: I found it painfully impossible to ignore the sinister threat of a bisecting blade hissing while being sharpened, ready to divide the vital sensitive cord that is to bind our people into a nation.

To-day the shadow of a dark age has fallen upon Europe. She seems boisterously eager to put out the light of ideals which she herself had specially brought to a new age and her newspapers to-day are full of the malevolent measures taken by dictatorial powers against their victims to keep them crippled for good or thrust them completely aside. I shrink from comparing with some of those acts the introduction in our country of a scheme in which there will remain no scruple to wrench off one of the most sensitive roots of our growing national being. The incident will appear too small and be passed over in silent apathy by the larger world, for those who are helplessly affected by it suffer from the cruellest of insults, the insult of insignificance. However, for us the enormity is such that I felt ashamed to claim the privilege of old age and failing health and was drawn out of my accustomed seclusion to cry my warning even if it be a cry in the wilderness.

The Communal Award carrying the malediction of a separated political life has been pronounced even upon groups and communities of our country that did not want it. The Indian body-politic is to be divided into eighteen different sections. Mahatma Gandhi described this process as a vivisection of the body-politic which will emerge as a carcass out of this operation.

And this evil of separate electorates is made worse by the scheme of weightages whereby communities are differently valued to suit the present mood of the Government. For reasons which need not be explained the Hindus are handicapped most in the coming constitution, and Bengali Hindus, instead of receiving any protection, being in the minority, have specially been singled out for a reduction of their representation even below their natural population strength by weightage being cast against them. Though a tacit compliment, it is an open assault employing a novel political arithmetic invidious enough to turn the methods of reasonable government into most irresponsible means by which one community is made permanently independent of the co-operation of the other while wielding the right to oppress it if it so chooses. It is not that we wish to deny our Muslim countrymen the benefit of their numbers, nor that we suspect them of dangerous designs. It is only that we refuse to accept the fate of all future prospect of mutual co-operation blighted by a scheme which puts a premium upon communal allegiance at the expense of national interest—a scheme which engenders suspicion where there should be trust and corrupts both the communities by encouraging fanatics to make political profit out of communal passion. I beg to remind our rulers that even worse than the commercial exploitation of our economic life is this political poisoning of our national blood, worse than punishing subjects on suspicion, without trial for an indefinite period; for it is punishing the future, an eternal damnation for acts of disobedience, real or imaginary, proved or unproved.

Ever since the very suggestion of this proposal, the atmosphere in our province has become turbid with passion menacing amenities of civilised life, based upon mutual tolerance and co-operation. Already a spirit of wanton destructiveness seems to be creeping even in the commonwealth of our literature, threatening violence to our language, rapidly creating a situation which could have its analogy if the Scotch people had suddenly revolted with a Calvinistic frenzy of bitterness against the English tongue because of its difference from their own traditional speech and thus if they had deliberately attempted to wreck the intellectual communication between them and the rest of the country. This is the first red signal of danger presaging a fatal collision between neighbouring communities whose duty it is to create a comprehensive life of a common welfare. If it is disturbed in an unthinking obduracy of communal spite then not only our political efficiency but economic prosperity also will be involved in ruin.

We have been watching on the part of our Government the uneven discrimination in the apportioning of appointments in spite of the risk it runs in lowering the standard of administration. Owing to reasons for which the Hindus are not answerable, our Muslim brethren have suffered for long from inequality of advantages in various lines. With all my heart I should welcome its being gradually brought to a balance. But it is too plain that there is a spirit working behind the arrangement savouring of a purpose not pertinent to the problem, and this has made its process so aggressively unhealthy for our collective good. Offering any encouragement to the clamouring for crumbs of favour at the table of a supreme power not only causes meanness but feebleness of character. It cannot be gainsaid that the Mahomedans own in them virile qualities that are remarkable. There is no doubt that their democratic tendency of mind has given them special fitness for winning in the race of life. Those of them with whom I have had opportunity to come in close relationship I have frankly admired and loved, and their number is not small. I have always intently hoped that all the differences separating us that mostly arise from utter stupidity and primitive spirit of unreason could be removed through nearer personal touch and comradeship. But any biased treatment from any alien source that is not expected to have a natural sympathy and unselfish concern for the country can only emphasize these differences into a mortal mischief. Let us have the far-sighted wisdom to know that concessions acquired through a prudent patronage are always demoralising, both for those who are fortunate and others who are deprived. They will create complications that will perpetually irritate each other and in the long run will never serve those who have been helped to an easy path of profit. We, who belong to the same soil must, for the sake of a civilised existence and ultimately for bare self-protection, cultivate mutual friendliness, and both the parties should rise above all immediate provocations and allurements, and should distrust the elements, foreign and indigenous, that sow living thorns in their path of fellowship. We Hindus must not grudge the favoured partners of our destiny the sudden shower of gifts so long as it lasts; the only cause for anxiety lies in the sureness of a reaction that will follow when saturation point is reached and yet satiety remains distant, when the one-sided game of indulgence crosses the bounds of even autocratic decency. The most ill-omened aspect of the problem which frightens us is when we realise the absurdity of bringing arguments to the present question, being perfectly certain that our rulers long trained in parliamentary ethics, know better than ourselves that communal division in a political organisation is fatal to its effectiveness.

And what is the most unfortunate fact about it is that the vehemence of our wrath is poured upon the Mahomedans who are as much the victims of a disastrous policy as we are ourselves. For it never can

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

761

be to their best interest this offer of an intoxicant. It will no doubt rudely and constantly disturb our own peace but in the natural course of things one day the other party will have time to sober down and discover in dismay that some very valuable things have been destroyed and possibilities ruined that are not easy to be recovered. However, in the meanwhile I earnestly ask my Hindu brethren never to lose their temper and aggravate the injury into suicide. As for those who have instituted this policy under various plausible excuses it will be presumptuous for me to warn them for their wrong-headed statesmanship. If they have no compunction to mix some baser alloy in their gift which could have its full value only by its uncorrupted generosity, they will not only miss their dues in thanks which I am sure they cannot afford to despise but—well they know better.

Those who have studied modern conditions in Europe have surely learnt that for a moment it may become possible to force people reduced to helplessness to shallow injustice but not so to force them to assimilate it. Sooner or later it is ejected in a poisoned mass of contamination. Let us forget for the moment the dominant power that is here to make or mar our future and turn to those of our countrymen who seem to be losing their mental equilibrium through a pathetic illusion of an everlasting good luck and remind them that in this critical period of our history any wrong turn taken in the path of our self-government is sure to lead to a permanent disgrace and calamity. It is not the difference in opportunities which in itself is dangerous but the mental attitude created through it, the attitude of exultation on one side that recklessly pushes its triumph with immediate impunity to ungenerous extremes, and on the other side, the resentment rankling deep seeking to find outlets often in a wrong manner and unreasonable excuses. It encourages both the parties light-heartedly to perpetrate acts that embitter racial memory for all time to come, creating deep-rooted prejudices that attack the foundation of neighbourly good fellowship. It is very much like infusing the air with poison gas to make victory easy, using a terribly wasteful method of attaining an iniquitous success that spreads its torments far into the heart of an innocent multitude and non-combatant future.

I was born too early for this post-war age of disillusionment. I have had my moral sustenance from the much-maligned Victorian age through its literature and its struggling faith in humanity as it reached us across the sea. To-day when we find all through the West the ruthless repression of freedom, and that callously arrogant cynicism which is indifferent to a wide-spread human misery and injustice, I still must, almost against all contrary evidence, place my confidence in the sensitiveness to the ideals of humanity which I considered as the characteristic trait of the Western mind. And therefore, when I grow aware in our own neighbourhood of some far-reaching and deeply laid diplomatic move which means permanently holding paralysed in its meshes our future for the sake of a tighter grip upon our vitals, I still feel inclined to appeal to the chivalrous humanity of the Englishman representing the best ideals of the Western culture. I believe that if those ideals that show signs of dilapidation were restored once again and somehow brought to bear even upon Indian politics, if the people that determine the fate of this country could win in our hearts the prestige of unswerving fairplay; it will not only add to the credit of their civilisation but to their worldly benefit in the long run. If those that have called this meeting had no such faith, conscious or unconscious, in this race then this meeting is foolish and devoid of meaning. I am sure, even though they may not clearly define it to themselves, they are certain that the higher stratum of English life does not solely constitute of persons like the late Premier who betrayed his often-pronounced ideals when they concerned India or some Viceroy who cleverly navigated the White Paper boat into a stagnant water of inanity, and who must have inwardly chuckled at all our discomfitures and blunders of inexperience. If this pathetic faith which dies hard is an illusion, then let us leave this child's play of meetings and conferences and exclusively concentrate our attention to build our own history in an unaided and dignified aloofness and in patient wisdom. Or even fall back upon the stoic indifference of the oriental mind, the indifference that unconsciously prepares the soil for an unwelcome and unexpected cataclysm.

THE END OF MARRIAGE.*

(BY PARLICK EVDOKIMOFF.)

There has always existed in humanity, besides the rationalistic theory which places the emphasis upon the utility of marriage and protects it outwards, the mystical conception which penetrates to its very depths and reveals a meaning which is sufficient in itself.

Marriage is, then, independent of posterity; it appears as a road towards perfection and harmony, towards the fullness of being in supra-personal unity.

In the ancient Greek rites and mysteries, marriage was called "telos" that is, "end" in the sense of "crowning-point." The Pseudo-Aeropagite writes: "The Athenians call marriage "telos," because it is marriage which crowns man for life." Troitzky also indicates that Eros, in Plato's Symposium, is "epithymia ton holon", that is, aspiration to integrality.

The Platonic tradition, which has penetrated deeply into the religious and philosophical thought of the Eastern Church, has favoured the development of a mystical conception linked up with the metaphysics of sex.

That is one of the great traditions of Russian philosophy. Vladimir Soloviev has developed it with much force and clarity in a very profound study of the meaning and the metaphysics of love. He shows that the sexual differentiation is not bound up obligatorily with the life of the species, and that consequently love—Eros—has a higher meaning, not in the life of the species, but in the very personality of him who loves, in the transfiguration of sex. With the support of the data of history and natural history, he shows that the sexual factor is bound up not with the fact of reproduction in general, but with that of the reproduction of the higher organisms. This is proved by the fact that in the animal world sexual attraction becomes stronger in proportion as the reproduction of the species becomes weaker. In the lower organisms there is a very great power of reproduction at the same time as a complete absence of sexual attraction, arising from the fact that the sexes are not differentiated. In the more highly-developed organisms, the sexual attraction corresponds with a greater sexual differentiation. That attraction, weak at first, increases in the measure in which organic evolution develops and the power of reproduction diminishes, until at the summit, that is, in man, the strongest sexual love may appear despite a total absence of reproduction. So, then, if at the too extremities of life we find, on the one hand, reproduction without sexual love and on the other,

* Taken from an article in Student's World on "An Eastern Orthodox View of Marriage."

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

762

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 1

band, sexual love without reproduction, it clearly appears that these two phenomena are not indissolubly connected, that each has its own significance, and that ultimately, even from the point of view of natural science, reproduction does not appear as the essential aim of sexual life (cf. Troitzky, op. cit., p. 23, 25). The sexual differentiation, sex serving the species, has a profound meaning conformable with the idea of the higher being.

Any union of man and woman in marriage which has as its sole aim procreation (procreatio prolis) must be considered as immoral from the point of view of Christian ethics. That would be, according to Berdiaev, an application of the principle of breeding to human relations.

To marry with the aim of extinguishing the passions (concupiscentiae remedium) is a sacrilegious attitude towards the Eros of marriage.

The marriage which is based upon the physical relationship is only a respectable form of debauchery, man being a blind victim of the sexual energy, and sex being then bound up, not with life, but with death. The Freudian pan-sexualism is true for those who reduce marriage to physiology. Inversely, whoever despises marriage because of its physical element ought to be submitted to psycho-analytical therapeutics and cured of one of the many sexual traumata.

Aspiration to union with the loved one is not conditioned by pleasure. One marries because one loves, because one aspires to unity, because one is seized by the force of Eros, which is aspiration towards fullness of being, towards integrity of life, towards eternity. Physical love cannot be the basis of marriage, because it is in substance only symbolical.

The meaning and the mystery of sex are revealed in the great myth of man, the myth of Androgynon in the Symposium. According to Plato, Eros is the pursuit of wholeness. Aristophanes in that dialogue describes Eros thus: "Of all the gods he is the best friend of man, the helper and the healer of the ills which are the impediment to the happiness of the race... He leads us back to our primitive nature; he endeavours to make only one being out of two, and to repair the misfortune of human nature. Each of us is half a man... and each half is always in search of its other half... Such a necessity proceeds from the fact that our primitive nature was one, and that each of us then formed only a complete whole. To-day we call love the desire and the pursuit of that ancient unity. If we are friends of the god and at peace with him, we shall find and meet with, in our loved ones, the complement of our selves—a happiness which at present falls to the lot of very few. If this return to the primordial state is the most perfect state, then that which brings us closest to it is necessarily the most perfect of present things."

"Man in the thought of God," says Berdiaev, "is an integral, masculine-feminine; solar-tellurian, logical and irrational being. And it is only as an integral being that he is chaste, wise, sophical in his fullness. As a divided, torn sexual being, he is not chaste, not wise, destined to disharmony, to the urge of the passions, to non-satisfaction. Original sin is bound up above all with this division of the sexes, with the fall of Androgynon, of man considered as an integral being, with the loss of human virginity and the formation of bad masculinity and bad femininity."

ILLITERACY AND EDUCATION.

(BY CYRIL MODAK.)

The question of illiteracy in India has rightly exercised the minds of Indian and British thinkers alike. Indian patriots and bureaucratic officials have alike suggested methods for raising the percentage of literacy among the millions of this country. There is a vague cognizance of this problem in local self-governing bodies. But it is taking them an incredibly long time to realize that simultaneously with primary instruction there ought to be some scheme for adult education as they have in Russia. For liquidation of illiteracy as well as for general efficiency our educational programme must take into account both the future and present generation of citizens. The parents must be educated so that they may co-operate in the education of their children and join the aggressive campaign against illiteracy. We are particularly fortunate in this age to suffer from no dearth of methods. Thus, methods for adult education can be found if the initiative and support are forthcoming from Municipalities and District Councils and through them from the various charitable trusts that exist everywhere. What with the radio which can carry the lesson of one teacher to ten thousand listening classes all over the land, and the cinematograph which can offer the wealth of concrete and vivid illustration to hundreds at a time, there ought to be no serious difficulty in the way of mass education. In many instances the educational work among adults will have to hinge on some sort of vocational training. Mere literacy, not being a marketable commodity, will have to be allied to something of definite value economically, if it is to find favour with adults busy keeping the wolf from the door.

Those who cannot read and write, ought to be taught reading and writing but those who can, ought to be able to get good reading material. The upkeep of up-to-date libraries in charge of trained, courteous, and honest librarians becomes an important item of responsibility for civic organisations. It is disappointing to find many a municipal library ill-furnished and ill-kept in the hands of some half-taught relation of a member, ignorant alike of library methods and common civility.

As long as our teachers and our head-masters continue mechanically to weigh their success against examinations they will postpone the advent of civic efficiency. The measurement of character cannot be overlooked in any estimate of educational success. It is incumbent on schools to nourish and train moral qualities in every student who comes within their gates so that he may have the moral incentive to use all his powers for the service of his fellowmen. Teachers need not court disfavour by taking part flagrantly in politics. But they can prove their patriotism by spending their energy in the class-room and on the playground, at places of meeting and in private conversation to imprint on every single student, year to year, the character of a true and respected citizen. If we have fewer brilliant examinees it will do the country no harm as long as every one of them enters life with the determination to make his high principles felt in an unscrupulous world. We need men with character enough to keep personal feelings out of public matters, to consider civic responsibilities as a sacred trust, and to mete out equal justice to friend and foe. We look to our schools and to our teachers to send out for the service of their motherland men and women with keen mental and moral vision so that they may be able to see clearly in order to act effectively as citizens of this no mean commonwealth.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com
1936

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

763

INDIA'S DEPRESSED CLASSES.*

(By HORACE G. ALEXANDER.)

There has been a good deal of discussion in missionary and other such circles following the declaration of Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, one of the leaders of the Depressed Classes in India, that he was renouncing the Hindu faith, and that he was advising his followers to adhere to whatever religion might seem most likely to lift them out of their pit of misery and degradation.

It is best to be frank; and I am bound to say that when I heard of this, I said to myself: "Here is a new move of Dr. Ambedkar's to increase his political power and influence." Perhaps that judgment was unfair and uncharitable; but I still feel uneasy about the whole business. I know Dr. Ambedkar, as a man I like him. When a man has broken the chains of slavery as he has done, one is bound to respect him. In India, too often the strength of a political party is measured by the number of the religious community that it purports to represent. If Dr. Ambedkar honestly believes that the fifty millions of the Depressed Classes can best be helped by the formation of a great separate religio-political party, of which he might be leader, he is entitled to that opinion. But others are entitled to doubt it. The fact is that the millions of Hindu and Moslem peasants and workers, yes, even the millions of South Indian Christians, stand to gain by just the same social and economic reforms that the Depressed Classes need. It will be tragic if these millions are lined up behind several different and conflicting parties. The result will be that vested interests will still have things all their own way.

And in any case, though in community-ridden India this political and social issue is inevitably linked up with communalism, it has little or nothing to do with religion. Or rather, religion ought to be, not a cause of bitter conflict between deluded groups of poor peasants or town workers, but the real driving force that unites all in the struggle for justice for brotherhood and for human well-being. As an experienced Anglican missionary, Rev. F. F. Gledstone, observes (writing in The East and West Review), "It would be most deplorable if the souls of fifty million people should seem to be set up for auction, with the various faiths outbidding one another."

That the Depressed Classes of India need help from whatever quarter it may come, no one can deny. And to many Western Christians it might seem that true conversion to Christianity would be the natural first step towards their complete emancipation. Indeed, in parts of South India just such a process has been and is happening. As Mr. Gledstone points out, again and again

"There has been some outstanding man among the humbler classes who has had true spiritual experience and a deep longing after God: he has searched after God and at last found in Christianity the God who satisfied his needs. He has drawn after him relatives and neighbours; religion, like most other things in India, is essentially social, and no good man would be satisfied till he had shared what he had found with his kinsfolk. Those of the same social status in their own and adjoining villages have seen among the Christians better health, greater cleanliness, educational progress, and then as they looked deeper, joy, love, purer worship, higher morality, something at least of spiritual uplift."

But, alas, that is only one side of the picture; and Mr. Gledstone is too honest to omit the other. If Dr. Ambedkar and other members of the Depressed Classes were invited to become Christians, very likely "they would be ready to read the Bible or listen to expositions of Christian teaching, and they would be ready to praise Christian ethics and the spiritual teaching of the Gospels, but—there is plenty of lofty teaching about love and righteousness in the sacred books of the Hindus; how does it work out in practice? And the shame and the sadness for us Christians is that there are places, alas many places, in the parts of India best known to some of these leaders where Christianity does not seem to work. Out-castes who have become Christians do not appear to be any better than those who have not. It can be said there: "We want our people to be clean, but these Christians are dirty. We want our people to give up drink, but these Christians drink. We want our people to learn morality, but these Christians are not more moral than others. We want our people to be united, but these Christians are full of parties and factions. What good would it do to us if we did become Christians?" It is a great call to the Christian Church to self-examination and repentance. Christ draws all men, but Christianity represented by us Christians does not draw."

*From The Wayfarer—London July 1933.

And there is one another side of the picture that we must not neglect. As I read Mr. Gandhi's periodical called Harijan week by week, and get intimate pictures of the heroic and ceaseless struggle he and his Hindu followers up and down are engaged upon, working both with and for the Depressed Classes in the struggle for emancipation, I realize that it would be a crime to do anything in antagonism to those efforts. Mr. Gandhi constantly preaches that just because the Hindus have been guilty of imposing "untouchability" on these millions of their neighbours, it is they who must especially do penance for this great wrong. Wherever it is possible, one would like to think that Christian workers are supporting and co-operating with these Hindu servants of their people. It is well also to remember that for every Indian "untouchable" who would claim to be a follower of Ambedkar there must be ten—perhaps a hundred—who would claim to be followers of Gandhi. And what of those who claim to be followers of Jesus Christ? The work that needs to be done is so great, so difficult, that all who really care about emancipation ought to work together, whatever name or sign they bear. Let us pray for a united effort.

WOMEN IN HINDU LAW.*

(By G. V. DESHMUKH)

The path of Legislature to apply the Hindu Law to suit the modern times is made unnecessarily complex by learned arguments. If an attempt is made to remove only the worse features, than it is piecemeal, and contrary to established principles of jurisprudence; and comprehensive codification is suggested. On the other hand, any such suggestion is regarded as radical, revolutionary and as an attempt to uproot ancient Hindu Law, culture and tradition.

Better is not uncommonly the enemy of the Good. And as what is according to the principles of Hinduism is more likely to be accepted by the Hindu Community, I am directing your attention to the position of Hindu woman as mother, daughter and wife etc., in relation to my Bill before the Assembly.

The position of the Hindu women in the Hindu Family is perplexing. In the old scriptures and law books the highest sentiments are mixed with common expressions. Is there any explanation? The modern method in science and research if applied to this *Circular letter in explanation of his Women's Rights to Property Bill to Members of the Legislative Assembly.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

764
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 1

very respectable subject is not likely to be fruitless. I am therefore making an attempt to see light in darkness.

In the family the primary relations with respect to women are three: those of mother, daughter, and wife. I propose to deal with these relations in the family according to the views of the old law-givers.

Mother:—The mother's position with respect to distribution of wealth in the family is incontestable. This is in accordance with the high position the mother occupies in Hindu Religion. She is greater than the father and the preceptor. At the time of the division, either during the lifetime of the father or after his death, she gets equal share with the sons. From Yajñavalkya (16.124) by every law-giver this position is maintained. Vayas accords the same right of equal shares even to childless wives of the father; and Brihaspati gives equal shares even to stepmothers (25.64).

Daughter:—Coming to the daughter's position no modern can surpass them in their natural and noble sentiments about the daughter. Manu the oldest law-giver of the Hindus pronounced:—The son is oneself. The daughter is equal to the son, when oneself is living as the daughter how can any one else inherit, (1.130). Yajñavalkya says:—The daughter and her son are equal to a legitimate son. (129). The same is expressed by Narada (13.50, 18.50), "Daughter is equally his issue; she also prolongs his line." Brihaspati "she is derived from his limbs. How can any body else take the father's wealth when she is there." (25.55, 56). All these law-givers are of the opinion that when a daughter is living, in default of the son she inherits and no other can inherit the father's estate.

It may be pointed out for the information of the non-Hindu that for purpose of inheritance a classification was made of the daughters as:—

1. Appointed—Putrika.
2. Married.
3. Unmarried.

The first was based on religion and the others evidently on equity. But the old law-givers seem broad-minded enough not to attach any importance to the religious distinction.

Brihaspati and Parashar (15. 57) do not trouble whether she is appointed or not. They give her the right of inheritance from the father. The ceremony of the appointment itself seem to have lost importance even in Manu's time, and a daughter could be appointed merely by the intention (Manu). But the distinction based on equity was taken up and nearly all the lawgivers give preference to unmarried, and unprovided over married ones. This right of parental estate was in the absence of the son, but one will carry a very wrong impression of these law-givers if it is thought that they left the daughters at the mercy of the relatives. Manu who has been so much maligned is the greatest protagonist of equal shares. On the death of the mother all uterine brothers and sisters, the sahodaras and bhaginis, divide the mother's estate equally (1. 192). Even when the father is alive the mother's property belongs to her issue, her Praja which means both sons as well as daughters, (1. 195). Deval also is of same opinion that mother's property is common to both her sons and maiden daughters.

But what about the father's property?

I will subsequently show that women's property, the stridhan of the Hindu woman was not inconsiderable as is supposed in Hindu law today; otherwise equal inheritance of daughter and son, and the residue in the mother's estate after paying off the mother's debt, in the mother's insignificant estate would be meaningless;—but to come back to the father's property!

Brothers were enjoined under threat of degradation, more obligatory than the civil law, to give a quarter share of theirs to their sisters, Bhaginis (Manu 1.118). Vishnu even suggested shares proportionate to the share to the son's shares.

In the old days there might be some justification for some of the commentators to interpret this quarter share as in lieu of marriage expense, although healthy commentators were not wanting like Medhithi and Vijnaneshar the author of Mitakshara which is the alleged law for many of the Hindu in India, who condemn the practice of substituting marriage expenses for the definitely expressed mandatory quarter share.

PROBLEMS OF MEN AND WOMEN STUDENTS IN INDIA.*

(By E. SAMBAYYA.)

About eighteen months ago, a big sensation was caused in Nagpur by a case of double suicide. A Parsee young woman and a Hindu youth, both students of the local college, committed suicide by drowning themselves in a lake, as their friendship was disapproved and marriage disallowed. Again, the three sisters of a Calcutta family left a note behind them, saying that they were going to commit suicide by swallowing opium in order to relieve the anxiety of their father, who had to find large sums of money for their dowry in order to marry them off.

These two sad incidents are fairly representative of some of the difficulties that confront the Indian students today. Undoubtedly it is in the realm of friendship and marriage that most of their problems lie. The difficulties are due to the fact that India is still in the throes of adjusting itself to new ideologies and practices, and that young folk are usually quick at the uptake as compared with their seniors at home. The youth of India today represents a generation of men and women which is called upon to perform the difficult task of assimilating the best in Western civilization while conserving that which is of abiding value in its national culture. Thus the problem resolves itself into a problem of the discrimination of values.

Co-education is very common in India nowadays. There is a great desire on the part of men and women students to know and to understand one another, and to contract friendships which may or may not ripen into marriage. It is the fear of gossip and criticism that drives the young folks to resort to clandestine methods. Thus, while healthy companionship between sexes is advocated in theory, it is not allowed in practice. Another instance of the clash of youth with the older generation is in the interpretation of "personal freedom". The parents of girls are willing to let their daughters study in colleges, are ready to give them a liberal education, but do not let their children exercise freedom in choosing a partner.

The rise in the standard of living, and the acute unemployment in the country, have been responsible for the growing disinclination among young men with regard to marriage. A number of young men refuse to marry because they cannot afford it. The result is that there are numbers of young women in the country today who wish to get married but cannot find husbands. The dowry system, which has by no means disappeared, is responsible to some extent for bringing about this situation. It is tragic that our young men and women feel impotent when they are face to face with evils such as the dowry system and the caste system.

* The Student World Geneva.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

765

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to—

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mehsana, Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harli (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	" 25,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (Mill Agent, Ahmedabad.)
Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhalilal Daljibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. L., (Managing Agent, Alombic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)
Seth Pransukhlal Maratli (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)
Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)
Mr. Krishnarai Vitthalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 4 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 6 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 4 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuoria
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

Bombay. realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

766

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 1

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches:—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agent:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE Central Bank of India, Ltd. SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. FOCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad " "	Dondalcha " "
Tasgaon " "	Nandurbar " "
Satara " "	Shirpur " "
Kirloskarwadi " "	Shahada " "
Shirala " "	Sakri " "
Koregaon " "	Sindkheda " "
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon " "	Satana " "
Ahmednagar " "	Kalwan " "
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panhala)
Paigar " "	Kalol " "
Kalyan " "
Akshi (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS

Sir Chunilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kala,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeekar
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

767

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJANI BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJANI DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—

1. The Svadeshi, Yusuf Buildings, Churchgate Street, Fort, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.
3. The Mysore Emporium, Kitab Mahal, Hornby Road, Fort, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY AUGUST 8, 1936. No. 49

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

The Late Mr. J. D. Gandhi.
A Post Office Circular.
H. E. Mr. Rao on the Reforms.
The Spanish Deadlock.
Widow Remarriage and Property.
A Willingdon Job.
Students' Charter.
The Singapore Reform.
Buddhism in India.

Sir Shanmukham Chetty on the New Constitution.
The Sind Observer.
Modern Ideas in the Philippines.
Widow Marriage and Hindu
Society.
Wives in Hindu Law.
Caste in Modern Hinduism.
A Plea for the Middle-aged.

NOTES

The Late Mr. J. D. Gandhi:—We deeply regret to record the death of Mr. J. D. Gandhi of Messrs. Tata Sons, at the age of 76, last Monday. He seems to have been in his usual good health till that night when he suddenly passed away. In him we lose one who for many years was a good friend and to whose encouragement and support the Reformer is much indebted. We convey to his family our deepest sympathy.

A Post Office Circular:—Some time back a correspondent sent us a circular issued by the Director-General of Posts and Telegraphs stating that no articles should be transmitted by post, bearing certain stamped impressions or photographs or writings. These were: exhortations to boycott British or any other class of goods or to carry out any other form of boycott; portraits of any prominent leader of the civil disobedience movement; words like "Swatantra India" or others meaning separated India; and such other matter manifestly and specifically intended to further the civil disobedience movement. The circular seemed to us inopportune and unnecessary at the present time—it was dated 28th May of the current year—and we thought it proper to refer to the Director-General before commenting on it. The Director-General in reply says that the notice is identical with one issued on the 16th August 1930 and repeated on the 5th May 1932. It was repeated this year also in order to remind postal officials and the public that the instructions contained therein had not lapsed. As regards the prohibition of slogans for the boycott of goods, as Mr. Bewoor points out, the Postal Service is not only a national but an international service, and it is not desirable to allow such phrases on the covers of articles transmitted through it. Exhortations to "Buy Swadeshi" are expressly declared in the notice under reference not to come within the prohibition.

As regards the use of photographs, the Director-General is issuing instructions that no action should be taken in pursuance of the particular clause of the order for the present, in recognition of the fact that the civil disobedience movement is not being actively pursued at present. With reference to the last general clause empowering Postal officials to select to the Dead Letter Office articles on which are inscribed words which they consider objectionable, instructions have already been issued that all doubtful cases should be referred to higher authority before action is taken under it. The Director-General assures us that there need not be, therefore, any apprehension regarding the possibility of abuse of the powers given to the staff in this respect.

H. E. Mr. Rao on the Reforms:—The acting Governor of the Central Provinces, Mr. Raghavendra Rao, in the course of a speech some days ago advised Indians to over-look the denials and fix their minds on the concessions to their claims to self-government in the new Constitution. Unlike Sir Shanmukham Chetty who sought to support this course by reference to historical precedents, Mr. Rao recommended it as a commonsense proposition dictated by circumstances. Both Sir Shanmukham and Mr. Rao, it is interesting to note, began their political careers as Congressmen. Mr. Rao is still in externals a Congressite—dhoti, coat, Gandhi cap, all in khaddar,—conspicuous among his British staff; while Sir Shanmukham, Dewan of the most orthodox and conservative Prince in the country, prefers the European costume, hat, boot and tie. That is by the way. Mr. Rao's method is that of the fabled power of the swan to separate milk from water. This may be possible to those who look on the new constitution as an adulterated mixture of autocracy, bureaucracy and democracy, in which the last is bound to come to the top in the long run. But not to those to whom the new constitution is a repudiation of the supreme end to which Indian history points as India's national destiny. The Government of India Act is the ancient maxim of 'divide and rule' embodied in a statute. The country is split up into a number of watertight provinces in the name of autonomy; the people are divided in airtight electorates in the name of protection of minorities; in the States, the Princes are alienated from their people in order to fit them into a strange kind

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

770

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 8

realpatidar.com

of federation. How is it possible to work this hotch-potch arrangement so as to advance national interests, the foremost of which is solidarity? Because this is impossible, the Government of India from the time of Warren Hastings developed on the lines of a strong central Government. What is not generally understood is that the elimination of the Government of India as the central Government transfers the political centre of gravity from Delhi to London. The success of the Hoare scheme—inspired by the same ideas as the Hoare-Laval pact—will be a disastrous set-back to the whole course of Indian history. If it fails, there will be a chance of our being able to raise on its ruins a stable structure in conformity with the synthetic genius of the country.

The Spanish Deadlock :—The revolt against the republican regime in Spain, has developed into a movement for the restoration of the monarchy. Prince Juan, third son and heir presumptive of the ex-King, has arrived at the headquarters of the insurgents. The Government as well as the rebels claim victories. Every message claiming that the Republican Government has the situation under control, is followed by news of the capture of some important position by the rebels. Other European countries are watching developments in Spain. France and Russia are apprehensive of Italian and German help to the rebel forces; and Italy and Germany fear that France and Russia are supporting the republican government. Mr. Lawrence A. Fernsworth, writing in the July Foreign Affairs analysed the various parties and forces at work in Spain and asked: "Can the Republic weather the storm? Can it ride through the revolutionary waves that from all sides beat upon it, coming to a safe harbour at last?" His answer is, Yes and No. "No one who has observed the determined persistence of the revolutionary forces," he writes, "their resurgence after repeated repressions, can doubt that the revolutionary tide is deep and strong...On the other hand, no one who observes the earnestness with which another class of men are bent upon creating a new Republican Spain, will reject the possibility—and the hope—that in the end they will triumph." The possibility of the triumph of the anti-Republican are largely due to the fact that the Spanish character is much too individualistic to accept either Socialism or Communism as a guiding principle. Then, again, the Spaniard is a mystic. At the fourth International Conference of the National Confederation of Labour held in Saragosa in May last, it was declared that "religion has a primordial origin and objective .. to give unity to that spiritual inquietude which the investigation into the beginning and the end of things, closely bound to being and not-being, to the life and death of things, is capable of awakening in man." The Spanish Communists do not aim at abolishing religion as in Soviet Russia. They are for religious reform. "If religions were cleansed of its parasitical elements, the religious orders and the clergy, there would disappear those causes of friction which exist between religion and the people." Another fact making for the opposition to the Republic, is that Spain's most glorious achievements and memories are bound up with Monarchy.

Widow Remarriage and Property :—We publish this week the second and concluding part of Sir Manubhai Mehta's able discussion of social reform problems, in particular marriage problems, in his presidential address at the meeting of the Bombay Social Reform Association on the anniversary of the passing of the Widow Marriage Act. Sir Manubhai starting from the Widow Marriage Act has covered almost the entire field of Hindu marriage reform—raising of the marriage age, inter-caste marriage, the question of unequal marriages and the dowry problem. Dealing with the position of widows after marriage Sir Manubhai expresses the view that a widow must sever old ties before she enters on another marriage. He accordingly suggests that her interest in the property of her deceased husband should terminate and that her children by him should go under the guardianship of the deceased man's relatives. It is hard to believe that the relatives will take better care of the children than their mother though she may remarry. Sir Manubhai does not apparently attach much importance to the fact that under the Widow Marriage Act, a widow who remarries loses her use of her first husband's property while a widow who does not marry but is unfaithful to him, is left in the full enjoyment of his estate. This is an important reason for changing the Act. The Mysore Bill now before the Representative Assembly, provides that the remarried widow continues to enjoy possession of the deceased husband's estate. Unless the man expressly forbade remarriage, the woman is left in possession of his property and as guardian of his children. The Mysore Bill seems a more equitable measure and we should like its provisions to be adopted in British India as well.

A Willingdon Job :—A few months before he was due to vacate office, Lord Willingdon created a new post called Secretary of the Executive Council and appointed his Private Secretary, whom he had brought with him from Canada, Mr. Eric Meville, to it. One of the first things one heard of on the accession of the new Viceroy, Lord Linlithgow, was that Sir Eric Meville was going on short leave to England. As he had returned from that country only a few months previously, having been sent there to learn the work of the Cabinet Secretary in preparation for the new office, the public at once understood that Lord Linlithgow, about whose antipathy to the Willingdonian regime stories are current, did not care to have this nominee of his predecessor as the custodian of the transactions of his Cabinet; and it surmised that Sir Eric will not return from his leave to resume charge of the post. This is what happened. Sir Eric has been appointed principal Private Secretary to

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

771

one of the brothers of the King, the Duke of York. His Royal Highness is heir presumptive to the British throne but, at present, his duties are more or less of a ceremonial and humdrum character. Sir Eric is most unlikely to have accepted the job if he had a chance of retaining his place in the hub of affairs in this country. It is now announced that the post itself will be in abeyance and that the acting incumbent will revert to his normal duties in the political Department. The Government of India has all along managed to do without a Secretary to the Executive Council of the Governor-General. Under the new Act it will have much less to do than at present as the autonomous provinces will relieve it of many of its functions. The creation of the new appointment at this time was without justification and Lord Linlithgow has done well to relieve the Indian Treasury of the cost of the Secretary and his office, which can not be less than a lakh of rupees a year.

Students' Charter :—A conference of students was held in Bombay last week end at which a document styled "the Students' Charter of Rights and Obligations" was adopted. The Conference, though it disavowed all connection with the recent Matriculation demonstration, was obviously much under the influence of the emotions aroused thereby. Although the Charter is said to be one of rights and obligations, we have not been able to find a single item in it which is in the nature of an obligation. Apparently, a student's obligation is discharged by being a student. Parents and guardians must consider themselves under an obligation to students for their consenting to be students. The term "student" includes infants over two or three years of age in Montessori schools as well as men and women of twenty and twenty-five in post-graduates. It is not easy to discover a basis of collective rights or obligations in this heterogeneous group in vastly different stages of brain and bodily development. In India at the present day a very small proportion of children attend schools; a very large proportion of parents send their children to school at considerable sacrifice. To the mature mind the most urgent problem in the educational sphere is how to get all children of school-going age into schools. The so-called rights of the small minority who are fortunate enough to be enrolled in some educational institution is not an urgent one, if indeed there is any such problem. We print this week a short summary of Mr. C. Rajagopalachariar's address to Madras college students. Mr. Rajagopalachariar is a Congressman of the orthodox school. His admonition to students to "observe strict discipline, discarding all bad taste and bad manners" is a timely one. It is also significant as a recognition of the fact that students' demonstrations do little to advance the political cause of a country. As a matter of fact, left to themselves few students are anxious to interrupt their studies by indulging in activities which achieve nothing beyond attracting public notice.

The Singapore Reform :—We have received the first number of a English monthly devoted to social reform published at Singapore. In an editorial on the need for such a journal in Singapore, we read: "The 'Reform' declares, as its very name implies, a crusade against all superstition that disgrace the Tamil Samuthayam. It stands for rationalism. Its advent in our midst is none too soon. An irrational and even ignoble sway of custom and convention is allowed to reign supreme in our society. The cloak of religion is now not only the mask for the predatory and pillaging parasitical priests of all our castes, but is also panoply of all tyranny and hypocrisy that freely prey on our social life and needs. Tyranny and havoc stalk in the name of religion at all times and in all places." It would seem that the new journal takes its inspiration from the so-called Self-Respect Movement in Southern India, which considers it derogatory to one's self-respect to believe in religion. Our Singapore friend will find if he enquires into the subject that so far from religion, being the cause of social stagnation it has always been the inspirer of progress in India and elsewhere. India expects its children overseas to think for themselves and to contribute to national progress by the widening of their outlook resulting from their experience outside this country. It will be a pity if they have nothing more to tell us than what they gather of happenings in the homeland. The Reform can make itself a valuable source of information to people in India if it would devote some of its pages to the description of the reactions to the Malayan environment of Indian society and culture which Indians in Singapore have carried with them.

Buddhism in India :—Commenting on Mrs. Suzuki's statement in the Young East that the Buddhism taught in Hinayana is thoroughly individualistic whereas Mahayana is noted for its doctrine of Parinamana, that is, turning over of one's own merits to others, Mr. P. P. Siriwardhana writes in the Mahabodhi: "Sri Rahula Sankrityayana Thera has told us that one of the causes of the disappearance of Buddhism from India was the introduction of Vajrayana. Wherever any doctrine foreign to the spirit of the true Dhamma was grafted on to the main body of Dhamma, the Buddhists began to show signs of deterioration with the deplorable result of Dhamma being submerged in forms and ceremonies utterly useless either for the emancipation of the lust-ridden mind or for the healthy and happy life of mankind." As evidence of the zeal of the Hinayanists of Ceylon in the cause of their Dhamma, the writer cites a passage from the "History of Indian Shipping and Maritime Activities" by Radhakamal Mukherjee stating that a number of Missions including monks and nuns sailed from Ceylon to China in the fifth century and that it was a group of nuns from Ceylon who established the Bikkhuni order in China.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 8

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, August 8, 1936.

SIR SHANMUKHAM CHETTY ON THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

Madras papers publish the full text of the address which Sir Shanmukham Chetty, Dewan of Cochin, delivered at the Maharaja's College, Ernakulam, on "Parliamentary Democracy and India." As was appropriate to the occasion—it was the Jubilee Memorial Lecture—and the audience, Sir Shanmukham's address was largely devoted to the theory of his subject. But it was not altogether an abstract disquisition. "Though it can not by any means be contended," he maintained, "that the new constitution has given us the fullest political freedom, yet I am of opinion that it would give the fullest opportunity to work out our destinies." If it does that, "fullest political freedom" may be left to come in its own time. The contention of those who are opposed to it, that the new constitution does not give a fair chance of working out our destinies, Sir Shanmukham himself, after laying down his broad proposition, immediately indicated its qualifications. "If the new constitution is worked in a spirit of goodwill and co-operation, it will in practice result in the establishment of a Parliamentary Democracy in India. If the Indian Ministers grasp the realities of the situation and face the problems of Government in a practical manner without being merely visionaries and if the Governor-General and the Provincial Governors realise the supreme responsibility that lies on their shoulders in guiding the Indian Ministers, the numerous safeguards would become dead letters and we would have what is called Dominion Status in India." Dominion Status, as we have repeatedly said, is not the crown and consummation of India's destiny. But for the moment we let it pass. Sir Shanmukham's whole argument, as stated in the sentences quoted above, rests on a series of question-begging propositions. Are the method and provisions of the constitution such as to evoke goodwill and the spirit of co-operation among Indians who are called upon to work it? What are the 'realities' of the situation which Indian Ministers should grasp in a 'practical' manner without being mere visionaries? These are the questions which Sir Shanmukham should have answered. Instead, he left them unanswered and proceeded to establish his claim on the analogy of the British constitution.

In the British constitution, the Dewan said, there are extraordinary powers vested in the Crown which corresponds to some of the safeguards in the new Indian Constitution. "No one has contended," he added, "that the existence of these extraordinary powers in the Crown made the British Constitution less democratic." He forgot that the Crown in the British Constitution does not represent "the personal and individual discretion" of the Governor-General and Governors in the new Government of India Act. Sir Shanmukham has perhaps not come across a recent authoritative repudiation of the right of the King to act independently of his Ministers. When King Edward VIII held a reception of foreign representatives on the conclusion of the funeral obsequies of his father, it was noticed that His Majesty showed more attention to the German Foreign Minister than to the guests from other countries. This gave rise to concern in Paris, and Sir John Simon felt called upon to broadcast in French the constitutional position of the British Sovereign. "In years gone by," he declared, "the Kings of England exercised great personal power. One of our writers has aptly remarked that the King of England in his relations with his Ministers has kept three 'rights'—the right to be informed, the right to advise and the right to warn. Nowadays the King always acts on the advice of his Ministers who themselves are responsible to Parliament." Sir Shanmukham will find much revealing material on this question in Guedella's two volumes, "The Queen and Mr. Gladstone." Also in the relations of the Asquith Cabinet with King Edward VII over its Parliament Bill and the proposal to appoint Indians to the Executive Council of the Governor-General.

There are many other things in Sir Shanmukham's address which are of more than doubtful accuracy. He does not seem to have understood the significance of the recent accession to power of the Blum Cabinet, the present Government of France. If he had, he would have found it necessary to modify greatly his observations on the French Parliamentary system, especially the one about the personnel of Cabinets remaining the same though the Cabinets themselves change very often. The fact is that the precedents on which Sir Shanmukham based most of his thesis, are, or are fast becoming, out of date. Free Trade, the Gold Standard, Cabinet solidarity, sheet-anchors of the British Constitution for over a century, have gone by the board. "We are all Socialists now," bemoaned Sir William Harcourt fifty years ago when old-age pensions, sick insurance not to mention unemployment doles, were beyond the wildest dreams of reformers. Sir Shanmukham, at a loss to define 'fundamentals' on which political parties should, according to him, be agreed, fixes upon belief in democracy and private property. He is the Dewan of the progressive state of Cochin which he would hardly be if he had himself faith in democracy as the sole form of government under which a people can prosper. Then, again, Sir Shanmukham seems to have a profound belief in the efficacy of the British party system—a belief which is not shared by Mr. Baldwin. When the National Government was formed, Mr. Baldwin heaved a sigh of relief at the thought that there would be no more "party dog-fights." As for private property, opponents of the Congress should be profoundly

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1938
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

773

grateful to Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru for having persented them with this "slogan" when they were at a loss for an election cry. They have fastened on it like limpets and, though the Pandit has repeatedly declared that political freedom is the immediate object and that Socialism is only a matter for study, and though they know well that other Congress leaders have publicly dissented from the Pandit's opinions, they persist in making out that the Congress stands for abolition of private property, religion and family life! Though Soviet Russia is the only country in which private property has been formally abolished, in most countries, including Great Britain, it is now but a shadow of what it used to be. It is not necessary to abolish private property as an Institution if we change our understanding of it as an Idea.

Sir Shanmukham told his audience that the great thing in democracy was initiative in the hands of popular Ministers; and that for the first time it is conferred on Indian Ministers by the new constitution. The right of veto vested in the Governors and the Governor-General does not, in his opinion, take away from the efficacy of the power of initiative. He forgets that the veto is over and above a number of prohibitions both as regards the sphere and the scope of the Minister's powers. Moreover, it is not so much the actual exercise of the veto, as the psychological effect of its existence as a check on his initiative, which would hamper the freedom of the Minister. Such freedom as he may have, will be by sufferance of the Governor-General or Governor and not as of right. As we remarked at an early stage of the discussion, the success of a Minister in the new constitution will depend either on his complete acquiescence in the Governor's wishes or on his ability to throw dust in the eyes of that functionary as regards his own. Sir Shanmukham's address is a clever piece of special pleading for the new constitution in the garb of an academic lecture.

Mr. Amritlal Seth's Statement.—The following is a literal translation of Mr. Amritlal Seth's statement—"Why I did not go to Karachi? Why I am not standing as a candidate for the Assembly? Such questions and inquiries are being made and it seems to me that I should once for all explain my position. By doing so the curtain between the public and myself will be removed and at the same time the weight on my conscience will be removed. There are allegations of certain impurities in my private life. I am not going to defend these allegations, because they are true to a great extent. I have admitted these charges before my friends and to-day I am admitting them before the public. I am sincerely sorry for them and I am to-day declaring my repentance publicly. In these circumstances to-day it is my duty to disappear from the public eye. I am the Managing Director of the Ranpur Institution. I have already given up all control over the "Foolchab" (a weekly paper published in Ranpur). From to-day I am in no way responsible for the policy, publication, propaganda of this paper as well as the activities of the Ranpur Institution. I am also the Managing Director of the Bombay Institution. I desire to retire from it as early as possible and I am taking all steps for that. But "Janma Bhumi" will carry on its work as usual. Thus I am retiring from all public life. I am taking leave of the public."

THE SIND OBSERVER.

Of the three parties to a modern newspaper which has the dominant voice—the public, the proprietor or the editor? A combination of any two of these is strong enough to quash the third. A popular editor can defy a proprietor to a considerable extent. A proprietor who has his public behind him, can exasperate any editor into resigning from the editorship or carrying out his instructions. An editor working in sympathy with his newspaper proprietor can thrust any paper on the reading public. Of the three, the public is the least conscious in normal times of its two collaborators. It buys its paper each day and there is an end to it. But editor and proprietor are always conscious, and painfully so, of the presence of each other and, in the background, of the reading public. It is the fear of losing readers that keeps the two in a state of armed neutrality, but neutrality all the same. In the case of the Sind Observer there seems to have been no peace and little understanding between proprietor and editor. Mr. K. Poonniah, the editor whose recent dismissal has roused public interest in the rights of journalists throughout the country, has issued his statement. His supporters have reiterated his position times out of number. Pandit Jawaharlal has taken up cudgels on his behalf. Now Seth Fakirjee Cowasji, Chairman of the Board of Directors and chief financier of the Observer, has published a long explanation giving the other point of view, why Mr. Poonniah was sent off summarily from the paper. And the Karachi Municipality, after considering a resolution to boycott the Sind Observer, has decided to leave the matter to be settled by Mr. Poonniah and Mr. Fakirjee. So far as one can look into the future, one might conclude that Mr. Fakirjee is in for a hard time; Mr. Poonniah has had the doubtful pleasure of becoming a public hero by ruining the patient work of sixteen years and the Sind public is left without a newspaper which it can implicitly trust. No newspaper, it is true, tells its reading public everything but every one of them thrives on the faith of its readers that it gives an accurate picture of events. The the Poonniah-Fakirjee controversy has left the Karachi public more sophisticated than it was before.

To an outsider the details of the dispute as revealed by the full statements of the parties concerned are disillusioning. When the first short reports were received in Bombay most readers concluded that Seth Fakirjee was a very conservative businessman who had been led by an impetuous editor into extremist paths; that Mr. Poonniah was an editor anxious to fill his newspaper with matter which would be read with interest by his public but was hampered by a nervous proprietor; and that both were incompatible temperaments who had at last decided to part. The details tell a somewhat different story. There are many points on which Seth Fakirjee is silent but Mr. Poonniah is eloquent. And there are a few incidents in which Seth Fakirjee's narrative supplements Mr. Poonniah's story. But on the main issues there is agreement. The facts seem to me to be, that Seth Fakirjee was fed up with journalism and had asked Mr. Poonniah to negotiate for the sale of the Sind Observer, that in the meantime he was seeking to run it as economically as possible, that Mr. Poonniah found this economy irksome and unjustified in view of a monthly profit of Rs. 3,000/—, that he endured it in the hope that it was only temporary, and that the failure of negotiations made it impossible for the two to continue as proprietor and editor. It was only a question of whether they were to part in a friendly manner or as enemies.

If I were Mr. Fakirjee, there is no editor whom I would more dislike to have with me than

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

774
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 8

Mr. Poonniah. If I were Mr. Poonniah, Mr. Fakirjee is the last man I should choose as proprietor. What surprises one is not why Mr. Poonniah and Seth Fakirjee parted company on July 20th but how they put up with each other all these months. Mr. Poonniah, it would appear from a letter written by him to Seth Fakirjee and published by the latter, was not satisfied with his salary—it had suffered a Rs. 100 cut under Seth Fakirjee's management—on the Sind Observer, and had been threatening to leave the paper for some time and to start a half-anna daily with some ten others. If this was his intention, Mr. Poonniah could not have chosen a better time or a better way of leaving the Sind Observer, though it seems a little unfair to that paper and to Seth Fakirjee. It also serves to explain why Mr. Poonniah who had put up with many humiliating conditions in the conduct of the Observer, should find it difficult to accept the instruction from Seth Fakirjee that only Associated Press news should be given about Pandit Jawaharlal, Congress, Socialist and States Peoples' Conference as well as speeches not of a propagandist nature.

The procedure adopted, for instance, of communicating Seth Fakirjee's ideas through an Assistant Editor was a thousand times more offensive and derogatory to the dignity of the editor. The restriction on the use of photographs—"The Editor was told," writes Seth Fakirjee, "that those who desired their photos to appear must pay for the block and for the space, as was asked by other newspaper....Photographs of individual persons or gatherings of persons shall not be given without the permission of the managing director,"—made the position of the editor intolerable unless he was also the Managing Director, and most ludicrous of all was Seth Fakirjee's instruction regarding reports. It removed the need for any editor but a dummy one. "As little publicity as possible should be given to any individual member either in the Municipal Corporation or any other body, private or public, including the Legislative Assembly. I would suggest," says Seth Fakirjee, "that instead of giving the names of the persons bringing in resolutions or amendments, it may be said that several resolutions and or amendments were brought before the meeting as under, on which discussion followed. During the discussion it was opined by several Corporators as under."

All these changes would reduce a newspaper to the level of a business letter. Mr. Fakirjee does not seem to have imbibed the principle that names make news. He has now apparently realised how impossible his position was. For after Mr. Poonniah's departure, the Sind Observer has done all that it was forbidden to do. It has published reports of the Socialist Conference, and more than that it has decided to illustrate its news with a, for Mr. Fakirjee, reckless disregard of expense. The face of Roosevelt smiles at the reader with no excuse and little justification from one issue of the post-Poonniah Observer, three girls in bathing costumes decorate another number and a whole page of pictures on August 1 tells the public that for Mr. Fakirjee the new year has rung in. It is but natural that Mr. Poonniah should regard the old policy as a ruse to get him out of the office. I hope, however, that Seth Fakirjee keeps up his change of heart when the next editor comes on. If our newspaper proprietors underwent a course in Journalism, there will be less friction with their editors. It surprises me that Mr. Poonniah stood all these restrictions and then exploded on to him a comparatively minor issue, the amount of space to be given to reports of Congress, Socialist and States' Conferences. Mr. Poonniah, so far as I know, has little more than a journalist's interest in these political events.

It will not be without interest to see who takes up the editorship. If Mr. Poonniah's statements made it difficult for the Sind Observer to have a responsible journalist as editor, Seth Fakirjee's declaration of the position makes it impossible. The management will have to adopt a more trustful attitude towards the editor. The new editor, whoever he may be for Seth Fakirjee has advertised the post, will have to print in the first issue of the Observer after he takes charge, a statement that he has been given wider discretion than Mr. Poonniah enjoyed as editor. Otherwise every photograph that appears will be assumed to be paid for—Sind leaders may even be prepared to pay for not getting their photographs printed in the Sind Observer—every report of a meeting in which names are omitted will be held to be in pursuance of the new journalism formulated by Seth Fakirjee. The very terms of the advertisement make a clarification of his position necessary for any future editor of the paper. And even then his position will not be an enviable one. "Wanted for the Sind Observer one Editor and two sub-editors....Approved applicants will be kept on probation for six months, and will be under the control of the Board of Directors in the matter of policy and conduct of the paper." Apparently this direct control applies to the sub-editors as well as the Editor. If what happened with the Assistant Editor is an indication of what we can expect from this, the new editor will have a regular vigilance committee watching over him as against the single supervisor who guarded Mr. Poonniah for the Directors.

Mr. Poonniah's position will also be awkward. He at least had no excuse for not knowing what journalism is or, knowing it, not standing up for its ideals. He should have tried to persuade Mr. Fakirjee that no newspaper could be carried on on the lines proposed by him. If he did not succeed, he should have resigned. What Mr. Poonniah seems to have done is either acquiesced in or ignored Seth Fakirjee's instructions. Mr. Poonniah admits that he did a little of both with occasional protests to Seth Fakirjee. Seth Fakirjee's charge of insubordination seems to show that he has, at times at any rate, ignored the instructions, a procedure which was fair neither to himself, to the Board of Directors, or to the public. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. The only weapon a journalist has against employers who regard him as their servant, is a resignation always ready in his pocket, sometimes in his hand. Mr. Poonniah should not have waited for his dismissal. He should have offered to throw up his post at the first sign of interference, thrown it up on any actual restriction of his rights. That would have been a more fitting end to a record of sixteen devoted years' service on the paper. But the reason for the deplorable developments on the Sind Observer is the total lack of respect for each other shown by proprietor and editor. It is useless to expect the businessman and the idealist—and your true journalist is always an idealist—to understand each other.

S.

Bengal Hindus And Communal Award:

—The Governor of Bengal has received from the Marquess of Zetland a reply to the recent memorial from Bengal Hindus seeking amendment of the Communal Award. The reply refers to the Secretary of State's speech in the House of Lords on the subject, in which he said that His Majesty's Government would not propose any alteration of the Award except with the consent of the communities affected. He adds that there is no intention of departing from this undertaking of His Majesty's Government, and accordingly it would serve no useful purpose for them to rediscuss at this stage the difficult issues raised in the memorial.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

775

MODERN IDEAS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

(BY WALTER BROOKS FOLEY)

Sometimes tourists in touching the coastal cities of Oriental countries have a feeling that Western civilization has invaded the East far more than it actually has. This is true even of such a country as Japan which has learned its whole militaristic programme of aggression from the West. So much that is obvious in Oriental life is superficial. It is planted upon the foundation of ancient Oriental philosophical attitudes that are not destroyed but are somewhat latent. It would not take very much to eliminate the crust of Western habit that one sees along the coastlines of Oriental countries.

I have been reading several books lately on the Philippines written in the middle of the nineteenth century by residents and visitors in the Islands. On the basis of that material, so far as the lives of millions of people here are concerned, there has been very little actual change. There are new roads everywhere which have been built almost entirely since the Americans first came. There are fairly good communication systems which are available except in times of typhoons. There are air services to different sections of the Islands. Coastal steamers carry passengers in comfort to major ports. Apartment houses are being built in the city of Manila. Health conditions have greatly improved. But the normal attitudes of mind on the part of the Philippine millions are about what they have been for a hundred years.

One will admit that a golf course built on the site of the old moat around the Spanish walled city is better than stagnant water that used to stand there. One can appreciate the delightful city of Baguio which is laid out almost like a great national park at an elevation of five thousand feet in the mountains some one hundred and sixty miles north of Manila. But the ambition of the people does not approximate that of Japanese enterprise or of Chinese common sense. In other words it is going to take longer than thirty-eight years to create a lasting democracy in these Islands.

In a recent conversation with General Holbrook the officer commanding the United States Army in the Philippines, he made the remark, "These are perilous times." If anything, his remark was an understatement of fact. No one who is at all familiar with the turn that has been taken during the past five years would ever dream of questioning the general statement. This is true not only of the Far East but of Europe and the United States.

There has been more freedom and independence in the Philippine Islands during the past few years, than anywhere else, practically speaking, in the world. But what is to happen soon, or may be actually happening now, is becoming fairly obvious.

With the insistence upon compulsory military training in the Philippines, which as the Assembly Bill passed last February indicates may include children of both sexes from the age of ten years, upward, we have here the beginnings of a very definite type of fascism which will out the possibility of real freedom.

According to the Philippine Commonwealth Constitution it is impossible to have a dictatorship. But constitutions can be interpreted in various ways, many times to give authority to individuals that other interpretations might not give them. Such seems to be taking place now.

One hates very distinctly to see any right of human liberty of freedom infringed and it seems to me there is such a sweep in that direction throughout the world that it is not surprising that some Filipino leadership should lose its balance and not make the utmost effort to maintain the liberty of the fourteen million people in the Island.

If the United States severs its contact with the Philippine Islands and thereby partially permits a new authoritarian form of government to spring up in the Philippines we will have wasted the effort and time and money that have been used in the past thirty eight years in this Far Eastern Hemisphere. Just to cut adrift deliberately a people with whom we have been connected by our own choice for these years on the grounds of a pseudo desire for granting them independence while knowing full well that it is impossible for them to maintain freedom whether economically or politically, is about the poorest international attitude we have permitted ourselves to indulge in for a long while. To allow an American Army officer to be elected field Marshal of the Philippine Army at a salary of P36,000.00, with perquisites of course, does not indicate that the United States is becoming world minded to the place where it is willing to make some sacrifices for larger international outlook.

WIDOW MARRIAGE AND HINDU SOCIETY.*

(BY SIR MANUBHAI MEHTA)

The one certain consequence of marriages in haste was repentance at leisure and a sudden woeful increase in the number of child widows—so grave as to seriously affect the decennial average for the worse. For whereas there had been a satisfactory fall of 30 per cent in the total number of Hindu widows during the last decade, the number of child widows at once shot up owing to the marriage madness that seized the people in the winter of 1930. The returns for the number of child widows between the age of 10 to 15 happily showed the same decrease of 30 per cent, thus indicating that the girls mostly sacrificed to this marriage furore were infants below the age of 10. The number of infant widows between the ages of 5 and ten was 102,298 in 1921. It went up to 105,482 or an increase of over 3,000 in one year alone, as shown by the census figures of 1931. The number of infant widows aged 4 swelled up to thrice their number and rose from 3,475 to 9,076; while those aged five increased from 8,694 to 16,019. The tale of havoc created by the pigtailed purdits could hardly have been more harrowing. The inauguration of the Sarda Act has left a trail of onerous responsibilities for the Indian social reformer of the future which I have no doubt he will never shirk. This terrible marriage epidemic which raged over the country in 1930 is also responsible for several other ills, which may even add to this onerous burden in the future. It has led to the falsification of census statistics for 1931. Parents who were carried away by their contumacy into defiance of the law and who rushed headlong in to ill-assorted unions for their hapless infant daughters in anticipation of the penal provisions imposed by the law were equally anxious to conceal the fact of marriage when they registered the civil condition of members of their family in replies to questions by the census authorities. The census was taken immediately within one year of the marriages and many girls though really married were returned as unmarried in suppression of the correct facts. How otherwise can one account for the wonderful result recorded in the census Report of there being 58,663,574 married men as against only 58,353,082 married women! When it is remembered that the term

* Concluding part of address delivered at anniversary meeting of Hindu Widow Remarriage Act, held in Bombay, July 25, 1936.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

776
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 8

"married" in the census returns also includes "widows" there cannot be any other explanation of this anomaly. As a result of this enumeration one has to face the fact of there being an excess of over three lakhs of men. The riddle can only be solved on the basis of a systematic suppression of facts. Parents who were anxious to defy the law in anticipation were equally anxious to escape the penalties brought on by themselves by suppressing the fact of marriage and returning their married young daughters as unmarried. The risk of having child widows to care and provide for incurred by our Society has therefore been more grave and serious than is apparent on the surface. Its magnitude will be revealed in all its glaring colours only by the next census of 1941 and then 1951. This mad rush to hasty marriages of infant girls in 1930 has also led to the total upsetting of the balance which nature tries to maintain between the numbers of the two sexes in normal times. In Europe the Great War was one such cataclysm which disturbed the normal ratio between the members of the male and the female sexes and left a large excess of females over adult with all its evil results on the prevailing morals of the people. War has always worked as a positive check on the growth of population, but it leaves an excess of females and upsets the equilibrium. In India which happily has not been much troubled by wars during the last century, the balance has accordingly tilted in favour of the male sex. The census of 1931 has returned the number of men at 181 millions as against 171 millions of women. The male sex had always retained this superiority in numbers in the past, thus leaving all the less excuse for polygamy. It is reported that in the Hindu Society there are as many as 8 co-wives among 1,000 wives—an anomaly that is altogether indefensible when there is not even a sufficient number of women to go round. Polygamy has at least reduced the number of available girls to serve this excess of men.

This preponderance of the masculine sex has prevailed in the country for many decades undressed. For of the other positive checks on population famine has been known to have a selective preference for males. The wage earner, man, had greater trials to endure in facing the grim monster and was therefore carried off in larger numbers than the woman who perhaps had greater powers of endurance against starvation. The lessons taught by the last great famine of 1899 have however added enormously to the effectiveness of the subsequent campaigns waged to fight the calamity so much so that famine has lost half its terrors and the excess of the male population goes on unbalanced. Pestilence is another calamity the ravages of which are also likely to upset the normal balance between the two sexes. The female sex however has been found to suffer more and fall on easier prey to the scourge of plague than man. I know at least of one case in which the onslaught of plague on women created a havoc. During an early outbreak of plague in Gujrat the mortality among the women was so terrible that the surviving male population of Sinor Baniyas petitioned to the Baroda Government to make the Widow Remarriage Act, the State has enacted on the lines of the British Indian Act of 1856, compulsorily applicable to their caste so as to enforce compulsory remarriage on every Bania widow in the District. The number of virgin girls had been so depleted that the community stood in fear of extinction unless the widows were made to remarry and be available for purposes of marriage.

Ordinarily however the life of a male child has greater value set on it than the life of a girl. The evils of infanticide are fortunately now a matter of only historical and academic interest.

In Rajputana, however, and especially among the Rajputs, there is still a striking disparity in the proportion of female children to the family. The girl dies or is allowed to die of comparative neglect and the ratio of excess in favour of males has stood unchallenged and undressed.

The evils of this inequality are considerably magnified with the prevalence of early marriages of girls. The Sarda Act is expected to prevent marriages of girls under 14 and of boys under 18. These must be taken only as the minima of marriagable age. Our endeavour ought to be to raise the age limits still higher so as to permit only adult marriages, which may go some way to restore the balance in the long run. For be it remembered that the general prevalence of early marriage leaves baneful results in several directions. Early marriages bring on early maternity and expose the woman to risks of fatal consequences leaving permanent injuries in their treatment during confinement if unskilful or neglected. Early marriages are likely to swell the number of young widows and if their widowhood is enforced by customs and remains undressed they only diminish the number of females capable of reproductive functions in the Society. Deformities and injuries left by early motherhood may bring in their train sterility and thus add to all the co-ordinating causes contributing to maintain the excess of the male population over the female.

A proper study of Sociology and Eugenics is necessary to throw light on the interconnection of all these phases of Society and to show what repercussions they have on one another. It would be also interesting to observe how the prevalence of early marriage and enforced widowhood both contribute to intensify the disparity of age of the bride and the bridegroom with further deleterious results. Physiologically a pronounced disparity in age of a married pair is likely to lead to sterility. In this connection some observations left on record by the census Superintendent of Rajputana are edifying and bear quotation. "For every 256 potential bridegrooms," he remarks, "there exist in Rajputana at present only 162 potential brides; and if the latter are not married till they are 15 years old many males will reach 20 years, unmarried. From 15 to 30 ages at which males contemplate or achieve marriages, there are 46 unmarried males per 10,000 persons, while there are only 4 unmarried females at similar ages. It therefore follows that these 46 males must arrange marriages with girls who are aged from 5 to 10 and from 10 to 15 of whom there are 82. Observing these proportionate figures, the approximate number of girls that have attained the age of 14 is 11; while boys of 18, 19 and 20 may be assessed at 33. It looks therefore as if the discrepancy of 4 years fixed by the Sarda Act of 14 for females and 18 for males is for the present insufficient in practice; and that if the provisions of the Act are rigorously complied with, the age of marriage for males will automatically rise to 21 to 23 for some years to come for want of sufficient girls who have reached the age of at least 14." The course indicated by the census figures for the Hindus is yet further to raise the age of maternity and the ban on widow remarriage—the two most important planks of the social reformer.

In this connection it is instructive to watch how several Indian States have attempted to meet the evil. The Idar State in Gujarat while fixing the marriageable age for girls and boys has also by law discouraged the marriages of men past middle age. It has penalised the marriage of a man aged 45 and over unless it is with a girl who is not under half of his own age. Thus if a middle aged Hindu happened,

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

777

to lose his wife and wanted to remarry at the age of 48 he could not legally remarry, unless he could find a bride of 24 years of age. This was ordinarily possible only in the case of a widow for it was not easy to get a virgin at 24. If the object of the act was thus indirectly to encourage widow remarriage it was admirably calculated to achieve that end. Otherwise it was a clumsy and uncalled for restraint on the liberty of marriage of men. No law of a civilised country imposes any restraint on marriage. The ban on widow remarriage ought to have been courageously raised instead.

Before I close I would like to refer briefly to another phase of the problem which though at first sight appears to be only remotely connected is yet intimately concerned with the problem before us. Exponents of works on sex ratios have pointed out that an increase in masculinity is an indication of declining population. This generalisation may perhaps be falsified by our country; it is however at least true of the Hindus and the Jains; for whereas the rate of increase among Muslims during the last fifty years is 55 per cent and among Sikhs 33 per cent; it has been only 26 per cent among the Hindus and only 25 per cent among the Jains. The disturbance of the equilibrium caused by the low proportion of women is much intensified by the prohibition against the remarriage of widows among the Hindus and the Jains. Moreover even the caste system is to a certain extent responsible for this decline for it has now been held by scientists as demonstrable truth that the restriction of marriages within the same caste promotes the preponderance of masculinity. In his "History of Human Marriage," Dr. Westermarck cites observations from various parts of the world in support of his view that a mixture of race leads to an increase in the proportion of females. From experiments performed on self-fertilizing plants which produced an excess of male flowers, on in-breeding cattle in which bulls greatly exceeded heifers, and on two independent breeds of horses, indicating that fillets predominate among foals in proportion as the sire and the dam differ in breed and even in colour. The obvious inference indicated is that marriage within the caste will in the long run increase the proportion of males over female children. Endogamy is believed to lead to this preponderance of masculinity for even such an ancient work as the Talmud can be quoted in support of the view that mixed marriages produce only girls. The wisdom of the ancient Hindus, while it held in anticipation of the law now disclosed by Eugenics that too restrictive in-breeding was harmful to progeny and therefore undesirable, also laid down that the ideal marriage should be midway between being exogamous and endogamous. It must be outside the gotra but inside the caste. When a study of sex ratios in population now teaches us that marriages confined to one and the same caste may lead to the preponderance of the masculine sex and consequently to a decline of the race in the long run it ought to supply the much needed cement to our third plank of Social Reform—vis the promotion of Inter Caste Marriage.

All sincere patriots and well wishers of our community ought to co-operate with the Social Reform Association in their endeavour to stop this decline. If we want to set right the balance, the preponderance of the masculine element can be remedied by the following three reforms:—

- (a) Prohibit early marriages; and raise the marriage age for girls still higher.
- (b) Encourage the remarriage of widows; the mere permissive act is not sufficient to break the force of custom. Polygamy has no justification in Hindu Society; and

- (c) Encourage intercaste marriages; All the three problems are inter-connected and they act and react on one another.

Finally one word about the Widow Remarriage Act itself.

This Act was launched as the result of an agitation led by educated and respectable men under the direction of leaders like Ishwar Chandra Vidyasagar. It is a short act comprising of only seven sections; one or two of the important sections dealing with the fact of the widow's remarriage, on her right to succeed to, and her interest in, the property of her deceased husband and his relatives; and also on her right to guardianship over and custody of her children by her deceased husband. The Act naturally declares that the widow on remarriage forfeits her right of inheritance to such property and even to property bequeathed to her by will if she was given only a limited or life interest in such property by the testament relied upon. She also loses her right to the custody of her children by her deceased husband. There has been a controversy whether a widow so remarrying need forfeit such right of inheritance, especially when it is only a life interest in the property that she acquires and her second marriage need not be regarded as her civil death. It has been argued that an unchaste widow does not necessarily forfeit her right to inheritance to property of her deceased Lord; and a widow remarrying cannot be treated more harshly than a widow who is unchaste and false to the troth she had sworn to her deceased husband. The law however has declared that a Hindu widow on remarriage loses her rights of inheritance or succession in the family of her deceased husband.

A complication however arises when the widow at the time of her remarriage changes her religion. The Act imposes this forfeiture of her old rights of inheritance only on a Hindu Widow and the forfeiture is inapplicable to a widow who when remarrying renounces her Hindu faith and becomes a convert to either Christianity or to Islam. The High Court at Allahabad had held that as the widow so remarrying ceases to be a Hindu widow the forfeiture clause also ceases to be applicable. The High Courts of Bombay and Calcutta have held the opposite view. It is hardly fair that we should place a premium on apostasy and hold a widow changing her religion at time of her remarriage to be free from the disabilities which applied to her while she held to her old faith. According to a fiction induced by the ideas of Hindu Law a widow represents only the surviving half of her deceased Lord and is therefore entitled to at least life interest in the property of her husband. How can she retain a continuing interest in that property when by remarriage she becomes the better half of another integer. She cannot super-impose her new moiety on the old moiety. Much less can she do so when the two halves belonged to altogether different faiths. Our sympathies need not follow the widow even after her change of religious persuasion.

Similarly as regards the custody of her children, the predeceased husband's family has a greater right to the guardianship of her children when she chooses herself to go under the protection of a stranger by her remarriage. We need not take up cudgels on her behalf indiscriminately. She has to sever old ties when she deliberately chooses to make new ties by her remarriage.

Each one of us must encourage and guide a weak and helpless Hindu widow to remarry if you find she is not likely to remain safe amidst the temptations surrounding her. Mere permissive legislation is not enough. Public opinion stands in need of further mellowing.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

773

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 8

realpatidar.com

WIVES IN HINDU LAW.

(By G. V. DESHMUKH).

I want to bring to your notice the property rights given to the wives in the absence of the son. To understand the problem correctly it is necessary to follow some general considerations :—

1. The word Stri is a general word used for woman; it is also used to mean wife. Special specific words are used to denote higher or lower divisions of womanhood. Patni, Bharya are used to denote higher levels of women in the family; Yoshii, Ganika, etc., denote lower levels in the society.

2. The Biological relationship between man and woman was called marriage (Vivah) by the old text writers and it was divided into eight forms. Some of these were approved and others were disapproved. Brunkha, Daive, Arsha, Prajapati, and Gandharva were the approved forms; Asura, Rakshasa and Paishacha, were condemned, but the point is they were all forms of marriage. These three forms are nothing but sexual relationship of violence, money and intoxication and will not be called marriage in any modern society.

3. The issue of all these eight kinds of marriage was recognised as son. There was therefore, no such thing as legitimate or illegitimate child, all being legitimate. These different sons were also classified into twelve different kinds of sons, ranging from Auras—from one's self—to self given even secretly produced.

4. The status and rights of all these wives and sons naturally varied.

Accordingly the women of the family were classified into the following orders :—first in rights and dignity were the Patni and Bharya. Next followed the second order of Stri, Dara, Nari, Angana and last came the Dasi, Yoshii, Ganika, etc., the lowest in order included in the general term Stri, and on whom all the common expressions seem to have been used.

To understand correctly the women's question as solved by the old law-givers, it is important to bear the above classification in mind, as the rights, status and position of a woman varies according to the order to which she belongs.

Patni or Bharya of the first order are the most important from the religio-legal point of view. The word Patni is derived from the root which means 'to be master, to govern' and harya is from the root which means to nourish. With the dignity of these words and also the religious significance it will be found that these words are not used loosely, or profusely in the texts. To take the instance of the two of the leading Smritis of the Hindus, the Manusmriti, and the Yajnavalkya. In the Manusmriti out of 249 times in using words relating to women, the word Patni is used twice and Bharya twenty times. In these twenty-two verses there is not one word which is derogatory, indeed great respect is shown to them. In the Yajnavalkya Smriti the word relating to women occurs 49 times Bharya occurs once only and Patni occurs twice—once to mention that Aurasa son is born only of Patni, and secondly to give her the right to succeed to her dead husband in default of a son, in the famous verse 11. 135/136 which have been followed by every law-giver and commented upon by every commentator, and interpreted correctly by Jimitvahan, the law-giver of Bengal in Dayabhaga.

Nor have the other law-givers been lacking in giving Patni the right of inheritance. Vardhamanu gives her the right of property after the death of her husband even though the father, mother and brother are living. Prajapati gives her the right of property in movable and immovable property. She takes the fire if she dies before him; and takes the wealth if he dies before her (Brihaspati 50,51). Vishnu gives her the whole wealth, and Brihaspati asks the king to punish the relatives as robbers if they trouble her with respect to the property. In Mahabharat, Vyas gives her the enjoyment of the husband's property. Selfish objectors, ignorant of Hinduism, by repeated noise have persuaded the Hindus and non-Hindus, Indians and non-Indians to believe that in Hinduism 'Woman does not deserve independence.' They have picked up bits of verses; used them without reference to context, "Narad and Manu have said this," but Narad and Manu have used the word Stri not Bharya. Besides they have also said that 'Sons are without Independence' in Narad 33,34 and Manu 8:416. Does this imply that sons also cannot inherit? Baudhayana quoted in the text books on Hindu law also uses the word Stri and not Patni or Bharya. "Women (Stri) are without strength and therefore cannot inherit." Many a commentator has already explained this as inapplicable to inheritance in presence of definite express texts giving inheritance to grand-mother, and mother and numerous texts giving right of property to Patni.

In my bill I have asked the right to property for the Patni. It will be seen that in Hinduism:

1. A wife in the presence of the son gets equal share with the son.

2. A wife in the absence of the son on the death of her husband inherits the whole property of the husband, though kindred and kinsmen are alive.

CASTE IN MODERN HINDUISM.*

Hinduism without caste is neither a theoretical nor a practical impossibility. In fact what the Buddha did was to liberate the spiritual ideals of India from the yoke of any particular form of social organisation, and his movement cannot be called unsuccessful, even though there is no separate religion as Buddhism in India to-day. It was attempted by many reformers in Medieval India, and two very successful of these movements still persist in our midst as Sikhism in the North and Virasaivism in the South. It is therefore no new-born prejudice of modern Hindus.

The modern movement for the abolition of untouchability is an attack directed against the most vulnerable nerve-centre of the caste system; for beside being a humanitarian movement, it is also a challenge to the notion of congenital purity and impurity which Hindu fundamentalism has been maintaining by what appears to our mind, a misapplication of the doctrine of Karma and transmigration. That is why we find to-day Hindu fundamentalism in deadly opposition to the anti-untouchability movement—not because fundamentalists are devoid of humanitarian sentiments, as it is sometimes supposed.

The weight of educated opinion to-day seem to be on the side of these caste-breaking tendencies. There is no use condemning people of this school of thought as impious, irreligious or ungodly. Some of them may be so, but quite a large number of them are as pious and devoted to Hindu spiritual ideals as any representative of Hindu fundamentalism. If we disregard this increasing volume of opinion in the country, we shall only fail to notice the symptoms of the revolution in thought that is taking place in modern Hinduism. This change consists in the recognition that the pure spiritual content of religion has no inevitable or even necessary relation with any social system, except in so far as it is to lighten the latter with the principle of Dharma, the universal law

*The Vedanta Kesari.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

779 of righteousness. We believe it is proper to characterise this change as the recapture of the old Buddha spirit by the modern Hindu conscience.

It is also to be remembered that this divorce of caste consciousness from the spiritual ideal is symptomatic of a still deeper change in the Hindu outlook. For many centuries past, Hinduism has practically been an ethnic religion, and the Hindu conceived as one so born and never so made. It was an extension of this idea that resulted in the notion that salvation can be obtained only after one passes through the discipline of the caste system, and is finally born of Brahmin parentage. But the belief outrages the facts of history and need not be taken seriously; for no one can deny that men of exemplary piety and spiritual illumination have been very often born in lower castes and out-castes of Hinduism in spite of serious cultural handicaps and among societies in and out of India belonging to non-Hindu religions. In fact caste is no indicator of man's spiritual level. An uncompromising recognition of this is necessary if the ethnic Hinduism of the old law codes is to develop into the universal Hinduism of the Bhagavad Gita. That alone can claim to be a universal religion whose beliefs, practices and institutions are open to all who are duly qualified, irrespective of hereditary or other extraneous considerations. The issue is sufficiently plain to a mind free from pre-conceived theories: either separate caste from Hinduism and reduce the former to the position of a social institution; or make caste an essential part of the spiritual content of Hinduism and reduce Hinduism to the position of an ethnic religion. Modern Hindu conscience seems to favour the former course, and that is why the gradual development of the passive Hinduism of the previous centuries into the "Aggressive Hinduism" of our times synchronises with caste-breaking tendencies.

We for our part consider Hinduism to be a universal religion, and we cannot therefore admit that caste is anything more than a social system produced by a combination of causes, racial, economic and political. Once we thus separate caste from Hindu religion, we shall be in a position to take a thoroughly objective view of it, and judge it purely as a social institution. To deny its services in the past is as unjust and idle as it is to glorify it as a godsend perfectly valid for all time and all conditions. If it failed to Hinduise 13 million aboriginal tribes it has also to be said that it succeeded in doing so with regard to a much larger number, which accounts for the presence of numerous sub-castes in Hindu society today. This does not, however, entitle it for preference over new social institutions that can do the same work in a better, quicker and more efficient manner. It stressed the co-operative principle, smoothened the wheels of competition and preserved the technical skill of Indian workmen. But on this ground, to hope that it will continue to do so under thoroughly altered world conditions is quite futile and unwarranted. There is no use calling for co-operation when men are consciously unwilling to co-operate. If the cruelty of competition is bad, equally so is the stagnation, lethargy and exclusiveness into which co-operation imperceptibly degenerates.

Again the defensive mechanism of caste has done much to preserve Indian culture when it was threatened with insuperable dangers. But you cannot for ever live in hiding places without prejudice to your dignity as human beings. The embankment of taboos and prohibitions cannot for ever imprison the expansive tendencies of racial life.

In fact this dissatisfaction alone can sufficiently explain why many men, Hindu to the core of their being in other respects, fail to see eye to eye with Hindu fundamentalists in their reverence for caste. Efficiency in self-defence, not in aggression, is what justifies a social system and makes it acceptable to a people. As long as caste proved its worth in this matter people clung to it, but when pitted against Muslim and European social systems it has proved its inefficiency in many respects in spite of its survival value. Unwillingness to contact foreigners has not saved us from foreign influences. For even though we may not wish to contact them, they have come to contact us—first as travellers, then as merchants and finally as conquerors. Bitter experience has taught the modern Hindu that it is not with the aid to taboos but by a greater tightening of the social consciousness alone he can keep himself alive and honourable in this world. In the principle of nationalism which the West has perfected in all its constructive and destructive phases, the best brains of India too seem to recognise the system of organisation which can mobilise the popular will into a unified and dynamic force. Its healthy principles are accepted by men of awakened political consciousness, and it is generally admired as a higher and more efficient form of social life. Caste mentality is found to stand in opposition to this process of nation-making; for it is the parent of communalism, the irreconcilable foe of nationalism. In the organisation of the herd instinct a division of loyalties between communalism and nationalism leads to disastrous inefficiency—to what may be described as an element of dissociation in the national psychology. For the appeal of both is directed to the same instinct, and the surrender demanded by both is equally unreserved and exclusive. That is why with the growth of nationalism we meet with increasing condemnation of communalism and its parent caste.

A PLEA FOR THE MIDDLE-AGED.

Childhood, youth and old age have had their poets. Wordsworth's Intimations is, perhaps the most fervent as it is the most famous appreciation of the glory of childhood. Youth, of course, has been glorified by innumerable poets. Old Age, which Shakespeare's genius made tragic in Lear and contemptible in As You Like It, found its Poet in Browning. The aged Pope in The Ring and the Book and also in Ivanovitch speaks with the serene authority of Godhead.

A certain stage
At last I reach, or dream I reach, where I discern Truer truths, laws behold more lawlike than we learn
When first we set our foot to tread the course
I trod
With man to guide my steps: who leads me now is God.
The opening stanza in Rabbi Ben Ezra is a veritable paean in praise of old age:

Grow old along with me!
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made;
Our times are in his hand
Who saith, "A whole I planned,
Youth shows but half; trust God: see all nor be afraid."

But no writer in verse or prose has sung the glories of middle age, the connecting link between Youth and Old Age. This omission was sought to be filled by Mr. A. G. Vere, who though there is something poetic in his outlook, is engaged in the humdrum duties of Assistant Manager of the Madras Telephone Company at the Madras Rotary Club last week. We take the following excerpts from the report of his speech in the Hindu:—

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 8

Mr. Vere said that it had always seemed to him remarkable that English literature practically ignored middle age. How often did they read of a middle-aged hero? Of course, middle aged folk could not be entirely eliminated from literature, but when they did intrude on its august pages, they were frequently portrayed as nit-witted half mental folk and were generally contrasted to the young hero, who was probably making a splash on an income supplied by a mutt of a father. If the half witted person permitted to intrude should be a woman, they were invariably informed rightaway that it was quite a mystery how the very beautiful heroine (telegraphic address "Cosmetics") could have been so unfortunate as to possess such an ordinary mother.

The speaker continuing, said:

"On such general lines the story runs to its triumphant conclusion, with the hero (having entirely dissipated his father's fortune) stumbling in the last chapter—when drunk—on a gold mine or some such fortunate circumstances. Now being possessed of untold wealth, he marries the Cosmetic lady of his choice—keeps in moderate comfort in his old age the father he bled for so many years and unless, in his turn, he becomes a nit-wit parent, lives happily ever after.

"Take another aspect of the case. I refer to the present day habit of lauding to the skies what are after all the very moderate achievements of youth. It so happens that a certain young man in the early twenties, can throw a ball harder and straighter than most, can hit a tennis ball harder and more accurately than the average, can catch and run faster with a rugger ball than his fellows, with the result that he becomes a national hero, is given free trips (1st class throughout) all over the world, is overfed, overpetted, lionised and generally made to feel that he is no end of a fellow. But is he? Is he making any real contribution to the welfare of this world? I say definitely and finally 'No.' On the contrary, he is undoubtedly assisting, if he partakes in international events—quite unconsciously of course—to increase the already overwhelming sum of hate that exists between nations.

"We will now take the question of old age, which in the Glorification and Adoration Stakes is only second to youth! Mind you, I yield to none in my respect and affection towards those who have passed or are approaching the allotted span, but are they not, by the very fact that they are old, in the position that they cannot do much for the national weal—however much they might have done in the past! Why then this insistence—in my country at any rate—on the keeping of the aged in places and positions which they are no longer fit to occupy. One may say what one likes, but broadly speaking the fact that the older one gets, especially after one is sixty, the more intolerant and reactionary he becomes, quite unfitted to handle modern problems, quite unfitted to make quick decisions and quite unable to accept the views of those who are in the very prime of their physical and intellectual vigour.

"Notwithstanding this, our Mother of Parliaments is to-day largely controlled by old dodderers who, had they been in business, would have been axed years ago and indeed it must also be admitted that many of them would probably not have been very successful in business. Who then are the salt of the earth? The answer is: The middle aged. You will of course ask who are the middle aged? Whilst no definite years can be laid down as to when a person is middle aged, I should say that generally speaking it is between the ages of thirty-five and sixty, of which the middle fifteen years may be taken as the period when the middle aged are not only at peak of their powers, but also as the period when they are definitely the burden carriers of the world. It is not the habit of the middle aged to make a fuss about their achievements and indeed I think they are far too modest. Year after year, they toil steadily on. They may have large or small incomes, but the net result is usually the same—at the end of the year savings nil. They are probably educating children, keeping a home, helping parents, paying rates and taxes and generally providing the where with all that makes the wheels go round and the existence of civilisation possible. I know men in Madras who are keeping, at any rate for part of the year, no less than three homes going and they are not leading a double—or should it be in this case a treble?—life. The explanation is perfectly simple, they have a home in Madras throughout the year, one in the hills for the younger part of their family for a portion of the year, and one all the year round for their children that are being educated in England.

"I suggest to you, gentlemen, that such men are doing more for humanity than the youth who gets a century at cricket or does the hat trick or who scrambles over the line by the skin of his teeth for the winning try and on so doing is cheered to the echo by thousands and is pestered for his autograph. Whoever heard of a middle-aged man being cheered because every penny he earned he spent on others? No one, I am sure, and if any one did cheer him, he (the cheerer) would promptly be incarcerated in a madhouse. But why? Is not there something wrong with our sense of values? Is not there something heroic about the man who toils year after year with never a thought for himself, who foregoes luxuries and often necessities in order that his children may be well fed, well clothed, well educated, and well housed? Is he not deserving of some recognition—does he get any—sometimes—but it is usually the raspberry. Is it not ironical that a man, who was world-famous when he was a great tennis player, should become a non-entity as soon as he gives up tennis to do something worth while."

Place of Students in Politics :—"The place of students in politics, is like the place of bachelors in married life and just as bachelorhood is intended to be a training for useful and happy married life, a student is expected to equip himself during his student days, in order to find a useful and bright career in life, and that includes politics in a country where politics dominates over other things," observed Mr. C. Rajagopalachariar, addressing the members of the Pachayappa's College Union in the College Hall. Continuing the speaker said that politics was not an easy job and it required no less preparation than was required to become a doctor, a lawyer or a schoolmaster. The speaker would not invite students to leave schools and colleges but wanted them to learn politics side by side with other subjects. Concluding he advised the students to be self-reliant and master the subjects by observing strict discipline, discarding all bad tastes and bad manners.—A. P.

Change in Scientific Thought :—"Prof. G. Mahajani, Principal, Fergusson College, Poona, who addressed the members of the University Union, Bangalore. Sir C. V. Raman presiding, referred to the development of a new school of scientific thought which viewed both the physical and social sciences from a common angle. This new school of thought did not agree with the old idea of scientists that physical laws were fixed and immutable. This new school of scientists, Prof. Mahajani observed, held that there was nothing unalterably fixed about the so-called physical laws and that the characteristic features of any physical phenomenon varied with the varying points of view from which it was viewed. Modern scientists held that all these theories were right and at the same time wrong, according to from what point they were viewed.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

781

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive, of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-
THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohasan Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harij (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman),
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (MNI Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Tootsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dasaabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda, Raj Ratna Bhaillal Dalibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. G. L., (Managing Agent, Alomble Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrock Mills, Ltd., Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 3 per cent per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 1½ per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between
Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tuticorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 31, Spratt Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

realpatidar.com
Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

782
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 8

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1903.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT
VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches:—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000
London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

* Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application. The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to:—

THE SECRETARY
CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR
AND
TRUSTEED CO., LTD

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulia (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondaticha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nasik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Shiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS

Sir Chundil V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Bao Bahadur R. V. Vandevas,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,50,000

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

783

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

784

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

Aug. 8

realpatidar.com

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Nataraajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

Registered No. B 343.

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office :—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, SANDRA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor :—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY AUGUST 18, 1936. No. 50

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator.

CONTENTS

Parsi Poverty.
Communal Welfare and the Birth Rate.
Sex Proportion and Race Degerneration.
Mr. Rajagopalacharya and the Congress.
The Trichinopoly Election.
Protection or Privilege?
The Police and the Powers.
Bengal Hindus and the Communal Award.
A Deal in Souls.

The Essence of Advance.
A Plea for Marriage Reform.
Parsi Poverty.
In Praise of the Middle-aged.
Caste in Indo-Europe.
"Unity" of Chicago.
Women's Election Manifesto.
"Criticism Without Knowledge."
Depressed Classes and Conversion.
Christians and the Depressed
Classes.

NOTES

Parsi Poverty:—Professor Wadia, the indefatigable Honorary Secretary of the Parsi Charity Organisation Society, has dealt with the subject of poverty among Parsis in the light of statistics specially collected relating to 1141 families living in Bombay city. In all these cases the Society has secured help from charity funds either for the first time or had it renewed during last year. The number of Parsi families in receipt of relief wholly or partially from the numerous charity funds of the community was estimated in his last annual review by Professor Wadia to be about 2,500 comprising 10,000 souls. The number covered by the present investigation is thus representative, and the conclusions formed by the Professor may be accepted as sound and reliable. Taking Rs. 12 per head as the minimum needed for a Bombay Parsi to live a healthy life. Professor Wadia calculates on the basis of his figures that a sum of Rs. 7,62,000 is needed in addition to the Rs. 4,25,000 now being disbursed by the Charity Fund to lift the 2,500 families out of their present condition of underfeeding and semi-starvation by providing them with the prime necessities of housing, food and clothing. As regards housing, we are surprised to see that notwithstanding the several chawls for poor Parsis in different parts of the city, the rent paid by the families included in this investigation ranged on an average from 33 to 25 per cent of their incomes including the help received. It is obvious that persons belonging to other communities for whom there are no charity buildings to live in must be paying more than 33 per cent of their incomes in rent. Considering that the lower the income the larger the proportion needed for food which in the lowest incomes is almost wholly spent on food, such high proportions demanded by rent necessarily leads to under-nourishment and semi-starvation.

Communal Welfare and the Birth Rate:—Professor Wadia's scheme would eliminate rent from the budget of the poor Parsi and considerable further economies will accrue from collective living in colonies in the city itself, with common kitchens, common laundries and schools worked on a co-operative basis. It is difficult to see how a community which has abandoned the old joint family as a drag on individual initiative would respond to the call for this co-operative plan. One point to which Professor Wadia has omitted to call attention, is that with the growing number of unemployed in the community, requiring increased expenditure on relief, the community will not be able to maintain such large charity funds as in the past. Taking the Parsis in Bombay to be about 60,000, a sixth of the population is now in receipt of relief. The object of Professor Wadia's scheme is to prevent this proportion from increasing, as it is sure to do if the doles system is persisted in. He sees that the ill effects of this pernicious system are already making themselves felt. The Census Commissioner of India referring to the very low birth-rate, coupled with the exceptionally high survival rate, among the Parsis, observed: "Both phenomena are due primarily to the high economic and cultural condition of the community, prosperity with education being the only really efficient check on the birth-rate yet discovered." Professor Wadia found in his inquiry that poverty is mainly responsible for large-sized families and an attitude of recklessness on the question of wedded life and its responsibilities. "We have repeatedly come across instances of families in the course of our investigations," he writes, "where sons with very limited resources have married and brought further misery into their family." That the birth rate continues to be very low shows that the reckless breeding among the poor of which Professor Wadia complains, is not of a magnitude to affect the community's future. On the contrary, the low birth-rate itself constitutes a problem for Parsi reformers.

Sex Proportion and Race Degeneration:—In his interesting address at the meeting of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association which was printed in the last two issues of the Reformer, Sir Manubhai Mehta broke new ground when he attributed the "preponderance of masculinity"—that is, of the male over the female population in the country and especially in the Hindu

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

786

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 15

realpatidar.com

community, to inbreeding due to the prohibition of marriage between several castes. He also took the view that preponderance of masculinity is a sign of declining population. As a matter of fact the preponderance of males over females is greater among Muslims than among other groups and, surprising as it may seem, exists even among Parsis. For every thousand males there are 951 women among Hindus, 938 among Parsis and 901 among Muslims. What is even more striking is that, while the Hindu ratio declined from 970 in 1901 to 951 in 1931, the Muslim ratio declined during the same period from 938 to 901. If the predominance of masculinity is a sign of declining population, it is not easy to explain why, in the case of Muslims, it has coincided with an increase of population. In the fifty years ending 1931 while the Hindus declined from 7,452 to 6,824 per 10,000 of the population, Muslims increased from 1,974 to 2,216. The theory of a definite relation between sex proportion and growth of population would seem to require revision. This also throws doubt on the supposed effect of inbreeding on masculinity. In noticing the Census Report, we took exception to the Commissioner's speculations on these points. Inbreeding prevails in the most intense form in the small and compact Parsi community. Still their proportion of female population is much higher than that of the Muslims who have a wider field of choice, at least in theory. An eminent sociologist who investigated the effect of cousin marriages came to the conclusion that there was no evidence to support the popular belief that marriage between close relatives necessarily leads to race deterioration.

Mr. Rajagopalacharya and the Congress :— The resignation of Mr. C. Rajagopalacharya of his membership of the various Congress Committees, signifying practically the severance of his connection with the Congress, has not come on us as a surprise. It will be remembered that he retired from the Congress soon after the last general elections to the Legislative Assembly, the sweeping successes of Congress candidates in which were largely due to his great organising capacity and the intensive electoral campaign of which he was the indefatigable leader. His little book on the Bhagavad Gita which was published some months ago, was the fruit of his meditation in his retirement. The teaching of the Gita that a man attains salvation by doing his duty disinterestedly in the sphere in which his lot is cast, whatever it may be, is impressively brought out in Mr. Rajagopalacharya's commentary. That thought might have influenced his return to the field of politics on the eve of the Lucknow Congress. There was much rejoicing amongst the elders of the Congress at his return to the field of battle and it was confidently stated that he was to be the President of the next Congress. The reason which he gives for his retirement, namely, that another Congress leader put up a candidate for election to the Chairmanship of a Local Board against one whom Mr. Rajagopalacharya himself preferred and that the former won the election against the latter, is on the face of it a poor one for Mr. Rajagopalacharya to become a political sanyasi. It is evidently the last straw. His association with the Congress, he implies in his message, has been lately not conducive to his peace of mind which, he thinks, will now be possible to him. He recently emerged triumphant from a defamation case which he had instituted against a Tamil newspaper for making insinuations suggesting that he had misused Congress money for his own benefit. This grotesque libel against a man of Mr. Rajagopalacharya's sterling integrity was unreservedly withdrawn and apologised for by the newspaper. We cannot help thinking that the significance of Mr. Rajagopalacharya's seemingly abrupt severance of his long-standing relations with the Congress, is that that body is drifting towards uncharted seas and that the men of the group which rallied round Gandhiji and the non-co-operation movement, feel that their presence is not wanted any longer. What is a great loss to the Congress, will be a greater gain to scholarship and literature. Mr. Rajagopalacharya is not one of those who took to politics because they can think of nothing better to do.

The Trichinopoly Election :— Since writing the above, we have had a report of the election proceedings which has led to Mr. Rajagopalacharya's retirement from the Congress. We may say at once, that, on the merits of the matter, our sympathies are with Mr. P. T. Rajan whose candidate won the election against Mr. Rajagopalacharya's candidate. Mr. Rajan's position is, and he says he fully explained it to the Tamil Nadu Congress Committee, that the Provincial Congress organization should not interfere with elections to local bodies but leave them to be carried on with reference to local conditions. Mr. Rajan as a resident of Trichinopoly knows the local conditions best and his candidate is also a Congressman. There is no more reason why the Tamil Nadu Congress Committee should decide who should be the Chairman of the Trichinopoly Municipality, than why the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee should decide who should be the next Mayor of Bombay. We are astonished that a political leader of Mr. Rajagopalacharya's eminence and experience should maintain this untenable theory and make opposition to it the ground of quitting the Congress. To a representative of the United Press, he said that he believed in disciplinary action against Mr. Rajan for having dared to put up a candidate in opposition to the one set up by himself on behalf of the Tamil Nadu Congress Committee. But he feared that there was not enough force behind it by way of sanctions. Such talk smacks of Fascism and is nauseating. We can hardly believe that the Congress party favours the sort of dictatorship which Mr. Rajagopalacharya's words imply. Mr. Rajan in our opinion quite rightly refused to obey the dictation of the Congress Committee in a matter affecting the civic life of his city. Congress work in regard to elections to the Provincial Legis-

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

787

lature, would be impossible, said Mr. Rajagopala, unless the Congress Committee is able to order Municipal elections. We dare say that the Justice Party in Madras acts on this principle but we expect the Congress to pay more regard to the fundamentals of civil liberty, one of which is the freedom of civic affairs from political partisanship.

Protection or Privilege?—If, during the Swadeshi movement, anyone had suggested that Indian traders in foreign cloth were entitled to protection against foreign traders, he would have been laughed out of court. Yet that in effect is the attitude adopted by Indian cinema exhibitors in the recent agitation against the proposed establishment of an American-owned cinema theatre in Bombay. The conditions calling for protection do not exist in the theatre business. The Indian exhibitor has been in the field undisturbed for years. He knows, or he ought to know if he has the slightest business instinct, his public better than any foreigner can. He is a middleman if ever there was one. And the trade is by no means a new one. If the agitation had been launched against Western pictures, we could have understood, even though we could not have supported, it. But culturally, there will not be much difference between the films exhibited by the new theatre and the films shown by many of the old ones. If anything, an American exhibitor might well hesitate to put on pictures which present his countrymen and women in an absurdly foolish light. The inanities of the average song-and-dance Western film will no doubt continue to be inflicted on a long-suffering public. But the American, and the more so if he is a 100 percenter, will draw the line sooner than his Indian rival. From this point of view, it will not be altogether bad if we have an American-run theatre in our midst. But whatever one might feel on the subject, it is hard to justify the present agitation for which public and press support is being sought. The tradesman's right is only the right to sell to his public and nothing more. He cannot ask that competitors be kept back while he plies an exclusive trade. The cinema, moreover, has come to be recognised as a cultural force besides being a source of entertainment. It would be as absurd to raise nationalistic barriers in the cinema trade as in the trade in books.

The Police and their Powers:—In an article with this heading, a legal correspondent calls public attention in the New Statesman to some features of recent police prosecutions in England as between Communists and Nazis. "However the Police may try to exercise their functions," he writes, "their discretion, their belief in the likelihood of a breach of the peace, must to some extent depend on their view of the antipathy that certain political views may arouse. There is an impression, for example, that anything said in a loud voice by anyone suspected of being a Communist, may lead to a breach of the peace."

Among some policemen, at any rate, there is the equally strong conviction that nothing said by a Fascist can. The handing of a tract against Nazism to a German visitor was held to be such an insult by a London Magistrate. So far as Fascists are concerned, it appears to be the policy to prosecute only in the cases, where an actual, as opposed to the constructive, breach of the peace is on the point of occurring." The writer suggests that in some cases where there have been breaches or likelihood of breaches of the peace on account of Fascist provocation, the persons "bound over," were not the Fascists, but those who resented the provocation.

Bengal Hindus and the Communal Award:—The sudden emergence of a great Hindu demonstration headed by the Poet, Rabindranath Tagore, against the Communal Award, after the law Member of the Government of India, himself a Bengali strongly opposed to the arrangement, had declared in the Legislative Assembly that the issue was no longer a live one, took us by surprise. It could be explained by supposing that some hint had reached the organisers that the occasion was opportune for a fresh effort. It appears that there has been no development of any kind to invite such a demonstration. The Secretary of State for India, Lord Zetland, in his reply repeats what he said in the House of Lords: It was not the intention of the British Government to make any alteration in the Communal Award unless it was desired by the communities themselves but that no such alteration could be made under the Act without the specific consent of Parliament. Lord Zetland had publicly stated that the Award was hard on the Bengal Hindus. The purport of his reply is that the Hindus, however hard it may be on them, must abide by it unless they can persuade the other communities to agree to its being modified. That is to say, Hindu can not expect any help from Government in having this particular wrong righted. So much was clear from his earlier pronouncements and we share Lord Zetland's surprise that the memorialists appear to have overlooked them. It is possible that they thought that, as the British Government had recently changed their policy in respect of Ethiopia, they might do the same in regard to the Communal Award. The two questions however are different. Government made contradictory declarations about their Ethiopian policy because they were obliged to do so. They can not make any changes in the Communal Award because there is nothing to induce them to depart from the policy of maintaining the sacrosanct character of their declarations. We are sorry that the aged poet was dragged from his retirement to head this certain fiasco. He ought to have been spared the snub which the Marquis at the India Office has administered to him and his colleagues in this rather fatuous business.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 15

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, August 15, 1936.

A DEAL IN SOULS.

The Moonje-Ambedkar Pact particulars of which are revealed in the correspondence that Mr. M. C. Rajah has published, is a unique document a parallel to which is not to be found in the political and religious annals of any country. The substance of it is: Dr. Moonje and Dr. Ambedkar agree that the depressed classes must remain untouchables so long as they remain Hindus; that conversion to some other religion is sure to release them from this social infliction; that, while conversion to Islam or Christianity offers certain material and political advantages, it will take the large body of untouchables out of the pale of 'Hindu culture'; their conversion to Sikhism will obviate this consequence, but the Sikh community is neither numerically nor financially strong enough to afford the antyaja converts all the help they need; and that Hindus, in recognition of the consideration shown to their 'culture', should facilitate the conversion of antyajās to Sikhism by enabling them to retain the concessions of the Poona Pact even after conversion. There is a suggestion in Dr. Ambedkar's letter to Dr. Moonje that Hindus should also provide financial subventions to make up for the lack of resources of the Sikh community to support the antyaja converts. Before submitting the Pact to the acceptance of the Hindu Mahasabha, Dr. Moonje invited the opinion of Mr. M. C. Rajah who represents the depressed classes in the Legislative Assembly, in which he has introduced a Bill now pending for the removal of the antyaja's disabilities. Mr. Rajah has thought it his duty to place the correspondence before the public before further action is taken in the matter.

The idea that the depressed classes should seek social salvation by religious conversion, was first put forward by the late Dewan Bahadur Srinivasa Raghava Iyengar, before he became Dewan of Baroda in the closing years of the last century, in a report on the progress of the Madras Presidency under British rule. The Dewan Bahadur was a conservative Brahmin, and he made the suggestion solely in the interests of the depressed classes, as he conceived it fifty years ago, without any thought of political consequences. Nor did he seem to apprehend any results detrimental to the Hindu community from the conversion of antyajās to Christianity which he specifically recommended. No doubt, he did not feel called upon to consider what the effect of wholesale conversion of antyajās to Christianity would be on the Indian Christian community. We are not sure but that the Dewan Bahadur's suggestion might have suggested to Missions the idea of mass conversions from among the depressed classes. However that may be, large numbers of these classes have been converted to Christianity since the Dewan Bahadur wrote. But their social condition has not materially changed as he thought it would. Dr. S. C. Chatterjee told an Indian Christian Conference at Allahabad last November that the lot of converts from the untouchable classes remained much the same as before conversion. The formation of a "Depressed Indian Christians Association" in Madras, and the Circular letter, which the Secretary of its Executive Council has addressed to Christian Associations in Southern India, are of special significance. "It is unquestionable," writes Mr. Arokiaswamy, "that converts to Christianity groan under all the disabilities arising from caste distinctions. Although the benign Government have been pleased to grant privileges to them, they are not sufficient to bring them up to the level of the other depressed classes enjoying higher and more privileges." The Indian Christian community which will ultimately have to shoulder the burden of bringing up the converted mass, is apprehensive in the words of the Guardian, that, unless some Hercules rises to cleanse the Augean stable which has to be cleansed, "the community will become more and more superstitious, and more and more contemptible in the eyes of the world." The effect of mass conversion of the antyajās on the Missions themselves, should not be left out of account, especially now when many supporters of Missions are beginning to doubt whether, after all, it will not be best to begin by converting the "heathen" in their own lands. There is a world of meaning in the Lindsay Commission's terse observation that "the wheels of the Christian Church drag heavily in the sand of their (the depressed classes men who have entered the Church) age-long inferiorities and disabilities."

We have dwelt at some length on this point because Dr. Ambedkar's sanguine estimate of the advantages to be gained by the depressed classes, is, as regards Christianity, much discounted by actual experience. It is even more so in the case of his estimate of the material and political gains likely to ensue from conversion to Islam. The condition of the Muslim population especially in the provinces where it is the majority, is not such as to answer the expectations of Dr. Ambedkar as regards its capacity to help some millions of the depressed classes whose sudden influx can only aggravate it. But there is a more serious obstacle in the way of the conversion of these classes to Islam. It is reported that, at a mass meeting of Mahars in Bombay, where the project of conversion from Hinduism was expounded, the women as a body declared that they would not go over to a religion which required them to remain behind purdah. Sikhism as a religion is a bhakti cult like Vaishnavism and Saivism. The Sikhs owe their distinctive character in the Punjab to Guru Govind who vowed that he would make his sparrows strike down the eagle, and did it. In the arrangements embodied in the projected Ambedkar-Moonje Pact, there is not a trace of the spirit of the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

789 great Guru, but only a spirit of bargain entirely alien to it. Moreover, it is of the essence of the pact that it must have not only the moral but also the material support of Hindus. Dr. Ambedkar himself recognises that conversion to Sikhism, unless supported by Hindus, will bring about no improvement in the social conditions of the antyajas. Dr. Moonje and Dr. Kurtkoti may be ready to bless the project of helping the depressed classes to call themselves Sikhs while Hindus continue to incur the responsibility of helping them politically and financially, but there will not be many other Hindu leaders to share their opinion. The fact is that Dr. Ambedkar's belief that the depressed classes stand to gain much by apostasy is pure hallucination. It is obvious from his own hesitation to practice what he preaches, that the hold of Hinduism on his people is deeper than he is aware of. Hindu leaders who wish to strike a bargain with him like that embodied in the Ambedkar-Moonje Pact, are doing no service to the country or either of the communities. They are dragging religion—and not only Hinduism—into the mire in the belief that they are helping to save it from imminent dissolution.

THE ESSENCE OF ADVANCE.

(By WALTER BROOKS FOLEY)

"But now they desire a better country."

We are told that, though we do not know who was the writer of the book of Hebrews, we can rest assured that he was a great preacher. Again and again he abandons the main line of the argument in order to preach. Also he was a man of great literary ability. The book is written in the best Greek of the New Testament. He was a man of wide knowledge of philosophy. He knew Plato's system. He was familiar with the Epicurean theory of the universe. He was intimately acquainted with Aristotle's ideas. Through all his Epistle he uses in the most skillful way his wide understanding for the interpretation of the Christian religion. His knowledge, his acceptance and use of change, his firm Christian faith mark him as one of the first great Christians. He realized that Christianity demands an on-going, an advance, based on a desire for a better country in which to live and grow. Forward motion was at the heart of his method.

As in our author's day the essence of advance is still drawn from deep sources of never-failing supply,

When the great ice cap crept southward over North America from the Arctic wastes, it slowly but surely used as its source of supply what we now call the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, distilling from the ocean depths the moisture that cooled and hardened to form the ice. The water was the essence of the ice advance. Water was the real character of which the huge moving glaciers consisted.

Again and again men and women have found that the essence of advance must be drawn from deep, unfailing sources. What that essence actually is rests with us to discover, if we would make the advance necessary in our day and generation.

One source of supply is that of knowledge. The world's store of facts is very large. It is almost as though there had been many Josephs who, in an era of plentiful research, had been possessed of sufficient vision to gather into storehouses the realities of life that can now furnish truth with which to deal with our later problems in a somewhat dry and barren period of discord and confusion. Knowledge is ours for the asking—on the shelves of our libraries, in the minds of millions, in the laboratories of research, in the hearts of spiritually-minded prophets.

Out of knowledge it is possible to distill wisdom—which is more to be desired than rubies or fine gold.

One of Robert Frost's recent poems tells the story of a boy teasing some caged monkeys with a burning glass. From it the poet draws a lesson for men,

*They might not understand a burning glass.
They might not understand the sun itself.
It's knowing what to do with things that counts.*

It is not enough only to know the truth in order to be free. We must likewise know what to do with the truth—how to use it.

There is a force that can be applied to facts to make them bloom with radiant advance for all mankind. Again Robert Frost speaks:

*Some force has but to apply,
And summits shall be immersed,
The bottom of seas raised dry—
The slope of the earth reversed.*

Yes, knowledge of laws, of ways, of facts, is a constant source of supply for wisdom in dealing with practical affairs.

Yet, if we were to depend solely upon intellectual progress we could not possibly touch the fundamental weaknesses or strengths of mankind. For man has not yet either had the courage to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan," to many things that deter his onward and upward advance, or had courage to scale the heights of human possibility.

To be frank, the conceit of ignorance is only equalled by the conceit of knowledge. Too much of knowledge is concerned with the transient rather than the reality that lies behind and beyond temporary experience. The germs of stupidity and selfishness live in our dark corners far from the quickening flow of human advance. Too often we have mended our ways only as a last resort to save ourselves from destruction. Too often we wait too long to be saved—and those we leave behind must begin all over again the weary, yet inevitable, road that man must travel when he desires a better country.

We need not only the courage of our convictions, but the courage to correct our contemporaries when only collective action will set us forward upon the highway of experience. Knowledge will help us but more than knowledge is required. The philosophy of the author of Hebrews was not the whole of his message nor does it altogether explain his powerful phraseology.

A second force from which the essence of advance may be extracted is that of change. There are usually two alternative procedures that may be adopted in connection with change. There is the customary attitude of many who say, "No," whenever a suggestion is made that appears a bit novel or different. Such an attitude we may call resistance to change. Too many have stumbled over that obstacle, saying in hushed and sepulchral tones, "What was good enough for father, is good enough for me." Unfortunately that attitude is applied more often in the field of religion than in the driving of a stream-lined V-8 instead of a Model T. Yet out of religion come the vital issues of advancing life.

Even the flowers of the field know that change is essential. At least they respond on that basis to the turn of the seasons, whether in the tropics

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

790
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 15

or the temperate zone. For when they are given better soil, more sunlight, and adequate moisture they emerge from stunted specimens to be the equals and more of Solomon in all his glory.

The other alternative we may adopt when face to face with change is that of a readiness to change. By that I do not mean the colour adaptations of a chameleon-like existence where environment controls our thought, word and deed. Rather a readiness to change indicates progress in place of stagnation. Life in its lowest and highest forms represents motion, whether it is infinitesimal or majestic. Upon that law vital changes are predicated.

Change is composed of action and re-action just as one of the basic principles of physics is constituted. Change batters down the barriers that bar the way to advance. When we choose the gate-way of change we set our faces to go on into the brave new world of an advancing future.

Watch the opening petals of a night-blooming cereus if you would know the truth of unfolding change. For months, perhaps for years, the laws work on when we cannot, or will not, or do not notice. Then it seems, almost in an instant, the change comes. We sometimes forget the long compulsion of great forces and see only the immediate transformation.

What shall we call the third force that will shed about us the perfumed essence of advance? The writer of Hebrews called it "faith." Perhaps we will not violate the spirit of the text if we call it "fellowship with the Eternal."

Some lives seem to be like the fish-ponds of Penang—swarming with fish that serve no purpose and live only that they may gorge themselves with what is thrown to them. In such lives is no light of the sun, neither of the moon. All is evil from the outward appearance and action. Have you ever looked down into the bottomless pit through the eyes of a man or woman? It is an awful experience. It is disheartening. Then, have you gone on your stumbling way until one day you were allowed to look up to the heights of the highest heaven through human eyes that held the reflection of God in His goodness?

Man holds within himself the worst and the best. It is when fellowship with the Eternal assumes its place in a man's life that man is able to secure for himself the essence that perfumes his advance. When man substitutes the best for the worst he is seen to desire a better country.

It is when men and women no longer feel themselves to be strangers in a strange Satanic land but friends in a fellowship kingdom with God that the country-side is truly visible in its actual reality. Oh, the things we see—and never see.

The faith to remove mountains is a human possibility. It is the calm at the heart of the cyclone. It is the still small voice of everlasting life. It is the power of the divine dynamo of the universe. It is the altar of spiritual roses distilled from a million human petals.

Out of knowledge shall be gathered wisdom. Out of change will emerge creation. Out of fellowship with the Eternal will be fashioned the future. The blend of all three will give us the essence of advance. Out of the blend will come the divine spark that shall kindle the word of men and women into a blazing Christian conflagration, from which will emerge the refined metal of religious leadership for the new age that is to be.

In the grounds of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, Mass., there is a splendid statue. It represents an Indian bronzed by the sun and the wind, sitting astride his horse. His arms are raised in adoration and praise and exultation. His head is thrown back as he breathes in all the strength of his mature manhood the breath of the dawn in the first full freshness of the sunrise. The rhythmic appeal of the riding figure holds the wisdom born of knowledge, the stimulating acceptance of change, the faith in divine fellowship of all who desire a better country.

Thus we may go forth in peace and pleasure knowing that, despite our darkest difficulties and the seemingly insurmountable human mountain passes, God has provided some better thing for us. Therefore, we truly and earnestly desire a better country. Though the land of our heart's desire may be now concealed, one day it shall be revealed. In that faith for the future lies the essence of advance.

A PLEA FOR MARRIAGE REFORM.

(BY DR. S. MUTHULAKSHMI REDDI)

Marriage at any cost, under any circumstances, and at any age, has proved a bane to our Hindu community and has produced many undesirable results. Parents in their anxiety to get their girls married out of respect for an ancient custom and out of an unfounded fear that their girls and boys may become uncontrollable and immoral, have often failed to gain their object—namely to settle their children in happy and peaceful home life. The prospective son-in-law in most cases happens to be a student and has not finished his school or college course. The father-in-law has to help him with money even to complete his educational course. (He could have as well spent that amount on his own daughter's education and made her self-reliant.) Nowadays a mere B. A. or B. L. does not get on in life as well as he is expected to fare by his people who have spent all they possessed upon his education. All the same, the boy has to take his wife home whether he is settled in life or not, it may be because he himself wants to have his wife with him or his parents want their daughter-in-law to help the family in house-hold duties. Very soon children arrive in the family which further add to its expense.

Many fathers of large families being unemployed or turned out of their usual work do not easily secure a job in these days of economic depression and retrenchment in every Government Department. Very often the work itself being unsuitable tells upon the health of the father who becomes invalided and unable to earn. This is a common phenomenon in this unfortunate country owing to the frequent prevalence of epidemic diseases and malarial and other infectious fevers. Many such cases have sought our help. The poor mother of the children becomes either widowed or, worse than that, deserted by irresponsible husbands and fathers who to escape from the burden and worry of the family even disappear out of sight. The relations, if any, very often are neither inclined nor in a position to help these people. The deserted mother has to sell all her belongings not only to keep her children and herself alive but also to trace the whereabouts of her unfaithful husband without success. The desertion of wives and children is becoming rather frequent of late with the consequent demoralisation of society.

The parents of children consider it their primary duty to get the children married, but they never think of making any provision for their future well-being. Even intelligent handsome girls born of poor parents are given away in a hurry to old men and widowers with a number of children by their first wives, who die soon leaving the young wife and her children unprovided for. Girls of real1936r.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

791

poor parents are given away to worthless and ill-brought up young men who do not hesitate to cast them away when it pleases their fancy. The last class of boys are very often infected with venereal disease and the poor ignorant wife also suffers from the ill-behaviour and immorality of their husbands.

We are glad that the widow's cause has found both public sympathy and Government help, but that of the deserted wife and the deserted mother and her children who face a harder lot, have not yet been sufficiently brought before the public eye. They suffer from both social and legal disabilities much more than a widow. There are a number of young women and girls who for no fault of their own have been deserted by their husbands who, to make matters worse, have remarried and live with their second wives. Parents of girls, though conscious of a similar fate befalling their own daughters, do not hesitate to give their daughters in marriage to a man who has proved a tyrant to his first wife, because girls must be married at any cost. Further the deserted wife is not very often left in peace. Even hospitals and adult women institutions will not admit them for fear of their being annoyed by the husband in the middle of their training for a profession, as the Hindu wife according to the present Hindu law is the absolute property of her husband.

Those of us who are associated with the Homes of shelter and protection for women have gone through unforgettable experiences. In Madras, on the one side, there were marriage celebrations, rejoicings, festivities and blessings to the newly wedded couple and on the other side there was the sorry spectacle of a number of poor and destitute widows, young and old, and deserted wives, young wives and mothers who undertake the responsibility of looking after their off-spring—it is by far wiser to remain single and content till such period when they could find sufficient means to run a comfortable home. Scientific research has shown that continence is conducive to health and longevity and to moral, intellectual and physical development of the individual. We have examples in our literature of a Bhishma and a Hanuman and innumerable Rishis and sages, the modern Ramakrishna and Vivekananda and all that noble band of workers that have adorned our motherland. Let us bring back to our modern society our ancient ideals of chastity, self-control, and renunciation as self-indulgence and selfishness brings in its train disease and death. We have been taught by our great men and women and also by our modern scientists that self-control is possible and should be practised by all. The practice of every virtue is no doubt very difficult, but on that account are we to teach our young men and women the contrary? It is true that some are not capable of being virtuous and good. But all the same it is our duty constantly to teach the application of the right principles of life. We should never advocate early and indiscriminate marriage and at the same time the evasion of its sacred duties and responsibilities by the practice of birth control.

In this connection, I may mention that Deshmukh's Bill which aims at giving inheritance and property rights to Hindu women, wives, widows and daughters might to a certain extent alleviate the existing conditions by securing for women better economic and legal and social status, and indirectly by lessening the demand of big dowries by the bridegrooms.

Further to prevent neglect and desertion of wives and mothers and their children for no fault on their part, the Hindu Law of marriage must be made just and equitable between the sexes. We all condemn the practice of divorce in the west, but here in its place we have a one-sided divorce; the husband practically divorces his wife and has his own way without making any amends for her and her children. This is certainly equally bad, even worse as our present law gives the right only to the husband to do what he pleases with his wife and children. Even when the husband is well-to-do and is earning a good salary, the deserted wife, if she is parentless or when the parents are poor, has to suffer in poverty and in distress. She has neither the means nor the knowledge to seek redress from a cruel and unkind husband.

Meanwhile we have to give some immediate relief to distressed widows, deserted widows, deserted wives, mothers and children. Many of these are honest and willing to engage themselves in any honourable work or occupation and to maintain themselves and their children. And it is incumbent upon the society and upon the government to give them such a relief.

PARSI POVERTY.

(BY P. A. WADIA)

We have analysed the following five classes among recipients of charity relief:—

(1) Families with earning members ...	627 cases.
(2) Widows with earning sons... ..	166 „
(3) Widows with small children and grown-up girls	179 „
(4) Married couples	70 „
(5) Single widows	99 „

The question as to how much in the shape of income a family would require per head every month to provide themselves with the bare necessities of life including food, clothing and fuel has been very often asked. With a family of two to three souls the minimum requirements per head have been put down at Rs. 15 to 16 p. m. With a large family this amount would naturally diminish; but we would hesitate to put it at lower than Rs. 12 p. m. per head even in a family of eight to nine souls. These estimates are based upon figures worked out by the Sree Zarhosti Mandal and reproduced in appendix 4 of the book on Parsi Charity Relief by Dr. J. F. Bulsara, the joint Secretary of the Parsi Panchayat Funds. The estimates there given do not include clothing which is as much a necessity of life as food, and we have therefore added about Rs. 3 per head for this purpose. Dr. Bulsara in his book on Parsi Charity Relief estimates the total number of people who receive help in one form or other at 7,000 to 8,000 souls. We in our last annual report for 1933-34 have put down the figure of recipients of doles in the community at 2,500 families and individuals—that is, about 10,000 souls calculating on an average of four members to a family. We have also indicated in our last annual report that we were responsible for arranging help to the extent of Rs. 1,40,000 per year for 1,224 cases. We have further indicated that in the last year the total amount of help spent by the community was Rs. 4,25,000.

Planning for the minimum number of 2,500 families of 10,000 souls and assuming that the mean rents, earnings, help, etc., will be proportionately the same in the case of this 2,500 families as in the case of the 627 families which we have studied we would require for these 2,500 families an additional help of Rs. 63,500 roughly a month or Rs. 7,62,000 per year. With this additional help, 2,500 families can be lifted out of their present condition which is

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

792
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 15]

that of under-feeding and starvation and be provided with the prime necessities—namely, housing, food and clothing.

We should like to guard ourselves against misunderstanding at this stage. When we make an estimate of the total amount that our community would require to save 2,500 families from poverty and its consequences, we do not for a moment wish to imply that the community should spend this amount in the form of doles or otherwise on the families that need them or that these families should be provided with these necessities as gifts. We have repeatedly observed that such a system demoralises both the giver and the receiver. Under an economic organisation like ours resting on a basis of capitalism and individualism, if people can get a sufficient amount of money in the shape of doles to live on, most of them would shirk work and if the help is proportioned to the number of children it would be a strong incentive to reckless propagation. We are already noticing in our community this tendency to reckless propagation amongst the classes that are on the margin of subsistence or in receipt of doles. Our intention is to point out to our community that if a system of doles is logically followed out, and if the object of the dole is to provide the bare necessities of life to those who are unable to provide these by their own earnings or otherwise, we would require under present circumstances, in addition to Rs. 4,25,000 per year another Rs. 7,62,000. If such a total of Rs. 12,00,000 a year is secured and if the community employs its best available talent in carefully planning out far-sighted schemes for lifting these 2,500 families into self-respecting and self-supporting members of the community, it would be loyal to its traditions not only of large-hearted philanthropy but also of that common sense and intelligence which marked and were responsible for their prosperity in the past.

Our object on the present occasion is to point out the extent of poverty that prevails in the community, the under-feeding that exists in a fairly large proportion of the families that are helped, the vicious circle into which a system of doles has plunged us, and the amount of help in various shapes that would be needed if this policy of doles is persisted in. There are two alternatives before the community; one of them is to bring down the artificially high standard to which as a community we are said to be getting accustomed, so as to enable the members of our community to compete on more equal terms with other communities in the struggle for life. Assuming on the other hand that the present standard of living to which our community is accustomed is not artificially high, and that it has got to be maintained, the only other alternative that remains is to see that the large amount of money that our community spends in the name of charity, and the still larger amount that it may be possible to draw hereafter from the community, is spent in such a manner that those who are dependent on charities today will either in their own generation or in the succeeding generation cease to be so dependent, and be able to look after themselves as self-respecting and self-dependent units. With the resources at our disposal, and with co-operation between those who administer charities in various forms, it may be possible to establish colonies even in the city itself where with a common kitchen, cheap residences, medical assistance and efficient educational institutions, those who are receiving today doles and outside help will be saved their self-respect, will contribute by their work, in proportion to their ability, towards their own maintenance, and where the future generation may be brought up in health and educated as earning members of Society.

Fourteen years ago, that is within a year and a half after the institution of our Society, our Society drew the attention of the community to certain facts and figures concerning Parsi Poverty in a leaflet which the Society printed for the information of the community. The statements that we then made have been fully confirmed by the events of the last fourteen years. In this leaflet to which we have referred we spoke about the starting of an Institution "where (1) families might be housed in healthy surroundings and under sanitary conditions, (2) they might be fed on simple but wholesome food good enough to keep them physically fit, (3) they might have proper medical advice and treatment when ill, (4) they might have proper facilities for the education of the children, and for their own training in such occupations as would increase their earning capacity. In order that such families may not lose their sense of self-respect, nor have their finer susceptibilities benumbed, the members of such families who are fit for work should contribute out of their earnings towards their own maintenance a sum not exceeding a certain percentage of their earnings or not exceeding a fixed sum per month per head."

An Institution or Institutions like the one we suggested 14 years ago might not be difficult to organise and work, with the co-operation of the trustees of charity fund in charity chawls where already a large number of the recipients of doles are at present concentrated. Common kitchens, common laundries, and schools for the education of children worked in these centres on a co-operative basis partly with the help of the inmates of these new colonies, might bring an enormous amount of economy and saving as compared with the present unregulated system of doles to isolated families. Fourteen years have passed since we made this suggestion and we again earnestly call the attention of our community to the necessity of devising far-sighted measures along these lines instead of continuing the system of doles to which even our Society has in spite of itself been a reluctant party.

IN PRAISE OF THE MIDDLE-AGED.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. A. G. Vere's plea for the middle-aged which you published in your issue of August 8, was a good effort so far as Mr. Vere was concerned but is it good enough for the middle-aged? After all we are not a suppressed part of the community like the depressed classes or women, nor a despised section of it like the middle classes. We may not get the applause of the world as much as youth and old age do. But we more than others are the world. We are the persons who laugh young enthusiasms out of court and who are not taken in by the lamentations of the aged. The twentieth century in exalting democracy, has paved the way for the mediocre. The middle-aged has come into its own. There is no need to plea for us, for we have at last inherited the earth. Let Mr. Vere take heart from the two extracts given below from current literature.

Nowhere has middle age received a better tribute than in Anthony Adverse the novel which created a sensation in America two years back. The quaint Carlo Cibo, a Spaniard settled in South America, tells the hero: "When we are still young we think a great many people whom we meet are extraordinary. There is no one else in the world like them, we feel sure. Also our precious selves are without parallel. The world, we think, is not subtle enough to

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

793

understand us. But we are wrong. The adult world is far too subtle to waste much time on us. It understands us instinctively by just remembering itself. It has thought through all our thoughts and is tired of our violent emotions. It does not need to care about youth because it knows youth will get older. Grow up as soon as you can. It pays. The only time you really live fully is from thirty to sixty, provided of course you are healthy and do not die. No, the young are slaves to dreams; the old servants of regrets. Only the middle-aged have their five senses in the keeping of their wits.

The Chinese writer, Dr. Lin Yutang, approaches very near this conclusion but stops short of it. "The Chinese young man," he writes in 'My Country and My People', "comes back from Europe or America and begins to manufacture tooth paste and calls it 'saving the country by industrialization' or he translates American free verse and calls it 'introduction of Western culture'. And since he has usually a big family to support and some cousins for whom to secure positions, he must think of ways and means to rise higher and by that way be a good member of his family. That process of rising higher teaches him some memorable lessons of life and if he escapes all that and remains a hot-headed, round-eyed innocent young man at thirty, he is either an inspired idiot or a confounded genius."

Bombay,
August 10, 1936 }

Yours etc.,
"MIDDLE-AGED."

CASTE IN INDO-EUROPE.

The Editor,
The Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

Your reference to the breach of promise case, which ended in the award of a farthing to the country born European woman hair-dresser, reminds me of another interesting story.

A respectable Anglo-Indian gentleman of Madras decided to adopt an English child as his daughter. His offer of a happy home for an orphan girl was accepted by the authorities of a foundling home in London, similar to the "League of Mercy" in Bombay, and a little girl named Doris Hawker arrived in Madras in April 1923. When the child's prospective foster-father boarded the steamer to receive her, some of the European passengers discovered that he was not a "pure" European. To join them in their expressions of horror and indignation, they requisitioned the assistance of the Madras Mail which readily went to their rescue, and together they created such an uproar that the Madras officials were frightened into taking action in the interest of peace. Loaded with bags of sweets and toys, little Doris was sent back to her home in one of the slums of London.

Commenting on the incident, another newspaper called special attention to the indecision of the Anglo-Indian to declare his race as European or Indian, and wrote apologetically that the Anglo-Indian is in the position of the immortal ass which the Greek philosopher asserted would inevitably die of starvation if placed exactly equi-distant between two trusses of hay, from sheer inability to make up its mind which to attack first.

Sylvan Coonoor,
5th August 1936. }

Yours etc.,
M. G. JOSEPH.

"UNITY" OF CHICAGO.

The following appears in Unity:-

Unity's circulation is beginning to move again. New subscribers are coming in. We have been suffering losses during these last few years, and thus seeing our subscription list go down, and down. There was nothing we could do about it. No churches to appeal to for aid; no societies or organized groups of any kind to help us out; no money for advertising or other publicity devices! So we just sat tight, waiting for the depression to blow by, and hoping that we would not perish before the weather changed. That it was a hard struggle goes without saying. Had it not been for that peculiarly intimate and even affectionate loyalty which binds the subscribers of Unity to one another and to the paper in a fellowship which is itself as real as any church, we would not have survived. But the members of the family stood by—all did who could!—and now we are gaining new members, and the good old days are in sight again. What we need, right off, is a large increase in circulation. Why shouldn't we have it? The management of Unity was never more vigorous and alert, its editorial mind never more free, its array of writers, book reviewers, poets never before so large and able, its whole policy and purpose never so much needed as at this moment when prejudice, hate, and the menace of war lower upon us like approaching storms. We are constantly told, to our vast encouragement, that "there is no paper like Unity." But if that is so, why shouldn't more people, like-minded with ourselves, know about it, and join, as we believe they would be glad to join, our fellowship of faith? Come, friends, help us! Here is our paper, prepared and published with labor and love. But we can't distribute it without your cooperation. It is you who must take this paper and get it into the hands and hearts of those who rejoice in it and sustain it even as you do. Why should not each present subscriber find at least one new subscriber? Our subscription list doubled! Think of what that would mean!

WOMEN'S ELECTION MANIFESTO.

The Standing Committee of the All-India Women's Conference met in Waltham, held sittings from July 25-28 and discussed several questions concerning the women's movement in India.

The Standing Committee resolved to agitate for franchise and representation of women in regard to local bodies where these rights do not exist, as it is very paradoxical that although women have been accorded certain rights of voting and representation in regard to the Central and Provincial Legislatures and Municipalities, they have been left out of any participation in the activities of certain local bodies.

A joint memorandum on the political, economic, legal and educational status of women was drawn up to be forwarded to the League of Nations and international women's organisations, and a copy sent to the Government of India.

It was decided to hold the next annual session of the All-India Women's Conference at Ahmedabad from December 22 to December 24 this year.

It was also decided to appeal for a Central Fund for the Office of the All-India Women's Conference.

The following manifesto, to be issued on behalf of the All-India Women's Conference to candidates for the coming elections to the legislatures, was also prepared:-

We hereby desire to make an appeal to all candidates for the various legislatures to keep in mind questions concerning the general welfare and the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

794
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 15

social, economic and political progress of the country for which we stand.

It is now a recognised fact that women have their own special contribution to make in the public life of every country and the educated women of India are fully alive to their duties and responsibilities. For the attainment of full and free opportunities of service we feel that all sex disqualifications should be removed and that wide measures of social and educational reform should be sponsored by our legislators. To this end, we draw your special attention to the following questions which we consider to be of urgent importance.

Are you in favour of and will you give your active support to equal opportunities for all by removal of untouchability and sex disqualifications, whether legal or social, or in any sphere of public activity; are you in favour of and will you give your active support to educational reform by instituting free compulsory and universal primary education, by the removal of mass illiteracy, by a remodelling of the entire system of secondary education, with a view to turning out useful citizens and by instituting vocational training; are you in favour of and will you give your active support to Rural Reconstruction by patronage and development of indigenous and cottage industries and improved sanitation and medical facilities; are you in favour of and will you give your active support to social reforms such as the removal of purdah and polygamy, early marriage and immoral traffic in women and children, and the protection of young people from the evils of drugs, drink, tobacco, exploitation and cruelty etc.; are you in favour of and will you give your active support to public health questions such as infant and maternity welfare centres and creches, the early formation of a National Tuberculosis Association, adequate measures to cope with social diseases, leprosy, cancer, etc.; will you support social insurance for the sick, aged, unemployed and injured by accidents and maternity benefits; will you actively support the solution of the unemployment question both among the labouring and educated classes; and will you give your active support to the protection of civil liberties?

"CRITICISM WITHOUT KNOWLEDGE."

Writes the Examiners (Roman Catholic, Bombay):—

The Indian Social Reformer again writes on "Civil Marriage and the Catholic Church," but it has not taken our friendly advice first to study the question in an authorized Catholic Manual, with the result that it again writes nonsense. It is a discussion which arose out of an article by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, in which she accused the Church in Italy of "lending the odour of sanctity to concubinage." The Universe of March 20 gave a complete answer to Miss Pankhurst's charges and this is also an answer to the Indian Social Reformer's comment so far as we can understand that very confused note:

"Miss Pankhurst quotes certain documents which, she says, prove her case. The chief document is an Instruction issued by the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments on January 25, 1927. Paragraph 18 of this instruction is quoted by Miss Pankhurst, but only in part. This section of the Instruction is concerned with persons who before the Concordat, had entered into a civil, but not a religious marriage, 'a hypothesis,' says the Instruction, 'which ought not to be realised under the regime of the Concordat.' If this purely civil marriage was entered into by Catholics, they did so in defiance of the laws of the Church, and their marriage was no marriage at all in the eyes of the Church. But the Instruction makes provision for a religious ceremony, which however, will not be followed by provision for the civil effects of marriage, as in other cases, for these already exist, by virtue of the previous civil marriage.

"Now we come to the part quoted by Miss Pankhurst. This deals with a proposed religious marriage between two persons, one of whom had gone through a previous 'civil' marriage with another party. The Church, of course, does not recognise the religious validity of such a civil marriage, in the case of the Catholic, and, therefore, from her standpoint, the party may in certain circumstances be free to marry someone else religiously, in the Catholic Church. It is, of course, assumed that there is no moral obligation to marry religiously the original party. What is the Church to do in this case? The Instruction says that the parish priest is to refer the case to the Bishop. If the Bishop decides to permit the religious marriage proposed, this cannot, of course, be inscribed in the civil registers of the State, and equally clearly, such a marriage will not have the civil effects of marriage, from the standpoint of the State.

"It is obvious that this provision deals with what are called 'marriages of conscience,' and for a grave reason, the Bishop may permit such a religious marriage to be celebrated, even though it cannot be recognised as a marriage by the civil law. According to the civil law the person is married to one individual; according to the Church law the person is married to another. But neither civil nor Church law regards the person as married to two individuals, and there is no question whatever of 'lending the odour of sanctity to concubinage.'

"Miss Pankhurst goes on, not to quote, but to 'summarise,' another part of the Instruction, to the effect that 'State officials, soldiers, diplomatic officials and all who are forbidden to marry without special State authorisation, may be given a religious marriage without civil consequence.' But she omits the express condition which the document lays down 'if grave reasons of conscience shall persuade the Ordinary to permit it.'

"The other provisions to which Miss Pankhurst refers, all admit of a similar explanation. Once again, therefore, we suggest that Miss Pankhurst has completely misunderstood the situation."

DEPRESSED CLASSES AND CONVERSION.

Dr. Ambedkar's views on the relative advantages to the Depressed Classes of embracing one religion or the other, and the formula agreed upon between Dr. Ambedkar and Dr. B. S. Moonje, are disclosed in the correspondence released to the Press.

Dr. Moonje, writing from New Delhi, on June 30 to Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah, enclosed the formula which was:

"If Dr. Ambedkar were to announce his decision that he and his followers are prepared to embrace Sikhism in preference to Islam and Christianity and that he shall honestly and sincerely co-operate with the Hindus and the Sikhs in propagating their culture and in counteracting the Muslim and Christian movements for drawing the Depressed Classes into their folds, the Hindu Mahasabha will be prepared, in view of their having agreed to remain within the Hindu culture, to make an announcement that it will not object:—

1. To the conversion of the Depressed Classes to Sikhism;
2. To the inclusion of the Neo-Sikhs in the list of the Scheduled Castes; and

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

795

3. To the enjoyment by the Depressed Classes of the Political rights of the Poona Pact by free competition between the Non-Sikh and the Neo-Sikh Depressed Classes as provided for under the Poona Pact."

Dr. Moonje also enclosed a copy of the statement of Dr. Ambedkar's case.

Dr. Ambedkar's statement, among other things, said that there are three faiths from among which the Depressed Classes can choose: (1) Islam (2) Christianity and (3) Sikhism. Comparing these three, Islam seems to give the Depressed Classes all that they need. Financially, the resources behind Islam are boundless. Socially the Muslims are spread all over India. There are Muslims in every Province and they can take care of the new converts from the Depressed Classes and render them all help. Politically, the Depressed Classes will get all the rights which Muslims are entitled to. Conversion to Islam does not involve loss of such political rights, as the right to special representation in the Legislature, right to services, etc.

Christianity seems equally attractive. If Indian Christians are too small numerically to provide the financial resources necessary for the conversion of the Depressed Classes the Christian countries such as America and England will pour their immense resources if the Depressed Classes show their readiness to embrace Christianity. Socially, the Christian community is numerically too weak to render much support to the converts from the Depressed Classes but Christianity has Government behind it. Politically, Christianity will give them the same rights which Islam gives. Like the Muslims, Indian Christians are also recognised by the Constitution for special representation in the Legislatures and in the services.

Compared to Christianity and Islam Sikhism has few attractions. Being a small community of 40 lakhs, the Sikhs cannot provide the finance. Socially they cannot be of much help to the Depressed Classes, they are confined to the Punjab, and as for the majority of the Depressed Classes the Sikhs give them no special support. Politically, Sikhism is at a positive disadvantage compared with Islam or Christianity. Outside the Punjab Sikhs are not recognised for special representation in the Legislature and in the services.

The second question is, looking at these three alternative faiths purely from the standpoint of the Hindus, which is the best—Islam, Christianity or Sikhism? Obviously, Sikhism is the best. If the Depressed Classes join Islam or Christianity they not only go out of the Hindu religion, but they also go out of the Hindu culture. On the other hand, if they become Sikhs they remain within the Hindu culture. This is by no means a small advantage to the Hindus.

What the consequences of conversion will be to the country as a whole is well worth bearing in mind. Conversion to Islam or Christianity will denationalise the Depressed Classes. If they go to Islam the number of Muslims will be doubled and the danger of Muslim domination also becomes real. If they go to Christianity, the numerical strength of Christians becomes five to six crores. It will help to strengthen the hold of the British on this country. On the other hand, if they embrace Sikhism they will not only not harm the destiny of the country but they will help the destiny of the country. They will not be denationalised. On the contrary, they will be a help in the political advancement of the country. Thus it is in the interest of the country that the Depressed Classes, if they are to change their faith, should go over to Sikhism.

The third question is if it is in the interest of the Hindus that the Depressed Classes should go over to Sikhism are the Hindus prepared to make Sikhism as good an alternative to the Depressed Classes as Islam or Christianity is? If they are, then obviously they must try to remove the difficulties which lie in the way of Sikhism as compared with Islam and Christianity. The deficiencies are financial, social and political. The Hindus cannot help Sikhs to remove the social difficulty. But they can certainly help the Sikhs to remove the financial and political difficulties. Of these, it is most urgent to remove the political difficulty because it might become an obstacle in the way of the Sikhs.

The statement concludes with a discussion of the proposal to add Sikhs to the list of scheduled castes in the different provinces.

Rao Bahadur M. C. Raja, replying to Dr. Moonje, said:

I make a distinction between conversion which is a spiritual change and migration from one community to another for social, economic and political reasons. One would expect the President of the Hindu Mahasabha to view it as a religious problem and not merely as a political problem, without even looking at it as a social and economic problem. One can understand your concern if as President of the Hindu Mahasabha you placed the spiritual welfare of the Depressed Classes first and foremost and thought of the social and economic welfare next and lastly thought of them as a political factor. One would expect you as President of the Hindu Mahasabha to ameliorate the social condition of the Depressed Classes by removing civic and social disabilities of these classes, not to speak of securing for them the right of worship in Hindu temples on an equal footing with other worshippers, and to further the Harijan movement started by Mr. Gandhi all over the country. Instead of doing this what is it that you are doing? You are dissecting the Depressed Classes and affiliating them religiously to the Sikhs, while retaining them politically as Hindus.

The whole thing seems to me not to be conceived in the interest of the Depressed Classes but, on the other hand, to be planned in the communal interest of the Hindus and the Sikhs. We want to remain as a solid community moving of our own accord in the direction of progress and this we can best do by not throwing away our birthrights as Hindus but by remaining within Hinduism and changing it so as to make it more comfortable not only to our community but to other Hindu communities. We do not wish to be pawns in the game of communal conflicts and competition.

Your proposal involves the electoral fortunes of Hindus, Sikhs and the Muslims. If you want us to shift religiously from the Hindu fold, we shall have to choose religion between the Sikhs and the Muslims who are the bidders for our communal migration, wrongly called conversion. Why should we antagonise and stand arrayed against Muslims? They are our brothers as much as the Sikhs and the Hindus. If the depressed classes are all to become Sikhs and call themselves neo-Sikhs it will create all over India a Sikh-Hindu-Muslim problem as in the Punjab made more complicated by the fact that the so-called neo-Sikhs belong to the Depressed Classes even among Sikhs.

This question of conversion or communal migration as a move on the political chess-board does not disturb us much in South India. We are content to work under the Poona Pact. I would urge the Hindu Mahasabha to address itself to the task of making it easy for the Depressed Classes to stay within Hinduism and Hindu society instead of arranging for a ticket for entraining them to some far-off destination.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 15

Mr. C. Rajagopalachari writing to Mr. Rajah, characterised the whole thing as a "diabolical proposal."

Mr. Gandhi's letter to Mr. Rajah dated July 26 stated:—

"I have no difficulty about giving general endorsement to your letter to Dr. Moonje. I do not at all understand Dr. Moonje's or Dr. Ambedkar's position. For me removal of untouchability stands on a footing all its own. It is to me a deeply religious question. The very existence of our religion depends on its voluntary removal by Savarana Hindus in the spirit of repentance. It can never be a question of barter for me. And I glad you take nearly the same position that I do."

A telegram from Pandit M. M. Malaviya dated July 30 to Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah stated that the Pandit agreed with Mr. Rajah.

CHRISTIANS AND THE DEPRESSED CLASSES.

Under the title "A call to help in reaching the leaders of the Depressed Classes with Christian Literature" the Rev. J. Holmes Smith has addressed "a letter to all Christians living in India" which we reprint below from the Dnyanodaya:—

There is a vast restlessness among large sections of the population. The whole of the Depressed Classes, Aboriginal Tribes, and certain sections of the touchable Shudras are dissatisfied with their condition. They have a vague idea that the root trouble is the religious system which assumes that they are inferior peoples. They are in a frame of mind to hear about the Saviour who deliberately chose as the keynote of His ministry the declaration:

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me: for he has consecrated me to preach the Gospel to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim release for captives and recovery of sight for the blind, to set free the oppressed to proclaim the Lord's year of favour." [Luke IV : 18]

This restlessness has been augmented by Dr. Ambedkar's pronouncement. But it smoldered for many years before the rise of Ambedkar, and it is found in many parts of the country where Ambedkar's name is never heard. This restlessness and longing are part of the reason why 125,000 Untouchables a year entered the Christian fold during the last decade; and why probably a much larger number each year are now crowding into the Kingdom—wholly apart from Dr. Ambedkar and his pronouncements and programme.

It is of the greatest importance that the leaders of these people who are looking for a way out be reached with Christian Literature. Arrangements are being made to send to a select group of Depressed Classes and Aboriginal Leaders a monthly tract especially prepared for them. Our literature will include a covering letter each month, and month by month:—

1. Gospel of St. Luke, with appropriate comments.
2. The story of Ditt, a humble Church convert, who refused to be segregated in the Mission Compound, and led under God, a mighty Movement of his former caste fellows into the Christian Church.
3. "The Good News of Christ for the Depressed Classes" and "What Woman-hood owes to Christ," by the Rev. John Subhan and Mrs. Mohini Dass.
4. "The Christian Programme for Reconstruction," by Dr. E. Stanley Jones.
5. "Movements of Depressed Classes into Christianity"—a digest of Dr. J. W. Pickett's "Christian Mass Movements" by the Rev.

J. Holmes Smith. 6. Remarkable story of caste-Mass Movements in the Telugu Field—perhaps a digest of Bishop Pickett's forthcoming book.

These will be mailed out from the Ashram, Lalbagh, Lucknow. They will go to leaders all over India, in the language of the leaders themselves.

In order to assemble the names of such leaders we are appealing to all Christians in India, and especially to lay or pastoral leaders, who have a special responsibility, under God. Please get in contact with the local leaders of your Depressed Classes and please do it soon, for we must have the names of 100 leaders in a given language area before we print in that language.

We wish to define the term "Leaders of the Depressed Classes" so that those of you who are going to co-operate with us by collecting the names and addresses of these people may have a clear idea as to the type of people whose names we wish you to send to us. Please send us the names and addresses and the language they read of those of the Depressed Classes leaders in your city or district, who, if won for Christ, could because of their present position of leadership, pass on the message of Him to a considerable number of their people. While we are asking for the names of those leaders who can read we want to add that if you know of a real leader of these people who is illiterate, please by all means send us his name, especially if you can make provision for the literature being read to him. Kindly send these names to the Rev. J. Holmes Smith, The Ashram, Lal Bagh, Lucknow, U. P., together with a statement as to what language these leaders read with greatest ease and comprehension. In sending their names and addresses, please print both names and addresses, and make sure that the address is adequate.

Needless to say, after these names have been sent in it will be the natural Christian thing to be in constant brotherly contact with these leaders. In his letter on behalf of the Fellowship of Counsel of the National Christian Council, addressed "To All Heads of Missions and Churches" (for private circulation) Bishop Azariah says, "We desire once again to stress the importance of personal witness-bearing by Christians to their neighbours, and especially to those that belong to the exterior castes who are looking out to enter at religion which will give them full opportunities of a better life. If witness-bearing is always the duty of every Christian, it is doubly so at the present moment. Faithful witness-bearing now may win thousands of people; who later may become hardened, or may be infinitely more difficult to reach. We would therefore urge upon all Christians to begin an earnest campaign of witness-bearing to their neighbours of all communities and classes. The voluntary witness to the ordinary Christian man and woman is irresistible."

We would specially call to your attention the need for Christian women visiting and becoming friends of the women-folk of these local Depressed Classes leaders. Jesus Christ has done much for womanhood, and the women of the Depressed Classes need the friendship and teaching of the many Christian women whom Christ has redeemed. This is a unique service which only Christians can perform. There is a clarion call to Christian women, both foreign and Indian, in this situation.

Here is a nation-wide service of which you will wish to avail yourselves. Let us build up a list of names of the leaders who count, and see to it that they receive literature especially fitted for their needs. Please send the names and addresses soon.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

797

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-
THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase-the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT. BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:--BARODA.

Branches:--Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harli (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (M.B. Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsdas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand JDevchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhaillal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I., (Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratlal (Shorrocks Mills, Ltd Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

* Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000, will be allowed at 4 per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 1 1/2 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuoorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to--

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 21, Sprot Road, Ballard Estate,
Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

798
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 15

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT OF 1882.
HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Branches:—

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000
Capital Called up 1,00,00,000
Reserve Fund 1,04,00,000
London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,
Manager.

THE
Central Bank of India, Ltd.
SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. POCHKHANAWALA,
Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL
CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramatti (District Poona)	Viramgam (District Anand)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulia (District West)
Karad (District Satara)	Khandesh
Tasgaon (District Satara)	Dondalcha
Satara (District Satara)	Nandurbar
Kirloskarwadi (District Satara)	Shirpur
Shirala (District Satara)	Shahada
Koregaon (District Ahmednagar)	Sakri
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Sindkheda
Shevgaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Ahmednagar (District Ahmednagar)	Satana
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Kaiwan
Paighat (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch)
Kalyan (District Thana)	Mahals
Akluj (District Sholapur)	Kato

DIRECTORS

Sir Chundilal V. Mehta, K.O.S.I.	Prof. V. G. Kale
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Esq.	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.
Madhoojee D. Thackersey, Esq.	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.
B. G. Saraya, Esq.	D. W. Bant, Esq.
G. P. Murdeshwar, Esq.	F. B. Laxmeshwar, Esq.
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.	C. M. Gandhi, Esq.
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vandeke
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.

SHARE CAPITAL: Rs. 12,00,000
(Fully Paid)

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,

Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,
INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
Kamakshi House,
Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

799

realpatidar.com

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,

Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay. 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—

1. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Emporium, Kitab Mahal, Hornby Road, Fort, BOMBAY.

realpatidar.com

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Registered No. B 348

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office:—KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY AUGUST 22, 1933. No. 51

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice: I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard." WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator

CONTENTS

The Egyptian Settlement,
Civil War in Spain.
Mr. Panikkar Commends the Reforms.
Bhai Parmanand's Libel.
Sir Eric Mielville's Appointment.
Independent Labour Party.
Instrument of Accession.
Congress and Municipal Elections.

The Civil Liberties Union.
Hindu Women's Right to Property Bill.
An Experiment in Education.
The Depressed Indian Christians' Association.
The New Peoples' Party.
The Soul's Sincere Desire.
Hindu Society and the New Constitution.

NOTES

The Egyptian Settlement:—The conclusion of the Treaty between the British and Egyptian Governments, brings to a happy end an embittered relation between the two countries, which has lasted now for the best part of a century. British relations with the Irish Free State appear to be approximating to friendliness since Mr. J. H. Thomas left the Colonial Office. The settlement with Egypt will further lighten the pre-occupations of Great Britain with her associate States, leaving her free to devote her energies to the international situation in Europe. The Indian problem, however, still remains to tax British statesmanship. It is obvious that the solution for it must be found on the same broad lines as the solution of the South African, the Irish and, now, the Egyptian problems. The Hoare scheme embodied in the Government of India Act represents a line of policy altogether different from these. No one in this country is satisfied with it—not the Muslims, not the Liberals, not even Dr. Ambedkar whom Sir Samuel Hoare claimed to be its supporter. Two thoughts occur to our mind arising out of the British Egyptian settlement. Sir Cowasji Jehangir, among other Liberals, has declared that the retrograde provisions of the Hoare Scheme are due to the aggressive activities of the Congress, but for which the new Constitution, in his opinion, would have been a close approach to Dominion self-government. The Egyptian settlement flatly contradicts the view. That settlement is the achievement on the Egyptian side not of the Egyptian equivalent of Indian Liberals but of the Wafdists who correspond to our Congressites. The second thought arising out of the Egyptian settlement concerns Indian States. The position of the Khedive, now King, of Egypt was not dissimilar in its relation both to the Egyptian people and the British Government, to that of Indian Princes. In some respects it was worse. The people of Egypt had no neighbours to whom they could look for support as the people of Indian States do to those of British India. Nevertheless, the Egyptians have succeeded in transforming their Government into a Constitutional Government while, at the same time, they have also achieved the independence of their country with the good wishes of their British overlord. The settlement is creditable both to Egyptian and British statesmanship.

Civil War in Spain:—The fires of the infamous Inquisition are ablaze again in Spain. Civil wars are proverbial for the embittering feelings which they invariably bring in their train. But the bitterness with which the Spanish civil war is being prosecuted, exceeds anything in previous history, and can be only accounted for as the inevitable consequence of a heritage of religious persecution accentuated by the blood thirstiness of the national character fed on bull fights. In this respect, there is nothing to choose between the anti-clerical, materialistic Socialists and the pro-Church, pro-Royalist Fascists. The latest development is the use of poison gas by the Spanish Government against the insurrectionists. In reply to a protest the authorities have broadcast that they will use poison gas against the native Moroccan soldiers and tear gas against Spanish rebels. Latins are supposed to have no race or colour prejudice. Socialism, again, is claimed, not without reason, to overleap race distinctions. In the United States the Socialists have nominated a white man and a negro as their candidates for the Presidentship and vice-Presidentship respectively, at the forthcoming election. The distinction shamelessly avowed by the Spanish Government, besides depriving it of the sympathy of humanitarians, constitutes a calculated outrage on the deepest sentiment of Asiatic and African people. Coming on the heels of the Italian use of poison gas in Ethiopia, the Spanish Government's action tears asunder the thin veil which hides the essential savagery of this oldest of Christian countries in Europe. The Government is obviously losing ground and any day we may hear of the establishment of an imitation Fascist Government in Madrid.

Mr. Panikkar Commends the Reforms:—That the legislatures under the new Reforms will prove a powerful instrument for advancing social reform and remodelling Hindu Society, is the theory propounded with enthusiasm by Mr. K. M. Panikkar at a recent meeting of the

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

802

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 22

East India Association, London. We print extracts from his paper this week. Mr. Panikkar explained that, "what a Government, however well-meaning but alien in its composition, can never undertake with success, the new legislatures, composed entirely of elected representatives, will be forced by the pressure of political opinion to take up." Mr. Panikkar apparently forgets that the new Government takes over from its predecessor the pledge of religious neutrality, traditionally interpreted as social laissez faire. Because a mixed legislature with representatives of all communities in it, cannot be trusted to respect social customs, the Governors and Governor-General have been invested with overruling powers. To say that "Hindu orthodoxy was right in apprehending the creation of such a machinery as the greatest challenge" to it is to exaggerate grossly both the fears of the orthodox and the potentiality of the legislatures. The orthodox Hindu knows from his experience of the Sarda Act that he can count on rallying the orthodox of other communities to his side in opposing reform. Even if the reformed legislature accepts a measure, conservatives can always appeal to the Governor to veto it as an interference with the rights of the community and it is conceivable that the Governor might be persuaded to intervene on the ground that the legislature was not a purely Hindu body. In the case of other communities, he will feel morally bound to protect minority rights against legislation put through with the help of an "alien" majority. Mr. Panikkar, we are afraid, has fallen into the error of regarding the words, 'Hindu' and 'Indian', as synonymous—a mistake common in Europe and America. The new constitution far from being a source of strength to reformers is favourable to reactionary elements in society. Hindu orthodoxy has not protested against it so far as we are aware. It is the reformers who have felt that they will be hampered in their work by the cutting up of British India into provinces and communities. To place the responsibility of "remodelling Hindu society" through these legislatures on social reformers is ridiculous. Social reformers with a far greater record of practical work have expressed their fear that social legislation under the new constitution will be more difficult than under the present one. Mr. N. M. Joshi, of the Servants of India Society, who, besides being a pioneer in social service, has a wide experience of the Indian Legislature, said this in so many words in the Legislative Assembly not long ago. Besides, that a politically retrograde measure can assist social progress is a doctrine that finds no support.

Bhai Parmanand's Libel:—Bhai Parmanand may be a devout Hindu but he seems to be an intemperate politician. In a recent outburst against the Congress he seems to have made a sweeping statement about the women who have joined the Congress. We do not know why the Bhai made women the target of his invective and not the men. It was perhaps because he feared that men might resent his abuse in a way which he might not like while it is safe to abuse women. When this leader of the Hindu Mahasabha went to Cawnpore to address the young men of the place, the latter had the good sense and the decency to howl him down and to make it a condition that he should withdraw and apologise for his attack on women before they would hear him. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru who is at present keen on civil liberties, has thought fit to admonish the young men for their infringement of the right of free speech in the case of the vituperative Bhai. Free speech is not foul speech, and while we are as keen for freedom of speech as the Pandit we should draw the line at a wholesale libel such as Bhai Parmanand appears to have perpetrated. The young men of Cawnpore are imbued with the spirit of non-violence and the step they took to give expression to their outraged feelings must commend itself to everyone who values freedom of speech as distinguished from license. In an explanation which Bhai Parmanand has been compelled to issue, he denies having made any insulting remark about Congress women. Bhai Parmanand adds that he merely remarked that he has no respect or regard for Congress men and women who took part in the civil disobedience movement with narrow selfish motives. The Bhai ought to know best what he wrote. But it is difficult to believe that a harmless self-evident proposition of this kind could be distorted into a sinister libel. It is significant that Mr. Ganpat Rai, Secretary of the Hindu Sabha and a disciple of the Bhai, has also understood his remarks to be a criticism levelled at women in the Congress. He writes:—"Bhai Parmanand and many other Hindu Mahasabha leaders of the orthodox wing are of opinion that women should not be brought to the sphere of active politics and specially in association with men other than their relatives, in public bodies and public institutions. The sphere of women is primarily the home, and for public life they should form their own associations and institutions and should represent their matters to public bodies and institutions constituted by men. For Bhai Parmanand the ability to protect its womanhood is the acid test of a nation's prestige and power." From this outlook to abusing women who do take part in politics, is but a step and a very short step at that. Mr. Ganpat Rai is entitled to regard Bhai Parmanand as a social reformer in spite of his views. But we do not think any one else will agree with him.

Sir Eric Mievill's Appointment:—The London correspondent of the Hindu reports that Reynold's News puts a strange interpretation on Sir Eric Mievill's appointment as Private Secretary to the Duke of York. He says: "Attaching special significance to the appointment of Sir Eric Mievill as Private Secretary to the Duke of York, Reynold's Illustrated News sees in it a forecast of the Duke of York himself ultimately becoming Viceroy of India." Sir

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com
1933]

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

803

Eric', says the journal mentioned, 'was a discovery of the Marquis of Willingdon who appointed him his Private Secretary. Last October Sir Eric was promoted to be on the Secretariat of the Executive Council of the Governor-General—a highly responsible post. The fact that he has been suddenly recalled and appointed to the Duke of York's household is regarded, therefore, as being highly significant. For more than a year the appointment of a member of the Royal Family to be Governor-General of India has been under discussion.' The idea that Sir Eric Mievill's appointment as Private Secretary to the Duke of York portends the appointment of the Duke as Viceroy of India, is too grotesque to merit notice except as a flagrant instance of the ignorance of the British press of the elementary facts of Indian history and politics. The appointment of a member of the Royal Family to the Viceroyalty has been mooted before, only to be dismissed as involving complications of an almost insuperable character. The objections are far greater in the case of the heir presumptive to the throne, which the Duke of York is. It is more probable that his Royal Highness may be required to deputise for His Majesty in Canada in connection with the coronation next year. A Canadian Private Secretary who knows the idiosyncracies of his people, may be useful in that case. We suppose the King will follow the precedent set by his father and have his coronation performed at Delhi in person. Lord Linlithgow has laid out for himself a programme which may require an extension of his term of office to carry it even through its initial stages. A curtailment of it at the very beginning of his Indian career, is unthinkable.

Independent Labour Party :—Dr. Ambedkar has announced the formation of a new political party to be called the Independent Labour Party. He expects that all the fifteen members of the depressed classes in the Provincial Legislative Assembly under the new Act, will be his followers and will accept his programme. They will form the nucleus of the Party. But members of other castes and communities who agree to support it, may join the Party. It is in this view that it has been given a neutral designation. Disraeli said of the Peelites that they found the Whigs bathing and walked away with their clothes. The programme of the Independent Labour Party is a hotch-potch of odds and ends picked out of other programmes.

Instrument of Accession :—The draft of the Instrument of Accession to the Federation by the rulers of Indian States, was issued last week. It recognises the sovereignty of the rulers, declares that they enter the Federation voluntarily for the good of India, provides for the specification of the subjects over which each Prince agrees to hand over jurisdiction to the Federal Government, and fixes a time limit for the introduction of Federation. So far as a layman can see, the draft should meet all possible objections that can be raised by the Princes.

The new draft has been well-received by the Princes and their Ministers. We regard Federation as a half-way house to unification which is the historic goal of Indian nationalism. The Instrument of Accession leaves the constitutional problem of each of the States to be solved by the efforts of the people and the rulers between themselves. There is nothing in it to stereotype the system obtaining at present in any State. In the present circumstances, Federation of some sort can not be avoided and the sooner we get over it the better would it be for the country.

Congress and Municipal Elections :—Fuller information regarding the election of the Chairman of the Trichinopoly Municipality, which was the immediate cause of Mr. Rajagopala Charya's resignation from the Congress, is now available. It confirms our opinion expressed last week that Mr. T. S. Rajan (his initials were wrongly given in our Note) was in the right and that Mr. Rajagopala Charya was wrong in trying to thrust a Congress candidate on the Trichinopoly Municipality. In a dignified statement, Dr. Rajan has thrown some lurid light on the effects of Congress control over elections to local bodies in Trichinopoly. He writes :— "I found that the Tamil Nadu Congress Committee, in carrying on its campaign of capture of local bodies, was bent on securing somehow a majority under the Congress label regardless of the consideration whether the candidate who signed the pledge, generally at the last moment, sometimes on the understanding that he would be selected often to serve his own interests, understood the implications of the pledge, or would add to the real strength of the Congress. The Trichinopoly Congress Committee was no exception to the rule. I have seen the formation of its District Board party and the way in which the party secured the President's seat. I have also watched its work in the Board. There is a general impression that the reputation of the Congress has not been enhanced by its administration and I share this view. The position has been the same or even worse in some other Districts. The Trichy Municipal elections were approaching. The election was to take place after two years of supersession of a Council in whose last days Hindu-Muslim bitterness had reached its climax. The supersession itself was brought about by the Council re-electing, as Chairman, Mr. P. R. Thevar (who was then in the Justice Party) whose conduct was disapproved by the Government. The Moslim members and some others held strong views about his conduct. The local Congress Committee, under the inspiration of Mr. Thevar, was making preparations to enable him to get elected as Chairman again. He has, since the supersession, become a Congress M. L. C., and Congress President of the District Board. These important positions, one should think, are enough to engage one's full attention. But he was keen on becoming Chairman again to avenge the wrongs done to him by the Raja of Bobbili."

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

804
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 22

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

BOMBAY, August 22, 1936.

THE CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION.

There are many people who, though not at all indifferent to the maintenance of what are known as "civil liberties", are doubtful about the congruity of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru sponsoring the movement to establish a non-party organisation for upholding them. Their reasons are not fanciful. The Pandit, they say, is President of the Indian National Congress. He is an uncompromising adherent of its goal of absolute independence. He is a believer in civil disobedience as a means of achieving independence. His mind is set on the attainment of political freedom. Why should he, while pursuing this great and all-comprehensive objective, start this side show for the vindication of "civil liberties," which pre-suppose the existence of political freedom? The ideology of "absolute independence" through "civil disobedience" has no point of contact with that of a demand for "civil liberties". Quite true, we shall perhaps be told, and that is why we want a separate organisation composed of all parties to work for civil liberties. But how can Congressmen with their ideology participate in a movement with another ideology entirely different from, if not opposed to, theirs? Are those persons entirely wrong who suspect that at the back of Pandit Jawaharlal's mind "Civil Disobedience" is bound up with "civil liberties" and that the "Civil Liberties Union" is wanted to throw its aegis over the next essay in "Civil disobedience"? Or it may be, the socialist measures which the Pandit's utterances foreshadow if the Congress accepts his socialistic ideology and comes into power under the new constitution with the object of wrecking it. The other alternative is that the Pandit's views about independence and civil disobedience have undergone change, and that the Civil Liberties Union is intended ultimately to take the place of the Congress. "Vested interests" have grown up within the Congress as at present constituted, which resist the opening of its door to men of other political complexions. It has hardened into a cult, a caste. The interests of the country, however, demand the co-operation of all schools of thought, and the only way of securing it is to start a new organization on the broad basis of Civil Liberties. When the Pandit ceases to be President of the Congress in the next few months, he will make this his principal platform, eventually, perhaps, a rival platform to the Congress. It is even possible that the Civil Liberties Union will absorb the Congress. The second alternative imputes to Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru a designing mind of the possession of which he has given no indication so far. There remains, therefore, only the first alternative, namely, he has just now engaged in two major operations which in their basic ideas as well as their logical implications are diametrically opposed to each other.

What are civil liberties? They can not exist without a reign of law. Civil liberties can not exist under personal rule. A recent writer declared that the civilization which teaches peoples to develop institutions, to observe laws, to require of governments that they respect the dignity and liberty of the individual—in short shows them how to be citizens of an organized State—this civilization is the gift not of Rome but of the Anglo-Saxon world. That, we think, will be generally admitted. Swami Vivekananda once told a Christian Missionary that in politics England is the world's teacher; we willingly sit at her feet; but let no one dare to teach India religion for India is the religious teacher of the world. Pandit Jawaharlal seems to acknowledge this, for he too seeks for his new organization guidance from Great Britain and the United States, though in doing so he overlooks the fact that in neither country is there at present any movement corresponding to the Congress with the ideology of independence cum civil disobedience. The argument of the British and American upholder of civil liberties, is: That the State is the expression of the soul of the people; everything that hinders the free expression of that soul weakens the State morally and spiritually and is therefore inimical to its best interests which are those of its people. Pandit Jawaharlal, president and principal leader of the Congress, can not use this argument. If he did, no one would believe him. That is by the way. The Magna Carta and the American Declaration of Independence, are the two authoritative documents in the history of constitutional government and civil liberties. It so happens that both these documents originated primarily as a protest against the State taxing people without their consent, in other words in the assertion of the rights of private property against the Sovereign—a King in the one case and a Parliament in the other. The French Revolution also originated in the autocratic impositions of an extravagant Court. It would seem, therefore, that the right of private property is the fundamental civil liberty. In the paragraph on the aims of the Civil Liberties Union, no mention is made of private property. "Orderly social progress," we read, "is promoted by freedom of speech, freedom of thought and expression, a free press and freedom of assemblage. The aim of the Union shall be to endeavour to protect these rights of citizenship, from all encroachment and infringement by executive or judicial authority, otherwise than by normal process under the ordinary law." Perhaps the right of property is covered by the phrase "other rights of citizenship." But in view of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's oft proclaimed views on Socialism, there is excuse for people who fear that the Union of Civil Liberties may become a "Union for the Expropriation of Property."

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

805

HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHT TO PROPERTY BILL.

(BY R. V. V. TATACHARIAR)

Dr. Deshmukh in his Statement of Objects and Reasons for the Bill does not disclose the historical evolution of the law on the point of women's right to husband's family-property. The family is a joint family still, notwithstanding the various ways in which it can be broken up and the property held in separate and exclusive ownership. For as soon as the owner dies intestate the property becomes joint in the hands of his sons and grandsons. That is the Mitakshara Law. Vijnaneswara was the first to evolve the principle of the right by birth of son or grandson that started or continued the joint character of the property whether self-acquired or partitioned or inherited. It was in this way he found an easy means of explaining away the various texts that prohibited the alienation of property by a Hindu lest the issue born and yet to be born should be deprived of their means of subsistence. In fact the deeper idea lurking in his mind might be that the estate or property itself was "gotra" or that which fed the cattle, children, slaves and all the dependants on the family. Hence it was that the King had to feed these people before he took the estate by escheat for want of a proper heir. It was evidently on the score of a free right to re-marry another husband that a woman entering the husband's gotra by marriage was not allowed any such right to share in the property. But when re-marriage went out of vogue such a right was allowed by Yajnyavalkya though it was made to abide the decision of her sons or step-sons to partition the estate; and she was not given the right to demand partition. Such a provision seems to find a place in the present Bill also. But there is no use of it; for it won't stop there if logical effect were to be given to her right at all. For a similar provision found a place in Ancient Smritis in the case of sons in a couple of ways. The sons could not demand a partition against the father, but this was explained away by commentators ignorant of the evolution of the law by saying that the provision was directed against self-acquired property of the father. Secondly the sons got their shares when the father of his own accord divided the estate or were to be content with what share was given them by the father at his own sweet will and pleasure. The sons could not compel the father to a partition under penalty of gross sin, unless he were recklessly immoral, dissipated, or wasteful. But even these liberal interpretations by way of exception were due to the natural extension by respondentia of the sages or as the result of decisions of the king's courts. Such was the original rigour of the law of joint family, and of its property. Now we have not yet completely been weaned away from all notions relating to the theory and practice of joint-family principles, and the notion of 'gotra' is still dominant in matters of marriage and adoption. The Dayabhaga rule of right by death, or right in common tenancy accruing to the sons on their father's death is confined only to Bengal. Even there the rights of women are not very much greater than in Mitakshara countries. And after all is there any great necessity for enlarging them in these days of returning to the old state of things in matters of women's remarriage, post-puberty marriage, etc.? The long usage dating from the time of the sages of endowing the girls on marriage with all kinds of Stridhana, dowry or seeru by whatever name we call it, would have to be peremptorily discontinued on the institution of the new right in the joint family property for women born in the family, lest the balance of ultimate benefit from the family be more in women's favour and much against sons' interests. Or such marriage would mark the time of family division of property; or else how are girls married away to enjoy their share and when? And what is to become of them if the sons should choose to conspire against their sisters and never think of any partition at all? And if the women cannot demand it, what then? Then the courts will come to the rescue and say that as in the case of the sons themselves the right to demand partition is only incident to the right to share in the property. History has a lesson for us in this respect. If this demand for partition were not granted the women would have neither the use as heretofore nor the ownership thereof under the new Bill.

Then again, if the widow after inheriting her husband's share in the ancestral property in her absolute right and after partial or entire alienation thereof, say to the very man whom she subsequently thinks of marrying under the Imperial Act, if only to circumvent its provisions, then how is the ancestral family to proceed against the alienated property? How is it possible to fetter her absolute right; and would it not be taking away by the one hand what was given her by the other? This aspect of the question has not struck anybody. So if the women who enter the joint family by marriage should be allowed to inherit the husband's share in her absolute right, then it must be distinctly understood that on re-marriage whether under custom or under the old Hindu law or under the Act all her previous alienations must fail in effect and become null and void ab initio. In these disquieting and distressing circumstances it seems best to meet the new demand for higher right for women in the joint family by a simple provision that their present right to a woman's limited estate be enlarged into an absolute right in succession first of the widow and then of the daughters, leaving it for the daughter's son to succeed through his mother or grandmother. More inroads would prove simply disastrous, and futile.

We shall now look to the history of the evolution as I have elsewhere elaborately traced, of women's right in their husbands' properties. Originally they were mere chattel bought and sold in marriage among Dravidian and some Aryan peoples, whose purchase-money went into the coffers of their fathers. When they had their right to remarry on the death of their husbands they had to marry any one among the sapindas or sagotras among Aryans and any stranger among Dravidians. In such circumstances there was no necessity to allot separate property for women. They in fact earned and saved for the benefit of their husbands and not for their own as they could own no property, and were always dependent upon their father before marriage, upon their husband during coverture, and upon their son thereafter. So too the son and the slave had no independent status and could own no separate property of their own. Times changed; and the slave could redeem himself; the son could own his independent earnings or property got at his marriage through his wife. And the widow, on losing her right of remarriage, could rear up a son for her husband on the bed of her brother-in-law or other sapinda or sagotra of her husband and hold his property for the benefit of such son who was to continue the line of her husband. In fact her guardianship grew into her right for life in the enjoyment of her son's property after his death. This, then, became the order of the day and when she could no longer re-marry she was allowed to come in for inheritance before the parents and brothers. Alongside of it or probably even in advance of it, the daughter in the absence

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

806

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| Aug. 22

realpatidar.com

of son, grandson and great-grandson stood in the shoes of son or other male issue, first in her capacity of a putrika-putras guardian, next as a putrika, and lastly in her capacity of a daughter merely or as the mother of her son who was latterly regarded as equal to a son's son. In all these cases it must be clearly understood that the widow or daughter took an absolute estate of inheritance on failure of a male issue; and there was no indication of their taking instead what is latterly known as a woman's limited estate for life, under the Mitakshara. The question as to why this was so limited is pertinent to our present inquiry. Leaving alone the penniless paupers and the rich millionaires who are not really affected in any appreciable degree, the average Hindu family forms the bulk of the entire society; and these middle class families rarely possessed anything more than a few thousand rupees worth of property. The persistence of the joint family traditions, the preference of the Brahma over the Asura and other forms of marriage, the consequent endowment of the Sulka or the bride's price on the bride herself as part of her Stridhana, the necessity, under the Brahma form, of the marriage samskara at the expense of the bride's father or his family property just like a son's upanayan or other samskaras, the fast-disappearing re-marriage of women and the perpetual widowhood imposed on young girls, among several other causes, contributed to the emergence of two of the most important institutions relating to women, namely the limited widow's or woman's estate and the woman's absolute Stridhanam. This was no doubt the result of long and tedious evolution by constant adjustments and compromises consistent with the original principles of joint family and woman's dependance on father, son, or husband. This was an achievement of the wise sages themselves, which was no doubt partially lost upon their long line of commentators. For upon a correct reading of the original sources in the oldest smritis themselves, it is clear that there is no good foundation for the limited estates in favour of the widow and daughter. They took an absolute estate as well as the daughter's son, in the absence of son, son's son and son's son's son. It is the commentators that have since, in the light of degenerate customs, curtailed it into a life estate. We can safely return to the old tenor of the ancient Smritis and enact that the widow and in her absence or after her the daughter shall get full and absolute right to the estate of the propositus of male issue. The widow and the daughter—if I may go the length of emphatically asserting in the face of much more emphatic and authoritative because official, or rather judicial assertions and pronouncements, to the contrary—never in the least and nowhere in all India including Bengal enjoyed the joint family property in their right as such as a co-sharer so long as there was male issue alive to continue the line and to protect the family dependants. The mother's right to a share equal to that of a son was recognised by Yajnyavalkya evidently because she happened to survive her own husband where she would naturally get on the death of her husband after separation from his sons, etc., as the surviving half and nearest Sapinda of her husband. The present law of succession of the son, son's son and son's son's son to the separated or self-acquired property of the propositus is a perverted interpretation of courts and commentators and is in the teeth of Bodhayana's specific texts (L5.113 to 118) on the subject: On separation the male issue is civilly dead as regards succession to their father's self-acquisition or separated family property, especially while the widow and daughter are alive and survive the propositus. In other words their absolute estates cannot be done away with or postponed according to the true light of the ancient Smriti literature. But in the undivided joint family property they hold not even the limited estate since developed in relation to separated estate of an issueless propositus. The male issue get it exclusively, subject to the maintenance of the chaste widow or even the unchaste mother, and to the daughter's maintenance and marriage expenses, which last burden was always held equal to a quarter of the share she would get if she were a son. This does not mean that she ever or anywhere had a right to a share equal to that of a son. If she were a Brahmin's daughter by a Kshatriya wife then she would take a fourth fraction of what she would take if she were a son by the Kshatriya wife which was only three fourth of what a son by a savarna or Brahman wife would get. This interpretation of the Mitakshara is correct in the light of the historical evolution of the law. Hence it would be wise on the part of the legislature to revert back to the ancient Smritikartas and enlarge the widow's and daughter's limited estates into absolute ones in succession to the inheritance, if only to command the same obeisance to the law as the sages have till to day done. But if the so-called social reformers should in their eager anxiety to put the fair sex on a par with the other sex, exceed this safe limit and newly and for the first time in the history of the Hindu Law try to create an equal right of women born or married in the family to the joint family property, equal to that of the son or other male issue, they would be hazarding too much and spoil an otherwise good case for Hindu women.

As I conclude this article, I come across Dr. G. V. Deshmukh's learned contribution at page 778 of the Indian Social Reformer for the year under the heading of "Wives in Hindu Law." Towards the end of it he says, "A wife in the presence of the son gets equal share with the son. 2. A wife in the absence of the son on the death of her husband inherits the whole property of the husband, though kindred and kinsmen are alive." The first proposition is rather too wide as the qualifications as to her being endowed or not with a marriage or other portion by her father-in-law or husband are, I suppose inadvertently, suppressed from the version of Yajnyavalkya on the point. The second proposition is correct according to commentaries and judge-made law if "whole property" means a limited estate in the whole; but it is also correct according to the letter and spirit of the ancient rishis if the expression "whole property" means an absolute estate in succession to the inheritance. The learned contributor does not appear to essay into the historical evolution of the law on the questions involved, probably because he has not laboured in that field or does not like to venture into generally unfamiliar and unknown fields. Otherwise he happens to be fairly accurate, and concise.

Mr. Jinnah's Advice to Students:—In his presidential address to the All-India Students' Conference, Mr. M. A. Jinnah asked students to cultivate fellow-feeling, show toleration, and develop a sense of brotherhood, which, according to him, was the only solution of the problem confronting the country. Mr. Jinnah agreed with Pandit Jawaharlal's view that students should not indulge in aggressive politics, but must keep abreast of world problems as they were the architects of the new age. Regarding the communal question, the speaker observed that it would exist so long as religion remained, but he exhorted students to think as Indians when India's interests were involved. Mr. Jinnah added that they should not preach idealism because that accentuated differences.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

807

AN EXPERIMENT IN EDUCATION

(By S. MUTHULAKSHMI REDDI)

The Avvai Home and Orphanage for Girls, Madras, has been promoting adult women's education by a system of part-time work and part-time study, in addition to its other activities. A certain number of destitute mothers, wives, widows, unmarried young women are given shelter and protection, and they are further trained if it is found that they are capable of pursuing an independent profession. They have to work in the morning and in the evening in the orphanage section or in the hostel. In the afternoons they study under a trained teacher. Their work consists of cooking, house-keeping, such as cleaning, washing, dusting and store-keeping, and the care of children in the orphanage and in the nursery school.

During a period of probation, if they show aptitude for a mid-wife's or teacher's life, they are given tuition up to the necessary standard and they are sent up for the required training on the condition that they pay back the money spent on them by the Orphanage. In case they are over-age or are not found suitable for either of these two professions, they are employed in the Home or recommended to private families for domestic service.

All applicants for admission to the Home have to sign a bond before admission guaranteeing return of the money spent on them during their stay in the Home and for any training outside for a profession. They have, of course, to accept the rules of the Home and to submit to its discipline during their stay.

We have trained three women as midwives and they have found employment. Two of them are returning in instalments the amounts lent to them. Two more women are undergoing training in the Raja Sir Ramasami Mudaliar Lying-in-Hospital and another in the Government Victoria Hospital, Triplicane. One young woman who showed neither aptitude for study nor a desire to remain single and be employed, has been married to a teacher.

We know as a matter of fact that even the Higher Elementary trained teachers after their long period of training earn only a scanty salary of Rs. 15 to 20 in the mofussil which is not even sufficient for a decent living; whereas our cooks and our governesses of children can easily earn that amount in addition to their food and clothing. All the same many of our women carry the wrong notion that cooking and house-keeping, which if adopted as a profession will give a better remuneration, is not dignified enough. These professions can be easily learnt and practised with success by a majority of our women there being no age limit, no expense, and not much of an intellectual strain.

We cannot but point out that the Indian public also have to change their present attitude towards domestic services and they must develop a mentality to treat their domestic servants, namely their cooks and other servants, with respect and consideration which is their legitimate due. Honest manual labour of any kind ought to command our respect as much as that of the intellect.

Domestic Service is organised and respected in the West. In European countries a cook commands as much respect as a clerk or a stenographer in an office, and they have their rights and privileges. These servants get one complete day off in a week. Masters and servants realise their respective duties and responsibilities. Hence they are able to get on smoothly and amicably. There are also recognised employment bureaus in Western countries which recommend good and honest cooks, governesses, attendants etc., to families who need their services. If there is any difference between the master and the servant that is referred to the Employment Bureau.

We do need such a system in India. Meanwhile we have to teach our women, rich and poor, not only the dignity of household work but also the importance of domestic science which consists of Home hygiene, home nursing, mother-craft, dietetics, nutrition, preparation, cooking and preservation of food. In these days of acute distress and unemployment among our graduates and highly educated and trained men, it would be a wise policy on the part of our women not to swell their ranks but tap the normal and the natural source of employment for women, namely, Domestic service. We hope that the educated public, at least will create facilities enough to attract respectable trained women for domestic service by way of adequate ways, sympathetic treatment and provision for old age in the case of loyal and faithful servants.

THE DEPRESSED INDIAN CHRISTIANS' ASSOCIATION.*

The following resolution was passed at a meeting of the Executive Committee of a Depressed Indian Christians' Association held at "Balasudra Vilas," Thousand Lights, Madras, on Sunday the 2nd August:

"Resolved to request all Christian Associations, Catholic and Protestant to set apart one electoral area each time by turn to afford an uncontested seat for the Depressed Indian Christians."

The following letter is being addressed to some of the Christian Associations in South India.

It is unquestionable that converts to Christianity from among the Depressed Classes groan under all the disabilities arising from caste distinctions. Although the benign Government have been pleased to grant privileges to them, they are not sufficient to bring them to the level of the other Depressed Classes enjoying higher and more privileges. The said converts form the majority of the whole Christian population. Yet because of grinding poverty, deep seated ignorance and illiteracy due to long standing negligence on the part of others, they are unable to compete in open and defied elections. As Christians are expected to evince a spirit of charity in all their undertakings, it will not be too much to expect a sort of mutual arrangement in respect of elections so as to avoid recriminations, bitterness and expenditure incidental to contested election campaigns.

On behalf of the said converts persistent requests have been made to the authorities concerned to have them merged in the general electorate or set them apart for electoral purposes as a distinct community similar to the Anglo-Indians composed of Catholics and Protestants. The Government have not been pleased to grant any of these requests for reasons best known to them.

It becomes, therefore, incumbent on all right thinking, broadminded and charitably disposed ladies and gentlemen of the Indian Christian community to view the peculiar situation of the said converts in an unbiased light, and afford them such a facility as to make it possible that one at least of the said converts is returned to the Local Legislature from any one of the constituencies in an unopposed manner. This will go a long way to foster true Christian feelings and at the same time contribute towards solidarity and unity in the Christian fold.

Considering the sort of atmosphere necessary for the realisation of the aforesaid object, it will be congenial to start the experiment in the Madras cum Chingleput constituency.

I, therefore, request you to give this matter the sympathy and consideration it deserves, and canvass the support of your Association.

(Sd.) V. J. AROKIASWAMY, Officiating Secretary.

* Guardian, Madras, August 6.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

808

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 22

realpatidar.com

THE NEW PEOPLES' PARTY.

The Editor,

The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

What appears to be filling the minds of those responsible for starting the new party at Madras is perhaps an over-powering sense of dread at the risk of being found out, even in thought, anywhere near the poor Justice Party, simply because it has been made for sometime a target for un-reasoning abuse all round day in and day out. It looks as if that unless one begins by denouncing it, he would have no credential to be heard in matters concerning public affairs. The tyranny of it is so frightful that even many of those who are at heart 'Justicites' feel ashamed to acknowledge their creed. If there is demoralisation any where in public life, it is here in plenty.

To the opponents of the Justice Party its besetting sin is its anti-Brahmin stand euphemistically called 'Communal Out-look'. The Brahmin-Nonbrahmin controversy is as old as the hills with its first traces in the time of Vasista versus Visvamitra. It is a truism that when power, prestige and privilege are allowed to accumulate in any one community it breeds a spirit of exclusiveness militating against all national fusion, whether that community happens to be Brahmin or any other for the matter of that. In the Hindu social economy an innate power of resistance to such baneful accumulation has been a constant feature in the mechanism of its social order operating like beneficent break at critical periods. That is the advent of Buddha, Mahavira, Ramanuja and Basava as among the successive leaders of this protestant anti-Brahmin movement from time to time, is a matter of history.

With the advent of the British rule in India, a settled Government once again brought to surface the concentrated power and prestige of the Brahmin community and it is a matter of common knowledge that till recently members of that community happened to predominate in public offices which are the seats of power. The Montford Report revealed, as the shafts of glaring light from the headlamps of a motor car slowly gliding along a village road would, the un-evenness of the social structure of the people amidst whom an instalment of political power was sought to be transferred. The flower of the Non-Brahmin community became conscious of the peoples' rights as opposed to what they felt to be Brahmin monopoly and the result was the coming into being of the Justice Party with its creed of 'equal justice for all,' bringing in its train the irritating communal G. O. We see the effect of this resistance manifested during these fifteen years, making it possible for a Oosman Saheb and Venkata Reddy to mount up the steps to the Governor's throne which is the crowning glory of the Party's achievements, let alone all abuse and vituperation.

I do not claim that the Justice Party is free from foibles. Its leaders might have, intoxicated by momentary triumphs, behaved causing needless irritation among those who first felt affected by this new upheaval. I am personally aware of how the anti-Brahmin bitterness of the period kept out from the executive Councillorship that constitutional enthusiast the late lamented Sir M. Ramachandra Rao, making the Government of the day poorer for it. But the Justice Party was a steam roller engaged in levelling up and such individual grievances were inevitable in its operation. Its creed of equal justice for all remains even to this day. It does not differ from that of the new Peoples' Party nor of the Congress for the matter of that. There is no fundamental difference between the aims of the Justice Party and of the Congress though the methods, ways and means may differ. That is absolutely no excuse for bringing up a new party into existence.

If the leaders of the new party have not the courage to throw in their lot with the Congress, the best way for them would be to join the old Justice Party in large numbers, infuse fresh spirit into it giving it a new orientation, endowing it with all the special features which they think it is their monopoly, now that the ban against the Brahmin entry is removed.

The pity of it is that the new party's attitude towards the Congress either is likewise characterised by the same lack of moral courage and bold thinking. With civil disobedience given up and the entry into Legislature favoured, they have no excuse whatever to keep away from it. Their constructive temper, sober and steady out-look of life, might in the new order of things steady the fire of patriotism kindled by the Congress harnessing it into constructive channels.

It is sheer moonshine for the country to think of shaking off the British yoke for the time being. The whole Europe is in the melting pot, while the latest Russo-Japanese tension in Asia does not promise to ease the situation. What repercussions this fearful state of things are likely to produce in India, it is impossible to predict. Independence in the abstract for the country is unthinkable. We should not wonder if in the near future we are forced to seek the very shelter which some of us would discard. Congress leaders like Sardar Patel and Mr. Prakasam are crying 'halt' to coming into conflict with Government calling upon people to develop strength from within. It is idle to keep harping on the shortcomings of the new constitution impairing and dissipating our energies which deserve to be conserved for re-construction work.

The present Government is like a huge locomotive with innumerable number of brakes. To think of wrecking it is like breaking your head against a stone-wall. Wisdom lies in the way of endeavouring to run parallel to it and get control thus making the best of the situation. It is bad economy for parties to keep quarrelling and recriminating each other frittering away country's slender resources.

Penukonda,
16th August 1936.

Yours etc.,
T. SIVASANKARAN.

[We publish Mr. Sivasankaran's letter although we have as yet made no reference in the Reformer to the new Party formed in Madras, which he attacks. That Party, it is obvious, is an attempt to steer clear of the rank anti-Brahminism of the Justice Party, once compared by the friendly Catholic Leader to the anti-Semitism of the Nazi regime in Germany, as well as the Socialism which Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's political propaganda has enabled its opponents to doist upon the Congress as its accredited policy. The appointment of two Indians as acting Governors of Madras, which Mr. Sivasankaran claims to be the crowning achievement of the Justice Party are clearly due to the agitation carried on by Parties opposed by the Justice Party. There have been acting Indian Governors in the Punjab, the United Provinces and there is one now in the Central Provinces, all out of the beat of the Justicites. The Governor of the Central Provinces, moreover is actually a Brahmin and a Congressite at least in his apparel, 'which oft proclaims the man,' both anathema in the eyes of Justice Party. There was a permanent Governor of Bihar who was a Liberal. In any case, the appointment of Indians as acting Governors or even as permanent ones, is no gain to nationalism. Further light on the point, may be found in our editorial note on the Egyptian settlement.—Ed. I. S. R.)

A Convert's Regret:—Mr. Raghavan, who recently embraced Sikhism has forsaken that religion on the ground that the Sikh leaders in the Punjab failed to fulfil certain promises, said to have been made to some of the 'Bahavas' including Raghavan.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

real1936].r.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

809

THE SOUL'S SINCERE DESIRE.

(BY WALTER BROOKS FOLEY)

" My heart's desire and prayer to God.....is, that they might be saved. "—Romans 10 : 1.

*Hushed was the evening hymn,
The temple courts were dark,
The lamp was burning dim,
Before the sacred ark :
When suddenly a voice divine
Rang through the silence of the shrine.*

The soul's sincere desire is to hear a voice that sings, a voice beyond the range of earthly things, a voice that stirs all efforts in order to save men.

Many voices are listened to in the hope that one shall be authentic. We are listening to many voices today. The millions who listen to Hitler, or Mussolini, or Stalin, or Gandhi, or Roosevelt are seeking the fulfilment of their desires. Too obviously, though, many are not seeking the soul's sincere desire.

The power that sends men out and up must come from a voice that is tuned to a programme that saves men. Some feel that the throbbing drums of that call can be heard between the bursts of world confusion. Some are saying in the words of the mountaineer song:

*Down in the valley, the valley so low,
Hold your head over, hear the wind blow.*

While there many are twilight souls with bandaged eyes, others have the flash of a divine wonder in their faces. Such are divinely sensitive because they have attained a higher spiritual intelligence. The keenest souls are those who know what they have found. The traveller who analyzed that fisherman's ambergris returned to find it thrown away.

I. DISCIPLINED LIBERTY.

To gain the soul's sincere desire it is necessary to reach results through a disciplined liberty rather than through a following of arbitrary authority. Instead of using fear as an impelling motive of religious devotion, we must use hope as a releasing motive. We must keep our intelligence in repair by a deliberate self-control.

One very definite guide through the present perplexity is the doing of one's duty. Through duty we will come to discernment rather than delusion or disillusion. While discipline is probably not the supreme purpose in life it may play an active part in moulding strong character. Two forces struggle for the souls of men: 1. The authority of the outside world; 2. Individual spiritual vision. Perhaps we must compromise between personal power and community collectivism. Always remembering with caution that it is not enough simply to agree, but that we must agree on the truth. It is often too easy to say what a friend wants us to say in order to give him transient pleasure rather than to point out to him the way, the truth and the light. Christian courtesy ought never to degenerate to lower levels of compromise and convention. True disciplined liberty is imposed from within as an independent creative impulse of the individual Christian. Such liberty is expansive as over against the greed of self-interest which furnishes very rocky soil for the seeds of the Gospel. Only men with no religion have no duties.

Just as there are pressures in the physical world like the wind resistance of a moving object which caused scientists in engineering to suggest the manufacture of stream-lined cars, or the pressures of planes of light against the new polarized wind-shields that prevent glare from approaching headlights, so are there pressures in the spiritual world that require us to adjust our lives to facts. When our desires run contrary to known facts we must discipline our free liberties to fit the situations, if we would get the maximum result in Christian value. We must eliminate the projecting parts of our ideas to conform to realities in other lives that we are anxious to serve and to save. If certain attitudes, expressions actions are stumbling blocks in the way of our friend's progress we must use the idea of disciplined liberty to correct the hindering methods. It is the highest we want, for whatever is highest in a man's soul represents the kingdom—we need to find something that cannot be doomed or destroyed by anything on earth.

We hear much of conservation. It is the modern term for saving. It is as essential in the spiritual world that we conserve souls as it is in the agricultural world that we conserve soils. Spiritual reforestation is possible, as well as spiritual irrigation. We must plant the proper seeds of Christian principles to furnish the necessary stimulating personalities who will prevent the erosion of the fertile soil of Christian possibilities. The man of disciplined liberty knows that religion begins with, "what should be, can be," and continues with, "what can be, shall be."

II. MAN'S HIGH PLACE IN THE UNIVERSE.

The soul's sincere desire insists likewise on the high place of man in the universe of God. That does not mean the nonsense of a conceit which puts man in the place of God. Such humanism has no eastern windows of divine surprise. There was once a man who thought he was above other men. He was—until he had that thought! In the best sense there can be no human operation without some divine cooperation. What we mean also is that while God can work without a man he can't make Stradivarius violins without Stradivarius.

One thing that keeps most of us from being great—or at least as great as we might be is that we don't read the great prophetic books, such as the Bible. And we don't read them because when we do we realize God is criticizing us. And criticism is something we just can't take. So we turn our backs on our best. We don't see the surrounding landscape. We are like a man rowing backwards in a boat. We do not see clearly until we are past. Or we are content to be like the dormouse in "Alice in Wonderland," always asleep in a crisis.

We say often that the stimulus seems to be gone from us—that we can't pray—that we can't feel the presence of God—that we are suffering from what might be called a "dry religious time." Then we need the illustration of the man riding a camel in the desert. A dust storm swirled down on him. He got off, instead of trying to plow ahead, covered himself with a blanket, and breathed quietly until the storm was over. Then he got up, mounted his camel and went on. Getting excited about our difficulties will not help. We need to think and act quietly "until the storm passes." "We have learned to peer and pore; we have learned so much from our youth; we are the three wise men of yore; we know all things—but the truth."

What are the qualities that will help us to live on a higher plane? Simplicity, tenderness, patience, love.

The consciousness of vital spiritual power comes for the most part as a slow deposit. The idea of getting all kinds of power by some sudden and secret guidance ought to be resisted. We need to be cautious about accepting secret messages from sociable angles who claim to have a private telepathic connection with the Almighty. Paraphrasing an old remark, "God does not grow Royal

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

810 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 22

Palms in a year," "In the past," says a friend of mine, "too many claimed to get a quick glimpse of spiritual living, claimed, indeed, to have found God, then let the world stew in its own juice while they ran around like Pollyannas enjoying their Beulah land." On the other hand we used to hear the pious testimony of the good brother who whined, "I'm serving the Lord in my poor, weak way." God doesn't want weakness any more than he wants over-confidence. What he wants is a capable, qualified, high-minded strength of conviction that men and women are important enough to be worth saving.

The chances are that what we ought to do is associate with the other fellow instead of praying for him in absentia.

III. HONESTY.

The soul's sincere desire is for honesty of purpose and objective. Too many lives are held back by a creeping paralysis of all the forward-looking faculties. We have too many disciples of Lot's wife who, you will recall, was turned into a pillar of salt when she looked back at that which she had been told to leave behind forever. We seem to sit around waiting for some expected crisis before we try to put a trunk-line call through to God. Such a course is downright dishonesty. Prayer is not a reservoir. It is a tuning fork. The God to whom we will not pray is only a ghost of God. Talking with God should strike the keynote of life at all times. We do not have to absolutely certain, but we must be honest.

The spiritual parents of legitimate religion are: (1) A vision of the ideal and (2) Insight into the real. Religion with such honest parents can become a vital force in the world. Without such parentage it is a misnomer. To keep one eye on perfection and the other on practical reality will seem to many people a feat conducive to a kind of cross-eyed futility. They will remind us that all things are relative according to the newest scientific theories of the universe; and that relativity means there is no hitching post in the universe. Relativity in a spiritual sense means what the great philosophical minds have always proclaimed, that we do not live in the present but in eternity. The last statement is more than a metaphor, just as the Bible metaphors mean more than is obvious at first glance. We need the dramatic—the appealing at times. When you hear a man say, with emotion, "My love is like a red, red rose," you don't expect to see a crimson rambler when the lady appears. Honest reality is the desire of our inmost souls, but that reality need not necessarily be as drab as dust.

Let's be honest enough to admit that one reason we do not go more often into the presence of God is because that line of march would take us from where we are, and we are not quite ready for divine direction. Perhaps we often adopt the attitude, "Hear am I, Lord, come and dwell in my presence." In other words, God should compromise His everlasting principles in order to gain our allegiance. That is not honest enough to be spiritually legal. Consigning ourselves to the guidance of God is a desire that we need to cultivate.

Do you know the story of the blundering bishop? He was always embarrassing his friends by his lack of tact and good judgment. He was goodhearted but—His wife said one day to a neighbour that he used to worry her greatly, but that she finally attained peace when she turned him over to the Lord. There are times when we need to be honest enough to admit that only the Lord can help us. No one wishes to be so dependent as to be worthless. On the other hand we must be honest in our realization of the source of all inspiration. In the simple words of a child we may be strengthened:

*I am a little child,
And I am ignorant and weak;
I gaze into the starry skies,
And then I cannot speak.
For all behind the starry skies,
Are paths no man has trod;
Beyond the universes is
The Infinite of God.*

Such a wisdom will give us a creative will to power, and will take our deep desire for power and Christianize it. Honesty is, then, controlled power. To be frank with one's self when necessary is the height of honesty. When we do that, we may become enough at peace with ourselves to know that we have made a first step towards being at peace with God.

And being honest does not mean wearing a halo of hate because of circumstances over which we have no control. Being at enmity with circumstances or people often means being at enmity with God who is far wiser than we.

We need to get out of experience only the wisdom that is in it—and stop there, not attempting to add a great deal of imaginary material. When a cat sits on a hot stove lid she won't sit on one again—or on a cold one either. In other words the cat has made a decision beyond what the experience justified. Strict honesty in analyzing the facts is essential.

All of us have known for a long time that construction is not all building. There must be some planning and waiting. Yet most of us like to rush ahead—to be doing something, regardless of what the consequences may be.

When we arrive at a day of decision that makes us sit down and think freely and honestly we really ought to celebrate that day ever after as Thanksgiving Day.....It is not by any means a waste of time to know whatsoever things are honest, for in knowing them our lives are apt to be more nearly saved lives.

"My heart's desire and prayer to God..... is, that they might be saved." To accomplish that purpose, as with Paul, so with us, we need to indulge in a disciplined liberty, experience the worth of our humanity, and be honest, and be honest enough to accept the verdict of the schoolboy, "Faith is believing what you know ain't so!" In these three qualities of disciplined liberty, worth of men and women, and downright honesty are the height and the depth and the breadth of wisdom as expressed in the soul's sincere desire.

HINDU SOCIETY AND THE NEW CONSTITUTION.*

(By K. M. PANIKKAR.)

It is only with the introduction of English common law and the gradual change of the English authority in India from an administrative machinery to a legislative State that the basis of Hindu customs and law came to be questioned. But, until now, the British Government in India has been particularly anxious not to undertake social legislation, especially when the customs and institutions which such legislation would affect were claimed to be semi-religious. Moreover, the British Courts, following the principle of common law in this country, gave legal effect to customs whose existence were proved before them, thereby crystallizing and strengthening their hold on the community. Thus, except incidentally, the main body of Hindu institutions, like caste and the joint family, has been left untouched.

* Journal of the East India Association for July 1936.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

811

But the new Constitution completely changes the position. What a Government, however well-meaning, but alien in composition, can never undertake with success, the new legislatures, composed entirely of elected representatives, will be forced by the pressure of political opinion to take up. Hindu orthodoxy was right in apprehending that the creation of such a machinery is the greatest challenge it has ever had to face. Never before has there been an authority in India which claimed power to change the old social institutions of the Hindus.

The pressure on Indian legislatures even at the present time to enact measures for abolishing the civic inequalities based on caste is sufficient proof of the desire of the Hindu community for the exercise of the power of the State in social matters. In fact, the very prospect of political power has agitated the Hindu community beyond all previous experience. The widespread movements of the untouchables for the immediate removal of all social disabilities based on Hindu law and custom is one example. The demand of the Indian women's organizations for comprehensive legislation giving them equal rights with men is another. Both of these touch the basic conceptions of Hindu law. The disabilities of the untouchables are based on no less a legal authority than Manu, and it is interesting to note that the symbolic protest of meetings of the depressed classes is the burning of the Code of Manu. The acceptance of the claim of the untouchables, which the legislatures, constituted as they are, can neither resist nor delay, spells the final extinction of caste-society, though not of caste as a social institution.

The demand of educated women who also will find representation in the legislatures, affects Hindu society even more fundamentally. The far-reaching effects of a legislative programme giving effect to the claims of women for equal status may be alluded to here merely to indicate the real nature of the crisis which the new Constitution has created in the Hindu society. Inheritance for women means the extinction of the joint family as an economic unit; freedom of divorce spells its extinction as a social institution. Civil marriage undermines the conceptions of caste. Attacked thus from inside by women and from outside by the depressed classes, the present social organization of Hinduism becomes the very first object of the legislative activity of the new State.

The point which I desire to emphasize is that the demand of the depressed classes on the one hand and of the women on the other arise mainly because it is realized that the legislatures have now the power to remodel society. The purpose behind the movements was to force the councils even as they are constituted today, to enact social legislation. The support that the women's movement gave to the Sarda Bill for the raising of the marriageable age of girls, and the constant vigilance exercised by them for the proper enforcement of the legislation that resulted, should indicate to what object the activities of the women's organization will be directed under the new reforms. Thus, in the new legislatures the demand for social legislation will become irresistible. Representatives of Hindu orthodoxy who appeared before the Joint Parliamentary Committee, were undoubtedly right in the alarm they expressed that the customs and institutions so long considered sacrosanct will not be safe with a democratic legislature functioning for the whole of India.

Of such institutions, the first to feel the effect of the new legislatures will be the joint family. How universal it is among the Hindus need not be pointed out. How it conflicts with the conception of State, which India is trying to evolve, is clear on examination. Those reformers who had hoped that by the mere permeation of ideas the joint family will break down underestimated its strength and perhaps its value to the individual in a non-legislating state. The Hindu society in theory is organized outside the State and of its organization the joint family is the basis. It cuts up Hindu life into so many fragments as to make the community a sociological fiction. It extinguishes the social sense, as the feeling of obligation to a social whole is impossible when there is no social unity.

From the point of view of the joint family, the Hindu community is nothing more than an inchoate mass of small units each unrelated to the other. The joint family is therefore incompatible not only with a State claiming plenary secular obedience, but with the conception of a unified Hindu society, and naturally every kind of social legislation which tends to unite the Hindus will mean the weakening of the joint family.

The continuance of the Hindu community in its present practically static state is based on a blind obedience to the extra-state laws - known as religious customs and institutions. Though these institutions are old, the problem that they face today is new. The social power in these institutions or customs has vanished with the growth of the legislating State and only the outer forms are left as a dead weight on the community. In primitive society custom and tradition mean the accumulated wisdom of generations. What differentiates civilized society from an uncivilized one is its attitude towards custom. In civilized societies, a custom in itself is not entitled to general acceptance, unless it has a clear social or moral purpose that justifies it. In primitive societies the validity of custom is that it has been so in other times. The mere fact that such was the habit of our ancestors is supposed to be a sufficient justification for even the most unreasonable practices.

Where the problem in India today differs from the problem as it has existed during the last 2,000 years is not that there is widespread protest against irrational customs, but that the motive force of the protest is different. In every age since the time of Buddha there have been vigorous movements of reform in Indian society. In fact, India's claim to civilization is not based so much on her social institutions as on her movements of protest. From Gautama Buddha to Mohandas Gandhi, India can claim to have produced an imposing array of men to combat the evils of her social institutions. But these great men, though they gave expression to the protests of their individual conscience, did not have the machinery of organized State to give effect to their reforms. The principle of social obedience in India remained familial and local and Hinduism continued to live much in the same way as in prehistoric times, in spite of her great men. The difference today is that such a machinery has been created with the help of Indians themselves and is available for the radical reform of Hindu Society.

It is often said in India that without political freedom, social legislation cannot be undertaken, and that as the new Constitution grants only limited freedom the utilization of its machinery for social organization would be impolitic, as it may lead to a division in national ranks and a consequent weakening of effort in the fight for Swaraj. To argue that because a nation is not free, it should not devote its energy to the reorganization of its institutions which were, in the main, the cause of its own loss of freedom is to argue in a vicious circle. Besides, the experience of India itself disproves the contention that social reform is dependent upon and must await political freedom. Mr. Gandhi's extraordinary efforts in the cause of the Harijans and his free acceptance of the principle of legislation by the existing

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

812

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 22

Assembly in this behalf, would show that the Mahatma does not accept the view that political freedom must precede social reform. Even assuming the argument to be true that a community which is not free has not the liberty to put its own house in order, I do not think that with the establishment of the new Constitution this argument could have even the shadow of validity. It may be that the power of the new Government is limited in a number of directions; but even its most determined opponents have never said that the legislatures under the Government of India Act are in any way restrained from putting into effect the most comprehensive social policy.

The real conflict between Hindu orthodoxy and the State will come when the legislature raises in some obscure form the question of divorce between religion and custom. Such a conflict was very nearly forced when the Sarda Act was under consideration. But it is obvious to every observer that the Sarda Act is only the beginning of social legislation; how it will develop is the question. The Hindu community offers so wide a field that to forecast a scheme of social legislation is almost impossible. But a few of the more important questions may be indicated. The proper control of the religious endowments of the Hindus and their utilization for the good of the entire community; the education and control of Hindu priesthood; the equal economic and marital rights of women; the abolition of social inequalities of the untouchables; reform of inheritance laws—each one of these will directly affect the organization of the Hindu community and will, if properly directed, lead to its rationalization.

For the first time since the origin of Hindu society, the chance has now come to us to organise it on a purposeful and rational basis, to make it re-act to the ethical sense and social vision of the thinking section of the community. How the Hindus utilize this opportunity is the main problem of the next few years before India. The chance is given to the Indian leaders to sweep away the accumulations of ages which have marred the face of the Hindu community. Let us hope that those in whom the power of legislation will be vested will have the social vision and the ethical urge necessary for this glorious purpose.

Speed is the life-blood of INDUSTRY
Do your business
BY TELEPHONE
AND USE THE INDIAN Air Mails
for correspondence.
INDIAN POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS DEPT.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1933
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

313

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland ... Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to:-

THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase: the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE
NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mohasa Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha, Harl (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED ... Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP ... " 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND ... " 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirchand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (M.N.)
Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand Devchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallal Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S., G. I.,
(Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratani (Shorrock Mills Ltd, Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnarai Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 300 to Rs. 1,00,000 will be allowed at 1/4 per cent per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at 1/4 per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutucorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Spring Road, Ballard Estate,

2-26

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

814
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 22

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)
INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,
Sheik Memon St., Bombay.
BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)
MALABAR HILL,
3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.
KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,
(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches :—
AHMEDABAD.
AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch).
CALCUTTA.
CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)
NAGPUR CITY.
POONA.
POONA CITY.
RAJKOT.
SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000

Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000

Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents :—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum now without any help whatever from you. The woman has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN

For further particulars apply to :—

THE SECRETARY

CENTRAL BANK EXECUTOR
AND
TRUSTEED CO., LTD

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL

CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona).	Virangam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara).	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirtoskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar).	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana).	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Aklij (District Sholapur).

DIRECTORS

Sir Chinnai V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Rajadnya, Esq.,
Madhoojee D. Thackersey,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
Esq.,	D. W. Raut, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	F. B. Laxmishwar, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL :—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 3 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to :—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

1936]
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

815

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay, 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

MADRAS.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

816

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

Aug. 22

realpatidar.com

a flawless Skin

It has been said that beauty is not a luxury but a Social necessity A flawless skin is one of the foundations of beauty Mysore Sandal Soap is matchless for the complexion.

MYSORE Sandal SOAP

Obtainable Everywhere.

Printed by Jai B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell, Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Registered No. B 345.
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN * SOCIAL * REFORMER.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Office: KAMAKSHI HOUSE, BANDEA, BOMBAY, 20.

Editor:—K. NATARAJAN.

Annual Subscription (Inland) Rs. 7-8-0 (Foreign) Rs. 10-0-0.

Vol. XLVI. BOMBAY—SATURDAY AUGUST 29, 1936. No. 52

"I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice; I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—And I will be heard."
WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON in the Liberator

CONTENTS

Manifestos.
The Poona Torture Case.
Warning to Wife Beaters.
The Civil Liberties Union.
Rajen-Rajagopala Clash.
Congress Discipline.
Conversion and the Franchise.
In Vishnu-land What Avatar?
Hindu Women's Absolute and Limited Estates.

Women's Right to Property Bill.
Education Under the Harijan Sevak Sangh.
Will America Return to Prohibition?
Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha.
The Japanese Himalayan Expedition.
Fascism and the Socialist.
Dr. Solanki's Inclusion in Scheduled Classes.

NOTES

Manifestos:—This is the season of manifestos. We have seen three of them and, doubtless, there are others which have escaped our notice. Communal manifestos have no interest outside the community for whom it is intended. Of the three manifestos which we have seen, two, namely, that of the Agricultural Party in the United Provinces and the People's Party in Madras, are simple and plain and the man in the street can not mistake their meaning. Being both new parties, they have a clean slate to write on, unembarrassed by prior commitments. The Agricultural Party has no ambition beyond ensuring the happiness and prosperity of agriculturists, cultivators and landlords, who form some sixty percent of the population. The Party believes that by securing this, it will secure the prosperity of all classes. The non-agricultural 40 per cent. depends for its existence on the agricultural 60 per cent. and when the latter is prosperous, the former is also sure to prosper. Such is the naive reasoning of the Agricultural Party's manifesto, and there is no denying that if we accept the premises, the conclusion follows as the night the day. The manifesto of the People's Party of Madras is even more unsophisticated. It catalogues the mistakes and failures of the Congress and the Justice Parties and proclaims the determination of the Party to avoid them by steering a middle course. The third manifesto is that adopted by the All-India Congress Committee last week. We expected it to state clearly that, non-co-operation having failed, the parliamentary mentality having come to stay, and the goal of independence being whittled down into whether to accept or not to accept office under the new constitution, the Working Committee had to find the best way of cornering as many seats as possible at the forthcoming provincial elections; and that if Congress members were returned in a sufficient majority they would, besides trying to prevent any other party from adopting measures detrimental to the country's interests, exert themselves to have certain specified measures adopted as their programme. Instead of that, the manifesto makes a laboured attempt to show that seeking election to the legislatures, taking the oath of allegiance, moving Bills, resolutions and otherwise taking part in the proceedings of these bodies, is a new and most effective way of carrying out the policy of non-co-operation. Conscious of the spaciousness of this dialectic, the manifesto besprinkles itself plentifully with nouns and adjectives which by their associations have come to have an emotional appeal. Some phrases here and there are apparently intended to mollify Congress Socialists; and the Congress nationalists are sought unsuccessfully, as it has turned out, to be conciliated by a direct condemnation of the Communal Award, which the Congress has hitherto resisted. But the astounding part of the manifesto is that it pledges the Congress Party to prevent the introduction of the Federation, which is the apex of the new Constitution. The manifesto does not indicate how this is to be done. We have not studied the Government of India Act, but it is our impression that, at this stage the formation of the Federation depends solely on the ruling princes and that if they agree to join, as they are sure to do, in the requisite proportion, nothing that the Congress party can do can prevent the Federation from coming into effect. We are not enamoured of this or any other Federation. But to prevent Federation when British India has been cut up into independent, autonomous provinces, will imperil the very existence of Indian nationalism. Apart from the States, Federation is needed to bring the sundered provinces into some sort of union. The Congress Working Committee was probably lured into this blind alley by the hope of conciliating Mr. Jinnah who from the first, for reasons of his own has opposed Federation. It is a fatal blunder which will cost the Congress Party the support of intelligent people who, in the past, have stood by it in spite of differences as to methods. The greatest mistakes of the Congress have been made when, departing from its own judgment, it adopted a course with the object of attracting this or that group into its fold. This is one of such mistakes.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

818

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 29

The Poona Torture Case :—In the Reformer of June 27, we called attention to the disproportionately lenient sentence of nine months imprisonment passed by the Sessions Judge of Dharwar on a Police Sub-Inspector, Agnihotri, whom he found guilty of the offence of torturing a mother and her daughter, twelve years of age, in order to extort a confession in a suspected theft. The mother died of the effects of the injuries inflicted on her. We pointed out that the offence was a grave one and merited more severe punishment and hoped that Government would move the High Court to have the sentence enhanced. Agnihotri appealed against his conviction. The appeal was heard by the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Wasudev last week. In rejecting the appeal, their lordships observed that the sentence was too lenient but as there was no application for enhancement and no notice was given to that effect when the appeal was admitted, they did not think it necessary to take any action in that respect. This means that the High Court's exercise of the power to enhance sentences depends on the discretion of the Executive Government. If the Executive Government do not choose to apply for enhancement of sentence, the High Court will, apparently, not exercise its power. The Government of Bombay would seem to have thought that the Sub-Inspector's offence was adequately punished by nine months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100, and though their lordships were of a different view, they did not act on it.

Warning to Wife Beaters :—The Madras High Court had before it not many days ago a case which is analogous to the Dharwar Sub-Inspector's case. There, also, two women were the victims of a brutal assault and one of them died of the injuries received by her. The assailant was the husband of one of the two and son-in-law of the other. The mother-in-law died of the injuries. The man was first tried by the Session Judge of Madura District who took the view that the injuries to the wife were inflicted "in the exercise of a right which every husband has to punish his wife for impudence or impertinence," and acquitted the accused on that charge. As regards the unfortunate mother-in-law, the learned Madura Judge thought that her intervention in the quarrel between her daughter and son-in-law might have provoked the accused to inflict on her the injuries of which she died, and sentenced him to one month's imprisonment. The High Court under its revisional powers felt obliged to repudiate the doctrine of the husband's right to inflict injuries on his wife for impertinence. Their lordships (Justices Panduranga Row and K. S. Menon) observed : "The learned Sessions Judge was so much obsessed with the right of the husband to beat his wife that he went to the length of criticising the police for having included the charge of causing hurt to the wife in the charge-sheet and even the Sub-Magistrate for including it in the charge sent by him for trial in the Sessions Court.

It is perhaps enough to say that, though the learned Judge may be entitled to have his own views on the subject in a private capacity, yet he was not justified in laying down the law in this manner from his seat on the Bench, declaring that the husband has the right of punishing his wife by beating her for impudence or impertinence. No such right is recognized by the Indian Penal Code, and wife beating is not one of the exceptions in the chapter of 'General Exceptions.' One can easily imagine the serious consequences of such a declaration being made from the Bench by a Sessions Judge unless the declaration is declared to be wrong and unfounded by this court. That is the reason why we think it necessary to state in unmistakable terms that the learned Sessions Judge's declaration of the rights of husbands in this regard has no foundation, so that no one may rely upon that in future as any justification or excuse for beating wives." The sentence on the second charge was considered too lenient and was increased to nine months imprisonment.

The Civil Liberties Union :—On Monday evening Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru inaugurated the Civil Liberties Union in a speech which we should not have felt it necessary to comment on but for his observations regarding those who did not see their way to accept the invitation to join the Union. Of about one hundred and fifty persons, he said only ten had declined. Gandhiji, he excused, as having many pre-occupations—and Working Committee members on the ground that they are always ready,—though in the case of others he seemed to hold that no preoccupation should stand in the way of their joining the Union in a "slave" country like India. (Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru is mistaken in assuming that persons who are not members of the Working Committee do nothing to safe-guard civil liberties merely because they do not advertise their activities.) We can not speak for all the rest, but one of them did not plead pre-occupations as his reason for not responding to the call to associate himself with the Union as a first or foundation member. His principal reason was that civil disobedience and civil liberties were opposite ends of the political pole and that, since Congress retains the right to launch Civil Disobedience, it is the proper body to undertake the duty of safeguarding civil liberties also. Every right should be correlated to the responsibility of dealing with the consequences to which its exercise may give rise. One party can not enjoy the right, leaving it to another to shoulder the responsibility. That this is not a vain fancy, is shown by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's observation at the meeting : "Supposing civil disobedience was started and those who took part in the movement got into jails, then it would be the duty of those who remained outside to fight against the suppression of civil liberties." This duty, in our opinion, will surely not arise unless those

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

819

who are expected to fight outside, the members of the Civil Liberties Union, had been consulted beforehand and had approved of the launching of Civil Disobedience at the particular time and for the particular reason. Mr. Bakhale of the Servants of India Society in seconding the principal resolution said that if he (the speaker) could co-operate with the Government by being nominated to the Council, there was no reason why he should not co-operate with friends in the Congress on matters of common grievance. But the point here is, if Congress starts civil disobedience without consulting the new Union or against its advice, what would be Mr. Bakhale's position vis a vis the Government on the one hand and his Congress friends on the other? In any case, it is not possible for every one to act on the reasoning of Mr. Bakhale.

Rajan-Rajagopala Clash :—The resolution of the Congress Working Committee condemning Dr. Rajan's action in setting up and, what seems to be regarded as more heinous, getting a candidate elected Chairman of the Trichinopoly Municipality, was, perhaps the only one which it could have passed in the circumstances, although it did not help Mr. Rajagopala Charya to reconsider his decision to retire from the Congress. At the same time, the resolution is a warning to those who like to think for themselves on public questions and who feel it their duty to stick to their considered views on them, to steer clear of the Congress, as plain as if "No one who has a mind of his own need enter here," were inscribed on its portals. To those whose lives have been devoted to fight against the autocracy of caste in social matters, the claims to implicit obedience of the Congress Working Committee, would seem to be an undoing of the good work so far done. In two respects the authority of the panchayat, rested on a surer foundation. The members who constituted it, were the elders of the same group and were in a position to give due weight to all the circumstances, involved including the imponderables, which count for so much in human conduct, and not merely to the exigencies of the moment. Then, again, panchayat decisions had to be unanimous in order to acquire the prestige of an inspired judgment binding on all men. The Congress Working Committee enjoys neither of these advantages. It is a body of scattered individuals put together and from year to year at the personal discretion of whoever happens to be elected President for the year. The weight to be attached to its resolution depends wholly on the estimation in which its individual members are held for their experience, sagacity and foresight. The issue in the Rajagopala-Rajan dispute, was whether the Congress Committee is entitled to force its own candidate, regardless of the conditions which make for good administration, on a municipality. We understand Mr. Rajagopala's standpoint to be that, unless Congress Committees have such a right, it is impossible for Congress to capture the Legislatures. But it is permissible to think that the capture of the Legislatures by the Congress at the sacrifice of local administration, is not in the best interests of the country. Millions of the population are not interested in, are not affected by, high politics. Good municipal administration, on the other hand, enters into their daily lives.

Congress Discipline :—Dr. Rajan in Madras would have been drummed out of the Congress Party because he could not agree with Mr. Rajagopala Charya on a matter which had no connection with the Congress, had he not put himself in a secure position by resigning all connection with the Congress. The President, no other than Pandit Jawaharlal himself, has demanded an explanation of the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee for having expressed its sympathy with the public protest against the Communal Award at a meeting held under the Presidentship of Rabindranath Tagore, President of the Civil Liberties Union. In the Central Provinces two Congressmen have severed their connection with the movement because they were asked to explain their conduct in calling upon the acting Governor Mr. Raghavendra Rao. We have come to feel that people who talk loudly of liberty, have one idea of it for themselves and quite a different one for others. What in the captain is a choleric word is rank blasphemy in others.

Conversion and the Franchise :—The "scheduled castes," popularly known as the depressed classes, have a certain number of seats reserved for them under the Poona Pact incorporated in the Communal Award in the new Legislatures. The Order in Council relating to these seats declares that no Indian Christian shall be deemed to be a member of a scheduled caste. The preliminary electoral roll for the Bombay Legislative Assembly has been published and objections and claims are to be made before the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court in Bombay. Mr. B. J. Deorukhkar, a leader of these classes, applied before the Judge objecting to the entry of the name of Mr. P. G. Solanki in the register of voters of the scheduled castes on the ground that Mr. Solanki was a Christian. Dr. Ambedkar who appeared as counsel for Mr. Solanki admitted that his client had embraced Christianity some years ago, but said that, about nine months after conversion, he reverted to his original fold after performing the necessary expiatory ceremonies. Since then he had signed the Poona Pact as a member of the Depressed classes and has been nominated to a seat in the present Legislative Council to represent these classes by Government. Affidavits showing that Dr. Solanki had been taken back into his caste were presented to the Court. The Judge accepted them and dismissed Mr. Deorukhkar's petition. Several interesting points arise out of this case. One and not the least important of these, is if one convert can revert to his "scheduled caste," all can do so.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

820
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

| Aug. 29

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER, BOMBAY, August 29, 1936.

IN VISHNU-LAND, WHAT AVATAR?

The retirement of Mr. Rajagopala Charya from politics, leaves Mr. Satyamurti the most articulate leader of the Congress movement in Tamil Nadu and, generally speaking, in the Madras Presidency. Mr. Satyamurti has always shone better as a lieutenant than as a leader. Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar and, then, Mr. Rajagopala Charya have served as ballast to the light craft of his political oratory whenever it seemed likely to be caught in a gale. It remains to be seen how he will shape as a leader in his own right. He spoke at Khar, the suburb of a suburb of Bombay, on Sunday and his speech was reported in the Times of India on Monday. It was in effect if not in intention a strong criticism of the Congress manifesto. Seldom has a Congress leader spoken so depreciatingly of Indians' capacity for self-government. The Times gave prominence to his declaration that "even after the last British soldier left the shores of India it will take us fifty years to clean up our Augean stables." If this means anything, it means that the withdrawal of the British, voluntarily or involuntarily, will not usher in the millennium, a straight hit at the declaration in the manifesto that independence alone can save the masses. Mr. Satyamurti went farther. He had no patience with those who argued that the presence of "the third party" prevented the adjustment of Hindu-Muslim differences, another dig at a vital point of the manifesto. "To argue in that fashion was to go round in a vicious circle," he said. In his opinion, communalism was due to a Hindu, Muslim, Parsi, Christian or Jew thinking of himself and describing himself as such. "This basic outlook had to go." Mr. Satyamurti is not quite right here. The Hindu, Muslim and others, do not think of themselves or describe themselves as such except on occasions when they are required to do so by authority. In the Courts, in administrative offices, even in registering documents, in the electorates, a man's 'caste' has to be mentioned. The Census schedules contain a column for religion, which is not the case in any other country. In Britain, we believe, a Census enumerator is forbidden to ask any question bearing on religious belief. The Roman Emperor, Trajan, administered a stern rebuke to the Greeks and Hebrews of Alexandria when they approached him with separate addresses of felicitation when he assumed the purple. He insisted on their approaching him as Roman citizens, on pain of his severest displeasure. But his successors did not adhere to his principle and our British rulers follow the policy of his successors. There is something in the argument of "the third party" after all. The basic argument of British Imperialists is that India is not a country but a continent, not a nation but a 'geographical expression.' It was not always so. The founders of the British Indian Empire made no distinction of caste or creed, and the Queen's Proclamation in 1858 embodied resounding declarations of even-handed dealings with subjects irrespective of race, colour or creed. The policy of discrimination had its beginnings in the third quarter of the last century. It rapidly grew and blossomed in the famous Minto declaration fifty years after the Queen's Proclamation.

Mr. Satyamurti said that the average level of character was not very high in this country. Character is one of the most difficult things to define. Putting it bluntly, he defined want of it as being afraid of telling the truth and standing by one's convictions. A few sentences later, the same orator declared that "the feeling 'right or wrong, my party,' and the readiness implicitly and faithfully to carry out the party decision, whatever one's private opinion on a given subject may be, was essential to the conduct of democracy," and that Indians were lacking in it. This is the kind of surrender required of a soldier, and Mr. Satyamurti evidently regards regimenting opinion as the instrument and main purpose of democracy. These are perhaps matters of opinion but even on facts the South Indian leader was more than shaky. He said that India (that is, the Congress) would not stand a dictator, adding: 'Even the Gandhian dictatorship, based as it was on love as opposed to force, was unacceptable to India.' Good Heavens! Gandhiji resigned the dictatorship not because India wanted him to but against the pathetic protests of Congressmen as a body not to leave them without a dictator. He was himself tired of the part. If Mr. Satyamurti believes that the country (the Congress) wanted Gandhiji to retire from politics, he will believe anything. In fact the Congress wants nothing so much as a dictator. It would be glad to have Gandhiji back at the helm at any price. It would even be content with Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru but that he never misses an opportunity for emphasizing his aversion for the lonely pedestal and his preference for playing the eternal freelance. If one thing more than another is clear in his personal make-up, it is his determination not to be fixed to anything or any body. The dictator must have an infinite capacity for blowing bubbles in the air. Pandit Jawaharlal, however, cannot, to save his life, resist the temptation of pricking them, as when, with reference to a proposition to make Hindi the sole medium of Congress proceedings, he drily remarked that Congressmen spoke a language which they believed to be Hindustani but which was not Hindustani. We are tempted to say something about corruption in this country, on which Mr. Satyamurti spoke with all the fervour of a convert, but we must bring these remarks to a close. Corruption, like character, is a loose word to define. Cash bribes are perhaps the most innocuous form of it because they can be easily detected. Even

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

821

cash bribes are not unknown in other countries. In this and more insidious forms it is universal where great powers are entrusted to poorly paid persons. When money-making is regarded as the highest object of endeavour, even well-paid Ministers and Civil Servants, cannot escape the infection. Only it is to nobody's interest to expose the corruption prevailing in other countries. The Asiatic and African are fair game to every one. We least expected Mr. Satyamurti to be in that gang. But he is obviously now intent on securing the support of Englishmen to his party, and what more handy for the purpose than to abuse his own people? We shall not be surprised to see Mr. Satyamurti emerge in the new regime as the leader of the European Party.

HINDU WOMEN'S ABSOLUTE AND LIMITED ESTATES.

(By R. V. V. TATACHARIAR)

In the face of Dr. Deshmukh's Bill for Hindu Women's Right to Property in the ancestral share falling to the husband, it has become necessary to probe more deeply than in my last article on the same subject and examine how far the ancient sages or law-givers extended to women born or marrying in the family the rights and privileges of a coparcener such as father or manager of the family, and how much, if any, they curtailed them, and why. We shall also see how the later commentators shut their eyes to the slow evolutionary aspects of the matter in question and lost sight of the true significance of the special texts relating to women's rights in the family property. I may at once and at the outset say that no such invidious distinction was ever thought of or sharp line drawn between absolute and limited estates, by the ancient rishis. True that Katyayana (Kane's Edn line or sloka 92) says that after the life of the chaste widow without issue who enjoyed her husband's (share of) property without let or hindrance from any of his kinsmen or dayadis, the latter took the same. Does this really curtail her estate and make it a limited or so-called life-estate? If her powers over the same be analysed and compared and contrasted with those of any coparceners including father and manager, it will be seen that there is very little difference. This small difference, though it might appear to a superficial eye to be rather invidious, really amounts to nothing more than a necessary precaution that she could claim no greater powers than the head. Even a father who had ample powers over the moveables including gems, pearls and corals (all being illustrative no doubt) but none over the immovables, whether ancestral or self-acquired, lest he should otherwise leave his issue and dependants altogether destitute, was enjoined first never to alienate them at all, next not to do so without the consent of the other coparceners and lastly not to do it unless they were self-acquired, without aid from the joint family estate. All the restrictions on the women also are, not better and no worse than these directions, the primary idea being that the 'gotra' or family should in no event be rendered destitute by the women who might chance to exercise wantonly or inadvertently the same powers over the joint family property as they could and would over their own stridhanam. Stridhanam was only of long later origin, and plebian and far from 'sacred' in character as compared with the old Vedic or Aryan joint-family property. By 'later origin' I mean the time when the Dravidian institution of absolute, separate, individual and unburdened property came to be engrafted slowly upon the older one. The impact of this idea was, by the way, responsible for the evolution of a coparcener's separate self-acquisitions, even within the joint-family institutions. Now when such separate property has made such violent inroads on the ancient traditions and destroyed the corporate holdings for all time, is it fair or necessary to force the procrustean and primeval bed upon the poor widow without issue, who is after all to get only her husband's share and not the whole joint family estate intact? When the reason of the rule has vanished, there seems to be no necessity to maintain the old order of things simply because of rules of religious or spiritual efficacy of remoter kinsmen or dayadis of her husband. By the way I may mention that the Privy Council has grievously erred in upsetting the correct Madras decisions in favour of Dr. Sarvadhikari's views on the capacity of the brother's son's son as being superior to that of the next heir when they specially welded both principles of sapindaship, visu, of consanguinity and religious efficacy into one harmonious whole, in which process the remotest descendant was eliminated in favour of a nearer ascendant.

Similarly the commentators and the British Courts in their wake have persistently ignored the true evolution of things in the light of history and internal evidence in the Smritis themselves and ignored the mutual or reciprocal action and reaction on one another of Aryan and Dravidian institutions in law as in all other fields and made an utter confusion without trying to keep clear of such tendencies to doubt and dismay.

But for this action and reaction one can easily understand why and wherefrom the points of similarity arise between the parallel institutions of diverse origins. The principle of representation and taking inheritance per stirpes is peculiar to joint-family traditions; while the principal of taking per capita relates to the Dravidian inheritance from maternal grandfather. But this latter principle was given the go by in favour of the former in the case of succession to stridhanam on the part of heirs like daughter's daughters, daughters' sons, and son's sons. Conversely the women who took their mother's stridhanam got only a women's or limited estate instead of an absolute one as one would naturally expect.

She was held, though again absolutely unwarrantedly, to inherit only a woman's or limited estate therein, in the wake of her own mother in the same property. Even the safeguarding expression "After her the kinsmen or dayadis get it" is altogether absent in her case, unlike in her mother's. Some rishis give her a full share and some a quarter only. While some say it is the unmarried daughter that gets it by way of provision for marriage, others say nothing of the sort but merely say the daughter gets it. Evidently she was expected to be more considerate to the members of the family of her birth and so required no such safeguarding injunction like her mother. Moreover who and what was she some ages ago? She was, by appointment or mere intention or act of the mind, a "putrika" who got the entire property in the absence or failure of her son who was as good as a son to her own father. Hence it is an awful travesty of justice that the daughter should be deemed and held to inherit only a limited instead of an absolute estate. It would be more in consonance with justice and legal history to hold that the childless widow steps into the shoes of her husband in respect of his ancestral share or his own self-acquisitions in absolute title of her own as the surviving half of her husband and that her daughter by the husband in question takes also

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

822
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 29

absolute interest therein as being no worse than male issue, though both her own and her mother's rights of succession may be postponed to that of the male issue out of deference to greater religious merit. But for this element of religion and for the historical account of the origin and development of the joint family institutions down to date, and for the fact that at no time did they take a share when male issue was in existence, there would be really no ground of objection to the equal right of all women born or married in the family to get an equal share in the joint family property, however small in value it be, and however ruinous to the economic aspect of the country as a whole by the division thereof into hopelessly minute parcels.

Now we shall see how the woman's estate compares with joint family managership whether of father or other coparcener. Both fully and effectually represent the property in respect of suits by or against it, compromises and family arrangements, management without waste or danger to corpus and possession of the estate for full and effective management. But while the manager is liable to account for the income, savings and expenditure, the widow or daughter is not so liable, need not save anything, and, if she does the accumulations need not be made part of the corpus but may be disposed of as she pleases. Like the coparceners she may partition the property with her co-widows or sisters as the case may be for more effective enjoyment, and alienate in whole or in part even the corpus much more liberally than the male coparceners, and give the alienee even an absolute title in certain contingencies, that is, a greater title than her own. Like the father she can also renounce or surrender all her interest in the property with or without retaining a small share even absolutely for her own maintenance and allow the next heirs or reversioners to come into possession, provided she does it bona fide and not with a view to divide the estate secretly with them. This surrender need not include that of her stridhanam. Now this short resume would go clearly to show how in some respects the widow or other woman is entitled to much greater rights than even the father or manager of the joint family. The reason is not far to seek. Her estate is really not so 'limited' as supposed to be but only an absolute one with certain safeguards in the interest of the people dependant on the property whom she could not refuse to support nor deprive of their future means of subsistence. This has been rendered necessary because of the joint family incidents of the property in her hands, and not because of any special attribute attached to her so-called estate. Because of the above incident she was given greater, nay, unfettered right over the entire income, which in average families would not be very much. But she has amply paid the penalty for this free intrusion into the joint family property by losing very many precious incidents of absolute property in her stridhanam above referred to. Incidents of coparcenership, such as survivorship, principle of representation in taking per stirpes, tracing heirship to the last full owner, instead of becoming a fresh stock of descent, spiritual efficacy to some extent extended at the instance of Vaishnavism to widow and daughter, and the non-exclusion of male issue are some of the characteristics that have crept unawares into non-Vedic or non-Aryan institutions that have been engrafted on the old Aryan or Vedic or joint family traditions. The fruits of the graft no doubt have been so sweet and so great that we have failed to see the local points of engrafting of new upon the old tree but have imagined in our exultation that it was a divine tree revealed to us by the wise rishis of old. Hence also one should be rather unwilling to remove root and branch all the traces of the old tree below the points of grafts in the hope or expectation of reaping the same or superior results from the exclusive sources of the newer portions above the graft-points. But to give full effect to the sages' intentions one may agree to legislative changes without prejudice to the joint-family rights of sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons as a compact series of coparceners or heirs of propositus, while alive and undivided from the propositus himself. In other words one may in fairness to women's new demands concede that they may be allowed to take a full or absolute estate instead of their usual limited estates whether it be widow, daughter, mother, sister or paternal aunt, or even the new heirs created in 1929 with many more that can be, with logic, reason and fairness easily added to their list. The Bill will, therefore, have to undergo several changes in the light of all the above considerations before becoming law acceptable to the wishes and conscience of the Hindu Community.

WOMEN'S RIGHT TO PROPERTY BILL.

(By K. B. GAJENDRAGADKAR, PLEADER, SATARA.)

The principle of Dr. Deshmukh's Bill that the Hindu women should be entitled to property rights is accepted by all sections of people. People who desire the welfare of Hindu women in general wholeheartedly support the principle of the Bill. Of course there are people who, in and out of season, oppose any legislation in regard to the personal law of the Hindus basing their opposition on the ground that "Religion is in danger." One absolutely fails to understand how a Bill like the present one affects the Acharas of the people, who worship custom as their only religion without looking to the principles underlying therein. These persons are raising the same cry for the last 80 years even from the time the Widow Re-marriage Act or the Law prohibiting Suttie was passed. The same cry is even blindly echoed now.

The Bill purports to give some rights of inheritance in the property to women. Do these people mean to say that that right was totally denied to the women in old days by the Rishis?

I would like to say that the idea put forward by some people to the effect that Legislation must not be undertaken in regard to the personal laws of the Hindus or any other community is surely an extravagant claim. If accepted it would be tantamount to prohibition of Legislation in any shape. For there is no system of personal law which would satisfy the opinions and sentiments of all people living under that system. With regard to the measures of Legislation affecting a whole class of people, the only correct and feasible test is furnished by the principle of aiming at the greatest good of the largest portion of the community without sacrificing the legitimate interest of any. Where therefore an important measure of reform is detected by the true well being of the people as a whole and is supported by the mass of enlightened public opinion, the fact that there may be a certain amount of dissatisfaction amongst the more conservative elements should not prove an unsurmountable obstacle. Past experience shows that such feelings of dissatisfaction are always evanescent, they usually give place to acquiescence and after some experience even to a cheerful acceptance of the new situation. Women's education of the present times is a good and convincing illustration of this proposition. As is said before, the principle of the Bill is accepted by

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

823

all intelligent and levelminded people. There would not be a single woman who would not agree with the principle of the Bill. But clauses of the Bill as framed by Dr. Deshmukh are not happily worded and they certainly need to be drastically changed. For instance the provision of the Bill that a Hindu widow should be entitled to a share in the property of her son for the simple reason that she was entitled to a share in the property of her deceased husband cannot be universally acceptable. The question as to what share of the Father's property a married and un-married daughter should receive also deserves careful consideration. The provision in the Bill that daughter should receive property both from the father and husband is also open to serious objection. The succession to the property inherited by the woman is not clearly mentioned. There is similarly a defect in the drafting of Clause 4. For example it is stated that the widow and daughters of a coparcener shall have a share equal to that of his son if he has any. This means if he has no sons but has a grandson there is no basis for determining the share of the widow and the daughters. The Bill does not also state whether the principle of equality is to be applied to son, daughter and widow as a class or to them as persons only. Dr. Deshmukh also failed to notice that his amendments will have far reaching effect on other branches of Hindu Law and he has not therefore made any provision for those contingencies. These are some of the objections against the Bill as it is framed at present. In short the Bill deserves careful consideration, and drafting at the able hands of expert legislators in the Select Committee.

The present writer honestly believes that it would have been much better if Dr. Deshmukh had placed the Reform made in the Baroda State affecting rights of inheritance of women, before his eyes in drafting the Bill.

The changes made in the Baroda State some of which are noted below, have freed Hindu women in that State from many of the injustices practised upon them under the old Mitakshara Law of Joint Family and have placed them in a far more advantageous and enviable position than their sisters in other parts of India. The Law as now amended in Baroda has made the widow of a deceased, a coparcener herself i. e., a member of a Hindu Joint Family. This has made a great change in the status of widow. She has as much right to ask for partition and get her own share in the family property determined and separated as any male member of the family. When she exercises that right she gets a share equal to that of a son if there is one, and in the absence of a son she gets what her husband would have got, if he had been alive at the time of partition. This change assuredly places a widow in a far more advantageous position than the one she had formerly in this property. The woman has now absolute interest in the property worth Rs. 12,000/- and limited interest in the rest of the property above that limit. She has now as much right of alienating property which she holds absolutely as the male owner has. The limit of Rs. 12,000/- is fixed only as a tentative measure and it will not be long before absolute right over all the property inherited by a widow is given to her.

The position and rights of daughters has also been improved in Baroda. An unmarried daughter is now given the right to ask for the separation of her share (equal to one-fourth of her brother's share) in lieu of maintenance and marriage expenses even if no partition takes place in the family. This places her in a more independent position and she is now free to live apart from the family and mould her future life according to her own wishes. With regard to the married daughter she had formerly no right of maintenance in father's family even when she was a widow and had no means of maintenance from her father-in-law's family. According to new Law in Baroda State a widowed daughter is given a right to maintenance in her father's family under some special circumstances.

This scanty account of the development of law regarding women in the Baroda State is given here in short, it is earnestly hoped that the Select Committee on Dr. Deshmukh's Bill should keep the law as modified in the Baroda State before their eyes. Let us hope that the Bill be referred to the Select Committee and law will be ultimately framed improving the status of women in British India. Will this auspicious day really dawn?

EDUCATION UNDER THE HARIJAN SEVAK SANGH.*

(By A. V. THAKKAR.)

The Harijan Sevak Sangh has completed the third year of its activities in September, 1935. During this short period its activities have gone on increasing both in quality and quantity:

	1932-33	1933-34	1934-35.
Prov. Boards ...	26	26	29
Dist. and Local Committees ...	213	333	372
	239	359	401

Correspondingly, there has been a progressive increase in the total expenditure of the Sangh under all heads from year to year: 1932-33, Rs. 2,31,089; 1933-34, Rs. 3,31,791; 1934-35, Rs. 4,48,422.

At the annual meeting of the Central Board, held at Delhi on 1st January, 1935, a new Constitution replacing the old one was adopted. According to it, the President shall form from among the members of the Central Board an Executive Committee of seven members, including himself as Chairman of the Executive Committee and the two Secretaries of the Central Board. The Executive Committee thus constituted, met twice during the year under report; at Calcutta from the 26th to the 28th April 1935, and at Wardha on the 29th and 30th August 1935.

Another important feature of the new constitution is that every member of the Central and Provincial Board district and other committees is required to sign a pledge declaring his belief in the complete eradication of untouchability. The pledge enjoins on every member that he should treat no one as an untouchable by reason of birth or caste, and that he should give proof of his intentions by actually helping the cause of the Harijans, either by personal service to them or by such other help that his position and means would permit.

During the year Rs. 41,245 were paid by the Provincial Boards and Rs. 17,834 by the Central Board as scholarships, thus making a total of Rs. 59,079. 117 students were in receipt of scholarships during the year 1934-35 as against 99 in 1933-34 and 47 in 1932-33. The value of scholarship ranged from Rs. 10 to Rs. 30, the average being Rs. 15, according to the course the student was undergoing. The 117 scholarships mentioned above were given to students in the various provinces in India from Jammu in the North to Trivandrum in the South, and from Karachi in the West to Jorhat in Assam in the East. Of these 117 students, 7 were lady students, 4 of whom were in the medical course in Bombay, Madras and Agra.

*Extracts from the Annual Report for 1934-35, realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

824
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 29

An analysis of the scholarships given shows that 34 were for technical and professional courses and 83 for Arts and Science courses. The total expenditure for 1934-35 on this item amounted to Rs. 18,445. It should also be borne in mind that in addition to this a certain sum was spent by Provincial Boards on collegiate scholarships, especially in big cities like Bombay, Madras, Calcutta and Poona. The applications for scholarships are scrutinized and scholars are selected by a small committee consisting of Principals N. V. Thadani and S. N. Mukerjee of the Hindu and St. Stephen's Colleges, Delhi, respectively and the General Secretary of the Sangh.

The Sangh is indebted to the Trustees of Raghmal Charity Trust, Calcutta, who donated a sum of Rs. 750 p. m. for three months and Rs. 400 for nine months in the year which was utilized for giving scholarships to 112 Harijan boys and girls in schools. Besides the Sangh awarded 120 scholarships from its own funds to Harijan students receiving similar education in the different provinces and distributed Rs. 41,425 as scholarships last year for pupils in Middle and High Schools.

The policy of this Sangh has since its inception been to discourage separate schools and recruit Harijan children to common schools.

As far as Municipal areas are concerned, our efforts in this direction have been fairly successful. But it is a distressing tale of woe in the case of some district and local board schools whether located in caste quarters or outside. Harijan children are not tolerated, though they are not refused admission. Harijan children are asked to sit outside in the pial of the school and the teacher if he happens to belong to the higher castes, shrinks from approaching the boy to teach him. There is another aspect of this question. Though large sums of money are spent by local boards on primary education, there are as yet vast tracts and areas mostly inhabited by the backward classes and Harijans without any schools. Thus the Sangh has been forced to start primary schools on its own responsibility, mostly in rural areas where there are no District Board or Taluk Board schools for 2 or 3 miles round or where Harijan children find it difficult to attend common schools.

In towns, the Sangh has similarly started schools intended mainly for the sweepers who have no access to public schools. The Sangh has been found fault with for duplicating the work of the local bodies. If it is only remembered that our schools in addition to imparting the three R's, to the pupils, serve as a social centre as well, looking to the social and economic needs of the community in the neighbourhood, this charge will not be levelled against us. This is a speciality of schools started by the Sangh. The Sangh, at the same time is conscious of the many shortcomings of its schools and the staff and had made arrangements last year to make the teachers more efficient by giving them training in first aid, hygiene, sanitation and elementary accounting.

From the information available, there were 1,298 preparatory schools with 34,273 boys and 2,816 girls last year as against 902 schools with 23,164 boys and 1,660 girls in the preceding year. The total expenditure incurred on these schools in the year under report amounted to Rs. 109,438 as against Rs. 75,814 in the preceding year. The Bihar Board of the Harijan Sevak Sangh leads the other provinces with 256 schools under it.

From the very beginning Orissa has been endeavouring to get Harijan children admitted into the common schools, and this year more than 1,000 have been admitted. Similar attempts were made in other provinces also and from the incomplete information available it is learnt that about 3,021 boys and girls had been admitted into common schools; still there are thousands of Harijan children living in the villages in the interior without schools of any kind for miles around.

The Sangh has been encouraging Harijan boys to take to industrial and technical training as a sure means of earning a living. A beginning was made in Tanning last year by starting the Cottage Tanning Institute at Calcutta under the able supervision of Sjt. Satish Chandra Das Gupta. The object of this centre is to apply chrome and bark tanning to cottage conditions without any elaborate machinery. A select batch of 21 pupils recruited from various provinces is undergoing a thorough training in chrome and bark tanning with a view to starting provincial tanneries on a cottage industry basis.

As an auxiliary to this, another scheme full of promise and significance, the carcass disposal scheme at Howrah, was started last year called the Dead Cattle Institute, again under the able guidance of Sjt. Satish Chandra Das Gupta. The object of this scheme, apart from utilizing the hides of animals for the manufacture of leather articles, is to convert by chemical processes the fats, bones and meat of the dead animals into rich and useful manures. From the very beginning it has paid its way, but its real importance lies in attempting to convert a part of a great national waste into national wealth. The course of training lasts in these two institutes for 18 months, after which the students will return to their respective provinces to set up small establishments.

It is expected that the village Chamar who is now used to primitive and crude methods of skinning and tanning will greatly be benefitted by the new methods. Until September 1935 a sum of Rs. 13,079 was invested in the tanning institute and the finished leather to the extent of Rs. 7,193 was sold up to that period. For the Dead Cattle Institute, the Sangh sanctioned Rs. 5,000 on Mahatma Gandhi's advice for practical experimental work.

Sjt. G. R. Valunjkar is also running a good tannery at Wardha under the immediate supervision of Gandhiji and it is probable that during the current year it will be running at full capacity so as to show a margin of profit. Both the Calcutta and Wardha Tanneries have recently added departments of shoe making which is finding a ready markets for its finished articles.

One other institution that deserves to be mentioned under this head is the Kodambakkam Harijan Industrial Home near Madras. Here students are trained in carpentry, smithy, cane work, tin smithy and weaving. There were 25 boys in the home who were given free board and lodging and the monthly expenditure came to about Rs. 400. In other parts of the country, in places like Cuttack, Navsari and Sabarmati, training in carpentry, boot and chappal making was given to Harijan boys.

There has been a rapid increase in the number of free hostels for Harijan boys and girls. 92 hostels with 1,133 boys and 148 girls were maintained during the year as against 60 hostels with 827 boys and 291 girls in the preceding year. Of these, 6 were girl hostels run by the Madras City, Karnatak, Gujarat, Andhra and Kerala Boards, with 140 girls. Andhra province topped the list with 22 hostels with 313 boys and 38 girls. The total amount spent during the year on hostels alone amounted to Rs. 62,888 as against Rs. 28,377 spent in the previous year.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

825

The average cost of food per head came to a little over Rs. 4 a month.

The Sangh spent Rs. 18,261 in supplying books, clothes, stationery articles, etc., free to Harijan students. The total amount spent by the Central Board and the branches of the Sangh under all heads, for educational work amounted during the year to Rs. 2,75,480 as against Rs. 1,63,945, i.e., an increase of Rs. 1,11,425 over that of the last year.

In almost every school, run by the Sangh, there is provision for rendering medical aid to Harijans for ordinary ailments. It is wellknown that the Harijan patients are neither promptly attended to nor properly treated in our public hospitals, staffed as they are with caste Hindus who are prejudiced against Harijans. The Harijan, therefore, would rather suffer patiently than go to hospital for medical relief. Thus the medical help given by our teachers to Harijan living in the area has been a God-send to Harijans in their sickness.

WILL AMERICA RETURN TO PROHIBITION?

"Liquor drinking in America has reached such a revolting stage that the liquor interests are alarmed at the prospect of a return to Prohibition," declared the Rev. John C. Bieri, D.D., before a meeting of the Landour Women's Christian Temperance Union held on 12th August at Abergeldie, Landour, the home of Mrs. J. E. Moody.

"Wet leaders are warning liquor sellers that they must not allow their customers to drink to excess, or the traffic will be inevitably outlawed," the speaker continued.

The Rev. Dr. Bieri, father of Miss Kathryn Bieri a teacher in Woodstock School, Landour, is on leave from his pastorate of the St. Luke's Methodist Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, Pa., U. S. A. At the beginning of his address he stated that he was not a special investigator of social conditions, not identified with a special temperance organization, not an "authority," but that he spoke as an ordinary observer of everyday conditions.

In reply to the accusation that there was more drinking in Prohibition days than before, Dr. Bieri quoted Bishop Edwin Hughes, who said that in eight years of commuting from the heart of Chicago to the suburbs during Prohibition days he had seen but two drunken men. In attending a football game at the University of Pennsylvania in 1930 where 60,000 people were present, Dr. Bieri had seen but two empty whiskey bottles where in pre-Prohibition days, as the ground-keeper told him, wheelbarrows full had been taken out after a game.

"During Prohibition," Dr. Bieri reminded his audience, "there were no saloons, no liquor shops, no magazine advertisements, no newspaper advertisements, no bill board advertisements, no radio advertisements, no cinema advertisements. It is easy to see that the temptation to drink was greatly lessened. Positive proof of less drinking was to be seen in jails, poor-houses, missions, delirium tremens wards, and Keeley Cure Homes almost emptied of alcoholics. If you wanted liquor, you had to know where to go for it. Now the liquor business is going for drinkers."

The speaker described the church was "deluded" and "smugly comfortable" after the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment, while the liquor forces subtly worked night and day with false propaganda, proclaiming the rights of "personal liberty," well financed by multi-millionaires. "The cry that the bootleggers were getting the millions that should go to the Government as revenue persuaded many to vote for the repeal of the Amendment," Dr. Bieri said.

"In repealing the Amendment," the audience was informed, "the promise was made that the saloon would not return. Within a few months the stools required at the bar by the new law were discarded, screens were put up at the windows, and the old time brass-railed bar was in vogue under the name of tap-room instead of saloon, and with the added allurements of cabaret, orchestra, and bar maids instead of men. Women are now at the brass rail with perambulators waiting in the street, a condition practically unknown in the old days. Boys and girls are served without restriction in most places.

"The country is being deluged with advertisements of liquor through magazines, newspapers, cinemas, radios, bill-boards, and department stores. My custom in America was to take an early morning walk daily. On Sunday mornings the pavements in front of the liquor shops in League Island were filthy with the results of Saturday night carousals. Midnight fights and arrest are frequent. Jails and poorhouses are filling, street beggars and drunken drivers are being multiplied.

"The result is that the church is once more aroused. Parents whose children come home drunk are aroused.

"Merchants who have to share their profits with the liquor dealers are aroused. Educational and pledge-signing campaigns are being organized." Dr. Bieri predicted that the next few years would see a fight to the finish on the alcohol question, and Amendment in the Constitution that would stay for eternity.

Dr. Bieri is serving as pastor of Kellogg Memorial Church, Landour, during August and September, and expects to tour widely on the plains before returning to America in December.

Mussoorie.

JULIA NORTON CLEMES

MR. SACHCHIDANANDA SINHA.*

(By VISHWANATH SAHAY VARMA.)

Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha comes of one of the most respectable Kayastha families of Bihar. Murar, in the district of Shahabad, is a well-known place having proud traditions of its inhabitants. It was here that the ancestors of Mr. Sinha settled down when the Rajput founders of the Dumraon Raj moved down from Oudh to Shahabad. Mr. Sinha's grandfather the late Bakshi Shiva Prasad Sinha, was the head of the collection and treasury department of the Dumraon Raj. He left behind him two sons, Ram Gulam Sinha and Ramyad Sinha—the latter the worthy father of the hero of this sketch. Bakshi Ram Gulam Sinha, Mr. Sinha's uncle, spent his life in the service of the Government in the North-Western Frontier as a Deputy Magistrate and Deputy Collector and distinguished himself in service. His younger brother Ramyad Sinha was also in executive service in the N. W. F. till after the Mutiny in 1857. But he resigned his job and came down to Benares to practice as a pleader. He soon shifted his practice to Arrah in his native district and by sheer dint of merit rose to the highest rung in the professional ladder and became the recognised leader of the Arrah Bar before long.

On the 10th of November, 1871, a son and heir was born to him who was named Sachchidananda Sinha.

He was the only child of his parents and naturally received their tender care and attention. At the age of 5, his 'Maktab' ceremony, then a common feature

* The Indian Nation Patria.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

826 realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 29]

in the Kayastha families but now in disuse, was performed. Two years later he joined the Arrah Zilla School where he gave abundant promise of a brilliant career and always stood first in the class.

He sat for the matriculation examination and passed in the second division in 1888.

In the same year, Mr. Sinha joined the Patna College. But the idea of going abroad was growing stronger and irrepressible in his mind. The difficulties in his way were almost insurmountable. Not a single Biharee Hindu of the higher castes had till then ventured to cross the black water. Besides the unwillingness of his parents, the question of money was a material consideration.

At last, he managed to raise a small sum by selling off his shawls, watch, chains, rings and books—in fact, every thing of any value that he had with him at the time—just sufficient to cover his passage to Aden. So he booked his passage and with but Rs. 50 in his pocket, shook the dust of India from off his feet, on the 26th of December 1889. He was then just eighteen. The evening before he wrote to his people asking them to remit money to Aden. When he reached Aden, he found the letters and the necessary sum of money which enabled him to proceed further.

After a week's stay at Aden, he caught the P. and O. mail steamer, in which after a rather rough passage in the Bay of Biscay, he reached London early in February 1890, and was received at the landing place by his friend Mr. Hasan Imam. Until the late Mr. (Sir) Ali Imam's return Mr. Sinha lived separately, after which he and Mr. Hasan Imam lived together, until the latter returned in July 1892. He joined the Hon'ble Society of the Middle Temple and the University College, London, at which he regularly attended lectures of distinguished and eminent professors in Law, History, Politics, Economics, Logic and Philosophy.

His allowance was not large but he managed to save a fair amount every month for purchasing books and he brought with him on his return—in place of the trunkfuls of fine clothes which many young men do—a large number of choice and valuable books, which formed the nucleus of that fine collection, which was formerly housed in Mr. Sinha's Library at Allahabad and now decorate numberless shelves of the Sachchidananda Sinha Library at Patna. Having passed his examinations, he was called to the Bar on the 26th January 1893 and shortly after, returned to his native country. It was suggested to Mr. Sinha by his relations that he should atone for the sin of having trespassed to the forbidden regions. This he stoutly refused and in doing so, he wrote in the shape of a learned thesis discussing the philosophy of 'prayaschitta' and its absurdity and inapplicability in case of those crossing the seas. To this view he stuck even when he returned and was determined not to budge an inch from the bold stand he had taken on the rock of a principle.

After some time, Mr. Sinha enrolled himself as an Advocate of the Calcutta High Court and settled down to practice at Bankipur in May 1893.

He made up his mind to start an English weekly. In the late Mr. Mahesh Narayan, a name yet remembered in Bihar with affection and admiration, he found a brilliant colleague with rare gifts of journalistic ability. With his co-operation, and that of the late Mr. Krishna Sahay and others, funds were raised. Before Mr. Sinha had been six months at Bankipur, he had the satisfaction of finding his scheme, not a wild goose chase as some people thought, but an accomplished fact.

The journal was named 'the Bihar Times', which later transformed itself into the 'Biharee'. It made its appearance in January 1894. The policy of the paper was vigorously pro-Biharee, and it was intended to create and rouse public consciousness among the Biharees.

With untiring zeal the two Biharee youths were living and striving for instilling in to the mind of the younger generation of Biharees the ideal of a self-contained Bihar holding equal status with other provinces. Unfortunately, Mr. Sinha's health broke down and he had to leave Bankipur for Allahabad on medical advice. Under the stress of circumstances, Mr. Sinha began his practice at the Allahabad High Court. It did not take him long to rise in the profession even in his land of adoption.

From July 1900 to June 1904, Mr. Sinha worked as the Honorary Secretary of the Kayastha Pathashala and the Honorary Editor of the 'Hindustan Review,' successor-in-title to the 'Kayastha Samachar,' a journal conducted under the terms of the will of the late Munshi Kali Prasad. As the Honorary Secretary, Mr. Sinha introduced many reforms in the administration of the institution. Mr. Sinha's connection with the Pathashala came to an abrupt end with the election of Rai Bahadur Gokul Prasad as the President of the Pathashala in July 1904. He managed to acquire the proprietorship of the 'Hindustan Review' from the Pathashala. Meanwhile, he thought of making further adventures in journalism by bringing out a weekly in 1902. The 'Indian People' as the journal was named by the late Mr. Ramesh Chandra Dutta appeared in January 1903. Mr. Sinha brought over from distant Madras as his colleague that brilliant and capable journalist, Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, now the renowned Editor-in-Chief of the 'Leader' of Allahabad. The 'Indian People', achieved for itself a position in a very short time along with the most respectable Indian journals. In January 1904 the 'Indian People' was converted into a bi-weekly, and continued as such till October, 1905, when it was converted into a daily under the name of the 'Leader.' Mr. Sinha was a prominent member of the directorate of the company that was formed to own the paper.

People felt Mr. Sinha's absence from Bihar and he was approached by friends to return to Bihar. However for some time, Mr. Sinha's allegiance as a lawyer was divided between the U. P. and Bihar, but ultimately he settled down in Bankipur. Here he set his heart once again upon realising the dream—the ideal of a regenerated Bihar. He was instrumental in organising the Bihar Provincial Conference—the Bihar Industrial and Educational Association and so many other public institutions which really served to infuse a real and novel spirit of patriotism and public service. He was then the propelling power behind all the movements in Bihar.

Even a casual visitor to the 'Singhashan', Mr. Sinha's residence, cannot help being lost in a world of books he sees around him. Right from his verandah to the bed room, it is all a mighty array of choicest books, books, and nothing but books. The Sinha Library and the Radhika Sinha Institute, which are Mr. Sinha's invaluable gifts to Bihar and the City of Patna, are his life-work. The Sinha Library is undoubtedly one of the largest libraries in India. There is hardly a book which Mr. Sinha's vigilance has overlooked. The red lines placed here and there in almost every book show what an untiring reader Mr. Sinha is. There is hardly an Indian newspaper which he does not receive and upon which he does not cast his cursory thought searching looks. There is hardly an important matter in whatever corner of the paper it may be, which his trained and

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

827 discerning eyes though old, will not detect. He has a priceless treasure-house of important and useful informations, newspaper cuttings and references collected year after year.

From the airy regions of books to which he soars and keeps soaring, he descends down with the precision and speed of the skylark to the minute details of his household. He is seen directing all the affairs of his domestic life with characteristic thoroughness and care, no less than what he will bestow on the most intricate public work. He is a remarkably practical man, a trait indeed very rare in scholars, philosophers and even politicians, who look contemptuously upon these "small things." His house displays perfect order and discipline and reveals a system in everything, big or small.

THE JAPANESE HIMALAYAN EXPEDITION*

Whatever success may attain the first Japanese expedition to the Himalayas, their choice of the peak—Nanda Kot—appears to be a very happy one. The peak situated in what is geographically known as the Kumaon section of the Himalaya is only 22,510 ft. in height from the sea level and lies at the head of the Pindari glacier. Within this section there are, according to Mr. Charles A. Sherring, an ex-Deputy Commissioner of Almora and much travelled mountaineer, four peaks above 23,000 ft. high above 22,000 ft. and eight above 20,000 ft. At no point of this area is it possible to cross the border of India without rising 16,750 ft. on the Niti pass or 16,780 ft. on the Lipu Likh pass; whereas other passes range from 17,580 ft. viz., the Untadhuna to Mana 17,890 ft. and Neo 18,510 ft. and the Lankpya 18,150 ft. It will thus be seen that not to speak of the Himalayan peaks even its passes existing in this section are higher than Mount Fuji the highest peak in Japan proper. In their turn, however, all these peaks in Kumaon section excepting two pale into insignificance when the proper Himalayan giants about 50 in number from a mean height of 24,000 ft. are taken into consideration. The two exceptions are Nanda Devi (25,645 ft.) and Kamet (25,440 ft.).

If, however, Nanda Kot is comparatively a less high peak, satisfaction will be found from the fact that its summit, like many of the other Himalayan peaks, big or small, still possesses the virgin snow untrodden yet by human feet. There is yet little information about the climbing potentialities of the peak in spite of the fact that it must have been seen many times both from the Pindari glacier at the mouth of which the peak stands and from the Gori valley running south of Milam. As seen from the west, the summit of the peak is bounded by two ridges each with an average inclination of 30 degrees. The ridges themselves do not seem to present any severe climbing difficulties but the approaches to them from the glacier below are probably not at all easy.

All these considerations become of less importance when it is noted that the first choice of the Japanese of a Himalayan peak has fallen in that region which traditionally is held as the most important and sacred part of the Himalaya and every peak, river and temple wherein is credited with a popular legend. Behind such legends remains the fact that the first Aryan exploration of the Himalaya commenced here. "Names like Gangotri and Badrinath," according to the Survey of India, "are reminders of the courage and enterprise of the Aryan pilgrims who were the first explorers to penetrate the Himalayan gorges and passes." In no other region of the Himalayas have the mountain features been given so poetic a nomenclature as here; in no other region has such a valuable legacy of geographical names been handed down from so distant a past. "These names," says the same Department "furnish a unique example of ancient geographical art, an example that modern geography has admired and perhaps even envied." Amidst the striking scenery surrounding the peaks and gorges of this region many of the great events in the mythological history of Hinduism are reputed to have taken place. Temples and sacred shrines—about 800 in number—rocky paths worn during centuries by feet of myriads of pilgrims tell the traveller that here of all places in India the artistic soul of the philosopher Hindu has through unbreakable generations sought satisfaction.

If one casts his glance northward from a place like Almora one will see that the particular town is surrounded by an amphitheatre of snowy mountains, a scene which with a different background and on a smaller scale, is comparable with that of the Ganges at Benares surrounded by a similar amphitheatre of stony ghats. At the western end of this amphitheatre stands genial Badrinath (Lord of Badri, 23,399 ft. in height) known since the days of the Ramayanic and the Mahabharatam heroes. There are many stories woven round Badrinath—the residence of Lord Vishnu—which even now attracts thousands of Hindu pilgrims to it every year. Opposed to Badrinath stands the grim-looking Kedarnath (Lord of Kedar, 22,770 ft.). The peculiar sanctity of the peak lies in the fact that it is here that the great God Siva took refuge when flying from the Pandvas in the form of buffalo and being hard pressed he dived into the ground, leaving however his hinder parts of the surface, an object of adoration for ever afterwards.

Then there are to be met such mountain names in this region as Trisul (the trident of Lord Siva, so named from the irregular shapes of its two summits as high as 22,320 ft. and 23,360 ft.); Bandar Punch (tail of a monkey which act as a beacon to pilgrims visiting the shrine of Jamuntri and is 20,720 ft. high); Srikanta (glorious throat of Lord Siva; 20,120 ft.) stands near the source of the Bhagirathi branch of the Ganges and has been supposed to be descriptive of the "sharp point" it possesses. Nilkanta (blue throat of Lord Siva 21,640 ft.) Nanda Devi (goddess Nanda or the wife of Lord Siva dominating all the peaks in the neighbourhood and venerated in the plains by thousands of her votaries and is 25,645 ft. high); Nanda Kot (the peak where the goddess Nanda dallies with her celestial friends and holds her court) and Pancha Chulli (five fire places of the goddess Nanda and is 22,630 ft. high). At times, says the Imperial Gazetteer when the wind blows the snow from the peak like smoke the votaries of the goddess in the hot plains of India will say the goddess Nanda is lighting her kitchen fire. Long long ago Atkinson in his "Himalayan Districts" spoke in connection with this region: "All the aids to worship in the shape of striking scenery, temples, mystic and gorgeous ceremonial and skilled celebrants are present. He must indeed be dull who returns from his pilgrimage unsatisfied."

It was Dr. T. G. Longstaff who in 1905 made an attempt to conquer the peak of Nanda Kot. He was accompanied by his two Italian guides and all of them were veteran Alpine climbers. The party succeeded in exploring the three large valleys on the east of Nanda Devi and Nanda Kot. They crossed two hitherto unattempted snow passes of about 18,000 ft. with their own baggage, as the climbing

*Anurita Bazar Patrika.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

828
realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 29]

was of too severe a character to be attempted by the local coolies. In attempting to climb the peak they established their base camp at Narspan Patti on the North-eastern foot of Nanda Kot in the month of June. On the following day the party attained a height of 19,300 ft. where they pitched the tent for the night. Next day (June 11) Longstaff fought his way up for about five hours reaching an altitude of 19,800 ft. and along the North-eastern ridge finally reached a height of 21,000 ft. but was turned back by the risk of starting an avalanche. Writing about his experience in Nanda Kot Longstaff reported the possibility of conquering the peak if there was sufficient time for the effort.

The Japanese expedition will follow in the footsteps of Longstaff and will be better equipped particularly when instead of local coolies who are no mountaineers they will have the assistance of the "Tigers" of the Everest Expedition. The expedition will follow the northern "high-way" to Tibet, the way to Manasarover and Kailash, followed annually and for centuries by devout Hindus and Buddhists—until they reach the Gori Ganaga. They will then follow its course and finally reach the village Martoli. From the latter place they will next move westward and reach Narspan Patti to establish their base camp there for ascending the peak along its north-eastern ridge, as did more than 30 years ago that veteran mountaineer Dr. T. G. Longstaff.

FASCISM AND SOCIALISTS.

Mr. J. B. Priestley, author of "The Good Companions," and at this moment about the most popular novelist in England, is, according to his own statement, a Left-Wing Socialist. He delivered a striking address on politics before the Independent Labour Party Summer School at Letchworth and warned the I. L. P. that while they argued Fascism was consolidating itself.

Saying first that he hated to deliver or receive lectures, Mr. Priestley declared that he was primarily interested in people not in politics; but he, like others, had been driven to study politics and economics by the present state of things.

If he was a Socialist it was perhaps because his father and mother were Socialist, though he confessed that he had always thought that capitalistic society had come to the end of its usefulness. His trouble was that he wanted people to have freedom and comfort, but that he could never believe any one political system or economic theory would achieve that result. His rough test for all systems, theories, and philosophies was to compare them with that profound saying "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath." And he found the Left quite as often as the Right wanted to make man for the Sabbath.

He implored them to ponder well on that point. One tyranny instead of another was not freedom as he understood the word. There were Socialists who if shown that their ideals could be more easily attained by some novel method would fight against that method because it was not their own. In short, their first desire was to see their theories put into practice.

In the same way he deplored the Jesuitical attitude of many of his Communist friends, who, if the authorities put some extremist into gaol, came whimpering to him about freedom and toleration. But when he asked them to try and understand the case for authority they called him a sentimental Liberal. Nor could he get them to see that material luxury for all without absolute freedom of opinion for all was no Utopia.

Going on to denounce the intellectuals of the Socialist movement "for their stupidity in not presenting a united front," the well-known novelist said:

"I am frightened by this for we shall go on explaining what hair divides us until we find the Fascists in command. While we are quarrelling the Fascists all over the world are consolidating. Some of you will finish your debates in concentration camps if you are not careful. We on the Left-Wing have to find a common denomination quickly."

He himself would put it that he wanted a world in which the ordinary man had justice and the exceptional man opportunity. In so far as the basis of Communism and trade unionism was compassion, he was with them; but in so far as the Communist showed hatred of those above rather than pity for those below, in so far as the trade unionist merely wanted to defend his wages rather than to create a better society, he viewed both with hostility.

He was afraid the Left-Wing was not realistic enough. Its tactics were deplorable. It must busy itself converting the executive classes—the men who knew how the machine worked. No society could be run without their co-operation. The Socialists should wave the flag of patriotism against the Jingo. English people were patriotic. They loved their country. It was a feeling to be revered, and not to be sneered at because it led them to be humbugged.

The way to begin to interest this influential section of English society was to make it clear that the Socialists also love their country and want to make it a happy land for all. The Socialists were guilty of not knowing how to use these people. They were content to sneer at them. Yet, added Mr. Priestley, the letters he had received after writing his "English Journey" proved how many well-to-do folk were horrified at learning what misery there was in the country and were anxious to know in what way they could help—The Hindu.

DR. SOLANKI'S INCLUSION IN SCHEDULED CLASSES.

The Poona Pact and the fact that it was signed by Dr. P. G. Solanki, as a representative of the Depressed Classes was mentioned before Mr. A. A. Chitre, Chief Judge, Small Causes Court, on August 22.

The matter arose out of a petition filed by Mr. B. J. Deorukhkar, who challenged the claims of Dr. P. G. Solanki, a member of the Corporation and a nominated non-official member of the Legislative Council, to be included in the scheduled castes constituency in the electoral roll.

Mr. Deorukhkar stated that Dr. Solanki had been converted to Christianity in April, 1925, at St. Andrew's Church, Agripada.

Dr. B. Ambedkar, assisted by Mr. N. C. N. Acharya, appeared for Dr. Solanki. Dr. Ambedkar admitted the fact of conversion but represented that nine months thereafter, Dr. Solanki reverted to his caste and was functioning as a member of the community. He was formally adopted in the presence of a panch and a priest officiated at the adoption.

The judge directed that affidavits be filed asserting the fact of reversion to the caste.

The affidavit was filed at 5 p.m. after which Mr. Deorukhkar asked for copy of the affidavit to enable him to cross-examine Dr. Solanki and others. The Court, however, informed him that it was merely a revising authority and that he could proceed in the proper court if he wished to pursue the matter further. Mr. Deorukhkar's application was eventually rejected.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

829

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

Subscription Rates.

Inland Rs. 7-8 (Post Free).
Foreign ... Rs. 10 (Post Free).

Single copies of the current month, if available can be had at 2 annas, current year 4 annas and copies more than a year old 6 annas each, exclusive of postage.

For further particulars, please apply to—
THE MANAGER,

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,
KAMAKSHI HOUSE BANDRA,
BOMBAY 20.

TRUE HAPPINESS only comes from FINANCIAL SECURITY

FROM EVEN A MEAGRE
START THE RICHEST
ESTATE MAY GROW.

No start is too small for a Savings Bank Account; add to it faithfully a modest amount every month and notice as the years pass, how it multiplies itself in surprising fashion. You'll soon learn to enjoy in contentment its consistent increase—the secret of true happiness.

Enquire at this Bank for the unique facilities offered.

THE TRAVANCORE NATIONAL BANK LTD

25-27, CHURCHGATE STREET,
FORT-BOMBAY.

THE BANK OF BARODA, LTD.

Under the patronage of and largely supported by the Government of H. H. the Maharaja Gaekwar of Baroda.

(Registered under the Baroda Companies Act III of 1897).

HEAD OFFICE:—BARODA.

Branches:—Bombay, Ahmedabad, Navsari, Mhasana Dabhol, Surat, Petlad, Patan, Amreli, Bhavnagar, Sidhpur, Karjan, Kalol, Kadi, Kapadwanj, Dwarka, and Port Okha. Harir (N.G.)

CAPITAL SUBSCRIBED	...	Rs. 60,00,000
CAPITAL PAID-UP	...	" 30,00,000
RESERVE FUND	...	" 23,50,000

DIRECTORS:

Mr. Walchand Hirachand (Chairman).
Sheth Durgaprasad Shambhuprasad Laskari, (J.B.)
Agent, Ahmedabad.)

Toolsidas Kilachand Esq., (Kilachand JDevchand & Co, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Girdharilal Dosabhai Parikh, B.A., LL.B., Baroda,
Raj Ratna Bhallai Dajibhai Amin, B.A., M.S. C. I.,
(Managing Agent, Alembic Chemical Works Co., Ltd., Baroda.)

Seth Pransukhlal Maratiai (Shorrocks Mills, Ltd. Ahmedabad.)

Mr. S. D. Saklatwala (Tata Sons, Ltd., Bombay.)

Mr. Krishnaraj Vithalrao Uplap.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest on daily balances from Rs. 500 to Rs. 1,00,000. will be allowed at $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. per annum and on sums over Rs. 1,00,000 by special arrangement. No interest which does not come to Rs. 5 per half-year will be allowed.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Received for long or short periods on terms which may be ascertained on application.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank grants accommodation on terms to be arranged against approved securities.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its constituents the safe Custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividends and interest thereon; it also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government Paper and all descriptions of Stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be learnt on application.

SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Deposits received in Savings Bank accounts and Savings Bank deposit accounts. Interest on these is allowed at $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent per annum. Rules on application.

W. G. GROUNDWATER,

General Manager.

THE SCINDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED.

Fortnightly sailings between

Bombay, Karachi and Calcutta,
Burma calling at Galle Tutuorin
Colombo and other coast ports
according to demand.

For Freight and other particulars apply to—

NARROTAM MORARJEE & Co.,

Agents

Sudama House, 81, Sprott Road, Ballard Estate,
Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

830

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

[Aug. 29

realpatidar.com

THE BANK OF INDIA, LTD.

(Established 7th September 1906.)

INCORPORATED UNDER THE INDIAN COMPANIES ACT VI OF 1882.

HEAD OFFICE:

ORIENTAL BUILDINGS, BOMBAY.

BULLION EXCHANGE,

Sheik Memon St., Bombay.

BANDRA, (Near Bombay.)

MALABAR HILL,

3/4 Hughes Road, Bombay.

KALBADEVI ROAD, BOMBAY,

(Corner of Picket Road.)

Branches:—

AHMEDABAD.

AHMEDABAD, (Station Branch.)

CALCUTTA.

CALCUTTA, (Bara Bazar.)

NAGPUR CITY.

POONA.

POONA CITY.

RAJKOT.

SURAT.

Capital Subscribed Rs. 2,00,00,000

Capital Called up " 1,00,00,000

Reserve Fund " 1,04,00,000

London Agents:—The Westminster Bank, Ltd.

CURRENT DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.

Interest is allowed on daily balances from Rs. 800 to Rs. 1,00,000 @ $\frac{1}{2}\%$ per annum. Interest on balances in excess of Rs. 1,00,000 allowed only by special arrangement. No credit will be given in accounts for interest amounting to less than Rs. 5 per half year.

FIXED DEPOSITS.

Deposits are received fixed for one year or for short period at rates of interest which can be ascertained on application.

"Savings Bank accounts opened on favourable terms. Rules on application." The Bank acts as Executor and Trustee under Wills and Settlements and undertakes Trustee business generally. Rules may be obtained on application.

The Bank grants accommodation of terms to be arranged against approved security.

LOANS, OVERDRAFTS AND CASH CREDITS.

The Bank undertakes on behalf of its Constituents the safe custody of Shares and Securities and the collection of dividend and interest thereon. It also undertakes the sale and purchase of Government paper and all descriptions of stock at moderate charges particulars of which may be had on application.

A. G. GRAY,

Manager.

THE

Central Bank of India, Ltd.

SAVINGS BANK.

Money saved wisely in these days brings Happiness and when spent unwisely, it brings over whelming debts, worry, distress and unhappiness.

Make therefore a regular saving by opening a

HOME SAVINGS SAFE ACCOUNT

with us and earn interest on Daily balances

SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

Before hiring a Safe in any of the Safe Deposit Vaults of Bombay, you are requested to visit our SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT, and you will decide in our favour as others have done.

S. N. FOCHKHANAWALA,

Managing Director.

THE BOMBAY PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATIVE BANK, LTD.

HEAD OFFICE: Apollo Street, Fort, Bombay.

BRANCHES:

Baramati (District Poona)	Virangam (District Ahmedabad)
Islampur (District Satara)	Dhulla (District West Khandesh)
Karad (" ")	Dondalcha (" ")
Tasgaon (" ")	Nandurbar (" ")
Satara (" ")	Shirpur (" ")
Kirloskarwadi (" ")	Shahada (" ")
Shirala (" ")	Sakri (" ")
Koregaon (" ")	Sindkheda (" ")
Kopergaon (District Ahmednagar)	Malegaon (District Nashik)
Shevgaon (" ")	Satana (" ")
Ahmednagar (" ")	Kaiwan (" ")
Bhiwandi (District Thana)	Dohad (District Panch Mahals)
Palghar (" ")	Kalol (" ")
Kalyan (" ")
Akluj (District Sholapur)

DIRECTORS

Sir Ghunnilal V. Mehta, K.C.S.I.,	Prof. V. G. Kale,
Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Kt.,	R. N. Bajaj, Esq.,
Madhraj D. Thackersey, Esq.,	A. P. Kulkarni, Esq.,
R. G. Saraya, Esq.,	D. W. Bant, Esq.,
G. P. Mureshwar, Esq.,	F. B. Lakshmeshwar, Esq.,
S. N. Keshavn, Esq.,	O. M. Gandhi, Esq.,
	Rao Bahadur R. V. Vankar,
	V. L. Mehta, Esq.,

SHARE CAPITAL:—

(Fully Paid) Rs. 12,96,900

1. DEPOSITS fixed for one year and shorter or longer periods are accepted. Rates and other particulars may be ascertained from the undersigned.

2. CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened for Co-operative Societies and individuals. Interest is allowed on daily balances not exceeding Rs. 1,00,000.

3. SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS are accepted and interest paid at 2 per cent. on minimum monthly balances. Rules may be obtained from the undersigned.

4. Drafts are issued on district and other towns on terms to be ascertained on application.

5. The Bank finances only registered Co-operative Societies in the Bombay Presidency, on the recommendation of the Registrar, Co-operative Societies, Bombay Presidency.

6. Accounts are audited quarterly by a firm of Incorporated Accountants and yearly by a Special Government Auditor. Quarterly statements of financial position are published in the "Bombay Government Gazette."

VAIKUNTH L. MEHTA,
Managing Director.

VERY IMPORTANT TO STUDENTS OF INDIAN POLITICS.

A Report of the Proceedings of the Bombay Representative Conference, 1922, known as the Malavia Conference.

The reminiscences of Lord Reading recently published by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru in the columns of the LEADER give important information about the negotiations between Lord Reading's Government and the Congress Nationalists. The Malavia Conference was held in connection with these negotiations. The Report contains interesting correspondence including correspondence between the Viceroy and the conveners of the Conference and Mahatma Gandhi.

Price As. 8 including Postage.

For Copies Apply to:—

The Manager,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER,

Kamakshi House,

Bandra, Bombay 20.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER

831

CENTRAL CLEARING HOUSE OF INFORMATION.

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA has been formed as a Central Clearing House of information and technical data on all matters pertaining of the many uses of cement and concrete.

* All these facts and figures—the pooled experience of the industry—are now through the Association, at the disposal of responsible officials, engineers, architects and surveyors.

* The Association maintains a staff of qualified engineers whose chief aim is to get the best out of concrete on your behalf. On request they will call and discuss any concrete problems and make further investigations, should information be lacking.

* The Association is representative of the whole industry and as such is producing brochures on the many forms in which concrete can be of service to you. Every practising engineer and architect should avail himself of this service—another demonstration of the desire of the Indian Cement industry to help you to the uttermost.

* The Association is debarred by its memorandum from making profits—its existence is justified only if it succeeds in being helpful.

* For further particulars write to

THE CONCRETE ASSOCIATION OF INDIA,
Forbes Building, Home Street, BOMBAY.

If you are interested in obtaining a set of authoritative pamphlets on Cement Concrete Construction, write to P. O. BOX 397, Bombay, quoting reference I. S. R./36.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

For the first time in history representatives of all Creeds, Climes and Cultures met in Chicago in 1933 to seek for spiritual solutions for the problems of the modern world. The World Fellowship of Faiths has published the proceedings of the conferences in a unique volume of 1004 pages. Among the contributors to this volume are distinguished men of all countries—the late Jane Addams, Mrs. Margaret Sanger, John Haynes Holmes, Dr. J. T. Sunderland and John Dewey from the United States; the late Sylvain Levi and Romain Rolland from France; the late Arthur Henderson, Muriel Lester and Sir Francis Young-husband from Britain; H. H. the Gaekwar of Baroda, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and K. Natarajan from India; Professor Hu Shih from China; and messages from world figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Sir Oliver Lodge.

A limited number of copies of this valuable work of reference has now been received. Orders can be booked at Rs. 10/- (Rupees ten only) a copy, postage 12 as. extra.—

OUR TRIP TO AMERICA.

BY
K. NATARAJAN.

Copies can be had at Rs. 3 (inland), 5sh. (foreign), and $ 2 (U. S. A.), postage and packing free from:—

The Manager,

The Indian Social Reformer,

Kamakshi House, Bandra, Bombay. 20.

SAFELY RELY

ON

AMRUTANJAN BALM

FOR THE CURE OF

Cold, Cough, Headaches, Rheumatism, Swellings and all other kinds of Aches and Pains.

AMRUTANJAN DEPOT.

BOMBAY

&

MADRAS.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

Mysore

DRESS and SARI

Fabrics

MYSORE SILK
FABRICS are pure
Swadeshi materials,
made of the finest Indian
Silk yarn, by skilled Indian labour, Indian capital backing the Mysore Government's
enterprise.

In a fascinating variety of distinctive designs in many charming colours and shades,
Mysore Silks are hard-wearing
materials. They wash excellently, their beautiful colours
are permanent, fast to sun and soap.

Government Silk Weaving Factory,
MYSORE.

Agents:—
THE MYSORE PRODUCTS, 191, Princess Street, Bombay.

Leading Stockists:—

1. The Mysore Silk Depot, Svadeshi Market, Kalbadevi, BOMBAY.
2. The Mysore Emporium, Kitab Mahal, Hornby Road, Fort, BOMBAY.

Printed by Jal B. Dubash, Manager, The Commercial Printing Press, 105, Cowasji Patell Street, Fort, Bombay, and Published by Swaminath Natarajan for the Proprietors of the "Indian Social Reformer" Limited, at 105, Cowasji Patel Street, Fort, Bombay.

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

ISSUED EVERY SATURDAY.

Index for Vol. XLVI.

September 1935—August 1936

Editor
K. NATARAJAN,
Kamakshi House, Bandra,
BOMBAY, 20.

PRICE ANNAS TWO.

PRINTED BY J. B. DUBASH, MANAGER, THE COMMERCIAL PRINTING PRESS, BOMBAY.

1936.

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

INDEX

	Page.		Page
A.		Bihar Government and Arya Samajist
Abandoned Wives	626	Missionaries	42
Abbas Tyabji	641	Bihar Squabble, The	373
Adjustment Impossible	243	Birkenhead and Vitthalbhai Patel, Lord	10
Aga Khan as Governor, The	354	Birth Control	298
Aga Khan at the League of Nations	490	Birth Control and Eugenics	229
Aga Khan on Muslim Policy, The	411	Birth Control and Mr. Bole's Proposal	90
Agriculturists, Legal Facilities to	745	Birth Control and Population	218
Alcohol and Road Accidents	12	Birth Control, Doctors and	194
All-India Rabidas Conference	455	Birth Control, Marie Stopes on	457
All-India Women's Conference	296	Birth Control, Sterilisation and	23
All-India Women's Conference, The Tenth	706	Birth Control, The Case for	245
All Things Edify not	55	Birth of a New Nation, The	278
Alternative, The	273	Birth Rate, Campaign for a higher	309
Ambedkar, A Deputation to Dr.	211	Bishop's Conference at Fulda, The	459
Ambedkar's Suggestion, Dr.	118	Bloated Salaries	307
America, Anti-Nehru Propaganda in	723	Boer Lady's Advice, A	278
America Faces the East. 812, 375, 390, 520, 646, 698		Bogus Sadhus	103
America in Africa	4	Bolshevik Red-Rag, The	578
America Return to Prohibition ? Will	825	Bolshevism and Nazism	548
American Attitude towards Indian Immigration	361	Bombay Businessmen's Manifesto	603
American Experiment, An	707	Bombay Finance	403
American Negroes and the Ethiopian Struggle	147	Bombay Legal Aid Society	417
American Tribute to British Genius	451	Bombay Presidency Mahar Conference, The	636
Americans, Two Eminent Living	123	Bombay Special Powers Bill, The	65, 71
America's Indian Policy	147	Bombay, The Social Service League	426
Amritlal Seth, Mr.	754	Bombay Women's Meeting	738
Amritlal Seth's Statement, Mr.	773	Bombay's Condemnation of Italian Aggression	98
Andrews, A Day with C. F.	25	Bombing from the Air	17
Animal Sacrifices at Kalighat	81	Bombing on the Frontier	555
Ansari, The Late Dr. M. A.	577, 585	Bonnerjee Legends, W. C.	310
Anti-Child Marriage Committee, An	23	Bonnerjee, W. C.	273
Antyaja Converts, Concession to	823	Boomerang	205
Apocryphal	355	Brahmo Samaj, Relation to the	353
Arab Women's Appeal	707	Britain and Ethiopia	673
Arab Revolt in Asia Minor	611	British Colonial Secretary, The New	659
Arya Samajists, Ban on	51	British India and the Indian States	129
Aspirations after the Unknowable	486	British National Anthem at Cinemas, The	82
Astonishing Blunder, An	483	British Rule in the Balance	171
B.		Broadcasting by Dancing Girls	371
Babu Bhagwandas' Marriage Bill	675	Broadcasts, "This Great Family"	282
Babu Bhagwandas on his Inter-Caste Marriage Bill	626	Buddha and Miracles, The	515
Babu Rajendra Prasad	506	Buddha's Man, The	501
Bad Blunder, A	353	Buddha's Way, The	501
Bajpai on the Educational Board, Sir G. S.	260	Buddhism and Conversion	163
Bakats, The Rise of the	51	Buddhism and Hinduism	145
Baptism and Christianity	300	Buddhism and World Problems	679
Baroda Hall of Fame	403	Buddhism in India	771
Baroda Government and Joint Family	211	Buddhism, Study of	553
Beacon of Hope, A	257	Buddhist Relics from Mirpur Khas	188
Bengal Hindus' Protest	723	Bullion Merchants, A Hoax on	115
Bengal Whipping Act, The	412, 563	Burma Industrial Exhibition, All	583
Bengali Women's Appeal	391	Bursary for Indian Christian Students	11
Betel Chewing and Cancer	98	Businessmen's Manifesto	563
Bhopal's Convocation Address	225	C.
		Cabinet Minister's Fall, A	626
		Cama Hospital Golden Jubilee	472

realpatidar.com

iii

... 418

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

INDEX

	Page.		Page.
Demand for Weightage	690	Evils of Economic Nationalism, The	217
Democracy, This	273, 307	Excessive European Representation	50
Depressed Classes and Conversion	625, 794	Excluded Areas	356, 369, 386
Depressed Classes and Hinduism, The	161, 168
Depressed Classes, Christians and the	796	F.
Depressed Classes, Sikhs and the	594	Faith and Fire Walking	405
Depressed Indian Christians' Association, The	807	Falling Birth Rate, The	663
Desai's Adoption Bill, Mr.	83	Family and Marriage, The	182
Devadhar, Gopal Krishna	177	Family Settlements among Muslims	715
Devadhar Memorial Committee	537	Farago on Abyssinia	85
Devadhar, The Late G. K.	201	Fascism and Socialists	828
Doctor, Hard on the	61	Fatuous Propaganda	563
Doctors and Birth Control	194	Fazli Hussain on the New Constitution, Sir	535
Dominion Status, Inadequacy of	161	Fazli Hussain, The Late Sir	721
Doon School, The	129, 145	Federation, The Accession of the Princes to	360
Dowry Demon, The	855	Film, A Much-discussed	40
Dowry Evil, The	406, 440, 441	Film of Mecca, Banned	506
Drink Control	60	For Record	482
		Foreign Propaganda	3
E.		Forty-Five years	5
Earthquake Alarms	386	Foulkes, The Late Mr. R.	74
Economics of Conversion, The	359	Franchise Puzzles, The	643
Educated Unemployed in U. S. A.	381	Franco-German Deadlock	465
Educated Unemployment	406	Free Legal Aid for the Poor	422
Education, A Public Responsibility	470, 485	Frontier Policy	546
Education, An Experiment in	807
Education and the Depressed Classes	202	G.
Education and Unemployment in U. S. A.	603	Gaekwar Jubilee in New York	505
Education for Social work	682	Gaekwar's Diamond Jubilee Celebrations
Education in India, Problems of	219	in New York, Maharaja	329
Education in 1933-34	467	Gandhi—Sanger Dialogue	337
Education in U. S. A.	434	Gandhi to Visit Japan, Mahatma	61
Egypt, Trouble in	179	Gandhiji and Birth Prevention	675
Egyptian Crisis, The	226	Gandhiji as a World Figure	69
Egyptian Settlement, The	801	Gandhiji on Conversion	77
Electoral Differences	50	Gandhiji on Social Reform	178
Elwin, Verrier	170, 229	Gandhism and Social Development	83
Elwin's Christmas Message, Mr.	274, 331	Gandhy, The Late Mr. J. D.	769
Emperor and the League	689	Gauba in Egypt, Mr.	167
End and the Means, The	235	General Evangeline Booth	714
English in Indian Education, Place of	504	Geneva, The Women Worker and	22
English Public School, The	165	George Santayana	460
English, Study of	497	German Bill to Promote Marriage, The	12
Englishmen in India	66	German Church Conflict, The	24
Eric Mieville's Appointment, Sir	802	German Refugees' Problem	283
Essence of Advance, The	789	German's Vacation	699
Ethiopia	561	Germany, Unemployment in	490
Ethiopia and the League	114	Germany's Financial Policy	91
Ethiopia and the League of Nations	587	Girl Recalls former Life	204
Ethiopia to Pay, Europe Sins	372	Girls and Depressed Class Education	467
Ethiopian Crisis and the Race Issue, The	139	Gita in a Nutshell, The	120
Ethiopian Situation, The	147, 547	Gita, Mr. Rajagopalacharya on the	551
Europe, Commotion in	433	Glass-Eyes	748
European Muslim Conference, The First	172	God as Mother	104
European Situation	739	Gold Exports	97
European's View of Caste, A	460	Gonds Hindus? Are the	81, 135
Evangelist looks back, An	38	Gonds and Hinduism, The	170
Evangeline Booth, General	714	Government Publicity	597
		Gour Aot and Hindu Family Rights, The	21

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

INDEX

v

	Page.		Page.
Great Indian Ruler, A	327	Hiralal's Conversion	627
Groundless Fear	242	Historical Justice	34
Gurukula University Hardwar, The	184	Hitler's Seven Points	507
H.		Hoare's Speech, Sir Samuel	19
Hammond Committee and Women's Electorates, The	436	Home to Roost	530
Hammond Committee's Report and Women's Constituencies	454	Hosts and Guests	290, 306
Harijan Leader's Warning	442	I.
Harijan Problem, The	124	I. C. S., The	546
Harijan Sevakh Sangh	369, 489	Ideals of Indian Education	727
Harijan Sevak Sangh, Education under the	823	Illiteracy and Education	762
Harijan Workers' Conference	657	Immigration to U.S.A.	418
Harijans and Christians in Mysore	616	Imperial Baby Week	394
Harijans and Conversion	440	Imperial Conferences? No More	612
Harijans, Catholic Conversion of	554	Imperial Preference	578
Harijans, Catholic Proselytising of	537	Imperialism Played Out? Is	148
Hasty Decision, A	499	Independent Labour Party	803
Henderson Dead, Mr.	121	Index	323
Himalayas, Go to the	753	India, A Buddhist Nation	628, 661
Hindi, The National Language	564	India at the Naval Conference	325
Hindu and Parsi Origins	394	India and Abyssinia	33
Hindu Ideals of Education	248	India and Abyssinia, Ancient	172
Hindu Intercaste Marriage Validity Bill, The	629, 648, 693	India and Japan, Trade between	664
Hindu Law of Succession: A Process of Evolution, The	261, 279, 293	India and Lancashire	241
Hindu Mahasabha	259	India and the League of Nations. 481, 577, 617, 724
Hindu Mahasabha and Caste	233	India and the Rejected Proposals	257
Hindu Mahasabha's Opportunity	265	India Bearing Gifts	138
Hindu Muslim Riots in Poona	552	India Hockey Team for Germany	471
Hindu Social Evolution	258	India, Public School in	285
Hindu Social Institutions, The Spirit of	153	India Remain in the League? Should	708
Hindu Social Reconstruction	728	India, Towards Understanding	152
Hindu Society and the Depressed Classes	236	Indian Address to Negus	658
Hindu Society and the New Constitution	810	Indian Adult School Movement	332
Hindu Tolerance, A Demand on	806	Indian Airmen's Success	387
Hindu Widows in the Deccan	43	Indian Annual, The	434
Hindu Widows' Right of Adoption	86	Indian Appeals and the Privy Council	89
Hindu Women and Property Rights	632, 742	Indian Atheletes for Germany	716
Hindu Women's Property Bill,	691	Indian Budget, The	418
Hindu Women's Absolute and Limited Estates	821	Indian Christian View of Mass Conversions	642
Hindu Women's Disabilities	518	Indian Christians and the Scheduled Castes. 562, 594
Hindu Women's Right to Property Bill	726, 805	Indian Christians and their Opportunity	20
Hindu Women's Rescue Home Society	392	Indian Editor, The	28
Hinduism	832	Indian Federation of International Fellowships	348
Hinduism and Aboriginal Tribes	132	Indian F. R. S., An	595
Hinduism and Caste	184	Indian Genius in Politics	568
Hinduism and the Depressed Classes	100	Indian Institute of International Affairs, The	211
Hinduism, Caste in Modern	778	Indian Institute of Science	705, 731
Hinduism, Reviling	305	Indian Muslims and Persian Reforms	73
Hinduism Save Itself? Can	169	Indian National Congress, Five phases of the	378
Hinduism, The Evolution of	314	Indian Nationalists and the Reforms	113
Hindus and the New Constitution	634	Indian Opinion's Lead	243
Hindustan Association of America	89	Indian Philosophy of Life, War and the	598
Hindustani Academy	328	Indian Plane, First	584
		Indian Problem, The	514
		Indian Ruler, A Great	329
		Indian Student Abroad	27
		Indian Troops for Aden	210

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

vi
realpatidar.com

INDEX

	Page.		Page.
Indian Universities, In Defence of ...	427	J.
Indian Women and Journalism ...	363	Jane Addams ...	7
Indian Women in Science ...	426	Japan Changing, Is ...	18
Indian Women's Fellowship of Service ...	572	Japan, Military Rising in ...	401
Indianisation and the British Soldier ...	263	Japan Thinks, What ...	420
Indians and Englishmen ...	370	Japanese Family, The Present Tendencies in the ...	182
Indians and Malnutrition ...	540	Japanese Himalayan Expedition, The ...	827
Indians in East Africa ...	215	Jawaharlal and Bengal Government, Pandit ...	252
Indians in Ethiopia ...	98	Jawaharlal Nehru, Pandit ...	476
Indians in Italian Somaliland ...	137	Jawaharlal Nehru, The Late Mrs. ...	417
Indians in South Africa ...	275	Jawaharlal Vindicated, Pandit ...	289
Indians in Trinidad ...	141	Jayakar on University Education, Mr. ...	228
Indians Overseas ...	268	Jesuitical Reasoning ...	227
India's Contribution to Civilisation ...	162	Jesus and Baptism, Belief in ...	259
India's Depressed Classes ...	763	Jesus and His Mother ...	181
India's Untouchables ...	730	Jesus and Mary ...	181
Indigenous Education, A Picture of ...	618	Jesus, Can Hindus Believe in ...	268
Indigenous Medicines ...	387	Jesus, The Religion of ...	600, 614
Indo-British Contacts ...	450	Jesus, The Teachings of ...	581
Indo-British Trade Relations ...	755	Jews, Catholics and Brahmins ...	67
Indo-Europe, Caste in ...	755, 793	Jews in Germany, The ...	44
Indo-Iranian Home, Ancient ...	387	Jinnah's Advice to Students, Mr. ...	806
Indus Civilization ...	475	Johns Hopkins' University ...	570
Indus Valley Culture ...	705	Joint Family System, The ...	421
Industrial Development of Russia ...	435	Journalism, Diploma Course in ...	60
Inscriptions and Monuments Discovered ...	444	Journalism in India ...	117
Instrument of Accession ...	803	Judo ...	269
Inter-caste Marriages Bill ...	567	Justice Party Crisis, The ...	82
Inter-caste Marriages, The Privy Council on ...	631
Inter-dining and Intermarriage ...	178	K.
Inter-Religious Conference ...	425	Kandaswami Protests, Mr. ...	259
International Conferences of Social Work, Third ...	614	Kannada, Hindi and English ...	280
International Congress of the World Fellowship, London, Second ...	249	Karl Marx on Indian Village Communities ...	602
International Congress of Women, 12th Session, The ...	122	Karnatak Literacy Conference, The ...	275
International Women's Conference ...	362	Katherine Mayo, Outdoing ...	380
Internationalist, A Distinguished ...	26	Katherine Mayo's Book, Miss ...	321
Iranians and Hindus ...	378	Kavitha Incident, The ...	67
Ireland and the British Commonwealth ...	19	Kelkar-Nehru Controversy ...	69
Ireland and the British Empire ...	27	Kenya, Indians in ...	663
Irish Free State, Reconstruction in the ...	371	King among Communists, The ...	531
Islam ...	130	King and the Pandit, The ...	499, 531
Islam and Ahmadism ...	627	King George's Memorial ...	466, 475
Islam, Hindu Influence on ...	322	King, H. M. The Late ...	324
Islam Iqbal on ...	339	King, The ...	737
Islam, Ismailis and ...	339	L.
Islam, Nationalism and ...	162	Labour Party Discussions ...	45
Islam, Polygamy in ...	140	Labour-Saving Machines and Unemployment. ...	721
Islam, Solidarity of ...	341	Languages, The Problem of ...	308
Islam, The Tenets of ...	599	Law of Divorce, Amendment of ...	681
Italians in India ...	3	League Assembly—A Contest of Creeds, The ...	121
Italy and Colonial Possessions ...	411	League Committee of Five's Report, The ...	89
Italy and Ethiopia ...	163, 700	League Mandates ...	164
Italy in Ethiopia ...	577	League of Nations and Italy, The ...	68
Italy-Ethiopian War, The ...	226	League of Nations and the Italo-Abyssinian Dispute, The ...	19
Ithad Party, The ...	529	League of Nations, Failure of the Junior ...	666
I was a Missionary ...	677, 694, 712	League of Nations, The ...	33

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

I N D E X

vii

	Page.		Page.
Lesson from the Bull, A	635	Milk for Babes	609
Liberal Conference, The	738	Mischievous Outburst	707
Liberals, Reforms and the	738	Misconceived Defence, A	754
Liberty of the Press, The	739	Missionary Motive, The	119
Libraries in India	2	Missionary Plans	284
Lindbergh Baby Case, The End of the	499	Missionaries and War	348
Literary Garbage	371	Mistake in Serial Number	627
London, Hindu Temple in	408	Mitakshara Joint Hindu Family	488
London, Pickwick Festivals in	349	Modern India, The father of	43
Lucknow Congress and After, The	549	Mohenjo Daro Inscriptions	465
Lucknow Congress, Draft Resolutions for	487	Monarchy, Back to	147
Lucknow Congress, The	514	Monogamy, a Plea for	755
Lucknow University Parliament	274	Monogamy and Hindu Marriage	641
M.		More Experts	258
Macaulay Vindicated	381	Mother India as I saw her	680
Madras and the New Constitution	209	Motherhood of God	97
Madras, Gerrymandering in	468	Mother of God, The	135, 155, 234
Madras, Version of Congress Origins, A	284	Much Ado About Nothing	402
Maharaja Sayaji Rao Gaekwar	292	Movement for World Christianity	524
Maharashtra Sangeet Samitee	393	Moslem League, The	513
Maharashtra Untouchable Castes	227	Music in Maharastra	387
Mahboob Ali, Syed	266	Muslim States, Concert of	482
Malaviya in Nasik, Pandit	449, 466	Muslim-Kadiani Contretemps	458
Man Among Kings, The	346	Muslim Marriages Bill	104
Man versus the Machine	598	Muslims and Reforms	634
Mangoes and Cholera	595	Mysore Widow Marriage Bill	588, 657
Manifestos	817	Mysore and the World Outlook	649
Marriage and Divorce in India	247	N.
Marriage and Dowry	484	National Socialism & the Catholic Church	90
Marriage Bill, The New	6	Nationalisation in Modern Turkey	186
Marriage Extravagance	450, 474	National Congress Jubilee	257
Marriage Extravagance and the Press	467	Nation of Beggars, A	212
"Marriage Hygiene" and Birth Control	650	Nazi Methods in India	611
Marriage Ideals	756	Nazi Germany, Life in	584
Marriage in India	343	Nazis and Catholics	451
Marriage in Mauritius	451	Nazis and the Justice Party	66
Marriage Legislation in India	472	Need of the Hour, The	276
Marriage Reform, A Plea for	790	Negro Delegation, The	451
Marriage Temple at Allahabad	417	Nehru Replies to Business Manifesto, Pandit	619
Marriage, The End of	761	Nehru Reviews Situation, Pandit	344
Marriage without Bridegroom	405	Nehru's Autobiography	406
Married Women and Employment	421	New Constitution, Dangers of the	209
Marie Stopes on Birth Control	457	News of the Week	716, 556, 541, 13, 125
Marie Stopes on Marriage	469	Newness or Freedom	888
Mary Chesley	617	New People's Party, The	808
Mass Conversions and Catholicism	547	New Provinces, Two	481
Mass Organisations	581	New Russian Peasant, The	491
Matriculation	690	New Outlook towards Social Problems	424
Matriculation Muddle	660	Notes on the Way	613, 745
Mechanism of Sanctions, The	365	O.
Memel Question	53	Oliver Baldwin	194
Memory of Past Birth	195	Open Door for Women	226
Men in Women, Constituencies	483	Organising for a Better World	118
Men and Women Problems of	764	Orthodox Entente, An	242
Message of Peace, A	484	Orthodox of All Religions Unite	250
Middle-Aged, In praise of the	792	Ottawa Pact, The	483
Middle-Aged, A plea for	779

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

vi
realpatidar.com

INDEX

	Page.		Page.
Indian Universities, In Defence of ...	427	J.
Indian Women and Journalism ...	363	Jane Addams ...	7
Indian Women in Science ...	426	Japan Changing, Is ...	18
Indian Women's Fellowship of Service ...	572	Japan, Military Rising in ...	401
Indianisation and the British Soldier ...	263	Japan Thinks, What ...	420
Indians and Englishmen ...	370	Japanese Family, The Present Tendencies in the ...	182
Indians and Malnutrition ...	540	Japanese Himalayan Expedition, The ...	827
Indians in East Africa ...	215	Jawaharlal and Bengal Government, Pandit ...	252
Indians in Ethiopia ...	98	Jawaharlal Nehru, Pandit ...	476
Indians in Italian Somaliland ...	137	Jawaharlal Nehru, The Late Mrs. ...	417
Indians in South Africa ...	275	Jawaharlal Vindicated, Pandit ...	289
Indians in Trinidad ...	141	Jayakar on University Education, Mr. ...	228
Indians Overseas ...	268	Jesuitical Reasoning ...	227
India's Contribution to Civilisation ...	162	Jesus and Baptism, Belief in ...	259
India's Depressed Classes ...	763	Jesus and His Mother ...	181
India's Untouchables ...	730	Jesus and Mary ...	181
Indigenous Education, A Picture of ...	618	Jesus, Can Hindus Believe in ...	268
Indigenous Medicines ...	387	Jesus, The Religion of ...	600, 614
Indo-British Contacts ...	450	Jesus, The Teachings of ...	581
Indo-British Trade Relations ...	755	Jews, Catholics and Brahmins ...	67
Indo-Europe, Caste in ...	755, 793	Jews in Germany, The ...	44
Indo-Iranian Home, Ancient ...	387	Jinnah's Advice to Students, Mr. ...	806
Indus Civilization ...	475	Johns Hopkins' University ...	570
Indus Valley Culture ...	705	Joint Family System, The ...	421
Industrial Development of Russia ...	435	Journalism, Diploma Course in ...	60
Inscriptions and Monuments Discovered ...	444	Journalism in India ...	117
Instrument of Accession ...	803	Judo ...	269
Inter-caste Marriages Bill ...	567	Justice Party Crisis, The ...	82
Inter-caste Marriages, The Privy Council on ...	631
Inter-dining and Inter-marriage ...	178	K.
Inter-Religious Conference ...	425	Kandaswami Protests, Mr. ...	259
International Conferences of Social Work, Third ...	614	Kannada, Hindi and English ...	280
International Congress of the World Fellowship, London, Second ...	249	Karl Marx on Indian Village Communities ...	602
International Congress of Women, 12th Session, The ...	122	Karnatak Literacy Conference, The ...	275
International Women's Conference ...	362	Katherine Mayo, Outdoing ...	380
Internationalist, A Distinguished ...	26	Katherine Mayo's Book, Miss ...	321
Iranians and Hindus ...	378	Kavitha Incident, The ...	67
Ireland and the British Commonwealth ...	19	Kelkar-Nehru Controversy ...	691
Ireland and the British Empire ...	27	Kenya, Indians in ...	663
Irish Free State, Reconstruction in the ...	371	King among Communists, The ...	531
Islam ...	130	King and the Pandit, The ...	499, 531
Islam and Ahmadism ...	627	King George's Memorial ...	466, 475
Islam, Hindu Influence on ...	322	King, H. M. The Late ...	324
Islam Iqbal on ...	339	King, The ...	737
Islam, Ismailis and ...	339
Islam, Nationalism and ...	162	L.
Islam, Polygamy in ...	140	Labour Party Discussions ...	45
Islam, Solidarity of ...	341	Labour-Saving Machines and Unemployment ...	721
Islam, The Tenets of ...	599	Languages, The Problem of ...	308
Italians in India ...	3	Law of Divorce, Amendment of ...	681
Italy and Colonial Possessions ...	411	League Assembly—A Contest of Creeds, The ...	121
Italy and Ethiopia ...	163, 700	League Committee of Five's Report, The ...	99
Italy in Ethiopia ...	577	League Mandates ...	164
Italy-Ethiopian War, The ...	226	League of Nations and Italy, The ...	68
Ithad Party, The ...	529	League of Nations and the Italo-Abyssinian Dispute, The ...	19
I was a Missionary ...	677, 694, 712	League of Nations, Failure of the Junior ...	666
		League of Nations, The ...	33

realpatidar.com

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

realpatidar.com

I N D E X

vii

	Page.		Page.
Lesson from the Bull, A	635	Milk for Babes	609
Liberal Conference, The	738	Mischievous Outburst	707
Liberals, Reforms and the	738	Misconceived Defence, A	754
Liberty of the Press, The	739	Missionary Motive, The	119
Libraries in India	2	Missionary Plans	284
Lindbergh Baby Case, The End of the	499	Missionaries and War	348
Literary Garbage	371	Mistake in Serial Number	627
London, Hindu Temple in	408	Mitakshara Joint Hindu Family	488
London, Pickwick Festivals in	349	Modern India, The father of	43
Lucknow Congress and After, The	549	Mohenjo Daro Inscriptions	465
Lucknow Congress, Draft Resolutions for	487	Monarchy, Back to	147
Lucknow Congress, The	514	Monogamy, a Plea for	755
Lucknow University Parliament	274	Monogamy and Hindu Marriage	641
M.		More Experts	258
Macaulay Vindicated	381	Mother India as I saw her	680
Madras and the New Constitution	209	Motherhood of God	97
Madras, Gerrymandering in	468	Mother of God, The	135, 155, 234
Madras, Version of Congress Origins, A	284	Much Ado About Nothing	402
Maharaja Sayaji Rao Gaekwar	292	Movement for World Christianity	524
Maharashtra Sangeet Samitee	393	Moslem League, The	513
Maharashtra Untouchable Castes	227	Music in Maharastra	387
Mahboob Ali, Syed	266	Muslim States, Concert of	482
Malaviya in Nasik, Pandit	449, 466	Muslim-Kadiani Contretemps	458
Man Among Kings, The	346	Muslim Marriages Bill	104
Man versus the Machine	598	Muslims and Reforms	634
Mangoes and Cholera	595	Mysore Widow Marriage Bill	588, 657
Manifestos	817	Mysore and the World Outlook	649
Marriage and Divorce in India	247	N.
Marriage and Dowry	484	National Socialism & the Catholic Church	90
Marriage Bill, The New	6	Nationalisation in Modern Turkey	186
Marriage Extravagance	450, 474	National Congress Jubilee	257
Marriage Extravagance and the Press	467	Nation of Beggars, A	212
"Marriage Hygiene" and Birth Control	650	Nazi Methods in India	611
Marriage Ideals	756	Nazi Germany, Life in	584
Marriage in India	343	Nazis and Catholics	451
Marriage in Mauritius	451	Nazis and the Justice Party	66
Marriage Legislation in India	472	Need of the Hour, The	276
Marriage Reform, A Plea for	790	Negro Delegation, The	451
Marriage Temple at Allahabad	417	Nehru Replies to Business Manifesto, Pandit	619
Marriage, The End of	761	Nehru Reviews Situation, Pandit	344
Marriage without Bridegroom	405	Nehru's Autobiography	406
Married Women and Employment	421	New Constitution, Dangers of the	209
Marie Stopes on Birth Control	457	News of the Week	716, 556, 541, 13, 125
Marie Stopes on Marriage	469	Newness or Freedom	888
Mary Chesley	617	New People's Party, The	808
Mass Conversions and Catholicism	547	New Provinces, Two	481
Mass Organisations	581	New Russian Peasant, The	491
Matriculation	690	New Outlook towards Social Problems	424
Matriculation Muddle	660	Notes on the Way	613, 745
Mechanism of Sanctions, The	363	O.
Memel Question	53	Oliver Baldwin	194
Memory of Past Birth	195	Open Door for Women	226
Men in Women, Constituencies	483	Organising for a Better World	118
Men and Women Problems of	764	Orthodox Entente, An	242
Message of Peace, A	484	Orthodox of All Religions Unite	250
Middle-Aged, In praise of the	792	Ottawa Pact, The	423
Middle-Aged, A plea for	779

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

viii
realpatidar.com

INDEX

	Page.		Page.
Overseas Indians Reciprocity Bill ...	746	Punjab, Good News from the ...	497
Oxford Movement in Norway, The ...	507	Punjab-Rural Uplift Grant for the ...	423
P.		Q.
Palestine ...	643	Qadians and Muslims ...	449
Panikkar Commends the Reforms, Mr. ...	801	Qualifications, Some ...	451
Parmanand and Congress Women Workers, Bhai. 7		Question of Discrimination, A ...	642
Parmanand's Libel, Bhai ...	802	R.
Paranjpye on Religion ...	305	Radhakrishnan on Hinduism, Sir S. ...	299
Parliament of Religions, Catholic Comments on ...	595	Radhakrishnan for Oxford, Sir S. ...	369
Parsi Poverty ...	785, 791	Raghunatha Rao, Diwan Bahadur ...	522
Parsis of Bombay and Parsi Charities ...	198	Railway but no Engines ...	17
Parsis and Movie Pictures ...	1	Railways and the Public ...	404
Passfield's Impressions of Soviet Russia, Lord ...	44	Raipur Rajakumar College ...	520
Pasumalai Educational Centre, The ...	136, 340	Rajan-Rajagopala Clash ...	819
Pasumalai Schools, The ...	131	Raja Tarangini ...	740
Penal Code & the Press Act ...	49	Rajagopalacharya and the Congress, Mr. ...	786
Peaceful Change ...	251	Ramakrishna Centenary... 353, 563, 547, 536, 519
People's Viceroy, A ...	529	Ramakrishna Centenary Message ...	408
Pelt's Visit, Dr. ...	424	Ramakrishna Gurukul and Vidya Mandir, Trichur, Sri ...	203
Pennsylvania Grants Freedom for Negros ...	29	Ramakrishna and the Modern World, Sri ...	647
Philippine Fellowship of Faiths ...	473	Ramakrishna Memorial Volume ...	360, 374
Philippines, Modern Ideas in the ...	775	Ramachandra Rao, The Late Sir Mocherla ...	595
Picture of Indigenous Education, A ...	618	Rao on the Reforms, H. E. Mr. ...	769
Pitt of Cambridge, Mrs. ...	156	Rashta Bhasha Prachar Examination ...	617
Plague Relief in Borsad ...	149	Rationale of Protection ...	241
Planning for Social Welfare, A Great Experiment ...	710, 725, 741	Raza Ali-Ponnu Sammy Marriage, The ...	323
Plea for Better Sermons, A ...	569	Reading reminiscence, A ...	338, 566
Police & their Powers, The ...	787	Reforms ?, What shall we do with the ...	2
Politicians & Office ...	307	Reforms, Who should work the ...	36
Poona Seva Sadan ...	35	Religion and Religions ...	409, 758
Poona Torture Case, The ...	818	Religion and Economics ...	644
Poona Riot, The ...	545	Religion, Vitality of ...	385
Pope's Paean, The ...	578	Religions and Cultures, Wanted A Synthesis of ...	566
Population Problem, The ...	371	Religious Education,—The Problem of ...	242
Portuguese and Malabar Christians ...	474	Religious Symposium, A ...	580
Post Office Enterprise ...	531	Religious Pretenders ...	98
Post Office Circular, A ...	769	Relief and Reform ...	193
Practical Citizenship & Elementary Education ...	665	Reminiscences ...	283
Prayag Ardhkumbha Mela ...	76	Repeal costs more than Prohibition ...	393
Partiloma Marriages ...	690	Representation of the Scheduled Castes ...	452
Princes & Federation ...	340	Rescue of Abducted Girl ...	137
President, The Next Congress ...	354, 337	Revolution and Reform ...	676
Press, Freedom of the ...	667	Rich & their Workers, The ...	50
Press Laws and the Penal Code ...	66	Risky Propaganda ...	402
Press and the Legislature ...	370	Roads and Railways ...	721
Pre-war Outlook on World Events, ...	122	Roman Catholic Church & the Italy-Ethiopian War, The ...	438
Procedure in Coroner's Courts ...	393	Round Table & India ...	84
Prohibition, The fight for ...	106	Russia, Family Life in ...	109
Prohibition, Will America Return to ...	825	Russia, Another View of ...	396
Proselytism, The "Prabudha Bharata" on ...	97	Russian Orthodox Church, The Emigrant ...	230
Proselytise or not ? To ...	106	Russian Decree ...	743
Proscription Order Modified ...	593	Russian Constitution, The New ...	744
Protection or Privilege ? ...	787	S.
Protection of the Assyrian Christians of Iraq... 202		Saohchidananda Sinha, Mr. ...	825
Provincialism and Communalism ...	146	Samuel Hoare's Speech, Sir ...	19
Public School in India ...	285
Punjab, Co-education in the ...	896

ix

realpatidar.com 807

1933-09-07 -Indian Social Reformer (883)

x

INDEX

realpatidar.com

	Page.		Page.
Trichinopoly Election, The	786	Waiz Memorial Fund, The	691
"Triveni"	753	Waiz, The Late Rev. R. M.	232, 246
Tuberculosis, The fight against	91	War ? Is it	67
Turkey under Kemal Ataturk	309	War & the League, The	82
Turkey, The Education in	211	Water Rates Movement, The	582
Turkish Constitution, The	220	Wayside Reflections	550
Twenty-second Child, A	57	Wedgewood Benn on the New Constitution	83
Two Eminent Living Americans	123	Weighty Pronouncement, A	723
Two Ways, The	453	Well Deserved Tribute	498
U.		Wells, Religion of Mr. H. G.	11
Unappreciated Virtues	129	Wheat from Mohenjo-Daro	60
Unemployment in the United Provinces	355	White & Black in Australia	435
Union or Segregation ?	275	Widow Marriage and Property	770
"Unity" of Chicago	793	Widow Marriage and Hindu Society	775
Unity Editorial, The	707	Widow Remarriage	757
Units of Federation	659	Widow's Adoption and Hindu Law	101
Universities, Sir Mirza Ismail on	233	Wife Beaters, Warning to	818
Universities in India & their Problems	533	Willingdon Regime, The	545
University Education & National Life	218	Willingdon Job, A	770
Universities & Colleges, Demand for more	241	Willingdon's Administration, Lord	516
University Officials	422	Willingdon, Lord	500
University & National Life, The	231	Willing to Wound but Afraid to Strike	205
Untouchability, Abolishing	133	Wives in Hindu Law	778
Untouchability, The Problem of	134	Woman, An Inspiring	538
Untouchability, & Conversion to other Faiths... ..	107	Women and Co-education	355
Untouchable Lincoln	523	Women and Council of State	515
Untouchables, Working for the	151	Women and Moving Pictures	69
Untouchables in the Making	35	Women and War	261
Untouchability and Conversion	410	Women in Hindu Law	763
Untouchability & Sikhism	515	Women Servants of India	563
Untouchability, Mr. Rajbhoj on	435	Women under Buddhist Law	326
Untouchability & Hindu Shastras	234	Women under Fascism	321, 538
Unwise Officials	422	Women Workers in Europe, The	9
Useful Innovation, A	595	Women's Absolute and Limited Estates, Hindu	821
U. S. A., Weather in the	362	Women's College	355
V.		Women's Conference, The	290
Viceroy and Rural Uplift, The	673	Women's Election Manifesto	793
Viceroy and the Byculla Club, The	194, 233	Women's Fellowship of Service	586
Viceroy—Elect, The	59	Women's Organisation, A Directory of	11
Viceroy, The New	513, 532	Women's Right and Religion	298
Viceroy, The Next	419	Women's Right to Property Bill	822, 805, 726
Viceroy's Address to the Legislature	37	Women's Status and Organisation	316
Vijayaraghavachari's European Impressions, Sir T.	53	Women's Role in National Life	274
Vijayaraghavachariya, Mr. C.	131	Working Committee Resolutions, More	523
Village Improvement	561	Working Programme, A	722
Village Uplift—A Suggestion	301	Working the Reforms	83
Village Hygiene, An Experiment in	244	World Congress of Faiths	715
Vishnu—Land what Avatar ? In	820	World Christianity, Movement for	524, 678
Vithalbhai Patel Trust, The	636	World Events, A Pre-war Outlook on	86, 122
W.		Wrecking and Working	69
Wacha, Sir D. E.	385	Z.
Wadia on Parsi Problems, Professor	193	Zanana Mission Work in India	221
Wahabee Movement, The	582	Zanzibar Indian's Case	611
		Zanzibar, Arab Riots in	370
		Zanzibar Legislation, Discussion on	23
		Zanzibar, General Rigby in	197
		Zanzibar, Anti-Indian Legislation in	116

realpatidar.com